Sorun sharply inhaled, and then lowered his hand to the ground. "Yeah, I can see where she's coming from, but it's still complete baloney." He crossed his arms and leaned further back into the post while staring towards Amy, face still disgruntled. "Anyways, because of Mrs. Fun Wrecker's order, I'm strapped for rings these days. So you want my help? I need a Power Ring."

"You can't just help out a friend and fellow Freedom Fighter with a little chore?" Amy asked him. She even went as far as to bat her eyelashes at him. Sorun rolled his eyes at the act.

"You're telling me I should look into my heart and help out a fellow soul in need for no compensation whatsoever for no other reason than she's a fellow comrade and that doing things out of the kindness of your heart is a good thing?" When Sorun saw Amy nod her head at the question, he shook his head much to her disappointment. "Yeah, I should, but I'm not gonna. I'm too desperate for that ring."

It was Amy's turn to roll her eyes. "You're just gonna use it on Nicole to play more games with her when you both have some free time."

"I'm insulted you would make such a valid and likely assumption over me," Sorun said, flaking his voice in sarcasm as he held a hand over his heart. "But as it happens, I have a different idea for that ring and Nicole."

"Oh, really? What's that?"

"It's a secret. You might see it later, though, assuming I get that ring," Sorun answered.

The pink hedgehog sighed out loud at the answer. "Why do you spend so many Power Rings on her, anyways?" she wondered.

"Aside from the fact she's the only fun person to play games with?" The teen flatly asked. "I don't know, Amy, I just don't like that she's cooped up in that computer all the time. She really likes it whenever I help her make her holo-body so she can interact with the world because, you know, she just likes being around and doing stuff like everybody else, so I just thought I'd, er..." He sighed, lowered his head and mumbled something under his breath, and then rose it again with his blue eyes pleading. "Look, I don't care what it takes. I just really need that Power Ring. I'll do anything."

After he'd finished, Amy continued to look at his face, as if she was trying to silently discern something from his features. It went on long enough that Sorun was about to ask what she was doing, but before he could her face suddenly alit with realization. It was a sudden enough change in her face that Sorun had actually jumped back a bit in surprise.

"Ohhhh...!" She started to slowly nod her head, and a wide smile began to form on her face. "Oh, okay. I get it."

"Get it?" Sorun repeated, genuine confusion in his voice. "Get what?"

The question, to Sorun's further confusion, only served to make Amy's smile bigger. "Oh, it's nothing. You're in luck: I happened to have a Power Ring stashed away for rainy days like this. I'll give it to you if you help me carry me all the clothes from Honey's shop back to my home."

"For real?" When Sorun saw Amy give him a confirmatory nod, he jumped up to his feet with a happy gleam in his eyes. "Yes, plan's in motion! Er, ahem." He cleared his throat and looked away when Amy, still grinning, looked towards him with raised eye ridges. "Er, yeah. Come on, we can go right now."

"Jesus Christ, Amy, what the hell..."

Sorun would freely admit he'd underestimated many things in the duration of his life. Today he would underestimate yet another thing: the sheer amount of clothes a girl was willing to buy and haul off. When Amy had described it to Sorun, he'd assumed that she had just been exaggerating and that it wouldn't be too much at all. It was supposed to be a simple job for easy money, or in this case easy ring.

And yet here he was. Bringer Claws out and laden down with he didn't even know how many bags full of clothes. It didn't even end there, as his normal arms as well were burdened with carrying so many bags that his arms were beginning to grow sore from all the bag straps slung over his limbs.

So there he was. Weighed down with probably enough clothes to cover a whole village, standing inside of Honey's shop as the owner and Amy chatted over by the register. A process that had been going on for around twenty minutes now. He didn't even know what they were talking out; he'd mentally tuned them out thirty seconds in. What he did know was that it was now twenty minutes of him standing in place while being slowly crushed by clothes as two girls nearby continued to chatter on and on about something. And his arms were getting too tired to tolerate this much longer.

He cleared his throat. Loudly, as to gain the attention of the two girls so they would stop talking and focus over to Sorun. "I don't mean to interrupt your conversation, but I would very much appreciate it if we could move it along at a slightly faster pace than zero," Sorun intoned, his voice barely above a hiss as he stared at the two. "Can we please hurry this up?"

Of the two girls, Amy was the first one to react by sheepishly grinning towards him. "Eh-heh, sorry, Sorun. I lost track of time. What were we doing?"

"Oh, don't mind him, Amy," Honey said, stepping past the counter while smirking towards Sorun. "No matter where I go boys just can't seem to appreciate the finer things."

Sorun scoffed and rolled his eyes. "Yeah, yeah, I'm a boorish, uncultured individual who has no taste in whatever you two were talking about, now can we pick it up already!?"

All that seemed to do was make Honey's grin wider as her tail swished playfully behind her. "Sure thing. The clothes are already paid for."

His eyebrow twitching in irritation, Sorun slowly exhaled a breath while turning his head towards Amy. "Then what are we even doing here if the clothes are paid for...?"

"Oh, we were talking about the concert!" Amy happily replied, almost oblivious towards the suffering Sorun's arms were going through. "Honey said that she was going, too."

Sorun's arms felt like they were threatening to snap at this point, but he kept up appearances as he faced back towards Honey. "Oh, really now? I didn't know you were into music, Honey."

Honey shrugged. "It's too great an opportunity not to go. See, I signed on a deal with Mina's manager, Ash, to make a bunch of t-shirts with the band's logo on them. And seeing as the whole bunch of Mobians are gonna show up there, well, how could I not go and drum up some business?"

"Always about the money with you, huh, Honey...?" Sorun muttered with a roll of his eyes.

"Hey, I provide a service in the form of producing lovingly-crafted pieces of works for generous rates," Honey replied, turning back to Amy while leaning against the checkout counter. "So, Amy, you were saying about wanting bring somebody to the concert?"

Amy pouted at the question and crossed her arms. "I tried asking Sonic out, but he turned me down."

"Shame." Honey flashed her a sympathetic look that almost melted away instantly once she turned her head over to Sorun's direction. "What about you, Sorun? Got any big plans for the concert tonight?"

"That, is none of your concern," Sorun responded in a flat tone. "I just wanna get this stuff back to Amy's place so I can get that Power Ring she promised me."

"Riiight. Of course." The grin on Honey's face broadened as her tail continually swished in the air behind her. "Amy told me all about that. You seem awfully desperate for that Power Ring, huh?"

Annoyed, Sorun shot Amy a glare, the pink hedgehog responding with a small laugh while avoiding his gaze. Honey just glanced towards Amy, the two locking eyes briefly before bringing their hands up to their mouths to cover their high-pitched giggles.

"The hell is so funny?" Sorun internally wondered, though try as me might he couldn't glean any answers from looking at the girls' faces. All he saw were those knowing, smug looks in their eyes, though why they had those expressions to begin with he hadn't a clue. "Did I miss some piece of context when I stopped listening to them or what?"

Fortunately, Amy chose that time to end whatever it is they were doing and walk towards the front door. "Alright, well, I guess we should get going. Thanks again for everything, Honey!"

"Bye Amy, bye Sorun." She caught Sorun's eyes just as he was making to leave, and then gave him a wink. "Have fun at the concert."

"... I will?" All Sorun could manage was a confused blink, which, much to his frustration, sent Honey into another fit of light giggling. Sorun just helplessly stared on, and then gave up with a shake of his head as he turned towards the door. Amy was nice enough to hold it open for him, but much to his chagrin he saw she still had that knowing smirk on her face just like Honey did. "Girls..." he internally scoffed as he stomped out the door, spectral arms covered with bags trailing behind him.

"The things I'll do for a Power Ring..."

It hadn't been the worst thing he'd ever done, all things considered. Did he get a lot of looks from people while walking through the streets carrying an obscene amount of bags filled with women's clothing? Oddly enough, not as many as Sorun would have assumed he would have gotten. Sorun didn't really know how to take that, but he'd count it as a positive. And despite all his complaining, it'd felt nice helping a friend out, even if he wouldn't admit it to Amy aloud.

The most important thing though was the Power Ring. Amy had thanked him profusely once they gotten back to her home and unpacked all her clothing, and as promised, she'd given him the Power Ring. The one sole reason he allowed himself to be subjected to that ordeal.

With that Power Ring, he had a plan. More of an idea, really, that had begun brewing in the back of his mind during his conversation with Amy about the concert. A nice thing he wanted to do, and a perfect opportunity to pull it off. A desire to do something nice born more out of a sudden whim he'd had more than anything else, really, but one he wanted to enact anyways.

So with that in mind, he descended the steps into the Freedom HQ's main room while tossing the ring up and down. He quickly hid it behind his back once he made it to ground floor when he saw all of two people inhabiting it currently, sitting on the couch and talking. Sonic and Sally, though he was less interested in the former and more interested in the latter. Specifically, something that was in Sally's possession.

Sorun heard them talking about something as he approached, though the conversation died down as he began approaching them. Sonic was the first one to take notice of the human, smiling and waving over in his direction.

"Yo, Sorun!" the hedgehog greeted. "What's shakin'?"

"Nothin' too important," Sorun blandly answered as he made a stop by the couch. "Been hearin' a lotta buzz about this concert that's going on tonight."

Sonic's ears perked up. "Oh, you mean Mina's gig? Yeah, her and her band's always slammin' out some rockin' jams whenever they play. It's gonna be great."

"We usually make it a point to have all the Freedom Fighters attend the event as well to help take the edge off," Sally added. "Were you planning on going, Sorun?"

To the visible relief of both Mobians, Sorun nodded. "Yeah, it seems interesting. I'll drop by." The teen hopped up onto the couch's arm, and then looked down at Sally. "Hey, can I have Nicole real quick? I wanna ask her something."

"Hm? Oh, sure." Nodding at Sorun, Sally began reaching into the inside of her vest wile still maintaining eye contact with him. "What did you want to ask her?"

"Just a little something," Sorun evasively answered. "Nothing you gotta worry about."

There was a scoff from the other side of the couch as Sonic leaned back, lacing his hands behind his quills. "Oh, really? You sure it's just not to just ask her to spend some more time playing games with you?"

"Yeah, keep guessin'," Sorun mumbled in response, quickly but gingerly snatching up the small computer Sally offered to him. He looked down at the computer and opened his mouth to speak, but then paused and looked up when he noticed that the other two were still looking at him. "A little privacy?" he requested.

He didn't like the way Sonic was smirking at him like that. A knowing, teasing smirk that just got on Sorun's nerves instantly because he just knew the hedgehog was thinking of something Sorun didn't like. Sally's reaction was a lot more subdued than the other Mobian's, being mostly accepting of the request as she nodded and stepped up off the couch.

"Okay, sure. C'mon, Sonic," Sally said, gesturing towards the hedgehog.

"Alright." Shrugging, Sonic hopped off the couch, his face still grinning at Sorun. "Wanna go hit the kitchen? Somewhere close by where we can keep talking while-"

" No , I think we should continue this conversation somewhere outside," Sally retorted, sending Sonic an admonishing glare at his suggestion.

He didn't even look fazed by the look, his mouth still set in a smirk. "Just joshin' around with ya, Sal. I would never dream of listening in on Sorun and Nicole." He began stepping around Sally and towards the HQ's exit. "Betcha I can guess what you're gonna ask her, though. Pretty sure what I'm feeling you holding behind your back is a Pow-"

"Hey, Sonic, keep talking and you'll wake up gray one day. I'll use Yamato to separate your fur and quills from the color blue while you're sleeping," Sorun threatened.

Sonic completely froze after listening to Sorun, and then began nervously chuckling as he started backing up towards the stairs. "Eh-heh, heh, just kidding around, Sorun, come on. You know I wouldn't do anything like that." He nervously gulped. "Your sword can't actually do something like that, can it?"

"Who knows? I haven't tried it." A threatening grin began to form on his face. "Wanna help me test it out?"

"I'm good!" By now Sonic's feet had reached the stairs, and he quickly began ascending them. "I'll meet you outside, Sal! Seeya at the concert, Sorun!"

The remaining two watched the blue hedgehog disappear up the stairs, staring up after him a bit before they both broke out in quiet laughter. Sally began shaking her head as her laughter died down, whereas Sorun's expression slowly faded back to neutral.

With her final laugh coming out as a sigh, Sally turned back towards Sorun. "That was a bit cruel, wasn't it?" she asked, though the mirthful look on her face said enough as to what she thought of the threat.

"Eh, nah. Call it payback for having to listen to him yammer on and on during missions." Sorun groaned and began to tiredly rub at his face. "I already have a negative view on the word 'juice', so when I gotta hear him go 'gotta juice!' every other time he spins through a robot it feels like I'm having an aneurysm." He made a "tch" sound and looked towards the ceiling. "Besides. His color would come back when new fur and quills grows and replaces the ones I grayed out. Probably."

Sally shot him a sympathetic look. "I know he can be a handful, but please refrain from pulling a prank that drastic. You can't tell me he's pulled a joke on you that warrants something like that."

"No, but it'd be so easy..." Sorun let out a wistful sigh, and then turned his head down to face Sally again. "Anyways, thanks. I'll only be a few minutes, so-"

"It's fine, you can take your time," Sally said, raising her palms up and shaking them in Sorun's direction as she began following in Sonic's footsteps towards the stairs. "In fact, since you're going to the concert tonight anyways, why don't you just hold onto her until then?"

Surprised, Sorun blinked his eyes as his head moved backwards just slightly. "Really? You're sure?"

Sally nodded. "I trust you with her. You're actually more careful with her than I am sometimes." She turned around to climb up the stairs, reaching a hand behind her to wave goodbye at Sorun. "See you at the concert, Sorun!"

"Uh, yeah. You too." Sorun made the effort to make a half-wave at Sally's back using the hand holding the ring, but due to his surprise he was too slow in making the movement and didn't even get to make it before she disappeared out of sight. He blinked again, and then silently slid down onto the end of the couch.

If there was one thing he wasn't expecting, it was that. He didn't even think he'd get as far as to getting five minutes alone with Nicole,especially with how selective Sally was over who handled Nicole, never mind the rest of the day. He wasn't going to be able to play games with her- he had another use in mind for the ring-, but with a lack of anything further to do for the next few hours until the concert, talking would be nice. He couldn't even begin to fathom what they would talk about, though, as he was still reeling from what Sally said. That thing about trusting him.

It felt oddly nice hearing somebody say that about him.

He looked away from the stairs and towards Nicole's computer body he was holding, and then sighed. Thoughts for later. Important question and next step of the plan now. Assuming he could even muster up the nerve to get that far, because what Sally just said was making him weak. And he couldn't help but feel jittery as he began to realize what he was doing.

"Am I seriously about to go through with this?" he asked himself as he gently placed Nicole down on the couch cushion besides him. "I mean friends hang out and do stuff all the time, right? Yeah. Yeah, this is fine."

Rather hesitantly, Sorun cleared his throat and leaned back into the couch. His eyes flicked down to the computer resting next to him, the green screen lighting up when Sorun called out, "Hey, Nicole?"

"Yes, Sorun?" came the response from the small computer.

"I, uh..." Sorun unconsciously began scratching at his neck and looked off to the side. "I'm sorry I always gotta go through the whole rigmarole of having to ask for you and hand you off back and forth with Sally all the time. I get there's not much to be done about it since your body doesn't have any mobility to it, but it's... I just don't think it's very fair you have to go through that."

Nicole took a moment before responding. "I don't mind it too terribly. It's the consequence of being a computer, despite how... frustrating it can be at times. But you needn't worry about me." Another pause. "I deeply appreciate your concern, though."

"Um, yeah." The nervous scratching increased. "Of course."

"Now could you kindly tell me what is it you wanted to ask?"

Sorun mentally cursed. Of course she'd see him trying to dodge around the subject. "Could you hop out for a bit?" he asked. "I... feel a bit better talking face-to-face with you."

"Sorun, without a Power Ring I cannot maintain my hardlight body for a long stretch of-"

"I know, I know, this'll only take a minute. I promise."

Some seconds passed as Nicole seemed to contemplate the request. He was almost afraid that she'd deny him, and he found himself holding his breath when the computer's green screen lit up again. "Very well," she agreed, making Sorun slowly exhale the breath he'd been holding. "Please hold for a moment."

Right after speaking, Sorun saw the black and green pixels that were Nicole's body began to form and take shape. He leaned further back into the couch, looking up at the ceiling and humming quietly to himself as he waited for the process to finish. Seconds later he sat back forwards in a normal position while turning to look at Nicole.

And just as expected, there she was. The holo-lynx looked more curious than anything else, but otherwise seemed pleased to see him. Sorun, in response, crossed one leg over the other and rested his right arm on the couch's arm, clearing his throat as he searched for the words to say.

"So..." he began, pausing to nervously drum his fingers on the couch. He was starting to wonder if requesting to talk to her in person had been a mistake or not. "There's a concert tonight," he finally settled on.

"Yes, I'm aware," Nicole said with a nod. "Evidently Mina's music tends to draw in a large crowd. From how Sally tells it she's quite good." She looked to the side a bit, expression unchanging. "I've heard a bit, through the handheld's speakers. I've never been to one of her concerts in person, though. I was often busy accomplishing one task or another on the HQ's computer."

"But you're free tonight, right?" Sorun asked.

She gave him a confirmatory nod. "I did not plan on accomplishing anything tonight."

"Cool, cool..." With his left hand, Sorun held up the Power Ring Amy had given him and began spinning it around on his index finger. "I hustled this Power Ring off Amy," he explained upon seeing Nicole's surprised look.

One of Nicole's eyes twitched in confusion. "You... did what to Amy?"

"It was a completely consensual arrangement, don't worry about it," Sorun answered with a wave of his free hand. "Truth is I've never been to a concert myself, even in my previous life. You're always going on about how you'd like to experience life like other people more, and this concert's tonight, so I just thought, you know... we could make it a learning experience and go to the concert."

The long moment of silence that passed between them did nothing to sooth Sorun's nerves. He saw Nicole giving him a critical look, her eyes going back and forth between him and the power ring as mild shock overtook her features. Meanwhile Sorun was playing the words he just said over in his head over and over while wondering if he'd said the right thing. Finally, she asked, "You went through all the trouble of getting a Power Ring just so I could experience a concert in person?"

"I mean, it wasn't that much trouble." Oh, how he wished that was true. "I just thought we'd do something different for a change. Video games are nice and all, but there's more to life than just that. Variety being the spice of life and all that."

More silence passed, and Sorun anxiety built up. Nicole looked down in thought for a second, and then looked back up at Sorun's eyes. "Are you asking-?"

"For my best friend to accompany me to a public social event to experience life a little? Yeah, totally," Sorun quickly finished for her with a nod. "And Sonic, Sally, and everybody else is gonna be there, too, so we can all have a bit of fun. Maybe make it a big thing, you know? We don't really get a lot of time off like this so I figured we could just live it up a bit."

In response, Nicole closed her mouth at having her own thought finished with her. She didn't say anything, either. She only just continued to silently stare at Sorun with a strange, unreadable expression he couldn't place. A look that that was doing nothing to help ease his anxiety, as he truly had no idea why she was staring at him with that strange look.

And then she disappeared.

The sudden disappearance had been so sudden and without warning that Sorun had jumped in his seat in surprise at it. He almost began panicking, too, though held off when he saw the green display on Nicole's computer body light up. He breathed out in relief, and then leaned forwards.

"My apologies if I frightened you again. The power demand for maintaining that form became too great," Nicole said through the computer's speakers. "As to your invitation, Sorun... I would very much be delighted to try and 'live it up' as you put it. I think experiencing something new in my holo-body would be... rather nice. So yes. I'll go to the concert with you."

"O-oh." Well that had been easy. Far more easy than he'd expected it to be. It certainly took a weight off of his chest, and he felt himself begin to breath easier. He had a distinct feeling all that anxiety would return later tonight, but that was for Sorun in the future to worry about. Right now he just wanted to be ecstatic over the fact that Nicole had said yes. "Okay then!" Sighing, he shifted his form so that he was lying on the couch, carefully placing Nicole in a position so that he wouldn't accidentally knock her over.

All of that mental exertion had gone and made him tired. That and the physical exertion from having to deal with Amy's antics. Now that he had finally calmed down, he decided he wanted to sleep. And maybe if he was lucky he'd be able to sleep all the way to the concert so he and Nicole could just go immediately. Sounded like a great plan to him.

"Nicole? You don't mind if I take a nap, do you?" Sorun asked. "I'm just kind of tired from some stuff I did earlier today, so could you do me a favor and wake me up around seven if I don't wake up myself beforehand? I don't wanna oversleep and have us miss the concert."

"It's no problem at all, Sorun. Though I have to wonder what you were doing that made you so tired," Nicole said.

Yawning, Sorun leaned his head back and closed his eyes. "I'll, uh... I'll tell you later on the way to the concert. It had to do with Amy and the whole... eh, I'll tell you about it when I... mf..." He only managed to get that far before finally falling asleep.

It was decided by the ones organizing the concert that the event itself would take place in a large, open plaza at the edge of Knothole City, near towards the edge of the forest. Sorun didn't think there was ever a time he'd seen so many Mobians packed together in once place before; no matter where he went there were crowds of people wandering all over the place, all of them excitedly chattering about the going-ons and about the coming concert. Around two-hundred if he were to accurately estimate a number. A rather sizable portion of the city's whole population.

By now it was sunset, the sky being colored a dark orange mixed with dark blues as night threatened to settle in. Despite the approaching night, everybody around seemed to be more awake than ever. It was almost suffocating to Sorun, seeing all these happy and bustling people around him. It didn't help that he felt a bit out of place being the only human walking around, but fortunately, nobody paid him any mind. He'd actually gotten a few hellos from some strangers, which went far in improving his mood.

It felt nice, feeling included along with everybody else despite looking so different, despite his own personal grievances over the matter. And it felt great seeing all these people around being so happy as well. It helped Sorun to forget everything else happening in the world and Eggman, which he supposed was the whole point of this event. To give people a break from it all. It really was working, too. Sorun couldn't remember the last time he felt so good.

"Huh. So this is what a concert is like." Sorun felt a rustling on his left shoulder, and looked towards it to see a Chao sitting on his shoulder. Virgil looked about as excited as everybody else from the way his eyes and smile were so wide as he looked around at the crowds around them. "Even Virgil is all excited. Man."

"Sorun!" The sudden call of his voice snapped Sorun out from his thoughts and made him turn to his side. Instantly he saw Nicole enter into his view, wide smile on her face. "You were right! This is wonderful!"

"H-ha, yeah, I know, right?" Sorun weakly muttered in response, a forced smile on his own face. He wasn't used to seeing Nicole, or anybody, really, this happy. But the second he'd walked her along with Virgil over to the concert and inserted the Power Ring into her computer body so she could generate her Mobian body, her face had just lit up in the most purest form of wonder Sorun had ever seen from all the merriment going on around her. Sorun could barely even keep up, as she just kept walking around to try and experience as much as possible in the time she had.

In a way, he was happy for her and glad he was able to give her this opportunity. Seeing the smile on her face alone was making Sorun beam inside and struggle to keep it contained under a neutral expression. But then there was the voice in the back of his mind telling him that he was doing too much, that even for somebody he admitted to being friends with that this was probably going too far.

That he was getting a bit too attached and would only make it worse for her when he died. He pushed those thoughts aside, though, as at the moment he didn't care too much. He rather liked seeing Nicole this happy, and he was having fun himself, so he was doing his best to ignore those voices.

"Sorun, come on!" Nicole had tried grabbing at Sorun's hand to try and drag him somewhere. Sorun avoided the attempt by quickly shoving his hands into his pockets while leaning back. The movement was subtle enough that Nicole didn't even seem to register it, and instead began waving at him to follow her. "I saw Sally and Sonic a bit further ahead!"

Wordlessly, the teen began following Nicole as she led him further up the plaza. "What the hell am I doing?" Sorun wondered to himself as he watched the brown and black lynx ahead of him. "Aren't I supposed to be avoiding doing stuff like this? Argh, but it's fine, though, right? It's just a bunch of friends going to a concert, and fuck me for wanting to have some fun before I die. At least Nicole's having a good time." He sighed and looked back at the horizon just as the sun almost finished setting completely. "Nah, it's fine. This is normal. Just me and some friends having some fun on our day off."

He would have figured he was allowed at least one break, and after everything else, he figured he might as well collect it now. For all he knew an opportunity like this wouldn't turn up again. And he felt that Nicole deserved the experience. So he'd just enjoy the night and then go back to the daily grind of fighting a mad tyrant tomorrow.

"Chao?" He felt one of Virgil's limbs press into Sorun cheek, which caused the teen to reach a hand up to rub at the Chao's forehead while continuing to face forwards.

It wasn't that difficult to keep track of where Nicole was going amongst the crowds. Her lynx body was distinct even compared to all the other Mobians around, and Sorun would be disappointed in himself if he couldn't find that purple dress she always wore. Eventually she stopped in front of a pair of Mobians, one who Sorun recognized immediately from the fact their body was blue. The human managed to stop just as Nicole began conversing with Sonic, Sally standing right besides the hedgehog.

"- I just have never experienced such an event myself, and thus far I've been enjoying it immensely," Nicole explained, Sorun only having caught the tail end of the discussion. "I have Sorun to thank for having brought me all the way here and giving me a Power Ring to maintain this body long enough."

Sally, for her part, was practically beaming. "I'm so happy you managed to make it!"

The two continued to converse among themselves while Sorun watched on. He took note of a blur passing by him along with a gust of wind that hit his face right after, and then took note of something jabbing into his side. Sorun looked towards the right to see Sonic jamming his ribs with his elbow, smug look on his face.

"I totally called you were gonna use the Power Ring to bring Nicole to the concert," he claimed, arms crossed and smug grin somehow growing even more smug.

Sorun, mouth turned downwards in a light frown, rolled his eyes. "You didn't call jack squat," he retorted. "And anyways I just wanted her to be here with the rest of us. Since she's part of the team."

"Yeah, Sorun, sure."

He didn't like the way Sonic said that, and in return he looked towards Nicole and Sally. "You came here with Sally, huh?" he noticed, eyes turning back to Sonic. "What a coinkydink that is."

The amount of satisfaction Sorun got from seeing Sonic turning flustered was immense. "That isn't- we aren't, well, we- it's complicated, Sorun,"

"Yeah, Sonic, sure," Sorun said, mirroring Sonic's earlier words. The hedgehog just pouted at that. "I just wanted to take my friend out to a concert to hang out with us. There seriously something wrong with that?"

"Come on, man, I wasn't being serious. I was just having some fun," Sonic promised, nodding his head in agreement to Sorun's question. "How come she gets to be a friend though and not me?"

"Because she doesn't suck at video games. And you do," Sorun flatly answered.

Sonic shook his head in denial. "No, I'm great at video games. You and Nicole are masters with them because she's an AI and you just happen to be as perfect with them as physically possible."

"You keep telling yourself that to make yourself feel better. You'll still never beat me at a video game."

"You're just happy to have one thing you're better at over me, huh, Sorun?" Sonic ground out, teeth grit in an otherwise competitive smile.

Sorun shrugged in response. "I'll take what I can get." He heard the rapid thumps of something hovering close by over the chatter of the nearby crowds, and turned towards the sound just in time to see a two-tailed fox land besides him and Sonic. "Oh, hey Tails."

"Hey, Sorun! Sonic!" The young Mobian waved to the pair and then stepped towards Sonic's side. "I didn't miss the concert yet, did I?"

"Nah, buddy, you're just in time," Sonic said as he reached forwards to rub Tails on top of his head. "C'mon, let's go find a good spot!"

Hanging back a bit, Sorun watched as Sonic with Tails in tow met back up with Sally, who had just finished her conversation with Nicole. They exchanged a few more words before they departed, leaving Nicole behind as she waved goodbye to them. Sorun continued watching the display for a bit, and then stepped up to Nicole.

"So," the human began, his word's drawing Nicole's attention as he stopped next to her, "how're you feeling about all this?"

"It's all so very stimulating," Nicole admitted to him, wringing her hands together while still holding that happy smile. "The sight and sound of all these people, walking around and interacting with all our friends in the open like this. It's... I've never experienced anything like this before. I can't even properly describe the sensations I'm experiencing at the moment."

"Chao-chao!" Sorun actually had to lean his head back with a grimace when he heard Virgil chirp so happily and loudly right next to his ear.

Nicole's smile widened at the sight, and she attempted to hide it with her hand when Sorun cast an annoyed glance at her as a result. "It seems Virgil is enjoying himself as well," Nicole noted.

"Well, I don't think he's ever experienced a concert, either. It's a new experience for all of us." As Sorun rubbed at his ear, he looked to the side past the crowds and caught sight of a body of red fur being lead by a lighter red body. Sorun almost laughed out loud when he saw that Knuckles looked almost as miserable as Sorun felt all the time, which was a high contrast to how much enjoyment Julie-Su looked to be having. "Yeah, a new experience for a lot more than us," he murmured.

"Yes, I can see," Nicole agreed with a nod. "Sorun-"

"Hey, you two!"

Having been cut off by the cheerful voice cutting Nicole off, the holo-lynx, human, and the Chao all turned towards the voice. Sorun and Nicole's eyes lit up in recognition when they saw Amy standing besides them, hands clasped behind her back while happily grinning towards the two.

"Hi, Amy," Sorun greeted with a wave. Virgil mimicked the action and did the same, gaining a giggle from the pink hedgehog. "Glad to see you made it. Seriously, thanks a million for the Power Ring."

"Oh, don't even worry about it. I'm happy to help out." Amy's gaze shifted from Sorun to Nicole. "I'm even more happy to see you put it to good use. It's great to see you out and about, Nicole!"

"Thank you, Amy. It's good to be here with the rest of you."

While listening in on the conversation, Sorun tilted his head downwards towards Amy's red and white dress. A dress that looked startlingly similar to the dress he always saw her in. Which was odd, as he could have sworn he heard her say she'd bought a new outfit just for the occasion. In fact, he'd carried such an outfit back to her home. And now that he looked closer, her outfit as a whole was largely the exact same with the exception of a fuzzy pair of pink earmuffs over her ears.

"Hey, uh, Amy?" Sorun asked, drawing the attention of her and Nicole. "Weren't you gonna wear something different for the concert?"

After hearing Sorun's question, Amy nodded her head. "Ah-huh. I did. This is my new outfit," she said, gesturing to her lower body with her hands.

"... It looks the same as what you usually wear," Sorun noted with a strained voice.

"Nu-uh, this outfit's from a completely different seasonal line," Amy denied with a shake of her head. "It's not about how the outfit looks. It's about keeping up with the current fashion trend while having just enough outfits to provide me with a bit of variety."

Sorun felt a vein on his forehead begin to throb. "Could you explain to me how having a bunch of outfits that look the same is variety ...?"

Amy's response was just to scoff while turning her head away. "Just because they all look similar doesn't mean they're all the same, but I don't blame you for making that assumption. It's a common mistake."

Sorun had to breath in heavily just to calm himself, but even still a few blue, spectral feathers managed to appear behind his back and fall to the ground. He reached a hand up to pinch the bridge of his nose, and then grumbled under his breath as he refocused on Amy. "So what's up with the earmuffs, then?"

"Hm? Oh, it's just a bit chilly out so I thought I'd wear it," she answered. "Hey, when's the concert supposed to start, anyways? Isn't it around eight?"

"I believe they're beginning right at this moment," Nicole informed them, pointing ahead towards the front of the plaza.

Where Nicole was pointing, with its back to the trees behind it, was a large, makeshift stage that had been set up just for the occasion. By now almost all of the Mobians who had attended had crowed up to be as close to the stage as possible. A few Mobians were up on stage holding various instruments, though any and all chatter in the crowd died down instantly when a certain Mobian among those on stage began walking towards the front where a microphone was.

Sorun, having settled into somewhere in the middle of the crowd alongside Nicole and Amy, couldn't help but to quietly whistle when he saw the hundreds of Mobians all around instantly quiet down when Mina walked up in front of the microphone. Not just because of how her mere presence made everybody quiet down, but from the way her entire demeanor changed from when he'd seen her earlier today. When he'd crashed into the yellow mongoose he got the impression of a shy and timid girl who he could hardly believe could go perform on stage.

This Mina, though, was completely different from the one he saw then. The clothing and face was the same, but the only emotion Sorun could think to describe how she looked was confident. Confidence mixed in with just a little bit of excitement as she took hold of the microphone. She tapped on it once, reeled her head back a bit when the feedback sounded out, and then cleared her throat as she leaned into the microphone.

She proceeded to shout right into the thing.

"Hello, Knothole!" Her voice reverberated right outside the giant sets of speakers stacked behind her and was amplified out to the crowd in front of her. The entire crowd cheered as a result, which only served to make Mina shout even louder into the microphone. "I hope you're ready, because... because we..."

Mina trailed off, her words going completely silent as she began to slowly rock on her feet. The band members behind her even began to become visibly drowsy, and before anybody could say anything, the entire band, Mina included, collapsed right there on stage.

Naturally Sorun assumed that panic would ensue due to the fact Knothole's favorite singer just collapsed onstage. He himself was starting to panic from the sight. That didn't happen. In fact, there was barely any reaction from anybody at all. Even more worryingly was that the Mobians all around started dropping to the ground in droves. Not even a minute had passed before seemingly every single Mobian in attendance to the concert fell motionless onto the ground right then and there.

There were only four exceptions to everybody dropping: Nicole and Amy, who were both glancing around at the fallen field of Mobians with terrified looks on their faces, Virgil, who just looked confused as he hung off Sorun's shoulders, and Sorun himself, who was so bewildered by what he was seeing that he didn't know what expression to make.

"... Huh? Egh..." Sorun winced and held a hand up to his head. There was a mild, dull throb in his head causing him mild discomfort, and beyond that he could faintly hear a sound. A low, buzzing sound that was so quiet that he could barely hear it. "What the... what is this?"

"W-what's going on...?" Amy stammered, taking a step back from the visage set in front of her. Nicole, by contrast, immediately crouched down to examine the nearest fallen Mobian. "Why... why are they all...?"

"They're fine," Nicole quickly informed her, fingers pressed against a fallen Mobian's wrist. "I'm detecting life signs. They were all... rendered unconscious?" she mumbled, face scrunched up in confusion.

Sorun, still standing nearby, felt some small relief at the words; he'd been fearing the worst the moment he saw people beginning to drop. But even the knowledge that they were all just asleep did little to put him at ease, as there was a still a couple hundred unconscious Mobians laying around them.

And there was still that incessant buzzing in his ear.

"Is anybody else hearing that sound?" Sorun asked, going as far as to dig a finger in his ear as if trying to root something out. "It's really... this noise is really bugging me."

"Sound? What-?" Nicole looked up from the body she was examining to affix Sorun with a questioning look, but then froze mid-way. Her ears perked up, and for some reason, she turned her head towards the stage. "Now that you've said it, I'm detecting an odd frequency, though I cannot determine exactly what it is." She pointed towards the stage. "But I can tell it's coming from there."

"The stage?" Sorun followed the direction Nicole was pointing to look at the band's stage. At first, nothing seemed to look out of the ordinary. On a second glance, when he looked closer, he saw that there was indeed something amiss. One of the large, black, rectangular speakers in the back was moving. The circular speaker part of the speaker was oscillating back and forth, as if it was playing sound.

Sorun found himself frowning. A mysterious sound he was hearing, a speaker that was seemingly outputting something, and a whole field of knocked-out Mobians. With how this world worked there was no way it was a coincidence.

"... You still have your computer body on you, right, Nicole?" Sorun asked, glancing towards the lynx while still keeping his body faced towards the speaker.

Nicole nodded. "Yes, of course."

"Mm." He turned his head a bit more to face both Nicole and Amy. "Alright, I'm gonna go check that speaker out. Might cut it if it turns out to be too weird. You two just hang back, alright?"

"Are you sure you don't want me to tag along?" Amy asked.

Sorun shook his head. "I think I can handle a single speaker. Just... just stay with Nicole and look out for anything weird, alright? I'll be back in a bit." He paused, and then reached up to remove the Chao from his shoulder. "Look after him for a bit, too," Sorun added as he handed Virgil off to Amy, who took him without complaint. Virgil seemed to squirm in her grasp and reach out towards Sorun, but this went ignored by the human as he faced forwards.

He took off without another word, not bothering to look back at the three as he stomped his way towards the stage. He wasn't too worried about leaving them behind, not with Amy among them, and at the moment his focus was more on finding out whatever this sound was and getting it to stop. And right now, he strongly suspected that the sound was coming from that speaker.

"We finally catch a break and this happens," Sorun bitterly lamented as he began climbing up the edge of the stage. "Pisses me the hell off. Everybody was looking forward to this- hell, I was looking forward to this. It was Nicole's first concert, too..."

Taking steps towards the back of the stage, he came upon the large, rectangular speaker that was a bit more than twice as tall as he was settled against the rightmost wall of the stage, still oscillating back and forth as if playing something. "Nicole said this thing is pumping out a sound frequency. Is this what knocked everybody out? But if that's true, then how come Amy, Virgil and I didn't get hit? Nicole probably got away with it for being an AI or something, but... ah, I don't know." He squinted and looked closer at it. "It just looks like an ordinary speaker to me. I should probably still cut it up anyways, just to be- hey, wait a sec..."

Out of the corner of his eye, he noticed that there was something off on the upper right corner of the black speaker. There was a small, thumb-sized sticker of an acorn stuck to that spot, but the adhesive seemed worn out in the way the corner of the sticker was sagging off of the sticker. Intrigued, Sorun reached up towards the sticker, grabbed the loose end of it, and quickly pulled the sticker off from the speaker.

His eyes nearly bugged out from his head when he saw Eggman's red logo, seemingly grinning down at Sorun, under the sticker and etched right into the speaker's case.

"Red flag, red flag!" Sorun's left hand unconsciously gripped the sheathed katana that manifested in his grasp. Right before he could even so much as pull the sword out, however, something new with the speaker happened. At the top of the speaker, at the center, a metallic lens opened up. There was a bright, red flash, and in the next instance Sorun saw a solid red light bleeding out from the freshly-opened aperture that was seemingly staring down at the teen. "RED EYE!"

He would have cut the speaker in half right there with the Yamato. He made the motion to do so, too, but before he could the speaker blared out. The resulting soundwave hit Sorun before he could do anything, and as a result he was blasted right off of the stage.

The sensation of his back hitting ground barely registered in Sorun after a couple of seconds of flight, but at the moment he felt his senses were under assault. His ears were intensely ringing from being knocked back by a large blast of sound, and even his vision was blurred and spinning. He felt an intense wave of nausea, and very faintly, at the corner of his hearing past all the ringing, he could hear two voices call out his name.

That was about as far as he was able to get before falling unconscious.

Waking up from falling unconscious was always an unpleasant affair for Sorun. It wasn't a pleasant rising, like one would experience from falling asleep. There was a lot more grogginess involved, and as sensations began to return to him vague pains of soreness in his back and head began to rise as well. Through that all, he could still faintly hear two voices speaking to each other, and that was enough to prompt him to get up.

Groaning, Sorun sat upwards as began to rub at his forehead. The surroundings were dark, but there was just enough light for him to make out the wooden walls, shelves, and fixtures spread about. From a first glance, it seemed like he was sitting on the floor of a small shop. He was clueless as to why he had woken up here of all places, though, as the last thing he remembered was being knocked unconscious from a speaker.

"Chao! Chao!"

"Sorun!" Past the fading ringing in his ears, he heard somebody call out his name. He turned his head towards the voice, and then widened his eyes slightly when he saw two figures crouched near the door. Even in the dark he could instantly make out Amy's bright pink fur against the dark background, with Virgil's blue and yellow body resting on her head. Nicole, whom Sorun only now realized had been the one to call out his name, was a bit harder to see, though the purple dress and green eyes were clear enough for him to make out.

Silently, he watched as both of them made their way from the shop's door to just in front of him. Both had concerned looks on their faces, Virgil looking equally concerned, which at any other time he would have been touched by if the intense feelings of worry over everybody and the absolute rage flowing in him for having been knocked out by a speaker of all things wasn't flowing through him. But as it was, they were. And he was not happy about it.

"Sorun? Are you okay?" Amy was the first one to speak out in concern over his wellbeing, and then reached a hand out to grasp his shoulder. "Y-you got knocked back by that thing, and you wouldn't wake up so-"

"I'm fine," Sorun interrupted, brushing her hand off of his shoulder while rubbing at his forehead with the other hand. "How long was I out? And what happened?"

"You were only unconscious for just under ten minutes," Nicole supplied from besides Amy. The barest hint of worry had gone from her face along with Amy at hearing Sorun speak, though her overall expression was still set in a deep frown as she glanced back at the shop's door. "You were unresponsive after getting knocked off the stage from that sonic blast. We were forced to take cover when that arrived shortly after, so we carried you to the nearest structure we could find."

Sorun followed Nicole's gaze towards the door, and then slowly got up to his feet. He was still disoriented just enough that he stumbled the slightest amount upon getting up, but he managed to catch himself just fine and then walked towards the door. He crouched down near its side, and then peeked out through the glass window at the top to get a view of the situation.

He could see the plaza and stage right outside of the window, and indeed all the Mobians that had been gathered for the concert were still passed out and lying about. That damnable Eggman speaker was still up on stage, too, and even from here Sorun could see that singular, red, mechanical eye-like light near its top. He suddenly had a very great desire to destroy it right there and now.

What he didn't remember being there was a large, floating ship parked just to the side of the concert area. A black and red, angular ship that was about the size of a large bus that had Eggman's logo stenciled on its side. Right in front of it he could see around ten of the red-painted Egg Pawns moving in and out of the ship, carrying large, egg-shaped metal pods out from a ramp leading into the ship's interior.

And just outside of the ship, seemingly directing the Egg Pawns, was him. Not in person, of course- there was a small, egg-shaped white drone floating around and projecting a mere holographic image of him that was floating just above the drone, but it was him. Even from a distance where Sorun could just barely make him out, he could clearly see that it was Eggman. And the mere sight of even just his holographic image was setting Sorun off on new heights of anger he didn't even know existed.

"Of course. Of course this is his doing. It's always his doing," Sorun thought to himself, hand roughly pressing against the door's wooden frame as his fingers began to angrily drum across them. "His robots attacking people, his schemes ruining people's lives, his goddamn speaker ruining the freakin' concert-!"

"Sorun." The calming voice voice from just behind him served to snap Sorun out from his thoughts, causing him to glance behind him. Nicole was there, standing behind him and reaching out to place a hand on his shoulder to get him to focus on her. "I know this situation is distressing, but please calm down."

He wanted so badly to just ignore her and storm right outside the door to confront Eggman's hologram and his robots right now, but Nicole's calming presence helped put his mind in a better place and helped him realize that perhaps this wasn't a time to be making brash actions. So with a reluctant nod, he stepped away from the door and settled in a kneeling position right next to Amy with Nicole moving just besides him.

"Alright, alright. So I think it's pretty safe to infer Eggman did something to sabotage the concert, 'cause I saw a big ol' Eggman logo on that weird speaker," Sorun began as he stuck a thumb out towards the door. "Saving the question of 'why' for later, why don't we figure out what we're gonna do about this?"

"I took some time to analyze the odd frequency we encountered earlier while you were unconscious," Nicole said right after Sorun finished. "This is just an educated guess based on what little rudimentary data I managed to gather, but based on the composition of the frequency and from what evidence we've seen, it's possible that anybody exposed to that sound frequency were forced into a state of suspension, though I'm unsure as to how exactly Dr. Robotnik accomplished this. I believe we can conclude, however, the source of this frequency is coming from that speaker."

Amy rose a hand up to gain the attention of the two. "I'm not complaining that we weren't knocked out, but, uh... how come we weren't knocked out?"

"Well, Nicole's an AI with a computer body, so she doesn't have organic ears or a brain or whatever that signals can mess with like organics," Sorun reasoned as he glanced back at the door. "And I dunno, maybe whatever he did only works with Mobians. I'm pretty sure I still heard that thing, but I didn't drop to sleep like everybody else, so that would explain me and Virgil. And you, uh..." Sorun turned back to Amy, looked up at her head, and then gave her a shrug. "Maybe... your earmuffs?"

"Her earmuffs?" Nicole repeated while giving Sorun an unconvinced look. "I admit it's odd that Amy was unaffected in the same way we were unaffected, but I highly doubt-"

"Actually, I had Honey make me these earmuffs along with the rest of my new clothes," Amy interjected with a small grin, gaining both of the others' attention. "And, well, loud music can be really harsh on my ears, you know, so I asked her to put in some extra padding to help soundproof them so I could enjoy the concert better."

At hearing the explanation, Sorun shot Nicole a look along with a slightly smug smirk. Nicole seemed to have caught it and did her best to ignore it by continuing to face Amy, though Sorun still saw one of her ears flick in irritation. He huffed out an amused snort through his nose, and then looked back towards Amy. "Alright, mystery solved. Now what are-?"

"Snrrkrkrk..."

All three heads perked up in shock at hearing what could best be described as a snore. The trio of Freedom Fighters glanced at each other, and then slowly traced their heads towards the source of the noise: the counter behind them, where they could now clearly hear sounds of snoring coming out from behind it. They all shot questioning looks towards one another, ending with Sorun sighing and standing up so he could maneuver around to look behind the counter.

After stepping past Amy and Nicole, Sorun reached the end of the counter. His hands grabbed onto its edge, and slowly he tilted his head around the corner so he could see who it was that was back there and snoring. The very first thing he noticed when he looked around was the color green- a lot of green. And that the body hosting all of that green was abnormally large and covered in scales. Fortunately, though, Sorun recognized him at first glance, though it didn't stop him from palming his face.

"Oh, for the- it's Vector," Sorun announced as he moved behind the counter and began to move towards the sleeping crocodile.

"Vector?" he heard Amy repeat from the other side of the counter. "What's he doing here?"

Sorun didn't answer. Instead, he stopped right above the sleeping crocodile while curiously looking down at his face. He was unconscious like the rest of the Mobians outside, though he didn't remember seeing anybody so... animated while they were under. They'd all been relatively still for the most part, whereas Vector was snoring and even mumbling a bit in his sleep.

A thought came to him, and Sorun peeked his head over the counter. "Hey, Nicole. That signal that knocked everybody out. Are you picking it up in here?"

In response, Nicole closed her eyes for a moment, and then opened them back up while shaking her head. "It's extremely faint, but I doubt it'd be enough to have the same effect on anybody as it does out there in direct proximity to that speaker."

"That so...?" Sorun crouched back down behind the counter and moved right next to Vector's side. "What are you doin' here, big guy? You just decide to take a nap back here?" He reached forwards and began shaking Vector's shoulder. "Hey, Vector. Vector, c'mon, wake up. Dude."

It seemed that Sorun's shaking did little in rousing the crocodile up from his sleep, though he did manage to elicit a incomprehensible murmur from Vector followed by him unconsciously swatting the human's hand away. This caused Sorun to frown.

"I ain't got time for this." Sorun's right Bringer Claw manifested over his shoulder. And then, without any fanfare, the spectral claw whipped forwards and smacked the green croc right across the face. A loud slap! resonated throughout the shop as a result, ending with Vector's eyes snapping wide open as a red, hand-shaped mark began forming on the side of his snout. "Wake up, you useless alligator."

"It's crocodile!" Vector growled in response, sitting upwards while rubbing at the red spot Sorun had just smacked. "What's the big idea, Sorun!? I was just takin' a nap!"

"Town's being attacked, idiot," Sorun flatly responded, causing Vector's mouth to snap shut. "Eggman used a speaker to knock everybody out during the concert."

The initial reaction that played over Vector's face was shock and disbelief, as was to be expected. He searched Sorun's features to ensure that the human was telling the truth, and then, bizarrely, he set his features in a straight expression and replied in a completely even voice, "Alright, go it."

"The fact you're taking this so easy- agh, whatever," Sorun mumbled with a shake of his head. "Dude, what are you doing sleeping in some random shop? Shouldn't you have been at that concert?"

"Eh, no disrespect to Mina, but her brand of hard rock music don't really speak to me, ya dig?" Vector explained with a shrug of his shoulders. "Never could get behind rock n' roll. Rap was always more my speed. So while everybody was out there I just, er, found a place to sneak away to when Espio and Charmy weren't looking. Thought I'd just catch some Zs in the meantime."

"... Dude, seriously?" Sorun's jaw dropped a slight amount as he gave Vector a disbelieving look. "You went through all that trouble to avoid a concert? You couldn't have just stayed in the HQ or something?"

"Those two knuckleheads were insistent I come!" Vector complained while shooting his hands up towards the ceiling. "They wouldn't let me catch a single break! 'Oh, Vector, it's nice to be supportive of the local talent and to help spread hope to all the people', well how is my mug showing up gonna cheer everyone up any more when the princess and Sonic and everybody else were gonna be there too!?"

"Is your aversion to rock so strong that you would have rather broke into some guy's place rather than sit through an hour of Mina's band playing?"

"It's barely breaking in when the door was already unlocked, and the guy said he was cool with me-"

"WE HAVE MORE IMPORTANT THINGS TO BE WORRYING ABOUT!" Amy screamed, causing both males to immediately go silent and look up. The pink hedgehog was leaning over the top of the counter, her face fuming as she stared down at the both of them. Virgil, still situated at the top of Amy's head, was positively shaking in fright from the girl's volume of voice.

Vector had shut up immediately, nodding his head fiercely while also standing upwards to move around to the other side of the counter. Sorun's reaction was much more controlled, the human staring impassively at Amy's face before slowly looking upwards. "You scared my Chao," he muttered in an annoyed voice as he reached up to take Virgil off of her head.

"Well sorry, Sorun, but we really need to get it in gear and do something before Eggman does whatever he's planning on doing to all our friends and the poor townspeople outside!" Amy yelled in a hurried voice, green eyes trailing Sorun as he stepped around the counter along with Vector, hand petting the top of Virgil's head in an attempt to sooth him.

"Normally I'd say you're not allowed to watch Virgil ever again after that, but I'll look over it considering the situation," the human muttered as he placed Virgil on the ground next to where he sat down. Nicole, not having moved from her spot, sat across from him while Vector had sat down nearby. "So an AI, a human with Chaos powers, A hedgehog with a hammer, a crocodile with a bad taste in music-" he chose to ignore the scoff Vector sent his way, "- and a Chao versus... all of that out there. What's the plan?"

Admittedly, Amy had a point. Everybody outside was vulnerable and in danger, and they had to do something about it. And as it happened, one of the smartest people in the Freedom Fighters was sitting right there across from him. Vector and Amy seemed to get the same idea, too, as they turned their heads in the same direction as him. Even Virgil seemed to be looking expectantly up at Nicole. The AI, of course, noticed all of these looks and, after a tense moment, looked out towards the door leading to the plaza.

"Ideally, we will need to find a way to interrupt the signal and wake everybody up," Nicole explained to them as she looked back to the group.

Sorun nodded in understanding. "Easy enough, I'll just stab it."

"Wasn't 'stab it' the plan you had before you got blasted off stage?" Amy asked, the pink hedgehog leaning against the counter while looking down at Sorun.

Sorun's blue eyes flicked up to Amy's green, his lips pressed into a thin line. "I won't let that happen again."

"I think Amy's correct, Sorun." His eyes widening in shock, Sorun turned his head back down to Nicole, who was shaking her head. "And besides, even as we speak Eggman is attempting to do something with the citizens outside. Their safety and wellbeing takes precedence over everything else first."

In response, Sorun groaned and rubbed at the bridge of his nose. "Then just have Amy deal with the robots while I deal with the speaker. She smashes them, I stab the speaker, everybody's saved and wakes up, all's good."

"We don't know the capabilities of that machine, Sorun."

The black-haired teen sent the lynx a flat look. "It's a speaker. It's a big rectangle."

"No. It's a Badnik ," Nicole corrected, casting a sharp glare at Sorun who immediately withered under the look. "You know that nothing the Doctor creates is by any means conventional. You were already defeated once by it. I don't want any of us encountering such an unknown until the situation is better in hand. In fact I would prefer to get everybody up first so we can all properly deal with it."

Sorun breathed out in slight anger, crossing his arms while angrily tapping at his shoulders. "I was not defeated by a speaker ." He glanced up towards Nicole, who was still sending that same glare his way. He breathed out again, and then looked to the side so he didn't have to see her stern face. "What do you suggest?" he begrudgingly muttered.

"Hey, that thing's makin' a sound that's puttin' everybody to sleep, right?" Vector asked, gaining the attention of everybody present. "Couldn't we, you know, play another sound? Something to drown the noise out?"

Nicole looked in Vector's direction, a thoughtful look crossing her face. "Theoretically speaking, a second, harmless frequency overpowering the one affecting everybody outside would disrupt the frequency and cancel out the effect. Do you have an idea, Vector?"

"As a matter of fact, I do." With a wide, tooth-filled smirk, Vector reached into the cuff of his glove and pulled out, much to Sorun's confusion, a disk. "This is my personal mix I carry around with me for good luck. I know the soundboard Mina and her pals use for their songs. Gimme a minute up there and I'll be playing some serious tunes that'll drown out all those sour notes no problem. Sorun and Amy can just deal with Eggman and his chrome cronies meanwhile."

"You're not gonna be able to get in ten feet of that thing without being knocked out," Sorun reminded him. An idea came to him, and he shifted his eyes towards Amy. "Hey, Amy, give him your earmuffs."

Right after Sorun finished speaking his sentence, Amy's hands defensively went up to the earmuffs protecting her ears. "Hey, come on! I don't want-"

"Amy, literally hundreds of lives are on the line here," Sorun impatiently ground out.

"Fine, okay, I get it." Conceding to Sorun's point, Amy removed the pink, fuzzy earmuffs from her head and gave them to Vector, who reluctantly accepted them from Amy. "Please be gentle with them, okay? They're brand new."

"Er, sure," Vector agreed with a nod as he hesitantly looked down at the earmuffs. "You sure I gotta wear these, 'cause pink ain't really-"

A barely-subdued growl sounded in the back of Sorun's throat, and at the same time a handful of blue, spectral feathers appeared falling down his shoulders. "Vector..."

Wordlessly, Vector gulped and immediately placed the earmuffs over his head. Sorun watched him intensely as he donned the earmuffs, and then sent an exasperated glare at the ceiling before calming down and looking back towards Nicole. The AI gave him a knowing look, and then focused back on Vector.

"Without any protection from the frequency, Amy will have to remain here until that situation is dealt with," Nicole continued, causing the crocodile to nod while causing Amy to frown. "That being said, I'm unsure to the amplitude that the Badnik speaker is outputting that frequency. Since it's of Robotnik's make, it's likely that the frequency it produces is of a higher magnitude than that of the normal speakers connected to the soundboard you plan on using."

"So? Any ideas?" Vector asked.

"Well... with a sufficiently high power source, you could temporarily boost-"

"Hey, you're not thinking of using the Power Ring, are you?" Sorun interrupted. "Nicole, come on, without that your body-"

"My body is right here," Nicole corrected him, reaching back to hold up the handheld computer before placing it down on the ground. "The safety of Knothole is more important than me maintaining this form."

Sorun stared down at the computer, and then looked back towards Nicole. "I know, but-"

"Sorun. I understand you have reservations about this. But it's okay." Sorun looked ready to argue the point, but stopped immediately when Nicole sent him a confident, reassuring smile. "There will be other opportunities for me to produce this body. There will be other concerts. But saving the lives of our friends is paramount to all else."

For a long moment, Sorun just continued staring into Nicole eyes, internally hoping that she would change her mind and suggest something else. As useless as it likely was at this point, he didn't want her to give up her lynx form prematurely. He wanted to suggest that maybe he could just go destroy the speaker, or do something else that didn't require taking the Power Ring out of her computer body.

But he knew she wouldn't go for it, and not only did he not want to argue the point with her, but he trusted any plan she made more than something he could think up. And he would concede that she had a point, and that this was more important than her holding her Mobian body any longer. So, after slowly breathing outwards, he shakily nodded.

"I really don't like this plan. But you're right." He reached forwards and hesitantly grabbed the handheld computer. He brought it close to him, and then looked back up to Nicole while his hand gripped the Power Ring. "Are you sure?"

"Yes." The holo-lynx gave him a nod, maintaining that reassuring smile of hers that greatly helped to put Sorun as ease. "It will all be fine, Sorun. There's no need to worry."

"... Right." And with that, he took in a deep breath and disconnected the Power Ring from the computer. Nicole's form briefly flickered, and then disappeared entirely in a shower of dark cubes. He stared at the spot where Nicole had been sitting, and then turned towards Vector. He extended his hand and offered the ring to the crocodile, though when he leaned forwards and grabbed it, Sorun snatched at the scaled Mobian's wrist with his now free hand. "Vector, so help me if you screw this up and I pulled her ring for nothing..."

"I'm not gonna mess it up, sheesh!" Vector grumbled as he pulled his wrist free from Sorun's grip. "You just worry about yourself and try not to get KO'd while you're out there."

"Yeah, I'll do that," Sorun muttered in a dry voice. He exhaled again, and stood up to his feet. "Alright, so the plan is I go out there and deal with the robots, Vector takes the Power Ring that he better not lose and deals with the signal, and Amy, you stay here with Nicole and Virgil until the signal's dealt with. Come out and help when you hear tasteless rap music blasting through the air, I guess."

From behind him, Vector opened his mouth to argue when he heard Sorun say the word "tasteless". He was stopped when Amy elbowed him in the side while shaking her head in a negatory fashion. From besides them Virgil began walking towards Sorun while reaching his small arms out towards Sorun.

The one-winged Chao stopped when Sorun, who had made it to the door to the shop, turned his head around to glare down at the Chao.

"You're staying here with Nicole and Amy." He tore the door open, his glare intense enough to stop the Chao from voicing any protest. "I'm not in the mood to argue this, Virgil. You can't fight. Stay here."

He waited for the Chao's reaction, eye's unblinking as he looked down at the Chao. Eventually, Virgil reluctantly nodded his teardrop-shaped head and turned around to trudge back towards Amy, who was looking down sadly at the Chao. Sorun took a moment to notice the yellow swirl symbol that had formed above the Chao's head, and tried his best to ignore the image as he exited the shop. He looked ahead, sighed, and began moving forwards.

On the outside he appeared as calm as could be. His face set in stone and his composure seemingly completely calm as he walked over to where that ship was parked, where the robots and Eggman's hologram was.

On the inside, Sorun was seething with rage.

He couldn't even count how many things were making him so upset he could barely see straight. All the unconscious bodies littered around him. Having to participate in foiling yet another insane scheme of Eggman's. Having to see even the visage of the man who was responsible for everything wrong with the world. The concert. Nicole having to give her body up prematurely.

The frustration was just too immeasurable for him. He didn't like that seemingly every single day he had to deal with this man. He didn't like that everybody else had to have been dealing with him for a lot longer than Sorun, and every day he was reminded again and again of how amazed he was at everybody's mental fortitude at remaining sane through it all. And right next to that was the image of that Power Ring that he was forced to pry out from Nicole's handheld body.

All that time spent getting that ring off Amy. Working up the nerve to even bring Nicole to the concert in the first place. All of that was gone now because of Eggman. She'd looked so happy during it, too. More joyful than Sorun had ever seen her, at least. And even he'd been enjoying himself.

But no. Eggman had to go and pull something. It was always Eggman. His plans and evil schemes. His evil machinations that brought the world to the edge of ruin and made a bunch of resistance fighters so desperate they had to follow the prophecy of same strange wooden tablet and abduct a teenager from an alternate universe just for a shred of hope at beating him. It was always his fault.

Sorun was so sick of looking at his face.

Near the edge of the plaza and to the side of the stage, where the Eggman-marked ship was parked, was a small stretch of land that was relatively clear of Mobian bodies compared to the rest of the place. It was here that the small squad of Egg Pawns were setting up large, egg-shape pods they were carrying in from the ship, having set them up in an orderly row. From the side was the small floating drone that displayed the hologram of Eggman, who, for the most part, looked extremely bored.

"Hurry it up, would you? I'd like to wrap this show up before sunup," the bald man grumbled, his form slumped and head resting against an open palm. "I know for a fact your motor servos can move faster than that. I'm the one that designed them. So shake a leg and get moving before I recall you lot back to the factory you were built in!"

The Doctor's threat actually did serve to make the robots move along at a faster rate, as they began moving nearly twice as fast. It was only a momentary change, though, since a giant, blue spectral fist shot in from out of nowhere and collided right into one of the Egg Pawns. The robot crumpled completely on contact with the fist, and was pushed forwards into one of the egg-shaped pods which met a similar fate as the Egg Pawn. The blue fist smashed right through the pod and went all the way to the ship, where it opened its clawed fingers, grabbed onto the front end of the ship, and then lifted it into the air only to crush the segment it had in its grasp while at the same time slamming it back into the ground. The spectral hand disappeared right after, leaving a twisted, sparking hunk of metal that had once been in a ship.

The surviving Egg Pawns looked on towards the ship in shock, while Eggman's image had turned towards the wreckage with a look of mild interest appearing across his features. From the corner of the hologram's vision, he saw dozens of blue swords appear in the air over all of the Egg Pawns and the egg-shaped pods. Within the next second, they all rained down and skewered robots and pods alike, rendering them all inactive and completely destroyed after the swords disappeared as well.

Eggman's entire reaction to the scene was to simply sigh, drum his fingers along his head, and have his hologram turn around to the other side. He sat up a little bit when he saw a pale human standing nearby, right hand tucked in his pocket while the left one held a sheathed katana resting over his shoulder, but otherwise he showed almost no reaction.

"Don't you just hate it?" Sorun asked, the searing anger in his blue eyes betraying his otherwise calm demeanor and even voice. "When a giant fist comes in outta nowhere and wrecks your robots?"

"An irritating inconvenience, to be sure," Eggman drawled out as his head turned towards the stage. "Confound it, I knew something slipped my mind while I was programming the amplitudes on that speaker. So the frequency I used to put all the Mobians here to sleep doesn't work on humans, eh?"

"Evidently not," Sorun remarked. "Don't tell me that body of yours is already goin' senile, Doctor. Forgettin' stuff's a bad sign."

"I think I should be the one concerned over your health." Eggman turned his hologram back towards Sorun's direction, and then moved his hand to readjust the round, blue glasses over his eyes. "Sorun, my dear boy! You look awful! Have you been getting enough sleep these days?"

The pale teen huffed a lock of black hair from his face to reveal the grimace that had settled over his features. "I got the crazy guy sending robots around to terrorize everybody to blame for that."

Grabbing the handle of the sheathed katana, Sorun removed it from his shoulder and pointed its blunt tip at Eggman's hologram. "You know how many missions I've been running because of you? This was the first break I've had in I don't even know how long, and then you come along and screw it all up. You know how terrible your timing is!? You can't just get a hobby or something instead of messing with people's lives all the time!?"

"This is my hobby."

The completely blank, no-nonsense answer given by Eggman caused Sorun to angrily huff out of his nose and lower the sheathed sword. "Then get better hobbies," he grumbled under his breath. "Or at the very least pick a better time then during a concert."

Eggman widely grinned at that remark. "Oh, but Sorun, my timing couldn't have been better!" He spread his long arms out to the sides. "This was all by design, you utter fool!"

"... Huh?" Sorun mumbled out with a tilt of his head.

"Oh, come now. You don't think all those little, insignificant skirmishes you've been having with my forces all these past weeks actually had any meaning past this, did you? A robot patrol here to harass a village, a scout bot there? You seriously thought I wanted to sabotage Knothole's hydroelectric system using a single Badnik whose design I based on a daydream I had that one time?"

"It did all seem kinda petty, even for you," Sorun admitted. "So, what, this was all some elaborate 'lull them into a false sense of security' plan so you could get the Freedom Fighters and a bunch of people together in one place and knock 'em out in one move?" He clicked his tongue, looked back at all the unconscious Mobians, and then looked back at Eggman. "I'll give you props for the plan, but the execution leaves a lot to be desired. You know there's easier, less convoluted ways of going about this, right?"

"Of course I do." Suddenly, Eggman's face became almost as weary as Sorun felt these days, and his hologram slumped forwards onto something out of picture from the hologram. Even his ginger mustache seemed to slightly droop. "This was all just because I found a shell-like artifact while raiding and destroying some lost, ancient civilization I found in a hidden valley in down the way in the lower continent. Inhabitants seemed like a cheerful bunch. I put them all in Egg Grapes and harvested their life energy for fuel before destroying their home and putting an oil refinery there."

Sorun inhaled sharply, and his grip on Yamato's handle tightened. At the same time, dark blue energy began to faintly roil down the length of the black sheath as Sorun continued to listen to the explanation.

"Anyways, this shell was a vaunted artifact or some such, yadda yadda yadda, I stopped paying attention when listening to all that screaming became too tiresome," Eggman continued, sounding almost bored at his own story. "It had some unique properties when introduced to certain sound frequencies, so I thought, why not, make a sonic weapon out of it. Was going for a whole ironic edge there: use sonic to beat Sonic." He sighed and flipped one of his palms up in the air. "But did I have to go out of my way to smuggle the speaker into Knothole and replace it with that singing harpy's equipment so it could be activated in a concert I'd been subtly guiding all you ruffians towards, only to then have a small detachment of Egg Pawns set up a bunch of Egg Teleporters to take all my new captives back to New Megaopolis?" He shrugged. "No. I could have constructed something with enough range that I could have just blasted all of Knothole from a distance, and then just use a teleportation beam to transport everybody here in five minutes. Would have been laughably easy, really."

"Oh, but you don't like easy, do ya?" Sorun asked, his voice a low hiss. His Bringer Claws had appeared folded over his shoulders, the spectral feathers on the wings almost bristling in rage as the talons resting on him kneaded angrily into his shoulders. "You're in it for the kicks and thrills, not a cheap victory, right? What's the point in conquering the whole world if you don't do it in style?"

Eggman, who had been tapping one of his fingers on whatever object he was leaning over, lifted his hand and pointed towards the teen. "You know what I like about you, Sorun? You pick things up quick and get to the point. And you're not a total bore to exchange jabs with, either. Not like that blue rodent," he grumbled as he looked away. "Always the same thing with him. The same childish nicknames and same jokes over and over. If it wasn't for the fact he always somehow manages to thwart my creations I would have lost interest ages ago. But at least you bring some fresh class to the table."

Sorun scoffed, and glanced his eyes back into the crowd where he knew Sonic's sleeping form was somewhere. "Yeah, well... tell you the truth, guy even irritates me sometimes." He glanced back at Eggman. "But don't hold it against him. It's probably hard thinking up new lines when you have to deal with all the stress he and the rest of the Freedom Fighters have been under practically their whole lives 'cause of you and the last Robotnik."

"Oh, that's no excuse. The second he and the rest of those furry miscreants start getting worn out and sloppy is the second I stop being amused and end all of this in an instant," Eggman threatened as he sat back up to his full height. His wide, manic grin returned, aimed right down at Sorun. "Oh, but you've been keeping things a bit interesting, haven't you, Sorun? Gotten a new power or two since the last time we spoke?" When the teen refused to answer, Eggman shook his head while making a light shrug. "Well, you've helped keep things mildly entertaining enough that I haven't ended the game just yet, I'll admit that much. You and the rest of those Freedom Fighters. And chances are you're going to foil this little scheme of mine, Sonic and his little friends will foil more schemes here and there, and then, soon enough, we're going to roll right back into same old, dull routine we were deadlocked in before you came around. But don't worry, Sorun. Rest assured I'll end my game with as much dramatic flair as possible so the end isn't quite as boring as the road getting there."

"Mm-hm, sure." Having tuned out Eggman's inane ramblings halfway through, Sorun turned his body towards the black speaker with the red eye resting on the stage. "I'm gonna go destroy your evil speaker now."

"Of course, by all means. Go for it," Eggman replied, almost agreeing with Sorun's intent. "One, ah, one second, though. Just gotta press this button here first."

Upon hearing the sound of a small click! , Sorun swiveled his head back towards Eggman with a raised eyebrow. He saw the Doctor's finger was extended and pressing a button on a small remote control he'd pulled out from somewhere, the grin on his round head still wide and manic. He was tempted to ask just what it was he'd done before he heard something else from behind him. The sound of metal plates shifting and parts turning.

When he looked back to the stage towards a speaker, what he saw had little resemblance of a speaker. What had once been little more than a black rectangle was in the process of transforming, its metal shell segmenting and shifting as its shape realigned itself. Mechanical parts resembling limbs extended out from the speaker's innards, only to be soon covered by the black plates. The speaker itself was folded inside of the shifting monstrosity's body as segments of metal resembling a maw formed over the circular part.

By the time it finished transforming, Sorun was no longer looking at a speaker. What he was looking at was a giant, mechanical beast in the shape of a quadruped wolf covered in black plates of metal. It scratched its long, metal claws along the wooden stage, its angular head pointed straight at Sorun with that same, single red eye still shining in the center of its forehead. And inside of its mouth, filled with rows of metal, dagger-like teeth, he could just faintly see the speaker at the back of its throat.

"... Okay, Nicole. I'll give you that one," Sorun thought to himself as he took a step back, eyes widened in shock at the sight of the Badnik. Eggman seemed amused at the sight, going as far as to bark off a single laugh at Sorun expense.

"What, you didn't think I'd only go as far as to make a simple speaker, did you?" Eggman rhetorically asked a stunned Sorun. At hearing no reaction from the teen, Eggman leaned back in his seat and tapped a few buttons on an unseen console. "Well, anyways, I'm going to send another detachment of Badniks to round up my new prisoners while you're being torn apart by that. In the meantime, I think I'm just going to sit back and watch-"

A Summoned Sword flew through the air and rammed right through the white drone, destroying it in an instant and causing Eggman's hologram to blink out of existence mid-sentence. Sorun watched the smoking drone fall dead to the ground, and then scoffed as he turned his head back to the giant, mechanical wolf.

"If you wanted a show, you shoulda showed up in person like everybody else," Sorun said, flipping the Yamato around so that his left hand was holding the sheath. From out of the corner of his eyes, near the other side of the plaza past the crowd of passed-out Mobians, he could faintly make out someone peeking their head over a stack of wooden crates. Vector's green head, adorned with Amy's pink earmuffs, was easily recognizable even from this distance, the crocodile seemingly biting his gloved nails as he looked up on the stage.

The black Badnik wolf didn't seem to take notice, however, as its large form jumped off from the stage and began to seemingly stalk sideways, its singular red eye still trained on Sorun. It suited the pale teen just fine- the more it focused on him the less Vector had to worry.

"Alright, pooch. I'll play with ya." Sorun's right hand gripped the sword's hilt and slowly slid it out of the sheath. "Either I stall you long enough that Vector disrupts the signal or I cut you to bits. It's your loss no matter what."

As willing as he was, though, he severely hoped that Vector would be fast enough to get rid of that signal so that he could get some help with this. He was confident enough with his powers by now, but the giant robot wolf staring down Sorun was not making him feel very good about the situation. The look alone was intimidating Sorun, nevermind the metal claws and teeth.

Unfortunately, it seemed that the Badnik wolf took him unsheathing his sword as a sign that he was ready to fight. The wolf dug its metallic claws into the ground, however, and instead of charging head-on reared its head backwards. Sorun, seeing what it was attempting to do, rose the katana's blade defensively over his form.

Right after Sorun rose his blade up, the wolf howled at him in a horrendous mockery of a wolf's howl masked in a mechanical flange. Waves of sound raced towards Sorun, distorting the air around it in a circular stream. In response, blue energy began coalescing around the katana's blade right as the sound hit.

Despite being hit dead-on by the soundwaves, Sorun remained rooted in place and relatively fine, his clothes and hair flapping uncontrollably from the force hitting him. By contrast, the soundwaves seemed to be broken apart upon making contact with the glowing katana, harmlessly fragmenting and dissipating away from the teen. The wolf seemed to take notice of how its howls were ineffective, stopping in its sonic assault soon after and tilting its head to the side in curiosity.

"You're gonna need better tricks than that! Yamato can just separate the soundwaves." Sorun lowered Yamato, and at the same time his right Bringer Claw lifted up from his shoulder and flew towards the mechanical wolf. The spectral claw grabbed right onto one of the dark wolf's haunches, and it was Sorun's intention to lift the robot right up into the air and flip it down onto its back.

That was the intention, at least. What Sorun didn't expect was for the wolf to snap its head down towards the Bringer Claw and clamp its metallic jaws down on the spectral hand's wrist. And he really didn't expect for its teeth to compress down hard enough that it went all the way through, causing the entire Bringer Claw to dissipate in a puff of blue energy.

"What the-!" That was the only thought Sorun managed to get out before the wolf lunged towards him, claws extended and metal teeth bared. The teen's eyes widened in panic, his remaining Bringer Claw beating down on the ground and pushing him away just as the Badnik swiped at the air when he'd been standing previously.

His boots skidding across the ground, Sorun spun towards the wolf with narrowed eyes. The black wolf respectively turned its head towards the human just as a barrage of Summoned Swords flew towards its face. Unfortunately, the robotic wolf howled again just as the swords neared, the soundwaves deflecting and blasting away all of the swords. One sword in particular flew dangerously past Sorun's head, and to the teen's shock he saw a few strands of black hair fall down away from his face, having been cut by the sword passing by him.

"Alright..." Trying for the Summoned Swords again, Sorun willed eight swords to begin spinning around in a circle around the wolf Badnik. This proved to be in vain, though, as the wolf simply swiped its claws around to shatter the Storm Swords surrounding it. During this, Sorun's left Bringer Claw had clamped onto the wolf's side, the spectral arm contracting and pulling Sorun towards it. As it did with the first one, the wolf chomped down and destroyed the Bringer Claw gripping on to it, though by that point Sorun's momentum was too great to stop. He flew right past the wolf, Yamato's edge dragging across its side and leaving a deep gash in its metal plates.

Sorun landed on the ground behind the wolf with a small grunt and, upon hearing the sound of machinery shift behind him, immediately sheathed the sword and held it out in front of him. This was done just in the nick of time, as the moment he'd turned around the wolf's clawed appendage lashed out towards him. The metal claws dragged along the katana's length, drawing white sparks and causing Sorun to be tossed back from the sheer force of the hit.

Flying back a good ten meters from the blocked hit, Sorun's body rolled over and over until coming to a full stop, the teen ending up on his back. He breathed out while looking up into the night sky, and then groaned as he began to sit upwards. "And as always, the super robot is kicking my ass," Sorun thought as he managed to rise into a sitting position. To his dismay, despite the sparking gash now present in its side, the Badnik wolf still looked as active as ever. "I wish Vector would hurry the hell up here..."

"Oh man of man oh man..."

Beyond his peripheral vision, Vector could see the fight transpiring between Sorun and a monster of a Badnik if he ever saw one. And unfortunately, it seemed to him that Sorun was losing. Bad. At least in a way that the human was dealing minimal damage while doing his best to just try and avoid getting hit by that thing.

Well, that was fine. Or it would be, at least. Because his job wasn't to fight the giant robot monster that looked like it was made of knives. Oh no. His job in this little mission was support. It was to get this Power Ring he was clutching in his hands up on stage and get the music flowing so Sorun wouldn't have to tackle that thing alone and get help from people whose job it was to deal with things like that.

This knowledge did nothing to subside the panic coursing through the crocodile, as he was so afraid that at some point that giant thing Sorun was fighting against would turn its head and notice him that he'd all but forgotten hiding and went for a dead sprint towards the stage.

On the upside, he didn't think the monster Badnik saw him. Right now it was too busy biting down on Sorun's katana and thrashing it and the teen holding it back and forth like a chew toy.

Still in a panic, Vector scrambled up the side of the stage and made his way right to the band's soundboard, which was still connected to the normal, non-evil speakers stacked up against the stage. He heard a startled yell out of the edge of his hearing, and looked up just in time to see Sorun tossed clear towards the other side of the plaza, the wolf Badnik right on his heels. Vector winced at the sight and went back to the soundboard.

"Hang in there, pal, just a few more seconds..." Vector hurriedly mumbled to himself as he began fiddling with the controls to the soundboard. "Okay, volume control, sound selection... yeah, now we're talkin'!"

While familiarizing himself with the controls he found a small disk tray sticking out of a music player connected to the soundboard. He quickly placed his personal disk inside and all but slammed the tray shut, taking some small satisfaction when he saw lights on the player light up. He eyed various knobs and sound adjustment switches, slowly turning them all up on max.

"Alright, check, check, that looks good, oh yeah..." Everything seemed to be working in his eyes. And so, with everything set up, all he had to worry about was actually powering this thing.

The crocodile's yellow eyes dipped downwards to a small cable that was leading from the soundboard towards the back of the stage. He quickly moved backwards, following the cable and moving past the stage's curtain to pass towards the back end of the stage. From there, he found what he was looking for: a small generator with multiple cords leading towards the soundboard and the speakers it was connected to.

Crouching down next to the generator, Vector examined the device and, grinning a wide-toothed grin at his success, pulled out a extendable jumper cable from an open panel near the back. Gulping, he reached behind him and held up the ring-like object he'd carried with him all this way. The Power Ring's golden light reflected harshly off the croc's face, but even through all that light he could see his nervous eyes through the reflection on the ring's surface.

"Well..." Vector gulped, compressing the jumper cable open and leading it towards the Power Ring, "no time like the present. Sure hope this works..."

And then, wincing slightly in apprehension, he clamped the jumper cable down on the ring.

Once more, Sorun found his body rolling against the ground as he was once again thrown back. Coughing from both the soreness coursing through his body and from the exertion he was being put through, Sorun stabbed Yamato into the ground and used it as a crutch to shakily get up to his feet, huffing out an exhausted breath as he looked up at the Badnik wolf.

So far, the damage he'd manage to inflict on the thing was minimal at best. He'd manage to create a few more gashes along its body, and while they seemed grievous, they certainly weren't affecting the robot's performance. Because it hadn't slowed down in the least since beginning the fight with Sorun.

As for Sorun himself, he wasn't holding up nearly as well as the Badnik was. Other from being battered due to being tossed around so much, he'd managed to avoid any serious damage, though there were multiple cuts and scratches along his clothes from where he'd narrowly avoided being slashed. But, unlike a machine, Sorun had limited stamina. And even worse his stamina pool was far from in top condition.

With the rate this was going, Sorun didn't see the fight going in his favor any time soon. And that was making him very worried for his own life and scared for the people's lives behind him.

He stopped dwelling on these thoughts when a curious sound pulsed through the air. The high-pitched, whining sound of audio feedback which made Sorun wince slightly. The robot wolf seemed to have an even stronger reaction, as its head actually stuttered almost in pain while causing it to look towards the stage. Sorun followed the wolf's lead and gazed towards the stage, where it was with no small amount of relief he saw Vector up there. The crocodile was standing behind a soundboard, one hand up and holding the pink earmuffs against his head while the other one was giving Sorun a thumbs-up. And then, promptly right after Sorun saw the gesture, Vector slammed his hand down to hit an unseen button.

What followed next was a cacophony of noise had blasted through the speakers on stage, filling the entire area with noise. A noise of random beats and deep bass that Sorun supposed could have been construed as music, but he'd be hard pressed to make that distinction easily. He wasn't even sure he could call what he was hearing rap, or even basic hip-hop. It was... it was something. Something new and unpleasant.

The wolf seemed to hate it, though, based on the way it was violently shaking, so that was probably a good sign.

"God, Vector, you call this music?" Sorun thought to himself, grimacing in annoyance. The grimace was wiped away immediately when he saw the wolf spin right towards Vector, an electronic growl escaping from the speaker embedded in its throat as it lowered its form.

In the next instant, it made an attempt to run towards the stage where Vector was in an attempt to get at him and the speakers. It only made it a few steps, though, as a spectral hand had reached out and grabbed one of its hind legs. With a grunt of exertion, Sorun willed the Bringer Claw to throw the black-plated Badnik backwards. The robot wolf rolled to an upright position on a dime, metallic claws digging into the ground as it slid to a stop while its eye was continually locked onto Sorun.

"You wanna get to him? Gotta get through me," Sorun announced, spinning the sword in his hand around once before sheathing it and holding it ready at his side. Whether the wolf even understood Sorun's provocation or not was unknown to the teen, but the fact it was lowering its form while scratching at the ground was not lost to him. "Great, now I get to be murdered to the sound of this trash playing in the background. Just what I wanted."

Without any further notice, the robot wolf charged forwards towards Sorun. The teen sighed out in exhaustion, and then hopped backwards as his two Bringer Claws shot forwards towards the wolf. The hope had been for the Badnik to only focus on one of the spectral arms while the other one got a hold on it, but to Sorun's frustration, the machine jumped from one side to another and managed to dodge both arms heading towards it.

Cursing under his breath, Sorun tried his best to dodge to the side when the wolf swiped at him with its claws. It was a sluggish dodge, and because of it a majority of the hood that hanged off the back of his sleeveless hoodie was ripped away. It swiped again, and while Sorun had tried blocking it with the Yamato, the force proved to be too great and the sword was batted completely out of his hand. The teen's eyes trailed the sword spinning through the air the instant it was knocked away, and because of that, he wasn't able to see the metal paw crashing down on him from the front.

He felt a heavy weight smash into his chest, and then cried out in pain when he was slammed right onto his back and onto the ground. Through eyes squinted in pain he saw the wolf's mechanical face and its one red eye almost leering down at him, its dagger-filled maw halfway opened as it got ready to bite him. Sorun looked from that to the metal paw pinning him down, flinging his Bringer Claws onto it in a panic to try and lift it off of him so he could move. This proved to be in vain, though, as the wolf immediately chomped down on the spectral arms and forced them to dissipate. The wisps of power that had made up the Bringer Claws didn't even have time to disappear fully before the wolf's maw chomped down towards Sorun's head.

It never made it close enough to bite Sorun in half. A large hammer had flown in from out of view and had smashed into the wolf's face hard enough that the entire thing's body was sent flying backwards. With the weight pinning him down suddenly lifted off his chest, Sorun sat up immediately and began gasping out heavy breaths of air, holding a hand up to his sore chest.

From the corner of his vision, he saw a gloved hand appear open and outstretched to him. He blinked down at the hand, and then looked up towards its owner. He couldn't hold in the sigh that left him when he saw a pink hedgehog in a red dress standing over him, smile on her face and large hammer slung over her shoulder with one hand while the other one was offered to Sorun.

"That speaker's really giving you some trouble tonight, huh, Sorun?" Amy asked, teasing grin playing across her features despite the severity of the situation. "Today just really isn't your day, is it?"

Scoffing in disbelief, Sorun shook his head and slapped his own hand down on the one being offered to him. "Would you drop it already?" he asked, clenching the hand he grasped. He was pulled up to his feet immediately by Amy, who patted him on the shoulder while giving him a nod.

"Mmm, maybe I will." A beat passed, and her expression instantly morphed into a serious frown as she turned into the direction of where she'd bashed the wolf to. "So that's the problem?"

Sorun followed her gaze, his own serious scowl forming. The Badnik had been knocked all the way to the other side of the plaza, and while there was a noticeable dent displayed on its face, its smooth movements suggested it was no worse for wear. It had quickly gotten back onto its feet and was staring down both the hedgehog and human with its singular red eye.

"Yeah. It's a tough one," Sorun said as Yamato reappeared in his left hand. "Nicole and Virgil?"

"Still in the shop," Amy answered. "I saw you having trouble out here, so when I heard the music start playing I left them behind and rushed out. They should be safe."

"Alright." The two started to separate, slowly walking in opposite directions with their eyes still trained on the wolf. "I guess the signal interference must be working if you're able to be this close to it. I was hoping that meant that everybody would automatically wake up, but it doesn't look like that's the case. So we're on our own here." He held up his right hand and snapped his fingers. "Here. Have some Spiral Swords as thanks for saving me."

In a flash of blue, eight Summoned Swords pointing outwards began spinning around Amy in a circle. She looked down at the swords surrounding her, tilting her head in curiosity before turning towards Sorun. "Thank you very much. Could you change their color, though? The blue kinda clashes too harshly with my dress."

"Isn't the guy you're chasing...?" One of Sorun's eyes twitched in irritation as he looked back towards Amy. When she saw the look, her gaze refocused on the robotic wolf, causing him to sigh and do the same. "You're so high maintenance, Amy, I swear..."

The conversation between the two was dropped right there. Their focus was solely focused on the enemy Badnik, who was in turn staring them down with that hateful red eye. The instrumental notes playing in the background had settled down to a low, steady beat as the two sides stared the other down, Sorun tightly clenching his katana while Amy hefted her hammer in front of her. The wolf, in response, began to slowly dig its metal claws across the ground. Vector, who had chosen to remain out of the fight, watched the display from behind the soundboard.

The beat of the music suddenly dropped, and it was when the tempo began to rapidly pick up did they begin their approach. Sorun ran along the right side, ripping the Yamato out of its sheath with his right hand and holding it out to his side as he sprinted towards the robot. Amy kept to the left side, hammer held down to her side as she made a similar approach to the machine with the eight blue swords still rotating around her. The wolf Badnik decided to keep a center approach, its claws tearing up the ground as it sprinted closer and closer.

Amy, being leagues faster and more agile than Sorun even in his prime, had of course reached the wolf Badnik before the human even got close. The wolf swiped its claws at her, though the metal blades at the end of its paws only managed to swipe at empty air as Amy had leapt far above the paw, the swords spinning around her briefly scraping across the robot's chassis. She swung her hammer in a wide arc, hitting the wolf right in the fact and causing it to stumble back slightly. It tried swiping at her again, but once more missed when Amy rolled forwards through the aie past the swipe and, using the momentum gathered by her roll, brought her hammer down straight on top of the wolf's head. It slammed right into the ground as a result, its four limbs splayed out to its sides and face dug into the ground.

With a mechanical growl, the wolf tore its face out of the ground, its red eye flashing as it noticed movement to the side. Sorun was still approaching with his katana held out to his side, and in anticipation, the wolf opened its mouth to try and howl at him. Right before it could, though, twenty Summoned Swords appeared over it and began raining down and impaling themselves into the robot's backside.

While this was happening, Sorun kept up his approach, noticing with some interest the wolf was jittering in place and struggling to open its mouth to try and howl at him as it was pelted with swords. "Huh." He aimed the tip of the katana forwards, and with a running start plunged the sword through the robot's body all the way up to the hilt.

It was right when the last sword fell onto the wolf's body that the katana was pierced right into it. An angered, electronic howl left the wolf as it shot up to its feet and began shaking its body in an attempt to dislodge Sorun from its side. It proved to be a success, as soon the sword was shaken free from its side and Sorun, Yamato in hand, was sent sailing backwards, though he managed to right himself in the air when his Bringer Claws appeared and flapped outwards to keep his body aloft.

The Badnik seemed to take this opportunity to try and howl at Sorun, as it had opened its mouth to do so. Right before it could, however, Amy had appeared at its underside with her hammer in hand, and with a mighty swung hammered its underside straight upwards. The force was sufficient enough that the robot wolf was sent careening right up into the air, where a spectral fist soon shot forwards and collided with the dented side of its head, causing it to crash back down towards the ground. Amy, waiting with her hammer held at the ready, reared back and swung just before the Badnik collided with the ground, causing the robot to mechanically cry out as it was sent flying forwards.

Despite the heavy amount of damage it had sustained thus far, showing from the way the Badnik's frame was severely deformed and cut in various places, the wolf was still going on strong from the way it deftly managed to catch itself on all four feet and slide against the ground. Not missing a beat, it opened its mouth and howled in Amy's direction the second its body came to a full halt. The pink hedgehog widened her eyes and held her hammer in front of her in a vain attempt at shielding herself from the oncoming soundwave, but to her surprise the eight swords swirling around her reformed and cross their blades in front of her, forming a shield. The shield of Summoned Swords took the brunt of the sonic attack, Amy being largely unaffected save for her short, pink quills being blown back from the force.

Up above, Sorun had flown right above the wolf and had begun to drop down when his Bringer Claws clasped their talons together into a singular fist. The Badnik, too busy ineffectively howling at Amy, could do nothing as the clasped-together spectral hands hammered its head right into the ground, interrupting its howl and causing it to flatten yet again. Sorun landed in a half-crouch and, not done just yet, willed one Bringer Claw to grab the wolf by its neck and hold it up while the other Bringer Claw curled into a fist and began to rapidly punch it in the face over and over. The dark wolf jerked its body every single time it was struck, its face plates denting further inwards with each hit. When Sorun was satisfied with the damage, he punched the black-plated wolf in the face one more time and then willed the Bringer Claw holding its neck to toss it towards the center of area, between himself and Amy.

By now the wolf's face was dented enough that it was practically unrecognizable, and the rest of its body was in a similar state. But even so, it still managed to rise up to its legs, even with the electrical sparks and oil pouring out from its wounds. And then, suddenly, its single red eye flared so brightly that both Sorun and Amy were momentarily blinded, and with that motion the wolf reared its head straight towards the broken moon hanging in the sky and howled.

This particular howl was more intense on an extreme scale compared to the previous howls. Despite the distance Sorun had from the wolf, and despite him guarding his body with Yamato's blade, he was still slid backwards from the force of the howl alone. Amy was more unfortunate, the Summoned Swords protecting her all finally breaking from the strain. She was sent straight onto her backside from the sonic assault, her hammer being flung right out of her grasp.

Hissing through clenched teeth, Sorun lowered the katana and looked out towards Amy and the wolf. Much to his panic, he saw the black wolf slowly stalking towards Amy. He expected the pink hedgehog to move or attack at any moment, but when he looked towards her, he nearly felt his irises shrink in fear when he saw her sitting up but seemingly dazed, her eyes spinning around in their sockets. She didn't even have her hammer in her grasp, the weapon having been knocked a fair distance away from her.

Rather expectantly, the wolf decided to capitalize on this opportunity and barreled right towards Amy. For a single moment Sorun continued watching the display, hoping that Amy would regain her senses and dive out of the way or do something to try and avoid the wolf. But even from here he could see it was no good. That sound attack from the wolf's howl had just rattled her too much.

Sorun, in turn, tried bolting forwards in an effort to try and intercept the Badnik before it reached Amy. He knew it was a useless move from the second he began moving his feet, though. Amy was around a good twenty meters away from his position. The wolf was already upon her, raising up its left foreleg in an effort to swipe its metal claws through her body. Not even his Summoned Swords or Bringer Claws would be able to reach the wolf in time to stop it from hurting Amy.

"Don't." Sorun's irises shrunk down to pinpricks, and a new wave of exhaustion hit his body. A single bead of blood began to run down his nose as blue energy began to coalesce around Yamato's edge. "You're not touching her!"

Having dropped the scabbard to grip onto the sword's handle with both hands, he slashed Yamato out in a single arc. It was an instinctual move he had barely even thought on. A thoughtless movement fueled purely by the urge to protect the pink hedgehog that was about to be butchered by the robotic wolf.

By all means, the katana shouldn't have hit anything, and indeed, it didn't. Sorun was still tens of meters away from the wolf, after all, so when he'd swung the Yamato, he'd swung at nothing but air. The slash had still been aimed at the wolf, however: specifically, at the mechanical foreleg risen up to be brought down on Amy. And in the exact same moment Sorun had slashed the sword in the air, a thin, blue line had appeared on the risen foreleg of the wolf.

And then, just like that, the leg cleanly flew off the wolf. It had flown off from the blue line, a seam created from the Yamato's power cutting through the Badnik's limb. The leg flew harmlessly away from Amy, while at the same time the wolf crashed down on its side from a sudden loss of balance.

Sorun, of course, had seen the entire thing. He looked at the sight in disbelief, and then slowly exhaled as he looked down at Yamato's silver blade. "Did I... that's how you do the long-distance...? Agh!" A sudden headache assaulted him, causing him to hold his head with his left hand as a spurt of blood gushed out from his nose. "I'm pushing myself too far here, but... yeah, no, that makes sense, you just separate the distance... alright, yeah..."

He removed his hand from his head, wiping off the blood on his face with the back of his hand as the sheath reappeared in his grasp. He knew from the games that long-distance cuts like that with the Yamato were possible, but he'd never quite sussed out how to tease that particular ability out of his Chaos-created Yamato. A lot of the sword's abilities still eluded him still, and while it was still a shock to him, he was overly happy at having at least discovered one new thing. It figured that it would take one of his friends almost dying for him to finally figure it out.

It wasn't a full-on Judgement Cut. But it was a step closer.

Breathing outwards, Sorun shook his head free of the grogginess that had formed and began walking forwards towards the fallen wolf. He saw from the corner of his vision Amy had managed to shake off being stunned from the earlier howl, though she was still sitting still and staring wide-eyed at the struggling Badnik. Her eyes flashed over to Sorun as he continued approaching the wolf, which prompted her to rise to her own feet, quickly run over to her hammer, and pick it up before following Sorun's approach.

Eventually, the two ended up standing next to each others' sides, weapons clenched in their hands as they looked down at the large robot. With its missing forelimb it was unable to rise back up to its feet, though its remaining limbs continued to pump back and forth, albeit at a slow rate. Even its mechanical growls were becoming garbled and distorted, and the red eye atop its head was noticeably dimmer than it had been before at the start of the fight.

Amy huffed out an exhausted breath, still looking down at the Badnik. Her eyes traveled from the wolf towards the katana gripped in Sorun's hand, and then up towards the human's face. "Did... did you do that?" she asked, gaining the other teen's attention. "How did you manage to cut it from all the way over there?"

Blinking at the question, Sorun rose the katana up for Amy to see. "The Yamato can do a lot," he simply answered, lowering it back down to his side as he returned to facing the wolf.

Seemingly accepting the short answer, Amy shrugged and turned back to the wolf. "Well, we did it. What now?"

"Hmmm..." After a few moments of contemplative humming, Sorun willed the Bringer Claws into existence. One of the spectral hands floated in front of Amy, holding its palm out towards her. "May I please have your hammer for one moment?" he respectfully requested.

She looked a bit startled at the request at first, looking up at Sorun's eyes and becoming even more surprised when she saw the serious look on his face. She looked back down at the spectral arm, and then began to savagely grin at the implication. "Why, of course. Since you asked so nicely," she said as she placed he red hammer into the Bringer Claw's grasp. "Just please be gentle with her."

"Oh, I would never dream of scratching your dear hammer, Amy." The Bringer Claw's talons curled around the hammer, with the second Bringer Claw grasping the hammer's handle right below the first. Slowly exhaling, Sorun willed the arms to bring the hammer upwards above both him and Amy, eyeing down the fallen Badnik wolf with complete contempt in his eyes.

And then, in a show of speed and power that surprised even Amy, the hammer was brought down right on the robot wolf. Metal pieces and electronics went flying, and the wolf cried out in a garbled, electronic howl as a whole chunk of its body was hammered right off of it. Sorun didn't even hesitate before bringing the hammer up and smashing it down on the robot again.

All of his frustration over how tonight had went. All of his anger over how everybody's plans, and his own plans, had been ruin. His complete fury at almost having seen Amy cut to shreds. All of the hatred he harbored over Eggman and the situation he found himself in. In those moments, all of those negative feelings seemed to fuel the Bringer Claws as they slammed the hammer down onto the wolf over and over again. It was enough that in those moments Sorun almost didn't even feel the exhaustion wracking his body, allowing him to not slow down even once as he pounded the Badnik over and over.

By the end of his relentless assault, what was left couldn't even be called a robot anymore. It was less machine and more a useless hunk of unrecognizable scrap metal and electronics, so horribly bent and twisted it didn't even have a definable shape. The wolf's head was about the only thing even remotely intact, though somewhere along Sorun's intense hammering the garbled whines had ceased completely and the red eye had completely dimmed.

Panting just the slightest amount through his nose, Sorun's Bringer Claws slowly offered the hammer back to Amy, who had watched the entire display with a continually flinching gaze. "Yeah, I don't know. I don't think hammers are really my thing. I'll just stick with swords," Sorun mumbled out. "Thanks, weapon buddy."

With an amused giggle, Amy took the hammer out from the offered claw, and in a puff of smoke it disappeared from her grasp. "You're welcome, weapon buddy. So is that it, then?"

"Almost." A Bringer Claw reached forwards past the still wolf's mouth, tearing past the speaker in its throat and reaching towards its innards. It grabbed onto something, and then yanked it out of the head and held it up for both Sorun and Amy to see.

The object that had been taken out from the wolf appeared to be a shell. A round, white thing covered in intricate carvings with multiple metal cables jammed and forced inside of it, with even more cables spilling out of the opening at the end. Sorun sighed sadly at the sight, the Bringer Claw's talons softly rubbing over its surface.

"Eggman said he destroyed some lost civilization for this thing. Mentioned grapes or something. It's what he used to make his sonic weapon," Sorun morosely intoned. "I don't really know what to feel knowing that the last legacy of a bunch of people I didn't even know existed until recently was used to almost wipe everybody here out." He tiredly sighed. "I'm just really angry and sad."

"I know. That sounds terrible," Amy agreed, softly nodded her head with a downcast look on her face. "What are you going to do with it?"

"... I kind of just want to save it since... since this is all that's left of whoever those people were. But I don't want another situation like this ever happening again." Regretfully, he willed the spectral hand's talons to curl around the shell. "I'm gonna break it."

It was a true shame, and he didn't want to do it, but at the same time he felt more strongly that it was too dangerous to be around considering all the damage Eggman had done with it this time around. He even waited to see if Amy would voice any objections, but when he glanced at her face, he saw that it was set in silent acceptance. That was all the confirmation he needed, so before he had the opportunity to change his mind, he willed the Bringer Claw to squeeze down.

The shell hadn't really broken in an overly showy affair. It had simply cracked and crumbled under the pressure the Bringer Claw exerted on it, the fragments spilling out in piles of shards, white dust, and electronic cables from between the hand's talons. The remainder of it dropped to the ground, prompting Sorun to finally dismiss the Bringer Claws with a short exhale.

"Well, that's that." Staring down at the white pile for a few more moments, Sorun glanced back towards the fallen crowd of Mobians behind them. To his relief he saw that a large amount of them were beginning to stir awake and move slightly. "Eggman said that he was sending more robots here," he continued, turning back to face Amy who had grown an alarmed look, "but it looks like everybody's starting to wake up. We should be fine once they're all up and moving."

"Oh. That's good," Amy said, breathing out in relief. "So that was... that was really crazy, huh?"

"Yeah, it was," Sorun agreed, sliding Yamato back into its sheath. "It's almost over, though. Which means someone can stop playing that terrible music!" Sorun screamed out towards the stage.

At his words, the musical beats spilling out from the speakers cut out. At the same time, a rather vexed-looking Vector peeked his head up from over the soundboard and shouted towards Sorun, "You got no taste, Sorun!"

"You're the one with no taste!" Sorun shouted back, shaking his head before turning back to Amy. "Anyways, yeah. Thanks for, uh... for bailing me out there. I wasn't really doing too good against that thing."

"Oh, no problem. That's what friends are for, right?"

Instead of responding immediately, Sorun continually stared at Amy. After a few moments, he mumbled something unintelligible under his breath and turned away from her, which caused the pink hedgehog to frown slightly. "Sure."

He became instantly startled and almost lost his balance when he felt a weight press against him. Breathing out in surprise, he snapped his head downwards and tightly gripped the sheathed katana still grasped in his left hand. He relaxed immediately when he saw it was just Amy, who for whatever reason had chosen to give him a light hug.

"Hey, thanks for saving me back there and helping to save everyone here," she told him, smiling widely while looking into his eyes. "I know it still must be a struggle for you, but you're doing really great. I just wanted you to know that."

Sorun almost went as far to open his mouth and refute her, but he had neither the physical nor mental energy to commit to the action, and he just plain didn't feel like denying her. After a few moments, though, he did go and gently brush her arms off of him. "Alright, alright. Get off," he mumbled, taking a few steps back from her. "I'm gonna go wake someone up." He turned around and took a few steps forwards, and then stopped and turned his head back to Amy. "... I appreciate the... ugh, never mind, you get it."

He didn't turn his head around fast enough to avoid the beaming smile Amy sent his way. Grumbling under his breath, Sorun began stomping forwards into the crowd, intent on getting as far away from her as possible and waking somebody up as quick as possible so they could begin the process of getting everybody up before the robot reinforcements arrived.

Fortunately, from the amount of stirring he saw from the people he was passing it wouldn't take much to wake them up. There were even a few individuals he could make out that were already steadily making their way up to their feet. He wasn't too concerned about that, which made him feel a bit more at ease. He felt even more at ease when he came across the sleeping form of a blue hedgehog, sprawled out on the ground right in front of him.

That was about as far as Sorun got before he fell down flat on his front, too tired from the earlier fight to move on much further. The Yamato had dropped from his grasp and immediately disappeared as well.

Sighing, Sorun turned his head against the ground to face Sonic. Much to his chagrin, it seemed like the hedgehog was still sleeping, and was even mumbling in his sleep a small amount. Rolling his eyes, Sorun managed to bring his index up to his face with a moderate amount of effort and, not hesitating in the slightest, popped the finger into his mouth. He held it there for a few moments, and then removed the wet digit from his mouth. He then positioned the moist finger right above one of Sonic's ears, and without missing beat plunged the finger straight into his ear.

The reaction was immediate. Sonic had woken straight up into a sitting position with a startled scream, his hand automatically going to his ear. Sorun managed a small chuckle at the sight.

"G-gah! What the heck was that for, Sorun!?" Sonic yelled, rubbing at his ear with an annoyed expression. That look on his face was immediately replaced with shock and wide eyes when he looked around at all the fallen Mobians surrounding him. "Wait, what the...? What happened to everybody?" He looked down at Sorun, his eyes widening even further when he saw the state the human's clothes was in. "What happened to you , Sorun!?"

"Sonic. So glad to see you finally woke up to join the rest of us," Sorun blandly replied, rolling onto his back so that his face was facing the night sky. "Eggman sabotaged the concert. Replaced one of Mina's speakers with a Badnik that put everybody to sleep. Nicole, Amy, and Vector took care of it. I helped out a little," he explained.

A few moments passed where Sonic absorbed all the new information offered to him. After this, his expression turned serious as he nodded down towards Sorun. "Alright, makes enough sense. So everybody's gonna be fine?"

"They should wake up, yeah," Sorun confirmed in a weary tone. "That being said Eggman's sending some extra robot since he thinks you all are still asleep, so you might wanna hustle and get everybody up before they get here."

"Alright, got it," Sonic said with a nod, rising up to his feet. "You helpin' out?"

In answer to Sonic's question, Sorun just barely managed to shake his head. "Naaah... I'm tappin' out," he murmured. "You go ahead and save everybody. I'm... I'm just gonna stay here forever."

Sonic rolled his eyes at the answer, though a playful smirk had still made its way onto his features. "I told you this would happen if you started skipping out on endurance training. It's fine, though. Hang tight here, we'll take care of the rest."

Sorun had already fallen asleep before Sonic even finished.

It'd been easy enough to wake everybody up who had gone to the concert and fallen down due to the Badnik speaker machine. With the multiplicative process of one person waking another up, turning to two waking two up, and with one of those people being a supersonic hedgehog who could wake up rows of people in a single breath, it had taken no time at all to rouse everybody back awake. In fact, in just under five minutes the two hundred Mobians who had been knocked out had all been successfully awakened.

The reinforcements of Badniks had arrived soon after. The number itself was laughably small: It was just a single small ship that at max could only fit around fifty Egg Pawns and an equal amount of the egg-shaped teleporter pods, and at the head of that ship was a small egg-shaped drone displaying a hologram of Dr. Eggman. The detachment force, of course, had been so small due to the Doctor having half-expected to arrive in a field of unconscious Mobians ready and waiting for processing.

What he got was a field of very-awake Mobians, the entirety of the Freedom Fighters included in the mix and a blue-furred hedgehog standing ahead of the crowd with his arms crossed.

"... So Sorun beat my latest creation, huh?" The hologram of Dr. Eggman floated down from the low-floating ship, stopping right in front of the irate-looking hedgehog who was tapping his foot rapidly at the man's sight. "A predictable outcome, but a small part of me still held out hope he wouldn't destroy that Badnik. It had some unique, one-of-a-kind parts in it. He's beginning to become as annoying as you are, rodent."

"Well, not sorry to be the one to tell you this, Egghead, but your plan of abducting a whole concert's a no-go."

A loud sigh escaped from Eggman, and his shoulders slumped. "You know what's never going to make Sorun more annoying than you? That." He leaned to the side and propped his head on his fist. "How long have we been fighting, rodent, only for you to resort to the same tiresome insults over and over? At least he puts some thought into the banter."

Sonic rolled his eyes. "Save it for somebody who cares, Eggb-"

"Eggbreath, yes, you've used that one a hundred times already." His look completely unimpressed, Eggman began drumming his fingers across his head while gesturing to Sonic with the other. "See? This is what I'm talking about. It's all gotten old, hedgehog. You, your nicknames, and the rest of your paltry little resistance. I'm not surprised you had to resort to kidnapping people from whole other zones just to keeps things going."

At that, Sonic's foot instantly stopped tapping. His eyes narrowed just the slightest amount, and in the crowd in the background some of the Freedom Fighters bristled at the remark. "You don't know what you're talking about."

"Is there really anything to understand past that? I'd argue the hypocrisy of you all calling yourselves Freedom Fighters after taking that boy's freedom from him, but I imagine you already got enough of that from him. I'm surprised he still chose to ingratiate himself with your lot, but fools will be fools, and he's kept things just a tad more interesting, so I won't complain. Much. He could really do to watch his language, you know. All that cursing he does cheapens the banter."

"Sorun doesn't swear," Sonic denied.

"Not around you, maybe," Eggman scoffed. "Suppose I can't really blame him. He has to live around a group of mangy animals that stole his life."

By the last word Sonic had become fed up with the Doctor's words. He uncrossed his arms, slowly stepping forwards with a disgruntled expression on his face. "Say whatever you want, Eggman. He's one of us and is helping to dismantle your empire one bot at a time." Behind him, some of the other Freedom Fighters smirked proudly at the claim. Eggman, meanwhile, rolled his eyes from behind his glasses.

"The empire you've made little to no progress in stopping after all this time? That one? Right, of course." Eggman's wide smile grew on his lips when he saw Sonic's frown deepen even further. "I'll be straight with you, Sonic. Coming all the way out here and having this whole scheme of mine fail was worth it just to see that look on your face. So congratulations! You bought yourselves a bit more time before I get bored." He waved his hand in the air. "Well, what are you waiting for? Go on, get to it. I got a whole platoon of Badniks back there programmed to destroy you. And while you're wasting time doing that, I've got dinner ready and waiting."

The hologram cut out. Sonic, in a fit of irritation, briefly spun through the air and cut right through the small drone that had been displaying his hologram. He landed on his feet, glaring up at the ship full of Badniks with the rest of the Freedom Fighters right behind him.

Suffice to say it had been a short and uneventful fight.

It had been the crack of dawn by the time Sorun had finally woken up. Nobody had bothered to move him from the ground, but somebody had at least put a blanket over him. That had been nice. Waking up to a bunch of dirt in his hair hadn't nearly been as nice, but he was beyond the point of caring by now. He'd just take a shower later on. And then purposely use all the hot water just to mess with Sonic.

He'd woken up to the sounds of loud celebration. When he'd sat up, he'd seen an Eggman ship burning to the ground in the background, with decimated robots scattered all around. Despite the dreary visage, everybody seemed really excited. All the Mobians who had come to the concert were all gathered around, and it was with some amusement he saw that they were holding Amy and Vector up into the air while cheering their names. Vector actually looked bashful at the attention, while Amy was practically basking in it. He saw that she was blowing kisses towards a blue figure in the crowd, too, and he couldn't help but chuckle when he saw the blue form disappear in a speed blur.

So, with little else to do, he'd walked all the way towards the concert stage, pulled himself up, and sat down on the edge while looking forwards at the proceedings. He felt a little upset that he wasn't included in the celebrations in the distance, but he didn't care all too much. He was happy enough seeing the dismantled heap of metal that had once been that wolf Badnik and the remains of all the other robots scattered around.

He couldn't get over the fact he'd almost died to that wolf out of his mind, though. The embarrassment from having to have been saved by Amy was trumped by his own self-loathing of his own weakness. Even after three Emeralds it still wasn't enough. He needed more Emeralds and more powers. The problem he was running into was that his health was starting to become negatively affected by these things, and the sunk cost fallacy of health over powers was already slowly catching up to him. Even so, he couldn't do anything to protect anybody with how he was right now.

"Power... I need more power..."

He'd just power through it if that really did become a problem. For now, though, it wasn't important. The important thing was that he was fine at the moment. Even more importantly, everybody was fine from the looks of it. That's what he cared about most over everything else.

"~They will see, we'll fight until eternity... come with me, we'll stand and fight together...~" He looked back towards the crowd of Mobians in the distance, still celebrating amidst the charred corpses of robots as a small wave of serenity hit him. "~Through our strength, we'll make a better day tomorrow... we, shall never surrender...~"

"Where's that from?"

Sorun's teeth made a loud clack! sound when his jaw snapped shut. Muttering curses under his breath, he turned his head to the side just enough to catch an eyeful of yellow fur wrapped in rocker's clothing, with another brown-furred form behind the first wearing blue boots and a vest. He grumbled some more when he saw Mina and Sally hop up on stage and sit next to him.

"Just a song. From where I'm from," he quietly muttered, slumping forwards and looking back ahead. "Sorry about your concert getting abruptly cancelled by a killer speaker. Rough luck."

From besides him, he heard Mina sigh. "It's not the end of the world. It's just so... frustrating this always has to happen to good people because of Eggman, but... but at least we have Freedom Fighters out there looking out for us. Freedom Fighters like you." He heard the slight rustle of clothes and felt Mina's eyes on him. "You don't have a half-bad singing voice, you know."

"Could you forget you heard that?" Sorun asked, cheeks slightly tinged in embarrassment. "What do you want?"

"I just heard we have you to thank for, well, helping all of us and I just wanted to see how you were doing," Mina answered. "How come you're not over there with all the others?"

"I'm content with just sitting here," Sorun answered in response. "Are you going to be fine now?"

He saw Mina nod from the corner of his vision. "Yes, we will, thank you. Nobody was hurt, thank goodness, so once everybody's nerves are settled and some time has passed, maybe we could try this again."

That was good to hear. He breathed out at hearing the mongoose's words. "... Well... I still haven't heard you sing, so maybe I'll go to that concert. Maybe," Sorun answered after a long beat of silence passed. "It'd be nice if you could tell me beforehand if that ever happens. For planning purposes."

He heard Mina giggle from besides him and could practically feel the smile she gave him. "I promise you'll be the first one to know. It's the least I can do. And maybe you could share that song you were singing with me sometimes?"

A smirk formed along Sorun's mouth along with a scoff leaving his nose. "Mm, not a chance. I don't think you'd like the first half of that song. It's real violent."

"Oh. Well, alright." Mina slid off of the stage and waved goodbye to Sorun. "I gotta get back back to my friends, now. Seeya, Sorun!"

He watched the mongoose walk off after saying her farewell, Sorun giving his own two-fingered salute as a farewell in response. "Well, at least she's doing well. Seems like this whole thing didn't faze her too much, so that's good. Hearing her sing songs from those games, though... pfft, right, I'll give her the lyrics to 'Devils Never Cry' and see how well she reacts to it. Not." That would be a disaster in the making. A fun disaster, but he had enough things to deal with without having to add that on top of everything else.

At hearing a voice clear their throat, he looked to the side to see Sally still sitting in the same spot and staring expectantly at him. He sighed, almost having forgotten she was even there in the first place, and then looked back forwards.

"So did you guys just finish holding Eggman off?" he asked, gesturing to the destroyed robots in the background.

Sally looked towards where he was pointing, and then shook her head. "Oh, no. We beat all of them hours ago. A few people just decided to hold a celebration for our victory and to make up for the concert, and everybody decided to go along with it."

"And you all decided to just leave me sleeping on the cold, hard ground throughout all that. I'm touched."

Pouting her lips in slight indignation, Sally rolled her eyes in response to the other teen. "You seemed like you needed your sleep, and nobody wanted to move you. Amy went and got you a blanket all the way from her house, and Vector made sure nobody bugged you while you were sleeping."

"They did, huh...?" Sorun muttered, eyes going towards where the two Mobians were as a slightly warm feeling grew in his chest. "That was nice of them."

"Yeah, it was," Sally agreed with a nod. "It's still kind of frightening, how Eggman managed to incapacitate all of us so easily. Amy said you took care of that problem, though." She scooted closer to Sorun and leaned her head a bit forwards so she was forced into his view. "You did really good, you know. There were a lot of Mobians at this concert, us included."

"Nicole's the one that thought the plan up. Amy and Vector did all the work. All I did was get smacked around by a monster wolf until Amy came and saved me," Sorun mumbled, blowing a lock of hair out of his face. "I didn't really do all that much."

"Ah-huh, so saving Amy's life wasn't all that much?" Sorun's head perked up in surprise, and he turned towards Sally who was giving him a smug look with her arms crossed. "You're too modest for your own good, Sorun. A few of the others could stand to learn a bit of that from you."

"Is one of those others blue and really spiky?"

Sally laughed out loud at that, sighing out in mirth while slowly nodding her head. "Perhaps," she agreed. "But seriously. Nice job."

"... I'm just doing what you all would have done for me. It's not a big deal." That was where a majority of the modesty came from. That and not having to feel the embarrassment from all the praise he'd receive, despite how good it would feel. He just didn't think he had the mental fortitude to handle that.

That and it made the narrative he'd weaved for himself about not considering everybody around him his friend fall apart. The narrative that had basically crumbled completely at this point that everybody saw through. The one he wasn't even sure he was bothering to hold up anymore.

Giving him a knowing smile, Sally began reaching into the inner pockets of her vest. "Sure it isn't. Anyways, here." She took out two items and placed them onto the space between herself and Sorun. One was Nicole's handheld, which served to brighten Sorun's mood up immediately. The other, much to his shock, was a brightly-glowing Power Ring. "I figured you two deserved something after what you did," Sally answered when Sorun slowly glanced up at her with a baffled look. "Don't worry about your Chao. Amy's looking after him."

"B-but..." Sorun stammered, looking back down at the ring and computer.

"It's fine. Just be sure to get Nicole back to me at some point." And with that, Sally slid off of the stage and began walking towards the celebrating crowd in the distance. "Oh, and no missions for you two today, so feel free to relax and do whatever you want."

The human teen watched Sally's back as she left, mouth hanging agape in complete shock. It seemed too good to be true, and he had to blink multiple times to ensure he was really seeing the handheld computer and ring sitting next to him. And, indeed, they were sitting there.

Feelings of intense gratitude towards Sally washed over Sorun, and he wasted no time in grabbing the Power Ring and inserting it into Nicole's handheld. The AI didn't even need a verbal cue from Sorun to begin forming her body, as almost the same second he'd put the ring in he'd seen dark cubes begin swirling around in the effort of forming Nicole's body.

Sorun felt himself put at ease when he saw Nicole's body finally finish forming, an easy smile uncontrollably forming across his face as his entire form relaxed. Nicole blinked once, and then turned her head towards Sorun as a similar smile formed on her face.

The smile lowered a significant amount when she saw the state of Sorun's clothing.

"Oh, Sorun..." she quietly muttered, moving right next to Sorun's side while worryingly examining his form. "Are you alright?"

"Y-yeah, I'm fine," he stuttered. He found himself torn between looking away in embarrassment and still looking towards Nicole, and chose to continue facing her as he tugged at the top portion of his blue hoodie. "I don't even want to know what Honey's gonna say to me when she sees this. She absolutely hates it when I get her clothes wrecked in the field. 'Sets a bad image for the quality of the material,' she says," Sorun informed Nicole, making air quotes with his fingers.

"Well, that sounds like a problem she will have to deal with on her own," Nicole said, actually looking a bit upset at Sorun's words. She reached forwards and brushed a hand over the spot on his abdomen where he'd been slashed at by the wolf Badnik's claws. "Are you completely sure you are unhurt?"

He felt his fingers involuntarily twitch at the contact, and felt the areas she was touching grow warm. Sorun, feeling uncomfortable at the contact, immediately moved back away from Nicole as a result, ignoring his battered body's protest as he resettled in his new position. "It's just a lot of bruises, I'm fine," he assured her, his voice cracking just the slightest amount. "Are you okay?"

Nicole moved her hand back to the side, giving Sorun a perplexed look with her eyes at the question. "Why would I be unwell?" she asked.

"Because of the concert," Sorun sighed out, his eyes slowly dipping downwards in shame. "I-I just wanted... we always do what I want, so I wanted to do something you would like for a change, and-and it was your first concert and everything but it got ruined and I- I just feel like an utter failure because the one time I try doing something for you I screw it up and-"

"Sorun. Look at me."

The utter inadequacy he felt over himself had caused Sorun to go off on a regret-filled tangent, though Nicole's words had brought him out of it. Despite the intense feelings of shame he felt, he managed to look up. He gasped out softly when he saw her staring right at him, a smile on her face. He couldn't fathom what she could possibly be smiling at right now.

"You had nothing to do with this. In fact, it is quite the opposite: you took active steps to ensure nobody was hurt." The smile lowered a bit when she looked at Sorun's clothes. "Almost nobody, at least. I wish you would be more careful with yourself and take less risks, but I accept you do so for the sake of others. And I deeply appreciate you having listened to me back in that shop. You looked ready to storm out there, sword in hand and ready to confront Eggman right then and there."

"I wasn't gonna... c'mon, give me a little credit here..." Sorun turned his head to the side, abashed smile covering his face that he desperately tried to hide by brushing his hair in front of his face. He heard Nicole laugh again at the sight, though even the happy feeling that gave him didn't stop the intense, apologetic urge still coursing through him. "I'm... I'm really sorry your night got ruined-"

"And I already told you that you have nothing to apologize for. Unless you've been colluding with the Doctor behind all of our backs, in which case I will be expecting a full written confession and terms of your surrender."

Sorun's head snapped back towards Nicole, though when he saw her still smiling towards him, his shook his head in amusement and began rubbing at his head. "Yeah, I'll be sure to get on it," he jokingly replied with a small chuckle.

Nicole reciprocated Sorun's chuckle, still gazing towards his face. "You do realize it was not just my night?"

"Well, yeah, sure, it was everybody's night, but it was special for you since this was your first-"

"Was this not your fist concert, too? By all means it was just as much your night as mine." The lynx's words made Sorun go speechless, and when he said nothing in response, Nicole continued. "And while it is unfortunate this happened, as I said, there will be other opportunities to experience such things. Beyond that, do not say we only ever do what you want to. I rather enjoy the time we spend together, regardless of what it is we are doing. And I happen to enjoy games just as much as you."

" Just as much as me? I can contest that," Sorun said.

"I'm sure you could," Nicole replied. "Nevertheless, no matter what it is we are doing, I greatly value our time together, and I am truly thankful you wanted to 'mix things up', as it were. The fact this attack happened in conjunction with that was little more than an unfortunate coincidence. So don't blame yourself for it going wrong, and just know I am still thankful for what you tried to do."

He didn't know how it was she was able to make him feel better with just words alone, but somehow, Nicole managed it. All the negative thoughts that had been assaulting him from earlier were all but gone at this point thanks to her, and he felt immensely better knowing she wasn't upset in the slightest at him. It helped make him feel lighter, and almost made him forget about his bruises.

Almost. His body was still screaming at him in soreness.

"Um, uh, that-that's..." Sorun sighed, and turned his body towards the edge of the stage. "Can we- can we just go? Go back to the HQ?"

"You do not wish to go celebrate with the others?" Nicole asked, though she mimicked Sorun's movements and slid off of the stage with him and onto the ground, making sure to grab her computer body along the way.

Sorun shook his head in a negative response. "We can do that later, and I'm not feeling up to it right now. I just want to relax." And he only had a limited amount of time before Nicole's new Power Ring would exhaust itself. They could wait. She couldn't.

Fortunately, Nicole seemed to accept his answer and gave him a nod. "Very well. I assume you want to play something, then?"

"Actually, can we... you think we can just talk?" Sorun shyly asked, turning his head away from her. "You know, about... I don't know, something. My old home or something else if you want. Can we just do that?"

When he heard Nicole pause, he began to grow slightly worried and looked over towards her direction fearing the worst. But when he looked back over at her, he just saw her eyeing him silently before once more giving him a nod, her lips upturning into a smile. "Of course we can, Sorun. I would be more than happy to."

"'Kay." Having been leaning against the stage, Sorun pushed off of it and attempted to walk forwards. He failed immediately, as another wave of soreness swept through his body and caused him to fall backwards. He gasped out in surprise and blindly reached out for something to grab onto before he fell down completely.

He ended up grabbing onto Nicole's shoulder, who had quickly stepped behind him to catch Sorun mid-fall. He felt that burning, nervous sensation return from the touch and tried scrambling to get away from her, but when he looked up and saw the frown on her face he stopped cold.

"You said your injuries were minor," she said, voice completely flat and eyes narrowed in an accusing manner.

"Eh-heh, minor is, er... subjective?" Sorun tried, doing his best to flash a grin. This only ended up causing another wave of pain to lance through his body, causing him to grimace.

She didn't look amused at all by his words, and after seeing him grimace, she shook her head in disapproval. "You're obviously too injured to be moving around on your own. I suppose I will have to carry you back myself."

What little color was in Sorun's face drained when he heard her say that. He didn't want that. "Aw, come on, Nicole, don't," he quietly plead, "that's too embarrassing. I'd rather you drag me than have everybody see that."

Nicole looked ready to argue the point, but stopped herself when she saw the pleading, nervous look on Sorun's face. She narrowed her eyes again at the look, and then closed them fully as a sign of conceding. "At the very least lean against me so I can help you reach our destination."

"Sure." Awkwardly, Sorun was repositioned so that his left arm was slung over Nicole's shoulder while his torso leaned its weight against hers. He still felt embarrassment over the actions, but he'd take this over having to be carried by her. He didn't think he'd survive something like that.

He was thankful she had offered to assist him in walking, as it was only when they began moving did he realize how battered he really was. Battered to the point he didn't even know if he would make it all the way back to the HQ even with Nicole's help. The fear of people seeing him being carried pushed him on, though, even if he wasn't confident that would be enough to carry him through. He at least wanted to get far enough to where nobody would see him if he did collapse.

"You know, ah, this... this reminds me a lot about that one time I went car surfing," Sorun murmured to Nicole as they inched their way along.

Nicole, keeping a firm hold on Sorun's arm in order to keep him on his feet, flashed Sorun with an a questioning yet amused look. "Car surfing? Dare I even ask what that is?"

"It's where you balance on top of a moving car and try to set records based on how long you stay on the car and how fast it goes. It was Dave's idea. Went about as well as you'd think," Sorun explained, letting out a pained chuckle halfway through. "There was this one junkyard we and a few others sometimes hung out in, and one day there was this junker of a car that was scheduled to be crushed but still worked, so Dave had this bright idea..."

Chapter 30

Recursion Error

Episode 30- Ring-around

"... You're a cruel person. You know that?"

"Yes, I'm the absolute worst for giving you a simple delivery job you don't even have to leave Knothole for. How could I possible by so absent of morals as to give you such an easy assignment?"

The human laying on the couch responded with a low, deep sigh, and then rose up one of his arms to drape it across his eyes while saying, "It's bad enough you limited my fix of the things. You gotta dangle 'em in front of my face and taunt me with them now?"

"Sorun, I'm just asking you to deliver a few Power Rings to people that need them. I'm not taunting you with anything."

"Ugh..." The human settled deeper into the couch. "Do I have to, Sally? I'm tired. I don't want to."

Sally, who stood in front of the couch the human was laying on, rubbed at the space between her eyes in slight frustration. She'd seen Sorun go through a lot of change since he'd become a Freedom Fighter, most of it good, some of it bad. She didn't remember laziness being one of the bad traits that had formed over time, though, even if it was in line with a lot of his habits.

It still amazed her how he'd gone from being the weak, timid human who was so reluctant to do anything involved with fighting to the person she was looking at right now. Excluding times like right now, he was a model Freedom Fighter if such a standard existed: he was powerful now due to the Chaos Emeralds, but more importantly he had the heart to help others and save people at his own risk. He never acted like he did. Sally couldn't even recall the last time she saw him give a genuine smile, and he still tended to avoid most people more often than approach them, though this behaviour had been lessening to some degree as of late. He never gave the impression of being a Freedom Fighter, but he acted like one.

Of course, his negatives shined through fairly clearly, and while Sally often found herself rolling her eyes at that side of Sorun's personality, she oddly found it comforting that Sorun wore those bad qualities on his sleeve as opposed to hiding them, as it made it easy to read him. She suspected he was the inverse of most people, actually: that he displayed all of his bad traits while actively hiding his good traits and generous heart. And she knew he was a good person, as he had just done too much to say otherwise. And furthermore she suspected he just lived this way because he suffered from overbearing shyness and couldn't handle friendliness from other people. She'd seen the signs, like the way he grew all flustered whenever Bunnie or Antoine acted friendly around him or how he would flounder around simple things like somebody giving him a friendly hug or even just a pat on the back. But he was trying. She couldn't fault him for that. And she was rather proud of how far he'd grown into being a Freedom Fighter.

But laziness? Sorun was a lot of things. Sarcastic to an exhaustive point. A bit more blunt and tactless than she would have liked. Perhaps a little too apathetic. But she'd never seen him outright refuse to do something she would ask of him just because he didn't want to. He always complained, as was to be expected, but he never said no.

Sally placed a hand on her waist, the other clutching a small, brown backpack. Its top open to reveal a small amount of golden rings nestled inside of it. "Can I ask why you're refusing to do this?" Sally asked, her voice slightly stern.

Sighing again, Sorun sat up on the HQ's couch to look Sally right in her eyes. "It's not a refusal. I'm telling you I am physically too exhausted to accomplish the task." He shook his head and ran a hand through his hair. "Sorry, Sally, I'm just... I'm not feeling it today."

She opened her mouth to refute this. She wanted to say that Sorun was being ridiculous and that he was just using exhaustion as an excuse to get out of doing a bit of work. But then she got a better look at his face, and she clamped her mouth shut immediately.

Sorun looked awful.

Having seen other humans in the past from Station Square, Sally had a fair idea what they were supposed to look like. Sorun always had a bit paler shade of skin than she'd ever seen on humans, but when Sorun had explained away and said that it was due to a lack of sunlight in his earlier life, she'd accepted the explanation. But his color looked slightly different now. It wasn't the clean kind of lightness she'd known him for, but a milkier, almost pallid look. She was fairly certain those dark circles around his eyes weren't supposed to be there, either. His disposition as a whole just looked haggard.

"Sorun, are you... are you okay?" Sally asked, concern growing in her face as she leaned closer towards him. "You're not sick, are you?" She hoped he wasn't sick. She didn't know how close human illnesses translated to Mobian illnesses, and while she would have liked Mobian medicines to work on humans, she wasn't an expert in this kind of field.

For some reason his facial features twitched at the question, followed by him shaking his head. "No, I just haven't been getting a lot of sleep."

"You have been getting kind of sluggish lately," Sally noted, her features creasing in worry. "How come you haven't been getting much sleep?"

"Just haven't," Sorun vaguely answered, turning his head towards the side to avoid Sally's gaze.

The chipmunk found herself frowning at Sorun's action. "Sorun, I can't take an answer like that. You're a vital part of the team, which means your health concerns are my health concerns." She felt the stern look drop off immediately when she saw Sorun's flinching face and conflicted eyes, her voice softening completely when she then asked, "Are you still upset at your hom-?"

"Jesus, gimme the bag. I'll do it," he grumbled out, his hand snatching forwards and grabbing the backpack out from Sally's grasp. "So who am I dropping these things off to?"

The stern look returned to Sally's face, not having appreciated the sudden turn Sorun had taken. "Sorun-"

"So how have you been?"

"Sorun, come on, that wasn't even a good attempt," Sally chastised with a shake of her head.

Looking up from the bag in his hand at the princess, Sorun watched the serious expression that had grown on her face for all of two seconds before sighing and going limp the couch. "It's not that, alright? I've been getting better with that. It's... I don't know, the whole-"

The human was cut off when a pained grimace lanced across his face. Much to Sally's confusion, he sat forwards on the couch while holding a hand up to his chest, around where his heart was. He coughed a couple of time, and then held a hand towards his back while giving a very concerned Sally a reassuring look.

"Uh, sorry about that. Crick in my back, this couch is horrible for laying on, you know?" Sorun apologized, letting off a dry chuckle that quickly tapered off into a withering sigh.

His assurances did nothing to quell the uneasy look Sally still had on her voice, her concern for the other teen still dwelling in her. "How badly has this been affecting you?"

"Hn, Sally, just drop it. I've been working on it," Sorun responded with a low groan. "Between home and fighting all the time and other stuff it's been a lot. But like I said, I'm getting better. Talking with Nicole helps, and believe it or not I'm actually getting used to going around fighting robots. It's kind of becoming, I don't know, routine for me? Which I think is good? But at the same it's like, is this a healthy thing for me to grow numb to? Because I don't... agh, it's weird." He lowered his shaking head and cradled it in his hand. "I know it doesn't really mean much to somebody like you since you've been doing this almost your whole life, but for me it's still..."

"No, no, I completely get it," Sally assured him, stepping a bit closer to Sorun. "Honestly, there's not a lot of people I would have expected to adapt to this kind of lifestyle while juggling, well, everything else you're having to deal with, so by all means you're doing really well!"

She'd thought he'd been doing spectacularly, actually, right before she found him in this state. She'd been happy he'd been talking over his issues with somebody in the effort of working through them. Seeing him like this still had her mildly concerned, but she could understand. She and everybody else had practically their whole lives to get used to the lifestyle of resisting Robotnik. Sorun barely had two months. If anything, the progress he'd shown so far was astounding. He'd even been becoming more and more active in missions, going as far as to even volunteer sometimes, which she attributed to his lack of sleep.

"Maybe you should be slowing down a little," Sally suggested to him. "You've been doing a lot lately, and I know with all the swords and the wings and whatnot you're good in the field, but you can't keep going forever."

An odd, dissatisfied look crossed Sorun's face. "Sonic acts like he does," he argued in a quiet voice.

"Well he's... special, in his own way. He acts like that because he can, but even he has his own limits." A frown creased her features as she looked to the side. "Even if he doesn't act like it sometimes..."

"Yeah, I get it." That dissatisfied look was still on Sorun's face, though it slowly disappeared when he let a calming breath out. "Right, well... other than that, I'm doing good," he said, giving her what she assumed was his best attempt at a reassuring smile. It didn't come out great, as it only half-formed and he'd darted his eyes to the side to avoid looking into her eyes. "By the end of this I, uh... I won't really have to worry about fighting anymore anyways, so... so yeah."

Sally nodded in understanding. "See, that's the spirit. This isn't going to last forever."

"Boy, don't I know it," Sorun mumbled under his breath. He sighed, and then looked towards Sally's eyes. "Hey, you didn't answer me when I asked how you were doing."

She found herself blinking in surprise. "I thought you just said that as a poor attempt at deflecting my question."

"I sort of did, yeah, but I was still serious."

"Really now?" Sally found herself crossing her arms, the amused smile she found forming on her face hiding the inquisitive look in her eyes. "I didn't realize you cared. You never seem like you do, especially after that once conversation we had after that thing with the first Emerald." She said this mostly just to tease him, of course. She knew at some level he cared about those around him, even if he refused to admit or show it. But it was still a bit of fun seeing the look on his face whenever she teased him like this.

The look like the one he was displaying right now. The semi-embarrassed, and a little to her surprise, slightly regretful look on his face. "I'm not allowed to be concerned over the wellbeing of another Freedom Fighter?" he airily asked, rubbing at the side of his face. "Geez, you're making me sound real shallow here."

Sally laughed a bit at that, and then chose to sit down on the couch next to him. "Oh, alright. I've been doing fine. As fine as can be expected these days, at least."

"So same old, same old?"

"About that, yeah," Sally agreed with a nod. "I... still worry a lot, about how the war against Eggman has been going," she silently admitted, followed by her beginning to wring her hands together. "We've been doing everything we can, but we still haven't been making any progress towards defeating him. If anything, we're just barely surviving here while helping out everybody we can."

It was a point of great frustration for her, as well as the rest of the Freedom Fighters. In the past whenever they'd thwarted his plots, it'd felt like they were making an actual, tangible difference. Tiny, minute differences, but she still saw them as taking steps forwards towards freedom. But nowadays, it didn't feel anything like that. It just felt like they were all struggling to stay up on their feet as opposed to slowly but surely winning.

"Even after all the trouble you went through with that tablet, we're still on a losing front, huh?" Sorun's words brought Sally out from her thoughts, causing her to look towards the human. "Man. What a bummer."

"I-I didn't mean to say... Sorun, you know we all know you've been doing good work out there-" She cut herself off when she saw a the small smirk beginning to grow on Sorun's face. She huffed out, and then turned her head to the side. "That dry humor of yours is unbecoming of you."

"Dry humor's all I got going for me," Sorun shot back, grin still on his face. "You said it yourself. War won't last forever, right? 'Sides, I got a feeling it'll end well."

"And what makes you think that?" Sally asked, turning her head back towards Sorun.

The human shrugged. "Eh, just a feeling I got. But going forwards thinking we're gonna lose isn't really conducive towards performance, and I try to keep a positive mindset." He leaned forwards a bit, breathing lightly through his nose. "I mean, I always fail, but I think the idea that I at least try more than makes up for it."

"The self-depreciating humor isn't really becoming of you, either," Sally quipped, shaking her head at the human's words. "But I agree that keeping a positive attitude is important, especially these days. I'm a little surprise to hear you say something like that, though. No offense, but you never pegged me as a... optimistic person, Sorun."

"I'm usually not. But this feeling I have seems pretty spot-on. Just trust me." He held up the backpack containing the Power Rings to Sally's view. "Alright, enough of that. So who am I delivering these things to?"

The sudden shift in the conversation caught Sally off guard, but the question made her realize she'd almost forgotten why she'd sought Sorun out in the first place. She needed him to deliver those Power Rings. "Oh! Let me think..." Sally tipped her head up towards the ceiling, clicking her tongue in thought. "Rotor and Sonic's uncle, Chuck, were asking for a ring to run some experiments of theirs, and Tails' uncle Merlin asked for one, too."

"..." Sorun had been nodding along to the names rattled off, though his eyebrows lifted up a slight amount at the last name. "Tails has an uncle named Merlin?" A wry grin grew on his face. "Does he wear a robe and pointy hat and cast spells?"

"I've never seen him in a hat, but he does practice wizardry arts, yes." The completely innocent answer from Sally caused Sorun's expression to fall completely flat for some reason. "I think he lives in a hut near Tails' home. You might try asking around for it if you get lost."

"... World's messing with me at this point," she heard Sorun mumble under his breath as he stood up to his feet. "Okay, I'm heading out.

Not really feeling up to it, but I'll do what I can."

Sally felt a playful smirk form on her lips. "Oh, I'm sure Sorun the Great Deliverer can handle a simple delivery job like this easily enough."

"I dunno. Last time that guy did a job a train got derailed," Sorun dryly remarked. "Is Rotor in the lab or at home?"

"The lab, I believe."

"Then I'm headin' there first." With that, he began walking towards the lab, twisting around just briefly to meet Sally's eyes. "Don't worry too much about Eggman. Remember, feeling."

"Feeling, sure," Sally demurred, watching as Sorun walked off towards the lab. "If gut feelings were all it took to win wars we would have been done with Eggman a dozen times over by now..."

"Yo, Rotor. Got a special delivery for you."

He'd been in the middle of a very delicate procedure when he heard that voice sound off behind him. That lethargic voice tinged with just a bit of mischief that he'd grown accustomed to hearing all throughout the owner's stay in Knothole. Putting down the small, tweezer-like tools he'd been holding in his claws, Rotor swiftly inhaled through his nose and turned his head around.

As expected, the purple walrus immediately saw the human leaning against the open door frame to the lab, holding a small backpack in his grasp while looking towards Rotor.

"Delivery, huh?" Rotor repeated, spinning around in the stool he sat on to fully face the human. "What is it?"

"Just a Power Ring Sally said you asked for. She's having me go on a delivery run," Sorun explained, pushing off of the frame and walking into the lab. "Beats getting smacked around by robots, so I thought why not? Anyways, here."

Sorun dug into the bag for a brief moment after stopping in front of Rotor, and then pulled out a shining, golden ring before offering it to Rotor. The walrus took the ring immediately, giving it an appraising look for a brief moment and then nodding. "Thanks," he said, setting the ring down on a nearby table. "Is this your way of making up for taking rings out of my stash that one time?"

"Ah, come on, man, I said I was sorry about that," Sorun said, rolling his eyes while beginning to lean against a table.

Rotor gave him a skeptical look. "Were you really sorry?"

He wasn't surprised at all when Sorun shook his head. "No, not at all, but I wanted to be polite about it."

The response had been an expected one, but it still caused Rotor to let out a light scoff as he turned back towards his work. He couldn't really hold it against Sorun whenever he did things like that; he didn't want to say the human's unfortunate circumstances gave him a free pass to freely be an annoyance, but he'd go as far as to admit it got him some leeway whenever he did something less than virtuous. Like stealing Power Rings from his stash of equipment so he could play video games with the resident AI.

At the very least, Sorun knew to reign it in and never go as far as to genuinely make somebody upset with his antics. Rotor personally thought his cold sarcasm was a bit much at times, but he at least never took it as far as to be demeaning or offensive to anybody. And he knew he and Sonic had a habit of playing small jokes and pranks on each other, but with how long Rotor had known the hedgehog, he was surprised the human hadn't been driven insane living with him. So he figured a small prank here and there was actually pretty tame all things considered.

He didn't really have many bad things to say about Sorun other than that. He wasn't even that upset about the Power Rings, as quite honestly, he couldn't be bothered be to upset at loosing what basically amounted to a renewable resource. Rotor wouldn't say he had a lot of good things to say about him, either.

Rotor reached for his tools again, and then paused. No, that wasn't right. Sorun was a... he was a good person in Rotor's opinion. He made some mistakes, but so did everybody. He was a fellow Freedom Fighter who saved people's lives and fought alongside the rest of them, so he couldn't say there weren't any good things to be said about the human. It was just that the two had never really connected on a personal level.

It wasn't for a lack of trying. The two had been on some scarce missions together, though usually they were done with an unusual amount of silence on both their parts unless necessary. They'd exchanged some words in passing during their free time, but most of these were just short conversations or just passing greetings if anything. Rotor suspected that it was just due to a lack of commonalities between the pair. Rotor was a tech junkie who loved nothing more than working with machinery, he'd freely admit that, and Sorun... well, Rotor didn't know much about what he liked. Video games. Sleeping and wasting time in random places. Those sodas that he seemed to hoard at times for whatever reason. That was about it. Outside of training he rarely hung out with many people, too, though on occasion it did happen. More frequently, too, now that he thought on it.

They simply just didn't have any interests that coincided. Rotor was fine with that, and he was fine with Sorun. He honestly would have liked if the human was a bit more open and socialized a bit more, then maybe he and Rotor could have something beyond a professional relationship, but he was keenly aware Sorun still held some hesitancy over this due to his out-of-zone situation and his thoughts on the Freedom Fighters' part in that. So he accepted it for what it was and chose just to roll with it.

The light, hissing sound of soldering soon appeared as Rotor got back to work on his project: a small, disassembled wrist communicator laying on the table in front of him and disassembled, with Rotor's tools rooting around in its electronic guts. Through his work, he noticed a pair of eyes looking at him, and when he turned his head just the barest amount he saw that the human was still leaning in the same spot while looking right at Rotor.

"Whatcha doin'?" Sorun asked.

"Just doing some repair work on some of the team's wrist communicators," Rotor replied as he turned back to his work. "This one is Knuckles'. I'm thinking of outfitting it with something to make it more shock-absorbent, because I swear it's always his I'm having to fix the most out of everyone else's. His and Mighty's. I think it's all that punching they do with that insane strength of theirs."

"I hear that," Sorun agreed. The human teen decided to finally remove himself from the table, and then stepped up directly behind Rotor to look over his shoulder. "So you're a big tech guy, right?"

"That's one way of putting it, I guess," Rotor responded. "I probably specialize into it more than anybody else. Tails and Nicole are probably the only ones that even compare. Oh, and Chuck."

"Cool," Sorun said from behind him. "So, uh... just out of curiosity, are you, um... are you the one that programmed Nicole?" he heard him ask. "You or Tails? 'Cause I don't really know where she came from."

Rotor felt his eye ridges raise at the question. With how much time he spent around Nicole, he would have figured he would have already asked her this question himself. Or Sally, since she was the one who had Nicole on her person at almost all times. He paused in his work and turned towards Sorun.

"Why are you asking me?" he asked the human.

"You mentioned Nicole, and it just came up in my head," Sorun answered with a shrug. "So did you?"

"We actually don't know where she came from," Rotor admitted to the other teen, which caused his eyes to widen slightly in surprise. "Yeah, way early on when we formed the Freedom Fighters she just kinda... showed up. Dropped in from the sky in a little pod and everything. She doesn't have any memories of it, either, so she's just as clueless to her origins as we are. We have a small betting pool to what the truth is. I threw five mobiums in on her being sent from the future by one of us."

They were strange circumstances to be sure, but by now everybody had stopped questioning it and had just accepted that what happened had happened and that Nicole was one of them. The why of it never seemed important compared to the now and all that. Sorun seemed completely mystified by the explanation, though, as his entire demeanor had went rigid, and for whatever reason a nervous looked formed on his face. "The future, huh?" he muttered. "So have you all, uh... ever had to deal with time shenanigans or anything like that?"

"Not... really, no. I think?" He paused to think, and then shook his head. "Yeah, no," Rotor denied with a shake of his head. "Why?"

"Ah, it's... it's nothing. It's just some things not adding up here and there I've noticed. I don't think it's anything, though." Sorun shook his head and waved a hand to the side. "Probably just me being a bit paranoid is all. Eh-heh." He exhaled, and then looked off in a random direction. "You guys really lucked out with getting Nicole just like that."

"Oh, don't I know it," Rotor agreed with a nod, a small smile forming on his face. "Can't even tell you how many situations she's gotten us out of and just how useful she is. She's a really great friend."

"Yeah," said Sorun, slowly and with a nod. "Yeah, she... she really is." He flicked his eyes back towards Rotor. "Really amazing how she evolved a real personality and everything."

"She wasn't always like that," Rotor told him as he spun back towards the disassembled wrist communicator. "Back when she first got to us I could barely tell her apart from a Badnik from the way she spoke. She just kinda... got that way on her own over time." He began soldering at the communicator's internals again. "I'm happy for her. It's nice that she was able to get the ability to have her own feelings. Really helped transition her into being her own person."

From behind him, Sorun gave a small hum of agreement, shifting uncomfortably on his feet.

"What was that hum supposed to mean?" Rotor questioned, turning his head to face Sorun again. "You don't think she's real?"

"I have a very biased view on AI and their status as real people due to my voracious consumption of various entertainment media, Rotor," Sorun answered as he walked back to the previous table only to once again lean on it.

Rotor, not understanding a word of what he just heard, gave the human a confused look. "Huh?"

Sorun blinked at the look, and then shook his head with a sigh. "Real is relative to the personal interpretation of the person asking the question of what is real and what isn't. In terms of Nicole's status as a real person, yes, I do honestly think she is one. Though that doesn't really mean much coming from me."

Rotor blinked in surprise at the statement, more at Sorun's actual words than his statement, though he did feel relief that Sorun shared his opinion. "That's... unusually deep, coming from you."

"I have my moments," Sorun defended.

"Apparently," chuckled Rotor. "I didn't know you could string together thoughts into words like that."

"Yeah, some old habits of mine have been slipping back into place." With a sigh, Sorun began rubbing at the back of his neck. "Kind of annoying, but it's whatever, you know?"

"Not really," Rotor denied with a shake of his head. "Well, whatever the case, I'm glad you agree with me about Nicole. Guess I kinda expected it, though. You spend a lot of time with her," he noted.

Sorun paused at Rotor's words, blinking once before sighing and letting his hand flop to his side. "Yeah. I think it's beginning to become a problem," he quietly admitted, almost low enough that Rotor almost hadn't heard it. He had, however, heard it.

"Why would it be a problem?" the walrus asked in genuine curiosity.

"... It's nothing," Sorun said, shaking his head as he turned back to Rotor. "I never really could get into the tech stuff. I kinda had an interest as a kid and did a little research into it here and there, but to be honest with you the most technical I ever got was when I built a computer. I never really did anything past that. Stuff never stuck with me."

A part of Rotor wanted to return to the earlier subject, though this new one Sorun had brought up about building a computer made all of his interest instantly shift towards that. He eyed the human with surprise, having all but forgotten his soldering tools as he once again fully turned to face the human. "You built a computer?" he asked, a bit of incredulity in his voice.

Sorun shrugged. "Well, if by 'built' you mean 'I bought a bunch of parts, slapped them together in a case, and then loaded a pre-programmed OS into the thing', then yeah, I built one. Coulda just bought a whole one already built, but I liked having a custom rig."

Any feelings of being impressed of the human's exploits dropped right there for Rotor, causing him to smirk in the other teen's direction. "Oh, so you didn't actually build and program a computer. You just put one together."

Having sensed the teasing tone in the walrus' voice, Sorun rolled his eyes. "Whatever, man, it totally counts. I couldn't program a computer to save my life, anyways. I only ever took the one programming class, and it was an introductory course at best."

"Oh, so you have some experience?"

"Eh, I could tell you the difference between a boolean and an if-then-else variable, but otherwise I kinda forget a majority of the stuff it's been so long."

"Ahh." Rotor gave the human a nod of understanding. "I getcha. So how'd your rig perform?"

"Decently enough," Sorun answered. "Parts weren't premium grade or anything like that, the cost of some of those CPU chips were a flippin' racket, but it ran smooth enough for my purposes." Sorun stopped to take a breath, and then groaned slightly as a thought came to him. "I'm really gonna miss that computer, man. I put my heart and soul into making it. I mean, not a huge amount and I had David help, but she was a thing of beauty."

"David?"

"Yeah, real great pal of mine from back on Earth. He's actually the one that convinced me to go ahead and build my own rig, said something like 'a true man builds his own machine' or something like that. Guy, uh... guy was kinda weird like that sometimes. Hope he comes through with that pact we made in the event one of us goes missing and deletes that unnamed folder I had on there." Sorun looked expectantly towards Rotor, mouth open and waiting for him to respond. When Rotor just stared at him blankly, he sighed out and shook his head. "'S just a stupid joke, I never... anyways, yeah, he was a great dude."

Rotor honestly didn't have a clue what it was Sorun was talking about, but he quickly found himself losing interest as he turned back towards the communicator. "I don't really get it, but I hope that works out for you. Whatever 'that' is, anyway."

"There's nothing to work out, I was kidd- ugh, nevermind."

"Ookay." Rotor reached towards his tool. "Well, I know you've probably heard this a lot, but for what it's worth I'm sorry about you losing your friend. And computer."

"Mm." Rotor only managed to pick up his soldering tools for a few seconds before he heard Sorun ask, "Hey, by the way, I've been wondering. Power Rings. Why do you all use rings as a power source?"

Keeping his focus on the electronics he was working on, Rotor answered with, "They're a clean, renewable source of energy. Why wouldn't we use them?"

"Yeah, I got that, but... but why are they rings? And also what are they?"

"Oh, right, we never told him about Power Rings, did we?" It was often that Rotor and the others forget about things like that. Things that seemed so commonplace to them due to having been exposed to it their whole lives being completely alien to Sorun, as, well, he was technically an alien that had never encountered these kinds of things in his own world. They of course always made time to clarify things to him if he ever grew confused, and usually Sorun just accepted any explanation without too much questioning. Even if he did seem to somewhat wither almost every time for some reason.

Well, whatever the case, Power Rings were an important aspect of their world. He supposed he'd take it upon himself to explain it to Sorun.

"Power Rings are a byproduct of the planet being saturated in so much Chaos energy from the Chaos Emeralds," Rotor explained. "Think of them like Chaos Emeralds. They're conduits for Chaos energy, but unlike the Emeralds they have a limited lifespan. They basically 'burn out', for lack of a better term. Why they look like golden rings, though, I couldn't tell ya. They just do."

"Oh, okay." A pause from Sorun. "How come they spawn out of a lake?"

"The Ring Forge." A few moments passed, and when all Rotor heard was silence on Sorun's part he realized he wouldn't know what that was. "It's an invention from this Overlander we knew. Nate Morgan," the walrus clarified. "He made a machine capable of creating Power Rings. Guy was a... he was a real genius, to tell you the truth. Some circumstances lead to his invention winding up in the lake, so now it just pumps out Power Rings. I've heard they can appear in the wild on their own, though apparently that's exceptionally rare."

"An Overlander, huh?" Sorun voiced from behind him, sounding more interested than Rotor had probably ever heard him. "You really liked him?"

"Sure. Everybody liked him," Rotor answered. "He even taught at the school we had set up for a bit that one time before we all had to get back into Freedom Fighting, around when the first Robotnik was defeated. He was, uh..." He had to take a deep breath to steady his suddenly shaking hands. "He was a really great person. Always tried his best to help people."

"... I'm guessing from the fact I haven't seen him around and your heavy use of past-tense that Nate isn't around with us anymore," Sorun quietly said.

Rotor shook his head. "No. He isn't."

"Oh. That's too bad. He sounded like a solid dude."

"The solidest," Rotor agreed.

A whole minute of silence passed. "... You think I could get powers out of Power Rings?" Sorun suddenly asked. "I mean if it's just Chaos energy like the Emeralds-"

"Yeah, but the Emeralds are unlimited wells of Chaos energy since they don't wear out. Rings do," Rotor denied with a shake of his head. "It is possible to channel some power out of them. If you really know what you're doing you can temporarily enhance your natural abilities with one."

A loud scoff was heard from Sorun. "Natural abilities? Right, and what 'natural ability' of mine is a Power Ring supposed to enhance? Snark?"

Rotor laughed a little at that. "Knowing you, probably." The light grin that had form settled into a contemplative frown. "I don't know, Sorun. Maybe if you rounded enough up together you could get something out of them, but I don't know. Sonic's more of an expert on using them than I am. He's gotten more mileage out of those things than anybody else I know."

"Really, now? What do you mean?"

"Well, he had this one kind of transformation he used to go into a lot when he wrangled together seven Chaos Emeralds from back when they were all separated and fifty Power Rings. Past that, uh... there was that thing that happened when he gathered a billion of them."

A loud crash was heard. Rotor, startled by the noise, immediately set his tools down and whirled around in his seat in concern at the sound. The sight he was greeted to was Sorun, sprawled out on the ground with a wide, disbelieving look in his eyes.

Any other time and Rotor would have made a joke about Sorun being so amazed he evidently fell off his feet. But right now he was just a bit worried in that wide-eyed look Sorun had.

"Billion? With a 'b' billion?" Sorun uttered in a disbelieving tone. When Rotor nodded his head in an affirmative, Sorun outwardly groaned out. "What in the... where did he find the time to gather a billion of those rings...?"

At that, Rotor shrugged. Honestly, he didn't rightly know where Sonic had found them all, either. Just around on his journeys around the world, he supposed. He'd never cared enough to ask. "I don't know. He was always gathering the things for power boosts to use against Robotnik, and when he absorbed his billionth one he... well, he got tough. Like, real tough. I don't think I've ever seen anything hurt him ever since he got that billionth Power Ring," he told Sorun. "But, that's Sonic for you. He's always been weirdly drawn to Chaos stuff. Just the way he is, I guess."

"... Yeah, of course he's special like that. Explains a lot, actually," Sorun finally said after a few moments of contemplative silence. A small, envious look, unseen by Rotor, briefly flashed over his features, though it quickly disappeared as Sorun settled into a neutral expression. "So. Seven Emeralds and fifty rings for a... a what, transformation?"

"Yeah. Hard to say if he could ever do it again since you're carrying around a few of the Emeralds in you, but yeah, he used to have this really cool transformation. Called it Super Sonic."

"'Super Sonic'." An amused scoff sounded from Sorun. "Lemme guess, his quills stand up on end and his fur turns gold. Pfft, yeah, that'd be the day..."

"Actually, that's pretty much how it looked. How'd you know?"

The moment Rotor confirmed Sorun's guess, the human's face went through a myriad of shifts. He froze at first, his features slowly turning into one of bafflement and utter shock before morphing into disbelief as he sent a glare towards the walrus. "C'mon, Rotor, get serious. There's no way."

Confused, Rotor turned his head to the side while squinting in Sorun's direction. "What do you mean? I am serious. That's what he looked like whenever he went Super."

Sorun continued to scrutinize the walrus' face for what felt like an eternity, trying to discern any hint of a lie in the Mobian's features. He wouldn't find any, however, as Rotor was being completely honest with the human. He seemed to realize this, too, and for reasons beyond Rotor's knowledge Sorun slowly lowered his head and cradled it into his hand. Rotor almost found himself asking if Sorun was alright, but stopped when Sorun began laughing while shaking his head in his hand. A low, bitter laugh that lacked any and all amusement.

"You know, sometimes I wonder if all of this is just a crazy fever dream as a result of me being put in a coma after getting hit by a truck or something after leaving that grocery store," Sorun confessed to the walrus, raising his head back up to look the purple Mobian in the eyes. "Like, am I just the Azathoth to my own insane fantasy world my drug-addled brain thought up after the doctors pumped me full of who knows what trying to save my life? Is all of this gonna disappear when I wake up to the sound of a flatline? It'd help explain all this Chaos insanity. It'd explain everything, actually."

Rotor quite frankly didn't have a single clue what it was Sorun was talking about. He felt himself become slightly disturbed at some of the things he did manage to understand, though. Mainly the coma bit. "Sorun, I can tell you for a fact I've been alive for a long time. Long before I ever met you. Pretty sure this isn't a dream."

The pale human sighed. "Yeah, I know. It's easy to live in denial though. I'm still waiting for it to turn into 'Bloodborne'. I'm gonna start accruing unknowable knowledge and suddenly I start seeing eldritch horrors hanging off the sides of buildings." Rubbing a hand along his face, Sorun turned towards the backpack he'd set down earlier, bending down to pick it up and sling it over his shoulder. "Christ, nobody told me Super Saiyans were part of the deal," Rotor heard the human murmur under his breath.

Much of what Sorun said still confused Rotor, who only continued to stare on in uncertainty at the human. He chose not to pursue it any further, though, as Sorun looked rather exhausted and he himself just wanted to get back to repairing the communicators. He sighed a bit in relief when Sorun stopped in front of him, and then gave Rotor a small two-fingered wave.

"Well, Rotor, it's been enlightening. I'm gonna go now," Sorun said. "Gotta get these rings to a couple other people. Have a good rest of your day."

"Well, alright. Same to you, Sorun." He watched as the human left the lab, waited a few seconds after the door closed behind him, and then let out a soundless breath of relief as he went back to fixing the communicators.

"Super Saiyan hedgehogs. Sure. Why not?" If there was one single good thing he would say about this world, it was that Sorun was impressed with how it consistently kept surprising him around every single turn. Rotor's little history lesson about Power Rings had been... it'd been something. The whole "billion rings" bit still had him reeling. The Super thing even more. Along with everything else going on in his life at the moment, all culminating into whatever the rest of his very short life was now.

He was on his way to Merlin's place, another subject that was throwing Sorun for a loop. Wizards were a thing apparently. So he supposed it was safe to assume magic was as well, but maybe that was to be expected. Most of the things he encountered in this world were practically magical. Sonic and anybody else with powers may as well have been magic. His own abilities were magic. This thing Aurora attached to him that kept giving him heart attacks was magic. Chaos. Magic Chaos. Was there even a difference? He didn't know, he didn't care, and he just wanted to deliver these rings and be done with the day.

So Merlin's place. He'd asked around. Got pointed to a small hut down the way in Knothole. He was walking there now.

"Ugh, man, it's-it's all coming back again." Sorun felt himself begin to rub at the bridge of his nose in an effort to quell all the negative emotions that began to roil in him. "I- why do I even bother talking with people? I can't- I don't know how much longer I can do this. All the-the lying, and pretending that everything's okay when nothing is okay and I don't, I can't, fuck, why am I like this...?"

It was a paradox that kept tearing him in half every single day. On one hand, he liked talking to everybody. He was beginning to like socializing and becoming what basically amounted to a normal person. It calmed him down and made him feel at ease.

He also absolutely hated it because he had to keep lying to people about himself and his impending death. He hated having to keep pretending to be okay when it felt like every single day he was falling apart at the seams and was on the verge of breaking down and snapping into a state of insanity. He wasn't okay. 'Okay' wasn't his body failing on him. 'Okay' wasn't feeling absolutely loathsome about himself and being in a perpetual state of self-suffering.

Some days were easier to deal with, which was good, because if days like today were a continuously repeating thing he was dead certain he wouldn't have made it this far. That one day where he'd been able to air at least some of his thoughts to that deer person helped a little, but that hadn't lasted. Days where he was able to distract himself doing missions or something else passed the time and took his mind off things since he could just shut those thoughts away for a time and focus on more pressing matters, which more often than not was surviving a fight. And wasn't that messed up? He was finding himself starting to actually want to go on dangerous missions, because risking his life doing something for the Freedom Fighters was a better alternative than stewing with his own abysmal thoughts.

Then there was Nicole. Sorun almost forgot all of his problems whenever he was with her. He was practically a drowning man at this point clinging to her like she was a life raft in the middle of an ocean actively trying to drown him, and he was completely disgusted with himself over the fact. He tried limiting his time with her, even tried avoiding her, but the emphasis was on the word 'try'. Because not once did he ever succeed. He'd try, and then cave in to his own desires to just feel normal if only for an hour or two. And after seeking her out and hanging out with her for a bit the high of escaping from his problems for just a little bit wore off and he'd find himself hating himself even more for giving in. So that was that loop.

And, of course, there were days like this. Days where he'd be reminded of it all talking with people, or some other random occurrences would just force it all to catch up to him at once. Days where he just crumbled and needed to find somewhere to just deal with it without anybody noticing because if anybody ever saw him in this state it would raise questions he couldn't answer and concerns that would inhibit his mission. In this case he was huddled up in an alley behind some random person's house after losing control of his emotions halfway to Merlin's hut.

"God, I'm so fucking pathetic." The backpack holding the remaining two rings was all but forgotten, discarded to the side on the ground next to him. His hands were busy cradling his head, his entire body shaking against the house he was leaning against. "A terrible person lying to all his friends because he wants to save their lives. It's so goddamn hard sometimes. I, I don't, I don't know how much longer- but I have to. I have to keep doing this until I die- I don't want to die, why did it have to be me, why the fuck did I have to be so weak and give into attaching myself to them when I should have kept my distance so they wouldn't care when I die? Why do I have to die, why does, I can't, this isn't-"

He grew aware of the fact that his breathing was beginning to pick up at an uncomfortable pace. His heart was hammering in his chest, and his shaking increased more and more as feelings of intense fear and anxiety began to assault him. Fear over dying, hatred over himself and his actions, the sinking, helpless feeling of despair that kept running through him-

In a flash of blue, Yamato appeared in Sorun's grasp. He immediately pulled down his shirt and hoodie, and then turned it around and stabbed it into his shoulder.

A cry of pain left Sorun when he felt the blade's edge dig into his body. A few beads of blood began to leak out of the wound and intermix with the cold sweat drenching his body, but it wasn't too deep a wound. Just good enough for his purposes. He watched blue energy run up the length of the blade, and with another cry of pain that was halfway to being a sob he removed the tip of the sword out of his shoulder. He dropped down into a sitting position right after, his legs utterly failing him in that moment. He panted heavily, wet eyes staring out towards the tip of the sword that was smeared in blood and a clear fluid.

Norepinephrine. His norepinephrine.

He still remembered those conversations he'd have with his mother. Occasions where Sorun would be curious and ask her things, or she'd just tell him random medical facts as parts of conversations they would have. He remembered quite vividly about one talk she'd had with him about a patient she'd been attending to who suffered from constant panic attacks due to a genetic abnormality they had that caused them to overproduce a certain hormone that induced panic. A chemical imbalance, she'd described. One she'd eventually solved by prescribing that patient a bunch of medicines to balance the chemicals in their brains. His mother told him that patient had gone on to become very productive in their life afterwards. He was happy for them. Happy for that patient getting their life back together through medicine and happy for his mother for looking so happy over having helped saved somebody's life.

He missed her so much.

Well, from what he remembered, that specific chemical that had been causing that patient so many problems was a neurotransmitter called norepinephrine. A chemical that induced panic in flight-or-fight responses. Probably good for surviving in the wild. Not very good for a teenager being crushed under an ungodly amount of stress every single day. And some days, like today, he simply just wasn't strong enough to deal with it and got beaten. And then this would happen. The terrible thoughts and the panic attacks.

They were a problem, because he couldn't control them and he kept fearing somebody would one day find him in this state, and hell if he knew how he was supposed to solve that problem. And more than that, he didn't want his friends worrying even more than they needed to. He didn't even want to think about the faces they would make, all at his expense. So he sought out a solution to control these episodes of his, and came to the same solution he had for almost all problems: just stab it.

So that's what he started doing: using Yamato's power of separation to separate the norepinephrine from his body whenever his levels were too high because life decided to take him to the back yard and beat him over the head with a rusty lead pipe. It worked for the most part. He'd immediately feel the edge be taken off of him once the chemical left his body, and he'd feel just a little bit better about himself. It wasn't permanent, as he wasn't removing the actual glands in his body that produced the substance. He'd entertained the idea of removing the amygdala from his brain for a little bit before deciding lobotomizing himself with a magic sword probably wasn't the best idea, and this method worked well enough when he needed it to. He wasn't so sure he liked the fact he almost looked forward to him separating norepinephrine from his body. To get that warm feeling of wellness wash over his body that made him feel better. That same feeling he got whenever he was with Nicole. The feeling of just escaping for a bit.

It wasn't what he would call a long-term solution, as he was sure there was probably some medical problem he was overlooking here with regards to ripping hormones straight out of his body, and even if there wasn't he was almost certain stabbing himself over and over was not a good answer to his problems. Fortunately, he didn't need long-term solutions. Because he wasn't going to have a long-term life. So if this is what it took to keep himself going until the end, then so be it. It was all for their sake.

"Fuck was I doing? Rings?" Rubbing a clammy hand over his face, Sorun groaned and dismissed the Yamato before looking out for the bag he'd dropped. "Y-yeah, I gotta... drop them off, yeah... Merlin's place? Yeah."

Shakily, he'd gotten up to his feet and scooped up the bag off the ground. He made sure to wipe the excess tears from his face and cover his wound up with his shirt to make himself look at least halfway presentable, and then set off out of the alleyway and back onto the main street.

He finally found the place after a bit of searching. Merlin's hut wasn't terribly out of the way of Knothole, but at the same time, it wasn't exactly easy to find, either. He found it, though, which was all he cared about.

For now he was stable, so at least there was that. Anxiety for now was gone and he felt his thoughts beginning to normalize again. He hoped it would stay that way, but he knew they wouldn't. Right now he just wanted to drop the rest of these rings off and end the day.

"Tails' uncle, huh? Merlin. Mr. Wizard Extraordinaire," Sorun sarcastically thought as he made it to the hut's front door. "Fuckin' hell, what's next? A shapeshifter? Wait, that already happened. Eesh..."

Shaking his head, Sorun reached forwards and knocked on the hut's door. He heard footsteps immediately approach from the other side, and before he could even begin to wonder what Merlin would look like, the door opened. Sorun would admit he was somewhat surprised to see a shorter fox Mobian with two tails standing on the other side.

Merlin was either a dead ringer for his nephew or it was Tails. Sorun hedged his bet on the latter.

"Tails?" Sorun asked, looking down into the young Mobian's eyes. "That you?"

"Sorun?" If the looks didn't give it away, the voice did. It was assuredly Tails. "What are you doing here?"

Holding up the bag of Power Rings, Sorun said, "Your uncle asked for a Power Ring, so I came here to give him one. He around?"

"Oh!" Tails' eyes lit up in recognition, after which he turned back into the hut while gesturing Sorun to follow. "Yeah, he's just inside. Uncle! You have a visitor!"

Deciding to follow Tails, Sorun stepped into the hut right behind him while taking a look around. It was about the size of most Mobian homes, maybe a bit smaller. Brightly lit despite the lack of windows and filled with shelves full of strange objects he couldn't quite place. Various colorful plants and oddly-shaped knick knacks. He even saw a crystal ball on a pedestal near the back.

"Yup," Sorun thought, "total wizard dweeb."

"I was just visiting my uncle to help out with some things. He's been having some trouble with the water line to his house and he asked me to take a look," Tails explained to Sorun as the human looked around the home. Sorun made a wordless hum in response, continuing to circle around and observe the place. He stopped when he heard Tails say, "Oh, uncle, there you are!"

Glancing down to where Tails was looking, Sorun followed the young fox's gaze to the other end of the house. There was another fox Mobian of similar eye and fur color to Tails standing there. Taller, and draped in brown robes and a hood. Otherwise he looked pretty average to Sorun for being called a wizard.

He was giving Sorun a kind of odd look, though. He couldn't really place it. Half-lidded eyes and a barely-suppressed grimace. Something that almost looked remorseful if anything. For the life of him, Sorun couldn't place why the wizard was looking at him with that look. Maybe he was having an allergic reaction to a bad potion or something.

"Ah, hello there." Merlin seemed to have tried his best to wipe that look off his face, but Sorun could still see vestiges of the expression as he bowed slightly towards the human. "You must be Sorun, the Freedom Fighter my nephew has been telling me all about."

"Yeah, something like that," Sorun confirmed with a half nod. He reached into his bag, and then pulled out a golden ring. "Here. Sally said you asked for one."

The Power Ring was lightly tossed through the air towards Merlin, who deftly caught it in his grasp. He gave the ring a single look-over, and then nodded in satisfaction and set it down on a nearby table. "Thank you kindly, Sorun," Merlin thanked with a small nod of his head. "Tails, were you not saying you needed to go retrieve some of your tools in the effort of fixing that pipe?"

Tails' face lit up with realization. "Oh, right! I almost forgot!" His twin tails immediately started spinning up, lifting his body up into the air. "I'll go back to my workshop and get my toolbox real quick! I'll be back soon!"

He took off towards the doorway before either of the other two could get a word in edgewise. Sorun stared after the young fox, simply blinking when he saw his flying body leave the open doorway so fast he hadn't even bothered closing it behind him. "I'm still never going to get used to the fact he uses his tails like a helicopter rotor. How does that even work? Are the bones jointed really weirdly so they can rotate, or... eh, I don't really care enough to think about it."

Well, he at least got that second ring delivered, so that was two-thirds of his mission done. All that was left was to get this final one to Chuck and he'd be done, and afterwards... Sorun didn't quite know what he was going to do for the rest of his day. Maybe just sleep in early or go for something to eat, he didn't think he'd had anything yet all day and he was feeling kind of hung-

"Er, young man, a moment please?"

Sorun had gotten one foot out the door before he heard Merlin call out to him. He stopped right where he was, and turned around backwards to face the wizard again. He had that same look on his face from earlier. That uneasy, almost remorseful-looking face that Sorun just quite couldn't place.

"Uh... Merlin, I'd like to stay and chat, but I'm real busy..." Sorun said, trailing off while leaning towards the doorway.

"I'm aware," Merlin assured him, "but I just wanted to have a quick word with you."

Sorun's eyes flicked to the open door, and then back to the fox. "I don't want to be rude, man, but I got stuff to do."

"Just... please, Sorun."

The confusion settling on Sorun's face was about equal to the amount of confusion he was feeling. He wanted to decline, but something about Merlin's expression stayed Sorun's words. "I guess Chuck can wait a few more minutes," Sorun finally reasoned with himself, shrugging and stepping back into the hut.

Merlin's eyes widened in almost surprise when Sorun decided to retreat back into his home. Sorun was almost surprised with himself, too, though this was overshadowed by the utter confusion he had over what Merlin, someone who he had just met a couple minutes ago, had to say to him. He supposed he would find out soon.

"Well, I have some time to spare," Sorun said, stepping near to where Merlin was and then leaning on a nearby shelf. "So what did you need me for?"

"I didn't need you for anything. I just wanted to speak to you." Merlin chose to remain near the back end of the hut, still facing Sorun and not standing near anything else. He gulped and twisted his hooded head to the side. "How have you been?"

Sorun found himself quirking an eyebrow. He knew Mobians were friendly, but didn't think total strangers asking stuff like that to each other was a normal thing. "I, uh... I'm fine?" he lied, sounding unsure of himself while shrugging.

Merlin turned his head back towards Sorun just the slightest amount, frowning slightly. "No, you aren't."

"... I'm sorry, but what is this?" Sorun asked, twisting his index finger around in a circle while pointing downwards. "Did Tails put you up to this? This some kinda weird 'get me to confess my true feelings to a random stranger' roundabout scheme, because if it is, he's let me down. That sounds like an awful plan."

"That can be construed as admittance that you are hiding your true feelings, you know."

"..." A twinge of annoyance flashed through Sorun when he realized that he was right. He scoffed, and then pushed himself off the shelf. "You know what, I got better things to be doing. I'm out of here. Tell Tails to mind his own business."

"Tails did not put me up to this." Sorun didn't even make it a single step away before Merlin began speaking again. "This is all of my own volition."

Inhaling deeply, Sorun turned back towards the old fox. "Okay, then riddle me this. Why is some random dude so interested in finding out how I'm feeling-?"

"I'm aware of what Aurora did to you and what you are going through."

It was a statement so unexpected and absurd that Sorun's mind went completely blank after hearing it. He'd just barely registered his jaw dropping open in surprise, and the rest of his body would have fell to the floor immediately if his feet weren't rooted to the ground.

His thoughts began to catch up with him after a time, and with them came a myriad of emotions. Absolute bafflement and confusion being at the forefront, with a great amount of suspicion right behind that. Because as far as he knew nobody was supposed to know that, and very great efforts had been taken to ensure nobody would ever find out. Sorun couldn't tell anybody even if he wanted to, and he'd tried when he did.

Yet, somehow, Merlin just said a single sentence that let Sorun know that he knew. A sentence that should have been impossible for him to say. He'd said her name. The name of that ethereal fiend that had cursed him was a name he never uttered aloud to anybody, but Merlin knew it. Sorun didn't know how, but he was gonna find out. Because past all of the suspicion and confusion he was feeling over that statement, there was the barest spark of hope that maybe the magic wizard he just met could do something to help him.

"What... I, how do... what ?" Sorun stammered, shaking his head while looking towards Merlin with wide eyes. "What do you mean you know? What exactly do you know?"

Merlin sighed, lowering his hooded head just the smallest amount and looking almost regretful over his words. "I know that your body is having a negative reaction towards the Chaos energy you have been infusing into yourself. I know that Aurora... inhibited you from revealing this truth to anybody else."

"How could you possibly know any of that...?" Sorun whispered, having grabbed onto the nearby shelf to support himself and stop from falling down.

The fox Mobian took in a deep breath before answering. "There were once beings that watched over the cosmos of this zone. Beings elevated to a higher plane of being due to intense exposure to Chaos energy and a strong connection to the Chaos Force. Certain... events lead to their demise, though before they died, they left three individuals as their successors. Two of the individuals the Watchers chose were-"

"Athair and Aurora, yeah, I head them mention the name Neo-Walkers." Sorun blinked, and his eyes began narrowing at Merlin. "Oh, don't tell me. You're the third one?"

"... Yes," Merlin confirmed with a nod. "I am the third Neo-Walker."

"Ohhh, I see." Sorun's voice grew an edge to it. The suspicion from earlier had all but evaporated from his senses, along with the confusion. That spark of hope was beginning to flicker away, too. In their wake was a sense of clarity and something else that was beginning to build up in him. "So. Mr. Prower the Neo-Walker. Why don't you tell me why you're bothering to go through the trouble of doing this?"

"Because this was the first moment we've had together," Merlin explained, "and I wanted to ensure that your mental state-"

"Mental state? I'll tell you about my mental state: It's pretty terrible," Sorun hissed out, pushing himself off of the shelf he'd been holding. "You know, it's funny, you say you're the third Neo-Walker, but I don't remember seeing you up there with those two echidna."

"We keep in contact with one another," Merlin clarified. "Athair and Aurora have been elevated to their current status. I am... still part of the mortal coil, as it were, and not quite as close to the Chaos Force as they are yet."

"Ah, well, depending on how this conversation goes I might be able to help you along with that 'mortal coil' bit."

At hearing that, Merlin froze and stared towards Sorun. The teen's form had gone completely rigid, eyes boring straight into the fox with his face set in a rigid, cautious expression. Down by his sides his hands were twitching.

"Merlin," Sorun began, attempting to keep his voice even but failing in the way some of his anger came through, "if you're going to stand there and say you told me all of this just to 'check up on me' and not offer any possible solutions out of my predicament, then we're gonna have some problems."

Pursing his lips tightly, Merlin sighed out through his nose. "There are no solutions to the stresses your body is being put through due to the Emeralds. Please don't take this the wrong way, Sorun, I know the burden that has been placed on you is great, -" Sorun's shoulders tensed, and his eyes flared wider, "- which is why I just wanted to ensure that you were getting along well enough, as it were. The bleary future we Neo-Watchers have been able to foretell hinges on-"

"Is this your way of saying you agree with what was done with me?" Sorun asked, voice so strained in anger it was barely above a whisper.

Merlin, slumping his shoulders, said, "Sorun, I... yes, when we discussed the matter I agreed with their actions, but you must understand that none of us wanted -!"

Like that, the teen turned right around and began stomping towards the door to the hut. Merlin reached out towards him, but otherwise did nothing as the human reached the front door. He dipped his head downwards in slight shame, anticipating Sorun to angrily storm out of the hut to get as far away from him as possible.

What instead happened was that Sorun closed the door, sealing them off from the outside world. And, rather worryingly, he remained planted to the spot facing the door with his hand on the handle.

"Don't kill him. Don't kill him. Tails is coming back. You won't get away with it. Don't kill him." It was a mantra Sorun had to repeat over and over in his head, because as it stood, there was precious little stopping Sorun from turning around and skewering Merlin with a shower of Summoned Swords. He felt disappointed in himself for believing there was actually a bit of hope in somebody being able to help him, but more than that, the amount of raw fury coursing through him was so intense that he could barely even see straight, and his hand resting on the door handle was shaking hard enough it threatened to break off.

He tried forgetting it. Tried putting it in the back of his mind so he could move on, and it never worked, but he tried . And now here was Merlin, reminding him of everything all over again and trying to justify what had been done to him. That was what really set him off- him trying to say what was done to him was right. It was the same incomprehensible anger and unbearable frustration he felt when he first talked to Athair and Aurora, when they'd explained everything to him. He was experiencing it all over again, and it was making his heart race and his blood boil.

Except Aurora and Athair were intangible Chaos beings when he'd talked to them. And Merlin was a living, flesh and blood being, and Sorun was desperately trying to hold himself back from killing him.

"You know, Merlin..." When Sorun turned away from the door to face him, the fox had taken a step back in shock. His eyes were wide and manic, and the anger and stress on his facial muscles were so intense the corners of his mouth were lifted in a crooked, furious smile. "You really gotta learn to pick your words better for these types of things." He began to slowly walk towards the aged fox. "Anyways, you've got my undivided fucking attention now."

To his credit, Merlin stood his ground and didn't budge an inch when Sorun stopped right in front of him. He kept up a steely expression even under the manic look Sorun was giving him, though the human did notice him fidget the smallest amount. It did nothing to lessen the rage inside of him.

"Listen. Your Tails' uncle. And Tails? I like the little guy," Sorun said, his voice cracking slightly from the anger he felt. "I pretend I don't, but I really do. Killing his uncle would hurt him, and I wouldn't like that. But I like you even less than that right now. My problem is that, if I did kill you, and it got traced back to me, which it would, that would do nothing but cause me problems. So I'm not gonna kill you, Merlin. But you should know that there is nothing besides that one singular fact stopping me from cutting you down where you stand, because as far as I'm concerned, you're complicit in what the Neo-Walkers did to me."

An understanding sigh left Merlin, though he gave Sorun a hard glare. "Sorun. You are no killer."

"Really?" A humorless, dry chuckle left the teen. "That's what you people conditioned me for. Killing Eggman, right? Ain't that the whole reason you forced me into all this?"

"Nobody forced you to do anything," Merlin denied.

"Oh, yeah, 'cause the alternative is so much better," Sorun scoffed.

"It is because that alternative future exists that we were forced to act this way upon you!" Merlin cried out. "The fate of the whole world is dependent on-!"

"'The fate of the whole world', fuck you, you're not the one dying over this." Inhaling sharply, Sorun crossed his arms and leaned back on a nearby shelf. "Just tell me why in the hell you bothered bringing this up so I can leave. Basking in the presence of a real-life wizard has lost its appeal pretty damn quick."

Giving a stiff nod, Merlin breathed out heavily before speaking. "I am aware this is difficult for you. Aurora periodically keeps watch of you to keep track of your progress. She was sent in quite a panic when you left Knothole, and she almost forced me to come after you."

"Mm, good thing you didn't. I really would have killed you back then if you tried."

Merlin's face twitched in a grimace before continuing. "We know you've been struggling internally with all of this. We're incredibly grateful you've decided to do the right thing-" He paused when Sorun violently flinched, choosing to reword himself and say, "- that you've... endeavored to give yourself for the sake of the planet. With that and everything that has transpired with you due to our actions, we simply... we just wanted to offer you any help we could possibly give."

"... You three feel bad, so you want to do something for me to make yourselves feel better. That about sum it up?" Sorun asked, eyes full of spite.

"Sorun-"

"You know what pisses me off the most? You people don't regret a single thing," Sorun interrupted, his harsh tone making Merlin clam right up. "You can all say what you did is horrible all you want, but you'd still do it at the end of the day since it's 'for the greater good' or some tripe like that. What's the life of some random guy not even from this zone compared to the lives of everybody else? You people don't care about me. You care that I'll get the job done and save everybody. You're trying to absolve yourselves of as much guilt as possible with the shit you're pulling right now."

The silence following Sorun's claim was the only answer he needed. It was transparent enough that even somebody like him could see it. Trying to help to try and "make up" for what the Neo-Walkers did to him, possibly help ease him further into the idea. Maybe even go so far as to get him to agree with them that this was for the best, that one person sacrificing themselves for the sake of a whole planet was a noble cause and that he should be happy to have been given the opportunity.

Maybe such a thing was noble, and maybe he was willing to freely do that at this point, but it didn't change them slapping a metaphorical collar on him and putting him in a hopeless situation where he had little choice but to sacrifice himself. If they admitted to him what they had done was wrong, then maybe he could find some forgiveness. But they wouldn't. So he didn't care how "bad" they felt over him. He didn't care how much they thought they were in the right. He didn't think they were, and he refused to give them any sense of satisfaction over the act. He'd spite them to the very end.

"Sorun..." Merlin's voice came out sad and cracked, and all it did was infuriate Sorun even further. "We just... we just want to help you have some peace before you, well..."

"You're failing to a miserable degree in that regard," Sorun retorted. "Ugh... you wanna help? Tell Tails when we talked I seemed like a normal person. Make it seem like I'm doing better so he and the others stop worrying about me so much."

"You're asking me to lie to my nephew-" Merlin cut himself off and shook his head in denial. "Sorun, it is quite obvious you need some help-"

"Zip it, dumbass." Sorun groaned out in frustration and rubbed at his face. "You think I don't know I'm cracking to pieces here the longer this goes on? I'm fucking aware I'm going mental here, but them knowing that isn't going to help anybody, especially since Aurora made sure I can't even tell them what the problem is. You know what happens then? All the Freedom Fighters get worried over me, possibly hold me back until I'm alright again which I will never be , and then suddenly saving the world becomes harder than it needs to be since they're not letting me out to go get the Emeralds," Sorun ground out, glowering at Merlin all the meanwhile. "So yes. I'm asking you to lie to your nephew about my mental state so I can keep this fucking masquerade up and get to the end of this as smoothly as possible. Don't see what the problem is. Telling a white lie should be easy compared to literally damning me. And it's all for the sake of the planet, isn't it ?"

His last words were hissed out with so much venom that Merlin visibly recoiled from him. Afterwards, though, he did give a nod, as small as it was. He didn't look the least bit happy about it, which Sorun didn't much care about. "Very well. If that's what you want, then... then I'll do it."

"Great," the human remarked, voice layered in sarcasm. "Look, I'm not doing this for you. I'm doing it because I don't have a better alternative and I've grown to actually like everybody here. So I'll do your dirty work, end Eggman, and save the world at the cost of my own life. But Merlin? If I get that seventh Chaos Emerald, and if I manage to kill Eggman and have some time to spare before I die, I'm coming straight back here to kill you."

The threat hung in the air between the two, Sorun's eyes betraying the seriousness of his claim while Merlin looked on with widened, shaking eyes. Outside of that, the fox said nothing and just hung his hooded head down once again in order to avoid the glaring look Sorun was giving him. The human scoffed, straightening up his back and turning away to walk out towards the door.

"If there was a better alternative, Sorun, we would have taken it." The human teen heard Merlin, but didn't so much as turn around to address him as he maintained his walk towards the door. "As limited as it was, the future we glimpsed into showed no other way. We simply love this planet and all that live on it too much for it to fall into the hands of that madman. I'm... I'm sorry that there was nothing else to be done, Sorun. We're sorry that we've done this to you."

Sorun stopped at the door, hand hovering over the door handle as he listened to Merlin's words. At the end, he inhaled a deeply and gripped the handle. "No you're not," he said, just loud enough for Merlin to hear. He twisted the door handle, and then tore the door right open.

It had taken some doing, but fortunately enough Tails hadn't encountered too much trouble locating the tools he needed. And so, walking along with a large box of tools in hand, the young fox had finally made it back to his uncle's home. And so, taking care not to drop the toolbox, Tails had slowly reached his free hand out towards the front door.

The door was flung wide open right before he managed to touch it.

Leaping back a bit in shock, tools rustling in the box he held, Tails looked up at the person who was on the other side of the now-open door. He immediately saw it was Sorun, who was looking down at Tails with widened, surprised eyes.

"Oh, hey, Tails!" Sorun greeted, clearing his throat while giving the fox a small wave. "You're uh, you're back already, huh? You get what you need?"

"Mm-hm!" Nodding, Tails lifted up the toolbox for Sorun to see, who gave a nod of his own in response. "I think I should be able to fix the water system now. From what I saw it has something to do with the water pressure, but I'll know more once I actually get in there. Oh, speaking of which, did you talk with my uncle?"

"Hm? Oh, yeah, yeah-yeah-yeah," Sorun said with another, more rapid, nod. "Cool, um, cool dude, your uncle. Really knows his stuff."

A tinge of happiness flashed through Tails, causing him to beam a smile up at the human. "Oh, that's great! Maybe we could all do something later on to get to know each other better!"

Sorun's face twitched. It was a small, imperceptible twitch that went unnoticed by Tails, after which he shook his head. "I don't know, your uncle seems like a really busy guy. I wouldn't want to get in his way or anything like that." He snapped his fingers and pointed at Tails. "Tell ya what, though, I gotta go drop this last Power Ring off to Sonic's uncle, but after I'm done with that and you're done with your water thing here we could do something."

Tails' ears had drooped the slightest amount when Sorun had shot down the idea getting to know his uncle better, but upon offering to do something with him his tails began to slowly and inquisitively swish in the air behind him. He cupped his chin in thought for a moment, and then looked up towards Sorun. "Well... there is this problem I've been having with the Tornado's engine. It's really deep in there, too, so I can't reach it without disassembling the whole engine. But if you could use your Bringer Arms to help out, it would really save me the time of having to take the whole thing apart just to get to the problem."

"Trouble with the plane, huh? I'm not really much of a mechanic, but if you're there to help guide me I guess it shouldn't be a problem." With that, Sorun shrugged. "Yeah, sure. I can do that. You need much time to deal with things on your end here?"

"No, it shouldn't take me that long," Tails said with a shake of his head. "Would an hour from now be okay for you?"

"Works for me." Sorun walked out of the doorway, passing by Tails while giving him a small wave. "Alright, I gotta go. See you later, Tails."

"Bye, Sorun!" As the older teen began to walk off, Tails waved after him in parting. In response, Sorun had reached his hand up over his head and gave Tails a two-fingered salute while continuing to walk forwards. Tails watched him until the human had walked out of sight, and then turned back to the hut.

"That was really nice of him, offering to help out like that. And it's nice that he's starting to open up a bit to other people, too. It's really looking like he's getting better. I'm glad for him." He was happy that it seemed that Sorun was starting to adjust more and more to life here, as well as becoming less standoffish towards others. He resembled less and less like the person he and the rest of the Freedom Fighters met the day he arrived on Mobius and more... normal. Easier to be around.

It made Tails feel better, knowing Sorun was adapting to living in Knothole. It was a hopeful sign that, maybe someday, he could learn to like living here and eventually start to even be happy with himself. Tails felt it was the least the human deserved, especially after everything that had happened to him and for everything he'd done for them. He just wanted the best for Sorun, and just knowing the possibility of Sorun finally learning to live a happy life here was enough for the fox to feel better over having been the one to build that machine and drag Sorun onto Mobius.

Perhaps one day he could even forgive himself fully for what he'd done. When Sorun was finally settled.

He was confident it would happen one day. Sorun's progress towards getting better was a slow- very slow, actually- process, but Tails could see it. Everybody could. He really was getting better the longer this went on, and if he was being truthful with himself, that alone was enough. But for now he was content on waiting to see what the future held for him, along with the rest of them.

Clutching the toolbox in his hand, Tails walked into his uncle's home with a small smile on his face. He only needed to look around for a second to see his uncle standing on the other end of the main room he'd entered. Merlin had been looking off towards the side, vacant look in his eyes, though his expression had brightened up immediately upon seeing Tails.

"Ah, there you are, dear nephew." A warm smile spread across the old fox's face as Tails approached him. "I trust you managed to procure your tools without issue?"

"Yep! I'm all set!" Tails confirmed. "How did it go with Sorun?"

The smile that had been on Merlin's face lessened to a degree, though he managed to hide it from his nephew by coughing into the sleeves of his robe. "A-ah, Sorun. Yes, he... seemed like a fine young man. Honestly, after all the fussing you've been doing over him I expected much worse, but if he truly is the same person you've been describing then he seems to be getting along fairly well."

"That's good." Turning around from his uncle, Tails began making his way down a nearby hallway. "Now I think I know what the issue is, so I'm gonna go take a look at some of the piping I was looking at earlier."

"Yes, of course. Lead on." Merlin turned to follow his nephew down the hall, making sure to keep to the younger fox's back. His face had morphed into a pained grimace in the meanwhile, the change of expression having gone entirely unnoticed by Tails as he began to happily hum under his breath.

"Hey, how much longer are you going to take with this, unc?"

"As long as I need to. Science isn't exactly an exact process, Sonic."

"Isn't that what science is supposed to be, though? The process of figuring out exactly how something works or something like that?"

There was a chuckle from the other hedgehog. "Life would be so simple if science was as easy as that, sonny boy. No, science is a grueling, arduous process that takes more patience than I care to describe in order to get the results you're seeking."

"Ah, right. Patience. One of my stronger traits," Sonic sarcastically remarked, turning towards a nearby stool and setting himself down in it.

His uncle said nothing in response, instead choosing to continue to mess around with the wires connected to the mechanical whatever-that-was sitting on the workbench in front of him. He didn't want to say he regretted coming all the way out to his uncle's workshop, because saying he regretted seeing a beloved family member was a terrible thing to say, but that wouldn't stop him from admitting that he was bored out of his mind watching his uncle work on that scrap heap in front of him.

He didn't know where they got the patience for this kind of monotonous work. His uncle and Tails and Rotor. Maybe it was because they were all geniuses in their respective fields and that somehow gave them the ability to actually enjoy sitting through this tedium. He'd never deny the results, but he could understand how they could walk the road there. He supposed that it was something only mechanical savants like his uncle would ever understand.

Well, Sonic was good with the fact he'd never understand what they saw in it. He'd just stick to running, thank you very much.

The hedgehog was knocked out of his thoughts when the garage door to Chuck's workshop opened up. He swiveled his head over to see who was opening the door, whereas Chuck merely flicked his eyes up from his work to observe who it was entering. Sonic found himself quirking an eye ridge up in surprise, immediately recognizing the figure coming through the door and approaching Chuck and his workbench as Sorun.

"Yo, got a package from the royal bank of..." The human cut himself off with a loud yawn, reaching a hand up and rubbing at his eyes as he mumbled something under his breath. "Man, I don't have the energy for this bit. Chuck, I got your Power Ring."

"Really, now?" Chuck picked his head up from his work just as Sorun stepped besides the workbench. He reached into the small backpack he was carrying and unveiled a Power Ring from its interior, which Sorun then proceeded to hand off to the older hedgehog. "I thought I asked Sally for this," Chuck said as he placed the ring down on a small space besides him.

"She asked me to deliver the rings to a bunch of people that asked for them," Sorun answered, settling to lean against a nearby support beam. "Don't know why she couldn't just do it herself, but I didn't ask and just went with it. 'Cause I'm a nice guy like that."

Sonic saw his uncle give Sorun a single lookover, and then heard him scoff as he returned to his work. "You've never really given me the impression you're one to help others out of the kindness of your heart," he said.

Sorun, hearing this, winced slightly and turned his head to the side. "Come on, man, that was a long time ago." When Chuck said nothing to this, he sighed, pushed off the support beam, and then walked past the hedgehog while digging into his pocket. "Well, think what you want, but here. Got this for you," he said as he removed a small bag from his pocket and tossed it on the workbench.

Once the bag hit the workbench, Chuck eyed it briefly before turning his eyes towards Sorun. The human teen locked eyes with him for the barest of moments, and then turned towards where Sonic was sitting as he made his way towards another stool that was on the right side of Sonic. Chuck watched him walk off, turned back towards the bag, and then reached for it and opened it. He let out a small hum of surprise when he gazed inside to see what was in it.

"Are these mobiums?" Chuck asked, turning his head up towards Sorun again.

"Yep. Twenty of 'em," Sorun answered as he sat down in the stool. "I owed you for that, that-that thing from, you know, back then. That thing."

"... Oh, right." A look of recognition flashed through Chuck's face. "You stiffed me for a chili dog. I believe it was only two mobiums you owed me, though."

The knowledge that Sorun had done such a thing was new to Sonic, and for a brief moment he felt a spike of irritation go through him as he turned towards Sorun. He almost went through with telling Sorun off for doing something like that to his uncle, but then he saw that look on Sorun's face. A remorseful look.

Sonic wasn't sure he'd ever seen Sorun look remorseful over anything before.

"Call it interest or something," Sorun muttered, waving an arm to the side. "I felt bad about it, alright? I'd rather not leave bad memories of me with people."

Blinking with an unreadable expression on his face, Chuck slowly pocketed the bag of mobiums while still looking towards Sorun. "Well... perhaps I was a bit harsh on you," the older hedgehog admitted, smiling lightly while rubbing the backside of his head. "I know Sonic has been singing praises about you up and down about your contributions to the Freedom Fighters."

"Have you? Have you now?" Sonic looked to the right towards Sorun, where he saw the human glancing towards him with a lazy expression. "You made sure to just tell him all the cool stuff, right?"

Feeling mischievous, Sonic shook his head. "Nah, it's mostly the embarrassing stuff. Like when you fell asleep during that mission in that swamp and woke up waist-deep in muck." It was still a funny memory for him, the teenage hedgehog laughing at the mental image. At having found Sorun angrily grumbling to himself as his spectral arms pulled his body out of the muck and how he'd had that indignant look of anger on his face for the whole rest of the mission. He'd warned Sorun things like this would happen if he kept neglecting his exercise, but despite the human looking more tired than ever, he just kept on ignoring Sonic. He figured it was probably a human thing. Or Sorun just being lazy.

"I'm never going in a swamp again, dude. Half the things that lived there tried eating me alive," Sorun mumbled, one of his eyes twitching at the amused smirk Sonic had. "And anyways," he continued as he turned back towards Chuck, "I... had a change of perspective, I guess you could say. Been having a lot of those lately." He sighed, and then crossed his arms while leaning back in the stool. "Don't look too deep into it. I'm just settling some affairs. That's all."

"Alright, if you say so." With that, Chuck turned back towards the mechanical bits on his workbench, small smile still on his face. "For what it's worth, I'm glad to see you changed your mind about your stance on being a Freedom Fighter. It looks to me like it's doing you some real good."

A small breath escaped Sorun, and he lowered his head as what Sonic assumed was a bashful look crossed his face. "Good. Right..." he murmured under his breath, almost too quiet for Sonic to hear.

Some time passed, mostly in silence save for the small mechanical clicks and whirs of the machinery Chuck was working on. Sorun seemed to be spending the time thinking to himself, arms still crossed with his head bowed down towards the floor. And Sonic was looking at the human from the side, smug smile on his face as he leaned back in his own stool. The look being sent towards him was not lost on Sorun, who deeply sighed as his eyes slowly drifted towards Sonic.

"What are you doing, smirking like that over there...?" Sorun quietly asked, not even bothering to move his head. When Sonic responded by sending him a pointed look while the smirk widened, he sighed again and dipped his head lower. "Don't you dare say what I think you're thinking..."

Well, with a request like that, Sonic just couldn't resist. "You know, I could have sworn I heard you complain about always being low on scratch, oh, I dunno, about a million times? Twenty mobiums is a lotta money to be spending for a guy as broke as you always say you are."

Sorun didn't say anything in response, choosing to remain quiet instead. It was more than enough for Sonic, though. Going out of his way to say sorry to a fellow Freedom Fighter after making a mistake was one thing, but from what Sonic knew he and his uncle weren't that close. Add that with the fact he evidently massively overpaid the debt he had with his uncle, and Sonic had to conclude that Sorun had just gone out of his way to be exceptionally nice to him.

It was this and all the other little things Sonic had been noticing coming up with Sorun. The way he was slowly becoming more approachable with the others, or the way he'd been volunteering towards some of the more dangerous missions more and more. But being remorseful over somebody he interacted with very little like Chuck was what did it for Sonic. That and the story Mighty had told him about Sorun having entertained a bunch of children during a mission he'd had with him.

He was changing, and for the better. Sure, he would always try to deny it whenever Sonic brought it up. But the cold, uncaring persona Sorun had been wearing all this time was cracking more and more, and at this point Sonic wondered if the human was even putting in the effort to keep it up and maintain it. What confused Sonic was that Sorun wasn't dropping that mask. He was happy, beyond happy, at the change Sorun was going through, but the fact he still held on to that aloof mask of his both confused and frustrated him.

"You know, Sorun, one of these days you're gonna have to learn to drop the act and just act normally around everyone," Sonic said, choosing to confront the matter directly. "You're just trying to go for the cool look, ain'tcha? Just admit it. You like us."

"No, I don't," Sorun denied.

Sonic rolled his eyes. "You're not even trying to hide it anymore. What's even the point?"

"I got no idea what you're talkin' about." Sorun lifted his head up and turned his eyes up towards the ceiling. "All I see when I look around me is a buncha desperate Freedom Fighters that pulled me into this zany world. The fact I'm sympathetic guy who likes doing nice things from time to time has nothing to do with that."

"Ah-huh, yeah." Crossing one leg over the other, Sonic looked up at the ceiling along with Sorun while asking, "So what are you gonna do when we finally beat Eggman and you don't have the excuse of focusing on fighting for freedom to hide behind?"

"This seriously the conversation you wanna have now? The future convo? We could talk about anything else, but this is what you settle on?" A scoff left Sorun. "Do you even know what you're gonna do when this is all over?"

Sonic shrugged. "Eh, I don't let things like that tie me down. Whatever happens in the future happens, and I'll just roll along with it."

"Pfft. That's so you." From the corner of his vision, Sonic saw Sorun's eyes, still affixed towards the ceiling, become half-lidded as a low, shaky breath left him. "I don't like thinking about what happens at the end of the road."

"'End of the road'?" Sonic repeated.

"Yeah, you know, end of the road of the war, Eggman's end of the roa- end of all the fighting," Sorun clarified with a frustrated huff. "There's nothing for me anyways."

The hedgehog's head turned towards Sorun, surprised look growing on his features. "That's not true at all. What makes you say that?"

"What makes me say that? What exactly is there for me here past the Freedom Fighters?" The human flung his arms up, and then let them limply fall to his side. "Fight in the war, sure. That's a straightforward enough goal. After that, though? What do I got after that?"

"A whole city of accepting folk? A group of friends?" The tone Sonic had adopted was one of utter bafflement, and light frustration at the train of logic Sorun was choosing to ride. The more he spoke, the less he understood why it was Sorun was thinking the way he was despite all of the obvious answers, and it made Sonic frustrated seeing it. He knew Sorun wasn't that blind. So what was it? Was he just ignoring what was sitting right there in front of him?

None of it made any sense. Things rarely did with Sorun.

"A city full of a bunch of random people and a group of comrades -" Sorun emphasized, glaring at Sonic from the corner of his eye, "- that took me away from my home, yeah, real great. The opportunities are endless," he retorted.

"You already said you don't hold that against us, so why do you keep bringing it up!?" Sonic asked, voice growing a bit heated at Sorun's logic. "You know we wouldn't have done that if we knew, you admitted it yourself, so that isn't the reason! So what is it!?"

"Have you ever considered I just don't like any of you?" Sorun asked. His voice remained level, though the cold, clipped tone it had betrayed his anger. "Do you really think that I'm over it yet?"

Sonic nodding his head must not have been the reaction Sorun had been expected, as his eyes widened the barest amount when he saw it. "Yeah. I do. I think you really do like us and you just won't admit it to yourself."

"Name one example-"

"You're friends with Nicole. You said it right to my face."

Sorun's body went completely straight, and he inhaled deeply through his nose. "Mention her again," he said, voice low, "and I leave."

Undeterred, Sonic continued listing off examples. "Alright, fine, then what about the fact you've been helping out with people more and more, or that you're talking to some of the others so frequently, the money thing with Chuck, the lack of angry outbursts you used to have all the time, the fact your cold shoulder's practically melted?" Every single fact said by him was accentuated by counting off his fingers, and he could see that every single thing he said made Sorun visibly more upset.

After he finished, the two teens full turned towards one another. Sonic's face was settled in a deep frown as he affixed Sorun with a accusing glare. Sorun just looked visibly bothered to an extreme degree: his hands were shaking, his eyes were wide, and he seemed to be breathing heavier than normal. It was a heavy enough reaction that Sonic's own anger was dialed back just a bit, and he was even getting ready to ask if Sorun was alright before he spoke first.

"Fine. I might have grown to like some of you. And maybe I'm mostly over all that." After saying this, Sorun's eyes took on a more conflicted shape, causing Sonic to sit back a bit in surprise. "I'm still figuring things out, alright?" he said, rising up off his stool. "Can we just leave it there?"

He didn't want to, but considering the words he heard Sorun say was more than he'd almost ever gotten out of the human, he was willing to leave it there. And that strange, mildly panicked look on Sorun's face had him a bit worried that he may have pushed him a bit too far, even if he didn't have a clue on how such a thing was possible with such innocent questioning. So he relented and gave Sorun a nod.

Sorun blinked at the nod, almost in relief, and then immediately turned away and made his way towards the garage's open door. "I gotta go. I promised Tails I'd help him out with the plane," Sorun said as he walked past Sonic.

As he passed him, another smug grin grew on Sonic's face. "Oh, hey, look at you helping out Tails like that. Sounds like something a friend would do, doesn't it?"

Not even bothering to turn back around to address Sonic, Sorun exited through to the other side of the garage door. Sonic's words did seem to anger Sorun somewhat, however, as he actually growled out in frustration as one of his Bringer Claws manifested, reached up to the garage door, and slammed it closed hard enough that the noise jostled both Sonic and Chuck.

"Ah, man." An exhausted sigh left Sonic as he ran a hand through his quills. "I swear, I can never figure out that guy's deal."

"Nor can I, but if I could give you some advice, sonny?" The younger hedgehog looked over to his older nephew, who looked at Sonic from the side with his hands still messing around with whatever he was working on. "I don't think Sorun likes it when you continue to bring this up with him, so maybe leave the matter alone and let the boy figure things out himself."

Sonic tilted his head to the side at his uncle's words, unsure of them. "I'm only trying to figure him out so I can help him, Chuck. Sorun, he just... confuses me so much, and I- agh!" He gripped his quills tightly as a frustrated grunt left him. "You know how hard it is trying to help somebody like Sorun when he acts like that all the time!? All-all... that!?" he asked, gesturing wildly towards the garage door.

It was only whenever they talked about things like this, too. The jokes Sonic played on him didn't bother him nearly as much, and sometimes Sorun would even fire back on him. Any other time it was normal conversations, and he still acted a bit cold, but he was otherwise calm and...

Sonic blinked in surprise. "You know, he only ever does get mad when we talk... huh." He saw the smirk that formed on Chuck's face, huffing and resting his head against one of his palms. "Fine, I get it. It's not like I'm trying to antagonize him or anything, though."

"You just want to understand him, I know," Chuck finished for him. "I get where you're coming from, but ask yourself this: who would know Sorun best?"

"Tch. A genie?" Sonic remarked with a roll of his eyes. "There's nobody that gets that guy except himself."

"Exactly." Chuck's simple response caused Sonic's eyes to drift back towards him after widening slightly. "Nobody would know Sorun better than Sorun himself, especially with the way he acts towards others. If everything you said is true, though, it does seem he's making strides towards figuring himself out. So you want my advice? Let him be," Chuck instructed him. "Let him figure things out for himself. I know sitting around and waiting isn't really your style, but you'd be surprised in how exercising some patience can get great results."

"I ain't exactly popular with the wait-and-see approach, unc, you know that. But... but I guess, you know, with how Sorun has been... I guess that's probably a good idea." The progress was there after all. Nobody, not even Sorun, could refute it, though the human certainly did try his hardest. And that was mostly on his own, with some time mixed in. He hated waiting when it came to helping friends, but what was he to do when it seemed like waiting for Sorun to set himself straight was the only thing that worked?

"Okay, Sorun. Go ahead and keep your act up." A self-satisfied smirk settled on Sonic's face as he reclined back in the stool and interlocked his fingers through his quills. "We're both seeing how you're turning out. You can try to keep it up for the rest of your life if you want, but there's no way you're gonna make it that long. Not even close."

Unfortunately, it seemed that reclining back in a stool that lacked anything in the way of back support was a mistake, as Sonic had accidently fallen off of the stool amidst his thoughts. His uncle had chuckled heartily at the sight, while Sonic himself remained still on the ground with a defeated sigh being his only reaction to the tumble.

A/N- This chapter's the bane of my existence, and I'll tell you why.

First and foremost there were some times near the end there I couldn't even log onto the site. The boys behind the curtain were doing some server maintenance work or something, I don't know, and if I'm being honest it wasn't really that big a deal since it only interrupted the editing process. A tiny inconvenience that didn't really matter. Still happened, though.

Then there was the face my decades-old, hand-me-down laptop went and bit it. Wifi adapter wouldn't work and the thing ran slower than something really slow, so I had to get that sorted and get a new one. Happy to say this new one runs like a dream and it's refreshing to not work with something that takes a whole thirty seconds to load in a page and has a battery life longer than an hour. But yeah, there was a whole week there I couldn't actually do anything. I tried doing it from my phone.

Here's some advice for anybody trying to use the fanfic site to write/edit chapters through a phone: don't do it. It don't feel good. Unless it's an emergency, don't do it.

Third, eh... I don't really like how this chapter turned out. Felt really repetitive in some parts. To be honest when I planned this arc out I structured it in a way where there's the chapters that advance the plot with character development and the introduction of various things and Emeralds and whatnot, and then there's intermission chapters like this one where that mainly serve as a status check on Sorun's mental state which has been slowly declining over the course of the story. I try to avoid making straight filler, though, so I try putting important things in this chapter beyond just more time with the characters, Sorun learning about the Power Rings and the whole "Sonic got a billion rings and got a permanent defense buff" the main takeaway among other things. But yeah. I'm subtle with some things and about as blunt with a hammer with other things, and I feel like here specifically I kinda went a bit too hard on some things. But eh, it's fine.

Anyway, that's all I got. Seeya in the next one.

Chapter 31

A/N- I got some stuff to say before we begin this one.

So originally this was supposed to be the "Sorun goes to Angel Island so we can establish all that stuff" chapter. Here's my opinion on literally anything related to the echidna that the comics did: it's a convoluted mess.

It just always seemed like such a disjointed, overly-complex plot you needed a graph to figure out for what basically amounted to a side story, and to be honest, I never liked it. But like it or not it's a part of the universe I chose to write in, it exists, so I have to deal with it. But right before I began writing this chapter I did a quick glance-over in the comic just so I could get some facts straight, and when I did I realized, "oh... OH, no, we can't have Sorun and the gang go there yet and meet those characters, that's way too soon." It's kind of a shame, I had a whole bit where Sorun was gonna go around confusing a bunch of echidna for Knuckles, but yeah, can't happen.

I put in a few hints earlier on, but for clarity's sake since the beginning of this story to now in terms of where this takes place in the comic timeline is between #173 and #174. It didn't progress past that due to Rubrum killing Feist, nabbing the Emeralds, and giving them to Eggman, which essentially "stalled" the comic story and moved it forwards months ahead of time while still technically being in the same place, which is how I explain away things like Team Dark being in G.U.N. is a thing even though at this point in the comics is wasn't. Or maybe Shadow was, I dunno, it's not really clear on that.

You know, that's another thing I wanna point out- the inconsistencies this whole comic has. From everybody's proportions changing practically every new comic because they tossed around the artists like no tomorrow I guess to stuff just being straight-up wrong sometimes. I've seen panels where somebody forgot Bunnie has a robot arm so they drew her with two normal ones. It's the same thing with Julie-Su's arm, I keep going, "is it a robot arm, is it just a sleeve, I don't know they really make it look like a robot arm and it's consistent with her backstory but there's panels in completely different art styles where she takes it off and there's a normal arm underneath and they never address it!" I even scoured the whole wiki just so I could get an answer of if it's supposed to be a robot arm or a pneumatic power sleeve or just a fashion accessory, I don't know, but I got nothing out of that endeavor. And the moon! The dang moon's intact in the comics! I had a heart attack when I saw that because I thought it was shattered because of the whole SA2 thing! The way the comics handled that was literally "just go play SA2 to get the story here", and in the story the moon got shot so I figured, "oh, alright, moon's broke, sure, I can do something fun with that." Nope! Turns out the moon in the comics is all fine 'cause reasons I guess, so now I got that plot hole to deal with. For all intents and purposes the moon in this story is a little broken, alright? It doesn't really change anything anyways, so it's fine.

... Perhaps I've gotten off topic. Point is a lot of time passed without anything actually happening, which froze some things and moved other things forwards. And at this point in time Dr. Finitevus and Scourge are up there doing their thing, and if Sorun met them this early that'd be bad plot-wise.

So it's cut. Chapter's cut and we're moving on to the next one. All that stuff's still gonna happen, it's too important to just ignore, but's it's gonna happen at a more appropriate time when I can integrate all that stuff more fluidly. It's probably for the best, anyways, because of all the chapters I planned I was looking forwards to this one the least and believe me when I say writing something when your heart's not in it is way harder and takes way longer than it needs to, the time it took me to write out Monochromatic Ideals can attest to that. So yeah, Angel Island's on the backburner for later. Right now we're skipping ahead to this chapter.

Recursion Error

Episode 31- The underwater adventure

"Huh. This is cool." Sorun's hand reached forwards, his index finger extending and pressing against the glass covering that separated him from the outside world. The finger slowly trailed down the glass, eliciting a quiet squeaking noise as Sorun looked on.

He'd always been curious about what being under the sea would be like. Mostly from all those marine life documentaries he'd seen, some movies and games that had underwater segments, those types of things. There was always something calming about those scenes he watched, which had eventually grown into a full-blown desire to go to the bottom of the ocean. Seeing it for himself was a different thing entirely.

It seemed like an entirely different world here at the bottom of the ocean. The whole scenery constantly shifting and wavering as well as being covered in a deep, blue film. The rays of sunlight piercing through the surface of the water overhead and helping to illuminate the depths around them. The colorful coral reefs they drove past and the schools of various types of fish that occasionally swam by them. There was something hypnotic about it all that had Sorun sitting back and staring in wonder at it all.

Of course when they crested a small bank, and when Sorun saw a giant, metal structure off in the distance with Eggman's logo painted on its front, he went from being in speechless wonder to silently seething in anger.

Quietly scoffing, Sorun sat back in his seat and looked off to his left. Where he was currently was inside of a small sidecar-like seat sealed in by a glass dome. The seat itself was attached to a larger, one-seated submarine-like vehicle, and past the dome covering to that vehicle he could just barely make out Tails' form past the panes of glass and shimmering ocean dividing them.

"Still can't believe he has his own submarine. And that he called it the Sea Fox," Sorun thought to himself as he leaned back in his seat. "I swear, he gets his own plane, he gets his own submarine, this guy gets everything." He sighed, steepled his fingers together in front of him, and looked out towards the facility they were driving towards. "These Emeralds sure wind up in the wackiest places, huh...?"

He'd nearly jumped out of his seat this morning when they'd gotten word of another Chaos Emerald being discovered. It wasn't inside of the northern continent, though, as it wasn't one of the Chaos sensors the Freedom Fighters had set up that informaed them of its location. Because this one happened to be located in the dead-center of the ocean somewhere, far, far away from those sensors. They'd only even gotten word about because, to Sorun's bafflement, there was apparently an aquatic team of Freedom Fighters Tails was personally associated with that had tipped him off about Eggman building some kind of facility under the ocean, along with them hearing the word "Chaos" over and over again when they'd been monitoring the airwaves.

Their curiosity had been peaked, so Tails had gotten a Chaos sensor, loaded it into the plane, and had then flown off with Sally's permission towards the ocean to confirm their suspicions. Sorun had decided to ride along with him, as he had a personal investment in locating the Chaos Emeralds and he hadn't been doing anything else at the time.

So they'd arrived around in the general location, and waiting there right in the middle of the water to guide them had been a whale. Not even an anthropomorphized, Mobian whale, but a normal whale that could talk to Tails through the plane via some communication thingamajig he'd rigged up, and they'd been lead towards where the suspicious facility was being built.

Go figure. Tails was friends with a talking whale. And a bunch of other talking sea animals in that particular group if his word was to be trusted.

Well, eventually Tails' sensor had picked up a positive reading, confirming their suspicions. He'd said his thanks to the whale, Sorun silently observing the entire exchange for the most part, and they'd flown all the way back to Freedom HQ to formulate a plan. It was decided that, since Tails had the submarine and it could, at most, fit three people via its pilot seat and two sidecars, a three-man team would be sent in to retrieve that Emerald. Tails, since it was his submarine and he was the best person to pilot it, Rotor, since he was the only Freedom Fighter they had who could deal well with aquatic environments and was tech savvy, and Sorun, because he heavily insisted on being there to collect the Emerald.

Thus, they were here. Driving towards a giant underwater facility to fight a bunch of robots, steal a gem of unlimited power, and then take a submarine home.

Sorun hardly believed there was a time in his life he would have found that really cool. Now he just felt tense but otherwise indifferent over the mission. The ocean still looked cool, though, so there was that.

The facility itself was a large, circular complex. The entire thing was held aloft over a giant trench, anchored into the top of the trench wall by six gigantic support struts. On its underside, near its front, was a small, circular opening whose surface lead to a room. A basic moonpool that Tails piloted the submarine up through.

Through the surface of the moonpool, the Sea Fox emerged, and then settled into a stationary position. The three domes on the main sub and the two sidecars lifted up, the three occupants emerging and hopping out from the center of the moonpool to the metal flooring surrounding it. Sorun had hopped out on one side all alone while Tails and Rotor had hopped out on the opposite side.

Taking a glance around the large, circular room, Sorun couldn't help but notice how oddly clean the place looked. The flooring was a sterling steel color whereas the metal walls were painted to be an immaculate white. The lights were bright, too, making it rather easy for him to see all around. And from what he saw, other than the moonpool and a door at one end of the room, the place was oddly empty.

"This place looks cleaner than a hospital room. I get it's brand new, but man... If it weren't for the giant Eggman logo out front I'd have to question if he was the one that really built this place," Sorun thought to himself. He'd seen the way Eggman constructed structures before. They usually leaned towards being more utilitarian than visually appealing. Structures and machines that served no purpose past their functions, unless he styled them after his own face just to taunt his enemies. All his creations, buildings or robots, were always soulless in that regard. Bland and a weird fusion of looking industrial and futuristic at the same time.

Not this place, though. It was too clean, too warm to stand in. Almost too inviting.

"You think it's weird that there wasn't a locked door or anything on that moonpool we just came out of?" As if voicing Sorun's own suspicions, Rotor's voice sounded out from the other side of the room as Sorun continued looking around. "I would have expected, you know, a fleet of water drones to attack us outside or a door we'd have to get through or something. That's his usual style."

"Yeah," Tails agreed in an unsure tone, "and why is he bothering to pump oxygen down here? He has to be since we're able to breath, but the only things that should be down here are robots." A contemplative hum followed the fox's statement. "You guys think this is a trap?"

"Oh, it's definitely a trap," Sorun voiced, drawing the attention of the two Mobians on the other side of the moonpool. "When has it ever been so easy walking into a place of his? I'll give him some credit though, because guess what, the trap works." Sorun spun around and pointed towards the sole door in the room. "Trap or no trap, I'm going for that Emerald."

When he glanced to the side, he saw both Rotor and Tails giving him frowns. "Are you sure this is the smartest move?" Tails asked, twin appendages slowly swishing in the air behind him.

"Pfft, not at all," Sorun scoffed with a shake of his head. He began walking towards the door, remarking, "But when have I ever been known for doing the smart thing?"

"Sorun, he's right. This is a risky move." This came from Rotor, who stepped away from the sub floating in the moonpool and towards Sorun while shaking his head and crossing his arms. "This is way too fishy to call safe. We should fall back and think up another plan."

"What is there to plan for?" Sorun asked. "We only have the one sub that fits three people, so unless you wanna go back to Knothole to wrangle up some scuba gear so we can all get caught in the massive trap behind that door, I say we just bite the bullet and go forwards." When Rotor continued to give him an unapproving look, the human sighed and crossed his arms. "Look, it's either we go get it now or leave a Chaos Emerald here. Eggman's already got it anyways, so it's not like he's gonna give it up without a fight. At least this way we see it coming."

The logic caused Rotor's hard features to soften into a thinking look. He sighed out loud, his tusks lowering to the ground along with his jaw as he ran a hand over his face. "You're seriously willing to freely walk into one of Eggman's traps just for a Chaos Emerald, Sorun?"

In truth, he really didn't want to. But he also desperately needed that Chaos Emerald for more power. To have every single advantage he could get against Eggman so he'd have a solid shot at killing him before he died. Even at the cost of his health for what little time he had left, even at the cost of his life, he was ending that man for everything he'd done and so everybody on this world could finally be free of him. That was the whole reason he was even here, after all.

But to do that he needed power. More power than what he had right now. He needed that Emerald, no matter what he had to go through to get it.

"I'm aware of the danger. I'm still going," Sorun said, addressing both Rotor and Tails. "I'm not asking you two to come with. If you wanna fall back, then fine. I'll go myself."

He really did mean it, too. Not in a way that was insulting to them for not committing, but just as a way of letting them know he was going in there with or without them while subtly implying he'd rather they avoid any potential danger. That was the intent of his wording, at least, but much to his surprise they both glanced at each other and then began chuckling in amusement. "Well, if there's no talking you out of it, I guess our hands are tied," Rotor said, giving Sorun a small grin when he turned back to see a look of surprise on the pale teen's face. "What, did you seriously think we were gonna strand you in the middle of the ocean?"

"Well, no..." He'd in fact just forgotten the important fact that they'd arrived here on a submarine and that is was his only ride out, but he didn't want to admit to them he'd forgotten this detail. "So are we going?"

"Actually, Tails, you mind hanging back with the sub?" Rotor asked, turning towards the fox. "You know, in case something happens and we need to beat a hasty retreat. Get what I mean?"

"Oh. Yeah, sure, I can do that." Tails' ears lowered the barest amount at being asked to stay back, but he still gave Rotor an understanding nod as he turned around and walked back towards the sub. "Try not to take too long, you guys!" he called out as he flew up over the moonpool. "I don't wanna stay here any longer than we need to!"

"No worries!" Rotor called back. "We'll get that Emerald and get back here as fast as possible!"

Sorun remained silent during the exchange, choosing to silently observe the pair from a distance. It was only after Tails retreated back to the sub and Rotor approached him did he choose to finally speak. "So, Rote, just you and I on this one. Sorun and Rotor. Rotor and, er..." When he saw the walrus give him an odd look, he coughed to the side and looked towards the door. "Yeah, let's just, let's, let's go."

"Um, yeah," Rotor agreed, quirking an eye ridge upwards in confusion when he saw Sorun walk towards the door. He said nothing else, and then proceeded to follow him.

The pair stopped in front of the door, Sorun staring unblinkingly at it while Rotor let out a contemplative hum. It was a metallic, white door so integrated into the wall it would have been practically invisible if it wasn't for the rectangular seam that was its border. There was no handle, though there was a small button lit up in a green color right next to it. Sorun took the initiative and reached forwards to press it, though when he did the green button flashed red and the door remained shut.

There was a scoff from Sorun. "Come on, he already knows somebody's coming to get this thing. He can't at least leave the door unlocked?"

"Ah, you know Eggman. Not one to make it easy for us," Rotor commented. He stepped past Sorun and kneeled down towards the button, squinting all the while. "Well, time to see if you were paying attention about your door hacking lessons," he said, claws brushing against the toolbelt he had strapped to his waist. "Wires should be just behind-"

Slash! Slash!

The walrus winced upon hearing two quiet, almost inaudible slashes reach his ears, and then winced again when what was once the door loudly collapsed onto the ground in four metallic pieces. He looked down at the remains of the door, and then slowly looked up at Sorun who was currently holding his katana in his hands. He met Rotor's stare with a blank look of his own.

"Yeah, I'm partial to a different type of 'hacking', Rotor," Sorun said, holding Yamato up for him to see. "Can we move on?"

Clicking his tongue, Rotor stood back up to his full height while pulling at the collar of his brown jacket. "All that time I put into teaching you that. Wasted. You're just like Sonic or Knuckles whenever they see a locked door."

"Hey, that ain't true at all. This is just way faster," Sorun denied as he sheathed Yamato. "Are you sure you're gonna be good here? I always figured you were more inclined towards the... technical aspects of things than the physical."

"Eh, maybe, but I can still hold my own in a fight. Probably not as well as anybody else, but I'm not a Freedom Fighter for nothing." Rotor walked through the open doorway, taking care to step over the pieces of the door Sorun had cut away. "You coming?"

Sorun stared after the Mobian, looked down at his sword, and then began following his back. "Yeah, comin'."

Going inside of the facility, Sorun immediately noticed that, as a whole, the place was constructed rather tightly. It was somewhat of a surprise seeing as the place looked a lot bigger on the outside, but so far all he and Rotor had encountered was tight corridors and hallways. There were some patrolling Egg Pawns that they occasionally had to duck out of the way of and hide from, too, but other than those small, occasional stalls it was mainly them just traversing through hallways.

Granted, there were a lot of those hallways. So many branching pathways, in fact, that Sorun was pretty sure that the two of them were lost and reduced to blindly wandering at this point. Which, now that he thought about it, was actually their only option as neither even knew the layout. But apparently Rotor was keeping track of the hallways they kept going down, or at least pretended to as he maintained that confident air about him whenever Sorun complained about them being lost.

He really hoped Rotor had been keeping track of where they'd been going, at least, because Sorun agreed with Tails sentiment in that he didn't want them to be in this place any longer than they needed to. This mainly stemmed from the feeling Sorun kept getting whenever he glanced at Rotor, which was worry. He didn't doubt the purple walrus had some combat ability, he was a Freedom Fighter, but at the same time Sorun knew this unequivocal truth: guy was primarily a nerd, not a fighter. And sure, Sorun was there, but he didn't want to have to divide his attention between looking after himself and Rotor in the middle of a fight. And Tails was all the way back at the submarine.

Strange feeling, being worried about another Freedom Fighter. Usually he was supposed to be the weakest one that needed to be looked after, but ever since he'd acquired Yamato things had been different. Like he'd been elevated to a slightly more equal level to everybody else, failing body notwithstanding. A good sign of him becoming stronger, he supposed, but those niggling thoughts in the back of his mind telling him his body was just going to get weaker with this Emerald were still present. He tried ignoring them. It didn't work.

The fact this whole thing reeked of "trap" wasn't lost on him, either. Odds were, a fight against something was going to happen. Sorun didn't have any illusions against that- there wasn't a single time he'd ever acquired one of these Chaos Emeralds without having to fight something. It was just the way it went. It made him all the more worried, and... something else. Not exactly excitement. Just a slight anticipation at an opportunity to fight something and forget about the rest of his problems for a little bit. Practically half the reason he went on these dangerous missions anymore was for those moments.

"Hey. Hey, Sorun," Rotor whispered, drawing the teen's attention. "Take a look at this."

Jolted from his thoughts, Sorun looked over towards Rotor, currently leaning against an opening in the hallway while peeking around the corner. He crept up to the Mobian's side, peering past the corner into the first actual room they'd encountered in this place that wasn't the moonpool room they'd emerged it. A wide, open room that was vacant of anything save the numerous amount of doors lining the walls and a smaller, booth-like room near the end.

Both teens glanced at each other, nodded, and began making their way towards the small booth in the back while keeping close to the wall. The booth itself seemed to be a completely enclosed space except for an open doorway on its side which they both leaned up against on either side of. Poking his head around the corner, Sorun saw a small room occupied by two Egg Pawns who were standing at a long computer console that spanned the entire front side of the room, faced forwards and typing away at keyboards as they stared at multiple monitors in front of them.

"I think that's some kind of security room," Rotor whispered to the human as they leaned away from the opening and looked at each other. "A security room or control center or something like that. Either way it's good for us."

"Yeah, man. Totally." Sorun slowly nodded in agreement, pointed towards Rotor and continuing with, "And that's important because..." he trailed off, waiting for the other to finish.

Rotor gave him a flat look. "Because maybe I can get into the systems from those computers and get us a map or a layout of the place so we can stop wandering around blindly," he whispered back in a clipped tone.

"Great plan. Solid plan. I say we go for it." Sorun glanced back into the room. "Want me to take care of those two?"

"No, it's fine. I got it." Rotor crouch down to a lower stance- which, given his stature, looked really awkward to Sorun- and began creeping into the room. "Just stay here and keep watch while I deal with this."

"Uh, sure." Trusting Rotor's judgement, Sorun decided to lay his back flat against the wall, staring forwards while still clutching the katana in his hands.

It didn't take long for the sounds of a struggle to reach his ears. It mainly comprised the sound of a lot of shuffling around, metal clanking, and the occasional grunt of effort from Rotor. Sorun merely continued to stare ahead, still leaning against the side of the doorway with one leg crossed over the other. Tens of seconds passed without the struggling noises relenting, Sorun coughing to the side but otherwise still calmly remaining in place. At one point he'd brought the Yamato up to his face and began fiddling with the blue cord wrapped on the sword's scabbard to pass the time, occasionally sending a glance towards the doorway he was besides.

After what felt like a full minute, he decided to check up on Rotor. "You sure you don't need a hand, man?" Sorun asked, raising his voice over the sounds of the struggling.

There was a loud, metallic bang. "Y-yeah, I'm- ergh!- I'm all good in here!" Rotor shouted back.

"If you say so..."

And so the fighting noises continued. Sorun had begun to idly tap his fingers against the sword's handle, humming under his breath and he continued waiting for Rotor to finish. He hadn't been keeping track of the actual time, but when it felt like another minute passed he called out to Rotor again, saying, "It'll just take me, like, two seconds if you let me-"

"Sorun, I got it!"

"Alright, sheesh. Just tryin' to help." More loud, metallic bangs and crashing sounds were heard inside of the room. Sorun took in a heavy breath, exhaled it, and waited a few more seconds despite his quickly thinning patience. When he heard no end to the sounds he heard inside the room, he groaned in frustration and pushed off the wall. "Oh my god, Rotor, just let me-!"

He stopped himself when he made it to the doorway's entrance, freezing when he saw the sight ahead of him. The two Badniks he'd spied when they'd first came upon the room were on the ground, lights completely out and bodies motionless. Rotor stood triumphantly over the two robot bodies, lightly panting while looking towards Sorun.

"What?" Rotor asked. Sorun was quick to wipe the surprised look off his face and replace it with a timid grin as he shrugged towards Rotor, who rolled his eyes and turned to the computer console at the end of the room. "Alright, well, give me a minute to get in here and see what I can get."

Turning away from Sorun, Rotor approached the front of the computer console and immediately began typing away at the keyboard, his eyes glued to one of the computer monitors. Sorun, remaining near the doorway, glanced at the monitors, saw lines of computer jargon he couldn't make out, and then looked towards Rotor's back. "So any luck?" he asked.

"Eh, getting there," Rotor answered. "It looks like this is some kind of security station. I'm trying to see if I can pull up a map from here, but the security system here is-"

A loud, ringing alarm blared through the air, cutting Rotor off mid-sentence and making Sorun wince and snap his head to the side. The alarm lasted around five seconds until Rotor hit a button, followed by him letting out a loud sigh.

"- Kinda strong..." he finished out. He then turned his head back towards Sorun, an awkward, apologetic look on his face. "So... my bad, but... how mad would you be if I said I accidentally may have tripped a, er, security protocol?"

"I don't think I'd hold it against you," Sorun coolly replied, lazily tilting his head out of the doorway towards the open room in front of the security booth. "You didn't get locked out, did you?"

"No, I managed to avoid that, but..." Rotor paused to look at one of the screens. "We still have a patrol of Badniks coming to check out what we just did. I'm seeing twenty here."

Sorun's ears perked up. He hummed, looked down at Yamato, and began running a finger along the sheath's edge. "Twenty ain't too bad. I'll deal with them, Rotor. Just get that map out of there so we can get this over with."

"Alright. Be careful."

"Ah-huh, careful. Sure..." Sorun stepped out from the doorway, walking towards the front of the windowless booth while stretching his neck back and forth. At the same time, he saw some of the doors at the other end of the room open, red Egg Pawns wielding lances pouring in right through them. Sorun watched on with focused eyes.

Just as Rotor had said, it was a group of twenty lance-wielding Badniks all standing in front of Sorun, eyes and smiling mouths resembling Eggman all aimed right towards him. Sorun's right hand stroked the handle of Yamato, fingers slowly but firmly gripping around it as Sorun watched on. Without another word he began speedily walking towards the nearest Egg Pawn, which took the opportunity to move in on Sorun.

"Oh, that movement, huh? That means... you'll stab in this direction." As Sorun thought this, he eyed the way the Egg Pawn right in front of him was moving. The position it put its feet and arms in, the direction its joints moved, the way it held the lance and the direction it was pointed in. The exact same movement he'd seen on so many other Egg Pawns. So, when it stabbed forwards, Sorun merely sidestepped the lance while keeping up his forward gait. At the same time, he tore Yamato out from its sheath and cleaved right through the robot's midsection. He'd continued walking past the Egg Pawn long before its two halves hit the ground.

He saw another one rushing towards him from the right corner of his eye. Not even pausing, Sorun willed four Summoned Swords to appear and consecutively swing upwards, the swords lifting the robot up into the air. It was helpless when a fifth Summoned Sword appeared over its head, thrusting downwards right through its face while also carrying its body back down to the ground.

That was the thing with fighting these Egg Pawns over and over again. Even if their AI had some rudimentary form of intelligence in the way of basic problem solving, they were still just basic, mass produced AI inside of mass produced bodies. They didn't have the capability to innovate and differentiate their attacks to a serviceable degree. They didn't adapt and learn. Their hardware and software just didn't allow them that.

Because of that, Sorun had been noticing the patterns. They didn't exactly have something as base as a limited amount of attacks, they had that much going for them, at least, but there was a certain... bias programmed into them. A bias that lead them to more often than not to commit to the same attacks over and over again. And Sorun, having fought these things for so long, started seeing those same movements and patterns they would default to. And after seeing them so many times he started memorizing them.

"It's doing that, so dodge this way. That one means it's going to swing to the side. These things never learn..." Sorun still continued to briskly walk right towards the Badniks, changing directions to just narrowly avoid being hit by a lance in the effort of walking past an Egg Pawn only to cut through it with a quick flick of his sword. "It's just like memorizing all those attack animations from those games back then. That's about what these things amount to anyways." The fourth Egg Pawn he approached thrusted forwards. Sorun's right Bringer Claw manifested, grabbed the lance, and then diverted it to the side. "They're nothing like Nicole." He thrusted his katana right through its face. "Nothing but bargain bin, copy-pasted AI. Useless fodder."

Sorun tore his sword out from the robot and watched it fall down to the ground in front of him. Stepping over the corpse, Sorun noticed that some of the remaining Egg Pawns were actually beginning to back up away from him, though they still continually pointed their lances at him. Unabated, Sorun continued walking forwards towards them.

He still didn't like fighting. Never did, and he never wanted to grow to like it. He hated fighting these things and anything else just as much as he did from the first time he fought a Badnik, embarrassing display aside. But there was no denying the feelings he'd been getting recently whenever he got into one of these battles with Eggman's robots, or rather lack thereof. Everything that plagued his thoughts always seemed to disappear in these fights.

The endless dread of his coming death, the frustration over his failing body and his own weakness, his self loathing at the way he treated his friends. None of that was there in these fights. All of those feelings were buried under the intense focus of Sorun attempting to survive these fights, as well as the endless rage he felt due to the Egg Pawns' visage reminding him of Eggman. Washed away by the adrenaline coursing through him. It was another way for him to escape, if just for a little bit.

Another robot charged towards Sorun. A Summoned Sword manifested in front of Sorun and fired forwards, the spectral blade sliced right through one of the robot's legs and causing it to fall face-first onto the ground. It slid right in front of Sorun, who only glanced down at it for a second before the grip on his sword tightened. He brought the entire blade's edge down on its body, cleaving through it completely before lifting the sword up and bringing it down again. Over and over he savagely hacked at the robot's body with his katana, and it was only when it stopped twitching did he finally stab its tip into its body. He dragged the blade forwards, carving right through its body all the way towards the other end.

The blade exited the Badnik's body in a wide, upward swing. The force of it, combined with the preexisting damage done from Sorun's earlier swings, caused the Egg Pawn's body to fly apart in pieces. Black oil flew forwards, splashing against Sorun's body. He looked up at the remaining Badniks with manic eyes, black fluid dripping down from the side of his face that had been splashed with oil. The Egg Pawns, with the most basic level of fear programmed into them by Eggman, did something Sorun did not expect: they ran away. They all turned right around and began to try and run away from him towards the doors.

They didn't make it. Blue, spectral swords rained down on all the door exits, blocking their paths. Two Bringer Claws reached out and grabbed two of the Egg Pawns, dragging them backwards towards Sorun who had his sword at the ready.

"Not yet. Not just yet." The electronic screaming coming out of one of the Egg Pawn's speakers was lost on Sorun as he cleanly cut through its head with Yamato. "Just a little bit longer."

No, he hated fighting. But he liked the catharsis cutting down Badniks afforded him, though. And he liked being able to momentarily forget how terrible his life was.

"Okay, aaaaand... there!" Quick as a could, Rotor pressed down on a button on a keyboard as soon as he saw the progress bar he'd been eyeing complete loading. Upon pressing the button, the bar on the screen was replaced with a 3-D rendering of the underwater facility, which Rotor proceeded to intently stare at. He scanned the entire screen, memorizing as much as the layout as he could as quickly as possible.

The sense of urgency Rotor had held had begun to subside when the sounds of Sorun fighting outside died down just seconds ago, though, all things considered, he was still in a hurry to get this mission done with quickly. He didn't need to spend much effort memorizing the facility's layout, though- despite all the hallways he and Sorun had traversed, the general layout of the place was fairy simple and uniform. He'd managed to memorize everything he needed in a short amount of time, and then moved away from the computer console and towards the door.

"Alright, got that all set. Now I just gotta go get Sorun," the walrus muttered to himself as he moved towards the booth's door opening. "I'm not hearing anything else so hopefully... he... what the...?"

With how proficient Sorun had become at dismantling Badniks as of late, what he'd expected to walk out into was a room full of destroyed Badniks with Sorun standing among them. And, to be fair, that is what he bore sight to once Rotor left the small room. Twenty destroyed Badniks, with Sorun standing up in the middle of them.

What he didn't expect was the state that the Egg Pawns were in. They were cut apart in an extremely excessive manner: there were barely any parts lying around that Rotor could properly identify due to them having been cut apart in so extravagantly. There was black oil staining the floor, walls, and even the ceiling almost everywhere, as well as a small amount of puncture marks and slashes all around the metallic surfaces.

Rotor was forced to pause fully, however, when he saw Sorun standing right in the middle of the carnage. His form was overly relaxed, Yamato and its sheath loosely held in his hands as he stared down at one of the destroyed and unrecognizable Badniks. His clothes and face were splattered in black fluid, though what Rotor couldn't help but look towards was his face. He was staring wide-eyed down at the dead robot, his irises heavily constricted to pinpricks and shaking. The muscles in his mouth were so strained that it was upturned into a small, crooked smile.

"Sorun?" Rotor hesitantly called out, slowly approaching the human while taking care to step over a torn-apart Badnik's corpse. "Sorun, you, er... you okay there?"

The sudden shift in Sorun's demeanor was so swift that Rotor found himself being startled. The grip on Sorun's sword and sheath tightened, while his posture went tense and straight. He snapped his head towards Rotor, irises dilating back to a normal size as his face eased into a neutral, lazy expression.

"Oh, Rotor. Hey," the other teen nonchalantly greeted, nodding towards Rotor. "You get the map?"

"Uh... yeah..." Rotor responded, slowly nodding towards Sorun while surveying the area around them. "Sorun, what happened here?"

Taking a quick glance around, Sorun shrugged and refocused on Rotor. "I guess I got a little overzealous. Sorry about that," he apologized as he sheathed the katana. "Anyways, robots are taken care of, so are we good to go?"

"I'd say they're a bit more than taken care of, but yeah. We're set," Rotor confirmed with another slow nod. Seeing Sorun in that momentary state, if just for a single moment, had him a bit worried, but seeing the dark-haired human speak so normally now made a majority of the worry Rotor had leave him. He seemed fine enough as he was, so he dropped the matter for more pressing issues. "I saw a map of this place and memorized the layout. Couldn't tell where it was the Emerald is stashed, but it looks like this place is mostly comprised of hallways and other smaller rooms, probably maintenance areas. There was one thing I saw that really stood out from everything else, though. A really, really big room at the end of the facility."

Sorun hummed at the new information. "The shiny, important item is usually in the biggest, most important-looking room. We're gonna scour every inch of this place until we find that Emerald, so we might as well start with the most obvious place," he reasoned, turning around to leave. He walked two steps, stopped, and then turned back towards Rotor. "Right, yeah, you're the one who actually knows where we're goin'. Lead on."

"It's this way." Rotor gestured towards one of the open doorways in front of them, and then began walking towards it. He heard Sorun begin to walk in step right behind him, and continued with, "from what I saw, we already managed to stumble halfway through this place already. It shouldn't take us too long to reach that room."

"Sounds great," he heard Sorun say from behind him. "Hey, Rotor?"

"Yeah?" Responded the Mobian, craning his head backwards to address Sorun.

"Where'd all this black stuff come from?" He saw that Sorun was eyeing the black splotches of oil that had been splattered on him from the robots, and that a slight bit of irritation formed on his face when he tried rubbing a spot off of his chest to no avail. "Seriously, what is this stuff? Smells awful."

Rotor's walking slowly down a considerable amount, and he turned his head further towards the teen. "It's... it's oil. From all the Badniks you took out," Rotor slowly explained, gesturing one of his hands towards the pile of cut-apart robots behind them.

Sorun's gaze followed Rotor's gesture towards the fallen Badniks, choosing to stare over at them for a few silent seconds. A look of realization soon lit up in his eyes. "Ohhh, yeah, I guess I didn't notice. Weird, I'm usually really good at not getting splashed by this stuff." He grimaced when he sniffed at a black smear on his arm, shaking his head and lowering it to his side. "This stuff's a pain to wash out, too. Ugh."

"I, uh... I hear that," Rotor replied, head still slightly turned towards Sorun's direction. "Okay, that's weird, but... eh, he's... he's Sorun. He's always kind of strange like that." Shrugging, Rotor turned back towards the doorway and sped up his walking speed. "Okay. Let's go check out that room."

It'd taken a bit of doing to get to their destination. More sneaking around hallways on their part, but with Rotor having gained knowledge of this place's layout they at least were able to progress forwards in an expedient manner.

He kept glancing towards him, though. Rotor. Sorun hadn't noticed it at first, but every so often as they kept advancing forwards past all the halls and doors the walrus kept sneaking glances at him from the side, a puzzled look crossing his features. That look became less and less noticeable as time went on, as if whatever it was that was on Rotor's mind was slowly fading, but it still made Sorun question just what exactly was on the Mobian's mind to begin with that made him continually give Sorun those looks.

Maybe the smell of all this oil splashed on him was bothering him. It still annoyed him that so much managed to get on him; usually his Bringer Claws or Summoned Swords dealt with robots at a good enough distance that any stray oil splashes missed him, or his Yamato cut so cleanly and quickly that there wasn't a huge amount of splash back. And sure, more often than not there was some that got on him, it was pretty much unavoidable in this line of work, but he never got drenched to this kind of degree before.

Perhaps he'd gone a little too hard on those Egg Pawns. He hadn't been able to help himself, as much as he hated to acknowledge it. He'd have to dial it back and avoid doing that in the future if what he did back there was what was causing Rotor to give him those looks. At least if he was with others.

One more door was passed by the two Freedom Fighters before they came to an area that was wholly different from anywhere else they'd traversed in this place thus far. They emerged from the end of a long, rectangular room that looked more like an atrium than anything else. There was more bright lighting from the ceiling lights and white, metal walls, too, and to add to the extravagancy of the room was multiple windows on either side of the room's walls viewing out to the ocean outside and the marine life swimming around in it.

Both Rotor and Sorun were less focused on the scenery and more focused on what was lying right at the end of the gigantic room: a glowing, purple gem sitting plainly on a small pedestal, without so much as a single robot guarding it.

"Yeah, I ain't buyin' it," Sorun began, slowly stepping through the atrium with Rotor right behind him. He began to slowly spin around, too, spreading his arms out towards either side while looking up. "He goes through all the effort of making this big, fancy room only to put the Emerald smack-dab at the end there with nothing between us and it?" He shook his head, arms going limp to his side as he made his way towards the Emerald. "Dude's a comic villain through and through. I'd say the fact he's been toying with us this whole time just to make it more interesting for himself is working in our favor, but I'll hold my tongue 'til we actually have the thing back at base. Where I'll then proceed to eat it for a super power."

"I can't exactly call it classic Eggman, but yeah, it's looking real obvious now," Rotor agreed. "You know, it's times like this I actually miss fighting the old Robotnik. He wasn't so... what's a word for something being so overly showy?"

"Ostentatious," Sorun supplied.

"Osten- wow, good word," Rotor complimented with an approving look. "Yeah, those days it was back and forth between us and he had to put in effort to get one in over the Freedom Fighters. But this Robotnik, he... it feels like he never takes us seriously, but he's still winning the war. It just feels insulting."

"Ah, not to worry, Rotor, we'll hoist him by his own petard yet."

He received an odd look from Rotor. "Hoist him by his own what?"

"It's from Haml... ah, I guess you wouldn't know what that is, huh?" Sorun mumbled to himself, and then turned his head around to face Rotor. "It basically means a guy like him with an overwhelming amount of hubris can only get so far before we exploit enough of his carelessness to beat him. Y'know, like that one story with the turtle that won that race because the other guy was so overconfident."

Rotor nodded in understanding. "Oh, Sonic told you about Tommy, huh?"

"Who?" They both stopped, Sorun affixing Rotor with a questioning glare while Rotor responded with a confused look. A few seconds passed, and then Sorun shrugged and turned back around. "Well, anyways," he said, "looks like we got what we came for. Now all that's left is surviving whatever happens next."

The Chaos Emerald Sorun's eyes were locked onto became more distinguishable the closer he and Rotor got to it. Cut in the same diamond shape as all the rest of the Emeralds he'd seen so far. Colored a deep purple color and constantly glowing and radiating in power. All perched up on a metal pedestal without so much as a glass casing covering it, or seemingly no other security measures Sorun saw as he glanced around the area. It truly was just sitting there for the taking. Seemingly, at least.

"Jackpot," Sorun mumbled, stopping right in front of the pedestal to admire the Emerald. "Oooh, Rotor, look," he commented as he turned his head around at the walrus. "It's purple just like you."

"Yeah, har har." Rotor sighed out of his nose and shook his head. "So what do you think's gonna happen once you take it off?"

"When you take it off. I'm not touching it 'til we're safe at HQ," Sorun corrected, and then hummed as he looked closer at the pedestal. "Well, it's sitting right on a pressure plate of some kind," he observed, eyeing the off-colored and slightly raised platform on the pedestal the Emerald was sitting on. "And," he continued, looking up towards the ceiling, "I'm pretty sure a TV or something with Eggman's face on it is gonna come out of those openings over there. I can see the lines where the metal plates shift and everything."

"Oh. Huh, yeah, I see it, too." Rotor looked up towards the ceiling where Sorun was looking, and then looked down towards the Emerald. "Okay, guess I'll grab it, then. Get ready for anything."

His arms slowly reached out towards the Emerald, with the Mobian gulping as his digits reached closer towards it. He stopped centimeters away from it, nodded while muttering something silently to himself, and then quickly snatched the Emerald off of the pedestal. He backpedaled away from the pedestal immediately afterwards, staring at the small, discolored platform that the Emerald sat on with apprehension while Sorun looked on in boredom. As Sorun had predicted, the platform began lowering down into the pedestal.

There was a loud, banging sound that startled both teens and caused them to whirl around. Metal plates began to slam down in front of all the windows lining the sides of the room, while at the same time the lights on the ceiling seemed to increase in intensity in conjunction with a single, blaring alarm sounding out. Up above on the ceiling, the seams Sorun had pointed out earlier began to separate to reveal a hollow space in the ceiling, where a large, rectangular monitor attached to a mechanical arm-

"Called it, I called it!" Sorun shouted, pointing towards the monitor.

- began lowering down from the newly-revealed space in the ceiling. The robot arm positioned the gigantic monitor so it faced down towards the two, where static proceeded to fill the entire screen. An image began flickering repeatedly on the screen, becoming clearer with each occurrence, until finally the screen solidified into a singular image: Eggman, sitting in a chair in a dark, metal-lined room and maniacally smiling towards the camera.

Rotor's face hardened into a steely expression, his body tensing up upon seeing Eggman on the large monitor above them. Sorun's reaction was much more subdued, the human silently exhaling, rolling his eyes at the ceiling, and slowly readjusting his grip on the sheathed katana in his grasp.

"Well, well, well..." Eggman's voice came out from an unseen speaker on the TV, sounding just as malicious to Sorun as ever. He steepled his hands in front of him while leaning in closer towards the camera, the Doctor's grin widening. "If it isn't the meddlesome... hey, wait a minute." The grin immediately dropped off of Eggman's face, followed by one of his hands reaching up to adjust the blue spectacles that hid his eyes. "Sorun? You're not that miserable hedgehog."

"Thank god for that," Sorun airily replied, spinning Yamato around in his grasp and resting it on his shoulder as he looked up at the monitor. "Don't tell me you were expecting him."

"Of course I was! I thought if anything would could drag that blue pincushion into my sights, it'd be a Chaos Emerald! Though I suppose it's not all that surprising to see you were drawn here in his stead. The allure of an Emerald's power must be irresistibly captivating to somebody like you." Eggman leaned back in his seat, propping his head against one of his closed fists. "Goodness' sake... all this preparation for the the wrong Freedom Fighter."

A fake, shocked expression lit up on Sorun's face as he looked around. "Wait, this was all a trap? I can't believe- I can't even fake it." Sorun's face dropped back to his normal expression as he looked back up at Eggman. "Look, we knew it was a trap, like, five seconds in, so can you just spring whatever you have set up so we can get on with the rest of our day?"

A sigh left Eggman. "You're really taking all the fun out of this, Sorun. Agh, fine, fine. The suspense is already ruined, just, where's the...?" The Doctor began grumbling under his breath as he began looking around for something on his end of the screen, his head picking up a bit when he found what he was looking for, followed by him reaching forwards and pressing it.

From the middle of the room, a large, circular hatch in the floor previously unseen by the two Freedom Fighters began to open up. They both looked towards the opening as a loud, grinding sound was heard, not unlike the sound of a mechanical lift raising something up. At the same time, something began to poke its head up from below the newly opened hatch as Eggman began speaking from the monitor again.

"You know, I had this whole speech planned out from the moment I conceived this trap. While Sonic was floundering over the fact this underwater facility was a deathtrap, I was gonna go over the new model of Egg Pawn with a dramatic flourish mixed in." As Eggman spoke, the thing being lifted up through the open hatch made it up halfway. From what Sorun observed, it appeared to be a Egg Pawn. A very big Egg Pawn, if the current size he saw said anything. It was painted differently, too. Primarily a dark purple color with red highlights here and there. "It was going to be this whole thing, but nooo , you wanted to get to the point, so here you are. Presenting the brand-spanking new enforcer to the Eggman Empire, blah blah blah, armored with the latest in specially-treated, composite titanium armor plating, details, details, I can't believe I put so much effort into this just for the likes of you."

The lift bringing the Badnik up finally reached its limit, and settled right into the floor with a loud, mechanical clank! Standing menacingly across from both Sorun and Rotor, grinning down at him with green lights for eyes and a sharp-toothed smile etched in Eggman's likeness, with four spikes sticking out of the rim of each of the hammer's heads for that added, menacing flair.

"Introducing, dah-dah-dah-dah, the Egg Hammer. Hurrah," Eggman introduced, sounding unenthused and almost upset. "Fresh off the assembly line and ready to pound you into oblivion."

Sorun looked the giant Badnik standing across from him up and down, finally ending with a rather unimpressed expression. "Wow, you... made an Egg Pawn bigger and gave it a hammer instead of a lance." A single Summoned Sword spawned next to Sorun. "Yeah, not really feeling the inspiration behind this one. For cryin' out loud, that hammer's just a shoddy copy of Amy's."

The Summoned Sword fired off towards the Egg Hammer's face. The Badnik, for its part, stood completely still and didn't so much as flinch when the spectral sword impacted its face. It continued to stand unflinching even as the sword shattered harmlessly against it, not leaving so much as a scratch.

Sorun blinked in surprise. "Oh, I see."

"No inspiration, eh?" Eggman said, leering down at Sorun from the monitor held above him and Rotor. "The armor plating on that bad boy is seconded only to the armor I placed on Metal Sonic. Good luck getting through that." He made a "hmph" sound while adjusting his blue spectacles. "And I'll have you know that just because that pink reprobate uses a hammer doesn't mean that she has a monopoly on the entire hammer market."

"Ah-huh." Sorun only paid half-attention to the mad Doctor as he slowly began to unsheathe Yamato. "Yeah, that's real interesting."

"What is that? That katana you keep carrying around?" A disbelieving scoff left Eggman alongside a mocking laugh. "You can't be serious! What makes you think that a flimsy little piece of forgotten eastern culture-"

A blue line appeared over the front half of the Egg Hammer's torso. Eggman stopped talking entirely, his focus shifting towards the Badnik. At the same time Sorun, holding Yamato with blue energy coursing down its blade, swung the katana through the air over and over again in the Badnik's direction. With each swing another blue line would appear somewhere on the Egg Hammer's body, and it was only when ten lines formed on its body did Sorun choose to stop and slide the Yamato back into its sheath; a small clink! was heard upon the hilt connecting to the bottom of the sheath. At the same time of the sword being fully sheathed, the Egg Hammer fell apart to pieces from the slices made throughout its entire body, the pieces clattering down onto the ground.

"Uninspired. Trash," Sorun drawled out, turning upwards towards Eggman who was gawking at the remains of the cut-apart Badnik. "You nailed it with the menacing color scheme, and the spikes were a nice touch, but man did that thing not perform well. Didn't even get a single swing in."

"What the- but- how did...?" Floundered, Eggman's face on the monitor looked back and forth between the fallen Egg Hammer and Sorun. His cheeks were slightly tinged in red, though whether it was from anger or embarrassment was unknown to Sorun, as he was too busy enjoying the look on Robotnik's face. He made an angered hum as he settled his gaze on Sorun, his head turning down slightly towards the Yamato. "So that sword of yours is no ordinary katana then..."

"I see why they call you a genius," Sorun responded. "If that's all there is, then we're taking the Emerald and leaving."

The large frown that had settled on Eggman's face deepened. He continued looking down at Sorun's sword for a few moments, and then rose his head back up towards the teen holding it. "Well, what sort of evil genius would I be without a backup plan? I wanted to reserve this for sending Sonic to a watery grave, but you and the walrus will do just as well." He reached over to the side and pressed a button just outside of the screen's view. "I'm blowing all the explosive charges I had set in the structural supports. Have fun sinking to your doom, boys!"

A sudden rumbling caused the floor Rotor and Sorun stood on to begin shaking, knocking both off balance and causing them to fall to their knees. Sorun managed to pick himself up in a kneeling position, looking up just in time to see Eggman cheekily grinning down at them and waving before the screen cut to black. He scoffed, and then looked to the side to see Rotor steadily get up to his feet.

"That maniac's trying to drop us into the trench the facility's hanging over!" the walrus exclaimed, running over to Sorun to help him up to his feet. "We got the Emerald, so we need to get back to Tails and the Sea Fox before all those support struts go!"

"I hear ya," Sorun grunted before getting tossed to the side again at the rumble of another distant explosion. He caught himself with another grunt, exhaling while standing upwards. "Times like these I really wish I figured out how to make portals with this thing..." he mumbled under his breath, thumb running across Yamato's sheath as he looked towards the back of the atrium. "Alright, we just gotta double back and- ah, of course..."

The doors to the back end of the atrium Rotor and Sorun had entered began opening, and pouring out from the small opening was a stream of dozens of Egg Pawns, all running towards the pair with their lances pointed forwards. Sorun clicked his teeth in frustration at the sight, pulling Yamato out from its sheath once more as blue energy began coalescing around the katana's blade. He swung the sword in a wide arc, a blue line running through the torsos of a number of Egg Pawns that had been in the front row of the group charging both him and Rotor. They fell down in their respective halves, Sorun turning back towards Rotor and yelling, "Rotor, c'mon, we gotta go!"

"Don't gotta tell me twice!"

Rotor and Sorun both took off in a run towards the group of Badniks approaching them, Sorun continually swinging his sword to cut them apart the closer they got. It was just when they reached the group that Sorun had cut apart the last Badnik, though when the pair of Freedom Fighters ran past the group another explosion rocked the facility and caused them to become off-balance. They caught themselves easily enough and dove past the doorway, and then pressed themselves against one of the hallway's walls as the floor beneath them, as well as the walls and ceiling, leaned a bit too far to the left before settling back into their proper position.

Keeping one hand on the wall while the other hand remained gripped around the Emerald, Rotor faced Sorun and asked, "Why weren't you doing that thing with your sword earlier!?"

"'Cause... 'cause that really takes a lot out of me," Sorun panted out. His entire form had become slightly hunched in exhaustion, making Rotor's eyes widen slightly in concern, though Sorun managed to find the energy to push off the wall and point down the hallway. "Let's go."

"Yeah." Rotor nodded in agreement, and with that they both turned down the hallway and began running forwards. "Hey, we don't have time to sneak around!" Rotor shouted over their running. "Are you gonna be good to fight anything else before we get back to Tails!?"

"I'll be fine!" Sorun shouted back. Left unsaid were the concerns Sorun had that he, in fact, wouldn't have the energy to cut down any Badniks in their way and make it all the way back to Tails, but the impending doom of sinking down to the bottom of an ocean chasm was keeping him going. For now, at least. He'd have to hope it was enough to make it to Tails. "Let's just focus on making it back, alright!?"

Little more was said between the two as they continued winding their way through the myriad hallways on their way back to Tails and the submarine. Rotor stayed ahead of Sorun and had been leading them down the facility, having still memorized the general layout from that computer he'd hacked earlier. Sorun had been forced to cut down any Badniks that had just happened to be in their way, and with every single time he used Yamato to dispatch a robot he felt his strength going weaker.

The doors were a problem, too. Whether it was a security measure due to the Emerald being taken or due to the self destruct sequence Eggman triggered, all the doors they'd previously passed that had been unlocked were now locked, or even worse giant bulkhead doors comprised of thick steel had slammed down from the ceiling in the middle of some hallways to block their way back to Tails.

Probably as a way to stall them or keep them trapped, but seeing as Sorun had the Yamato, they were able to simple cut their way past any and all doors. It was taking a heavier and heavier toll on Sorun every time, however, and he simply didn't know how much longer he could keep going at this pace.

He tried to stay at a constant pace behind Rotor between all the running, the robots, and the doors. The constant explosions heard in the distance and the floor beneath them shaking was a good motivator to keep going forwards, but even that was beginning to lose its effect. It was when he'd just cut a triangular hole through another bulkhead door that had slammed down in their way that he was really beginning to feel the fatigue beginning to wrack his body. Rotor had ran on ahead a little bit while Sorun had lagged behind, holding a hand against the wall for support as he walked forwards.

"Huh? Hey, Sorun!" Rotor, still a little bit ahead of Sorun, had turned around looked towards Sorun. Intense worry was written all across his face. "You doing okay!?"

"Y-yeah," he called back in a low voice, turning his head back towards the opposite end of the hallway when he felt two streams of warm fluid begin to run down his nose. "Just... just gimme a few-egh!"

Another explosion rocked through the facility, throwing Sorun off balance and making his entire side slam into the wall. No sooner had his body made contact with the cold metal did his ears pick up the sound of something extremely alarming: the sound of rushing water. He looked forwards towards the hole he'd cut through the door, his eyes widening when he saw a torrent of sea water rush in from down the hallway and towards him.

There hadn't been any time to dodge the water, and even if there had been, he wouldn't have had the energy to do so. He was washed right off his feet and carried down towards the end of the hallway where Rotor was, only stopping when he'd been carried right into another wall. Multiple spluttering sounds came from Sorun as he spat out the seawater that had wound up in his mouth, who then proceeded to wipe away any excess water as he began to shakily stand up to his feet.

"Well, at least the oil problem's taken care of... mostly." Legs quavering in exhaustion, Sorun managed to make it halfway up towards a standing position despite the water rushing up against his ankles. He only made it that far, though, as his legs buckled right after and caused him to crash back down to the sitting position. "Agh, gimme a break here..."

He was about to make another attempt at getting up to his feet when he felt something roughly tug on his arm and pull him upwards. He managed to catch out from the corner of his eye that it was Rotor who, with some difficulty due to the height advantage he had over Sorun, slung the human's arm over his shoulder to support him.

"You're a real handful, you know that?" Rotor grunted as he and Sorun hobbled forwards, doing their best to push through the ankle-deep water that was rushing past them. "I didn't know your powers wore you out that bad."

"I haven't really had them long enough to acclimate to them," Sorun lied, speaking between heavy breaths as he and Rotor continued pushing forwards. While he was speaking, a random Egg Pawn had rounded a nearby corner and had turned right towards them. It fell down onto its back when a Summoned Sword found itself going through its face. "Just... just keep me going like this."

"Yeah. Yeah, don't worry. It's just a bit further," Rotor grunted out, pushing them both along further and further down the facility.

After that it had been more moving. More robots skewered by Summoned Swords and the occasional door that needed cutting. Sorun had seen it as a good sign when they passed that security room they'd ran into earlier, and eventually after that Sorun began to actually recognize some of the hallways they were passing through.

They were getting closer to Tails, which was a good thing. Not so good was the fact the water had risen from around Sorun's ankles to his knees. Even worse was that the edges of his vision was turning black from his waning strength. But they were almost there. Rotor made fit to keep reminding him and encouraging him, to help him fight through all the exhaustion until they made it back to Tails.

"Alright, Sorun. We're almost there." The both of them had passed another corner, and Sorun had groaned out in dismay when he saw yet another bulkhead door in their path. "I think I remember this hallway," Rotor continued as they stopped right in front of the door. "We just gotta cut through this last door and we're home free, okay?"

With a groan, Sorun removed himself from Rotor and took a few steps away from the walrus. Rotor looked towards him expectantly, though his features turned confused when he saw Sorun shaking his head. He immediately saw why when the human teen lifted up Yamato- half of the blade was gone while the remainder was completely cracked and crumbling away. "Yeah, about that..." Sorun mumbled out, dropping the sword as it finally disintegrated in a cloud of black and blue ash.

"Ugh! Okay, okay, it's not a problem." Rotor quickly patted Sorun on the shoulder, and then made his way towards the side of the bulkhead door. There was a small panel where Rotor had stopped in front of, which the walrus proceeded to crouch down in front of and begin removed using a tool procured from the belt wrapped around his waist. "Look, I'll get this thing open. Just watch our backs, okay?"

Sorun, lacking the energy to respond, simply turned around to the opposite end of the hallway to watch out for anything dangerous as Rotor got to to work. There was the occasional Egg Pawn that wandered into the hall, though it was quickly destroyed from a quickly-fired Summoned Sword from Sorun. He was having a hard time creating even those, though. Each new sword he manifested was more cracked and broken than the last, and he was finding it difficult to keep his eyes open just to stay awake.

"Hurry it up, Rotor," an exhausted Sorun thought as he mentally threw another Summoned Sword at an approaching Badnik, adding to the pile of fallen robots at the end of the hall. "I don't have much more time here."

He didn't think he could make any more Summoned Swords after that last one. He was barely standing on his feet as it was, and his thoughts were becoming muddled in the exhaustion. He felt his eyes widen just the barest amount when he heard a loud, clanking noise behind him, and turned around just in time to see the bulkhead door having risen up. It only went up about a quarter of the way, though, and he saw that Rotor had stepped away from the console he'd been messing with and turned towards Sorun.

"Sorun," he began, "the door's stuck on something. Think you can-?"

With a groan of sheer effort, Sorun manifested a barely-visible, flickering Bringer Claw that slowly reached forwards and gripped the underside of the door. It managed to raise it halfway up before Sorun's power gave out entirely, causing the spectral arm to disappear and Sorun to stumble forwards as he lost his footing. He was fortunately caught by Rotor, who was forced to all but drag Sorun under the door and through the hallway.

By that point Sorun had been fading in and out of consciousness from his weariness. He did manage to make out the doorway he'd cut out at the very beginning, when they'd first entered the facility. He managed to make out the wide, circular room with the moonpool in the middle, and to his eternal gratitude he saw that Tails' submarine and the fox himself was still there. Due to his exhaustion his vision was slightly blurred and it was difficult to make out any hard details, but he saw enough to tell the fox was there. Even his hearing was spotty, as he managed to hear Rotor and Tails shout at each other but hadn't managed to make out the words they said.

The distant explosions combined with whatever it was that Rotor had said must have made clear the urgency of the situation, though, as Sorun managed to make out Tails hopping into the submarine's main body along with the distant-sounding hum of the Sea Fox starting to life. Rotor had helped Sorun into the sidecar-like vessel attached to the sub's side, the human being able to do nothing more than limply sit back as the glass dome closed in overhead and sealed Sorun inside the pod. He assumed Rotor had managed to get into his own sidecar as well, as not long after the submarine dipped below the surface of the moonpool.

Past the fogginess of his vison Sorun saw the whiteness of water foaming and rushing past the small vehicle he was sealed in before it soon gave away to the clear, dark blue surroundings of the deep ocean all around them. He saw the submarine immediately turn around and begin driving in the opposite direction of the facility, though Sorun found himself turning around in his seat for little more than an urge to see the facility he and Rotor had just narrowly avoided dying inside of.

It was still there when he turned around, albeit slowly shrinking away due to the growing distance between it and the Sea Fox. He saw one more explosion go off near its side, at the final support strut that hadn't been completely blown away from the previous explosions. That final strut being destroyed marked the end of it, as no sooner had the strut had given out than Sorun was forced to watch as the facility fell downwards into the deep sea trench below. He breathed out a sigh of both relief and exhaustion as he saw the metal facility disappear into the chasm's blackness, sitting back forwards towards the ocean view as Tails drove them away from the devastation.

He was only able to take in the grand sight of the ocean for a few seconds before finally passing out.

A/N- It's gag curse part deux, because this thing is proving to be a constant source of consternation for me.

I got asked if Sorun could use Yamato to separate himself from the gag curse. Short answer: yes, he could. He hasn't because of two reasons:

One- The gag curse is less of a restriction at this point and more like a safety net in case Sorun messes up and says something he isn't supposed to. Even though he's completely on board with the whole thing he still slips up every now and then, as evidenced last chapter when he was talking with Sally. He hates it more for the principle of what it represents over its actual function.

Two- Sorun literally never thought to do it. I was gonna go into that, like, way later, but there.

To be honest there's... a lot Sorun's Yamato can do. Enough that I had to restrict almost all of its abilities behind Sorun not knowing how it works, because if I didn't and he got all of its abilities on the get-go the story would have ended right there. And not in a good way. So it's all locked behind Sorun's inability to figure out how it works, hence him slowly working it out over the course of the story.

As for the curse not working around Merlin, chalk it up to it not proccing near Neo-Watchers and Sorun's wording and intent not being specific enough to trigger it.

And lastly, regarding Silver, who I made a reference to in a previous A/N over Virgil's name, here is all the information I am willing to give on the subject matter of that specific character in regards to whether or not he has a presence in this story and to what that presence exactly entails:

¯_( )_/¯

Chapter 32

Recursion Error

Episode 32- Trickster

Egg.

The very meaning of that one, singular word had changed a lot for Sorun over the course of his stay on Mobius. Before on his life on Earth it hadn't meant much to him. Personally, he never really liked the taste of the things. Baking with them was one thing, but eating them raw or scrambled or any other variation? He just couldn't do it. So his opinion on eggs was already low to begin with.

And then Mobius happened, and along with that came Eggman, and from then on the word was completely ruined for him. He couldn't even see an egg the same way ever again, internally cringing if he so much as caught sight of an egg while raiding Sonic's fridge. So that was two foods ruined for him forever: juice and eggs.

Breakfast would just never be the same.

But now he was here, sitting down on the Freedom HQ's couch with such a thing resting in his hands. An egg. Not a normal, garden-variety egg one would eat or bake with. No, this was a larger egg that just barely fit in Sorun's hands. A light blue egg with its tip being colored a yellow color.

Apparently this egg was Virgil.

It was right after the underwater mission, where Sorun and Rotor had acquired the fourth Chaos Emerald. Sorun had been asleep in the submarine for most of the ride back, only awaking when they'd made it to land and had to walk to Tails' plane to make it back to Knothole. The flight back, for the most part, had been uneventful.

They'd made it to Knothole's hangar, parked the plane, and the three had proceeded to make some idle chat as they walked back towards Freedom HQ, where Sorun planned on calmly sitting down, taking in the fourth Emerald, and then deal with whatever came next.

He walked into the Freedom HQ seeing Sonic with Virgil in egg form. Thus he was here.

"... I gave you one job." Sorun looked from the egg resting in his hands to the hedgehog sitting on the couch next to him. On any other day Sorun would have relished the extremely nervous smile Sonic had. The way the muscles around his mouth and eyes were tightened in worry and the way sweat was beading down his face and arms. But right now Sorun just couldn't find it in himself to look past the fact his pet had turned into an egg under Sonic's watch. "It was a simple thing. I left my pet Chao with you while I went on the big, scary mission under the sea, and when I came back I expected to find Virgil safe and sound. What I got was an egg." He lowered the egg into his lap, sighed, and affixed Sonic with a deadpan stare. "Dude. What happened?"

"So, uh, listen, Sorun," Sonic began, holding his hands up in an effort to try and placate Sorun, "Chao, they, they do this kind of thing all the time, you know? It's a natural part of their life cycle-"

"What the hedgehog is neglecting to mention is that he took his eyes off of your Chao for a time because he attempted to challenge me to a race out of boredom."

Slowly, Sorun's eyes drifted away from Sonic towards the far end of the wall of the HQ. He saw Shadow's black and red form leaning against the wall, arms crossed as he sent an admonishing glare towards the blue hedgehog. Sorun slowly looked back towards Sonic, who looked increasingly nervous under both Shadow's and Sorun's scrutiny.

"Is this true?" Sorun asked in a level tone.

"Well... yeah," Sonic hesitantly answered, giving Sorun a shaky nod, "but I was only gone a few minutes! How was I supposed to know I'd come back to an egg!? He was completely fine when I left him alone!"

Sorun listened closely to Sonic, and then took a slow, deep breath. He exhaled, eyes falling down to the egg in his lap, and without taking his eyes off of it he said, "Sonic, I'm not sure what I'm supposed to do."

"It's fine, bud, it's a natural thing for Chao. Virgil'll just hatch and-"

"No, I mean with you," Sorun interrupted. "I don't know how I'm supposed to punish you for this."

"... You know this isn't actually my fault, right?"

"Yeah, but from where I'm sitting it really doesn't look like that." The human teen sighed and began to idly tap at the egg. "They do this when they reach the end of their lifespan so they can 'evolve' or something along those lines, right?"

"Something like that. I've only ever seen it happen once, back when me, Knux and Tails ran into that one Chao Garden," Sonic helpfully added as he shuffled closer to Sorun. "I think they do this thing where they evolve to be like whoever raises them, though. That's how it worked for us. They, er... the little fellas really like to emulate things."

"Hmm. So what you're saying is that you don't have a clue what's gonna happen."

Sonic started in his seat, and then gave Sorun a sheepish grin. "Sorry, pal, nobody really knows a whole lot about them. Didn't you say you checked a book or something out?"

"Yeah, but it didn't really- oh my god I forgot to get that book back to the library ," he whispered under his breath. He'd been so preoccupied with everything else over all these weeks that it'd slipped his mind. Come to think of it he didn't even remember reading the full thing in its entirety now that he really thought about it. He hoped library late fees weren't a thing here. Or that the librarian would be too upset at him. He didn't even remember where he left that book, maybe somewhere in Sonic's room...

He shook those thoughts from his head. He was less concerned over an ornery librarian and more concerned over the egg that was sitting in his lap right now. Chao went through cycles like this all the time where they'd reach the end of a 'lifespan', turn into an egg, and hatch out from that egg. Sometimes it was the same Chao as last time, sometimes they evolved into a different and unique Chao, sometimes the egg turned gray and that marked their final life and permanent death.

Well, the egg hadn't turned gray, so there was at least one positive about this. Virgil wasn't dying, just... doing something else. The book and any other details he'd managed to get from people on the exact mechanics and functions of Chao evolution were rather vague. Sonic was right in that they did evolve in some semblance of whoever it was that cared for them since they were really emulative like that, but on the other hand there were apparently some cases of Chao evolving on their own without the need of a caretaker. And yet, in those same circumstances, they usually didn't evolve and just reincarnated as a normal Chao again. Or died.

In essence, the Chao did what they wanted. Maybe there were a myriad of other factors and variables Sorun and anybody else who made a study on the topic were neglecting concerning their evolution, but the fact was he had a Chao egg in his lap right now that was gonna hatch into something. Sonic personally attested to having a Chao evolve in his visage at one point, so he had that much to go off of. Maybe the same was going to happen to Virgil.

That still left the question of just what Virgil would evolve into, but Sorun would save those concerns until the actual hatching.

"Hey, guys." Sorun's attention shifted from the egg towards the side of the couch. He saw Tails and Rotor walk into his view, the former having been the one that addressed them while the latter was still holding onto the purple Emerald. "No change with Virgil, huh?" Tails asked, looking towards Sorun.

"Yes, Virgil's still an egg. No, Sonic's not getting out of me putting something weird in his gloves when he goes to sleep tonight." Sorun cast his eyes back on the egg, pretending not to notice the affronted look Sonic sent him. "You won't know which pair it'll be, either. You'll wake up one morning to put on a pair of gloves and then bam !"

"I think you're being way too serious about this," Sonic muttered under his breath.

Sorun's eyes flicked over to the hedgehog. "And I think the next time I ask you to look after Virgil while I'm gone getting stabbed at-"

The egg moved.

His mouth snapping shut, Sorun's head turned so quickly towards the egg that his neck had made a slight cracking sound. Everybody else leaned in closer as well as the egg jumped in Sorun's lap slightly, with some light cracks appearing on the shell afterwards. At one point Sorun had hesitantly raised a finger to poke at the egg, but then Sonic had reached over and slapped him on the shoulder while shaking his head, causing him to lower it back to his side.

And then something burst out of the side of the egg. A small, sharpened appendage of sorts that made Sonic, Tails, and Rotor recoil back in shock, caused Shadow to widen his eyes in slight surprise, and had Sorun tilting his head to the side in curiosity. The appendage continued to cut and slice away at the egg shell containing it, and slowly the small figure resting inside of the egg was revealed to those that were watching.

The thing that was inside of the egg had the same general shape as a Chao, but that was where the similarities ended. The blue coloring had darkened from a light to a dark shade of blue, and the yellow tips on his hands and feet had completely darkened to a black color. And on the back of each of his small arm appendages was a black, blade-like claw that curved up the arm, the tip of the two blades extending past his shoulders.

The strangest change was with the Chao's head. Virgil had blinked his eyes open, deep blue eyes looking straight into Sorun's. His teeth had become sharpened, and the yellow dot and teardrop-shape on the top of his head was gone completely. In place of that was a... silver crest of sorts sitting on top of Virgil's head. A crest in the form of two cylindrical horns jutting out of his head, both with flat tops and pointed diagonally in opposite directions.

"... Huh." That was the only response Sorun could find in himself to say as he reached forwards and tapped Virgil on his face. To his surprise, the Chao actually scowled and tried batting his finger away, Sorun just barely moving his hand out of the way before one of his two bladed arms cut him. "That weird silver horn-crest thing on his head... it's the same thing Vergil from the 'DMC' games had. His Devil Trigger had those horns," Sorun realized. "How the hell did that happen? I get my powers came from my subconscious and memory, but... but how'd he...?" He looked to one of his hands, and then back to the Chao. "Man. Chao sure are freaky."

He'd never even pretend to know how it was that Virgil's body managed to evolve to form into some kind of... mock imitation of his game counterpart's transformation. That book had said something about their species being natural conductors for Chaos energy, so Sorun suspected there was something there to that. Maybe being around Sorun and his powers had influenced it in some way? He didn't know at all. Nothing concerning Chaos energy was never straight.

Well, strange or not, he'd admit one thing: it was a good look for the Chao. Way better than how he previously looked in Sorun's opinion.

"Um..." That unsure hum had come from Sonic, which drew both Sorun's and Virgil's attention. The blue hedgehog was staring down at the Chao, eyes half-lidded and mouth held in a hesitant grimace. "Sorun, uh... don't you think that's kinda... too scary a transformation for a Chao...?"

"What are you talking about? He looks cool," Sorun defended. Sonic looked back towards Sorun in shock, and Virgil looked up at him with an almost... pleased expression on his face. "Look, he's got the two little swords on his arms and the cool silver horns. And... hey, look at that! His wings!"

He'd only noticed it when Virgil suddenly flexed the appendages on his back. The first thing Sorun noted was how they looked: where they were once small, pink, heart-shaped insect wings, now they were a solid blue appendage sharpened to look like a reptilian's wing, with a split near their tops to give the wings two tips. The second thing he noticed was that there were two wings on either side of his back, even the right side, which had previously lacked a wing due to Virgil's previous wound.

Virgil looked towards his back, his two split wings experimentally flapping. They beat down on Sorun's lap, the human chuckling slightly when the Chao's body was raised into the air where he then proceeded to float directly in front of the teen's face with a blank, almost bored expression.

"So your wing grew back when you evolved? Or it was replaced with the other one? Something like that?" Sorun guessed, tilting his head to the side a bit to get a better look at his back.

"Chao." Even Virgil's voice had changed. It was a noticeable few octaves deeper. Not too deeper- it was less the high-pitched voice it had been and now more a deeper, boyish voice, but it still hit differently for Sorun compared to how he used to sound. "Chao-chao."

"Oh. Huh." He still couldn't understand what he was saying, but he couldn't help but note how... dismissive the Chao's tone was now. Almost haughty in a way. "Well... I'm glad you got your wing back, buddy." He reached a single finger forwards to rub at the top of the floating Chao's head. Virgil stiffened up and flinched at the touch, but still allowed Sorun to rub at the spot between his silver horns.

He really was glad he had his flight back, too. It always bugged Sorun that Virgil had to live with a crippling injury and had to be carried around everywhere. Maybe now the little guy could finally get some freedom back, maybe even feed himself now, but really he was happy with Virgil's transformation as a whole. Sorun couldn't put a finger on why. It just... seemed fitting to him.

"Well, he looks kinda weird, but as long as he's happy with it I'm happy with it," Sonic voiced. He grinned a little at the floating Chao, and then leaned forwards while reaching a hand out towards him. "C'mere, Virgil, let me get some head rubs in, too."

Sonic's finger had made it within about an inch of Virgil before the Chao's head snapped down towards the appendage reaching towards him. Without a single sound, the Chao sliced one of his bladed arms in the direction of the finger before going to float over Sorun's shoulder. Sonic reflexively recoiled his hand at the strike, gripping his wrist while staring up at the Chao with shocked eyes.

"What the!?" He looked down at his finger, his eyes widening dramatically when he saw that the finger of the glove he'd extended towards Virgil had a long cut in it. The finger below was completely unharmed, but nevertheless the glove had been cut. "H-he cut me!" Sonic sputtered out as he pointed towards the Chao.

The Chao looked down towards Sonic, and then, in a seemingly disdainful tone of voice, said, "Chao."

Sorun, for his part, began to uncontrollably chuckle at the small feeling of pride going through him as he looked up at Virgil. "Oh, man, that was pretty good."

"Pretty good!? He picked up all your bad habits!" Sonic hotly claimed.

"You mean he picked up all my good habits," Sorun denied, reaching up to briefly rub the top of the Chao's head again. Sonic had an almost betrayed look on his face when he saw that the Chao let Sorun touch him without so much as raising an arm up in defense. "Good Chao. Gooood Chao..."

"Chao-chao." It seemed that Virgil reached the limit of how much embarrassment it was willing to endure, as he carefully batted Sorun's finger away with his arms while taking care not to cut him with the bladed ends. Sonic continued staring up at the Chao, and then began grumbling under his breath as he turned away to look at his cut glove. He noted from the corner of his eye that the Chao was seemingly smugly grinning down at him, which only made his angered mutters increase in volume.

"Well, I'm happy your pet Chao's all better now! Even he's a bit, well, spooky-looking." This came from Tails, who slowly began shuffling towards Sorun as he reached a hand out. "Hey, you think he would mind if I-?" He stopped when Virgil's head snapped towards him, the Chao's eyes narrowing as a frown settled on his face. Tails began to back up, nervously muttering, "O-okay, uh, nevermind. I'll just, er, be over here..."

Virgil huffed, his expression turning back to normal as he shifted his gaze from Tails to Rotor, who looked towards the Chao with an unsure look. He gave the purple walrus a dismissive look and then looked towards Shadow. The dark hedgehog met Virgil's gaze in a mostly calm, inquisitive manner, though he looked mildly surprised when the Chao gave him a small, barely-perceptible nod of respect in return. It came as such an unexpected motion to Shadow that he had no time to formulate a response before the Chao looked back forwards.

Sorun watched the entire display silently, chuckling under his breath after seeing the Chao nod at Shadow before finally settling to lean back in the couch. "Well, I say this counts as a successful day. Virgil got a makeover and his wing back, and we survived another mission and certain doom yet again. And it's not even evening yet."

"Uh, yeah. Great day all around," Rotor said. "So do you want this Chaos Emerald we survived certain doom for, Sorun?"

Blue eyes snapping open, Sorun looked towards the taller Mobian, and then down at the gem in his hands. "Oh, yeah! Can't believe I almost forgot that. Yeah, give it here."

Shrugging, Rotor tossed the Emerald through the air and towards Sorun. The human caught the Emerald with both of his hands, wincing slightly when he felt the Emerald affix itself to his hands and sighing out deeply when he saw arcs of purple energy begin to crackle around his hands. He sat back in the couch, breathing out slowly to prepare himself for what was inevitably about to happen.

He continued to stare down at the purple Emerald for a bit, and then looked up at those surrounding him. Rotor and Tails were both giving him reassuring smiles, and when he looked to the side he saw that Sonic was doing the same thing, even going as far as to give him two thumbs-ups. Shadow, inversely, only continued to look at Sorun with that perpetual scowl of his, though he did afford the human a slight nod of encouragement.

A small scoff, followed by the barest of smiles, found its way onto Sorun's lips right before his entire body began convulsing. He felt his muscles cry out in pain and felt a deep pain lance through his body, but compared to the other three times he'd done this... this time was almost mild in comparison. He was even able to keep his eyes open and look down as the Emerald continued to run its power through his body, and instead of having a pained grimace on his face it was more of a curious, questioning look.

It must still have at least looked like it hurt, though, as from the corner of his eyes he saw almost everybody save for Shadow wincing towards him in sympathy. At this point seeing as the pain was at a more than tolerable level, Sorun didn't feel it was necessary. It still felt nice, though, to be considered in such a way by them. And it made going through the whole process that much easier, even if it was already bearable.

He watched as the purple gem in his hand slowly began to dissolve and disintegrate into particles of purple energy that was soon enough siphoned off into his arms. He saw the veins on his limbs briefly glow purple, shift into a blue color, and then dim entirely. All the glowing and electricity arcing around him ended, and with a heavy breath Sorun slumped right into the couch.

A few moments passed where everybody stared towards Sorun's body with bated breath, Virgil in particular hovering close nearby while looking down towards him. Sorun's body suddenly twitched, startling everybody else and causing them to lean back slightly. The teen slowly groaned as he sat up a bit straighter, smoke still roiling off of his form as he began leaning his neck back and forth.

"Yeah, that'll wake you up in the morning. Or put you to sleep at night. Can't even tell anymore," Sorun mumbled under his breath as he began winding his left shoulder. "Man..."

"You okay, Sorun?" Sonic asked, blinking towards Sorun in concern.

"By some definition of the word, yeah." Wincing, Sorun stopped winding his shoulder and held his right hand out in front of his face.

Sonic's features relaxed slightly in relief. "Oh, great. So, uh... what'd ya get?"

"Well, I'm not feeling scaly, so I can tell you what I didn't get." He began flexing his hand as a disgruntled look crossed Sorun's face. "I swear, I ask for one specific power and they won't give it to me..."

"Um... what?" Sonic asked, face scrunching in confusion.

Sorun glanced up to the blue hedgehog, and then shook his head. "It's nothing. I was just wondering-"

He vanished mid-sentence.

It had happened so suddenly that there had been no reaction at first, as everybody watching needed to take a few seconds to process what had just happened: Sorun, right in the middle of talking, had completely disappeared in a small cloud of black and blue vapors that disappeared just as quickly. Sonic and Tails had actually jumped up in surprise when it finally registered that the human teen sitting on the couch in front of them had just vanished into thin air, while everyone else was staring at the spot with widened eyes.

A loud bang, followed by a quiet groan, was heard at the other end of the room. All eyes were drawn towards the source of the noise, where it was seen that Sorun was lying flat on the ground in front of a wall, holding both hands against his face. He slowly sat up in a sitting position, shaking his head while looking up at the wall.

"Tricking. I got Tricking," Sorun groaned out as he rubbed at his nose. "Slammed my face on the stupid-"

Once again, Sorun disappeared, only to then reappear slamming into another wall on the opposite side of the room. He groaned out loud as he slid down the wall, though he wasn't even able to hit the ground before disappearing and reappearing on another side of the room in the same instance.

Five sets of eyes slowly tracked Sorun as he teleported all around the room, slamming into a wall or the odd piece of furniture as he uncontrollably and sporadically appeared all over. A chair and a nearby lamp had been toppled over in his relentless teleporting, and at one point he'd teleported all the way up to the ceiling, yelling out as his body spun uncontrollably in its fall only to impact the ground. He finally ended it by teleporting once again, sliding face-first against the ground right at Shadow's feet.

The darkened hedgehog looked downwards, giving the downward-facing human a blank look while also taking a step back. Sorun, feeling multiple pains across his body from the multiple times he impacted against some surface, groaned out, "Shadow, how does this work?"

"You're asking me?" Shadow asked, face morphing into one of incredulity. "You're usually able to figure these things out fine enough on your own."

"No, dude, you don't understand. This is really hard." Sorun slowly got up onto his knees, grimacing slightly while holding a hand to his side. "Like, like I just keep zipping around everywhere and I- ah!" He teleported again, though this time he remained in the same position on his knees while only having teleported a few inches forwards. "Okay, I... I think I'm gettin' it down... man, that's a weird feeling."

"Are you okay to stand?"

"Er... yeah..." He sounded unsure of himself, though nonetheless Sorun managed to get up onto his feet, stumbling slightly but managing to catch himself before falling fully. "You can teleport, right? Can you help me out with this?" Sorun asked, looking back up to Shadow. "'Cause this is kinda tricky to get the hang of, I can't... this's just so weird."

Shadow hummed, looking Sorun's body up and down with his eyes narrowed in concentration. The look was enough to get Sorun to wonder what it was he was thinking of, but before he had too much time to ponder on this Shadow nodded his head. "I suppose it can't be avoided. Not like anybody else here is a better instructor on the subject." He went as far as the glance to the side towards Sonic, who was still sitting on the couch in the center of the room. Sorun could have sworn he'd heard some edge of superiority edged in that last sentence that somehow went with that look he was sending Sonic.

The blue hedgehog's mature response was to stick his tongue out at Shadow, who scoffed and rolled his eyes at the ceiling at the sight. Sorun stared in confusion between the two, and from the side he could see both Tails and Rotor palming their faces at the sight of the two hedgehogs' antics. Virgil just continued to hover in place, looking just as confused as Sorun looked.

"Okay, uh... yeah." Shaking his head, Sorun turned towards Sonic. "Hey, so uh, I'm gonna go with Shadow to try and work this teleport thing out. That alright?"

Sonic waved a hand to the side, calling out, "Yeah, sure, if you're feeling alright after all that go ahead. Have fun hanging out with the grouch over there."

"Don't mind him. He's just upset that you keep turning to me for help with your powers since I'm the only one here qualified to do so," Shadow said, maintaining his glare towards Sonic who was doing the same. Sorun looked back and forth between the two again, and after a few moments of this behavior continuing he decided to step in.

"And I deeply appreciate you taking the time to do so, now can we please go?" Sorun asked, leaning his body between the two hedgehogs while looking towards Shadow.

"Hmph. Of course." Casting one final glance towards Sonic, Shadow huffed and turned towards the stairs. "We'll go to the usual spot."

"Sounds good." Sorun looked back and nodded his head towards Virgil, with the Chao immediately flying over to hover next to Sorun's left shoulder. Satisfied, Sorun turned back around towards Shadow's back and began following him to the stairs that lead up and out of the HQ.

For some reason, though, Shadow stopped right at the base of the stairs. Sorun had stopped right behind him and looked on in confusion, but when he looked towards the stairs he understood why the hedgehog had stopped: somebody else was already coming down the stairs. And Sorun only needed a few seconds' glance at her legs to tell it was Sally.

"Hm? Oh, hey guys." Sally had stopped in surprise at seeing all the people in the HQ after descending the stairs, but then relaxed immediately upon seeing all their faces and even gave a small wave. Her eyes turned towards Sorun, at which point she lit up a bit and said, "Oh, Sorun, you and the others are back from that mission. I trust it went well?"

"About as well as it could have gone," Sorun answered with a nod. "Even managed to get an Emerald. Shadow's helping me out with some difficulties I have right now, but it's not an issue."

Sally nodded. "Alright, well I'm glad to... hear..." Her eyes slowly looked upwards, her voice trailing off when she saw the floating, split-winged and horned Chao hovering right next to him. She continued to silently stare at him, and then slowly lifted a finger up to point at Virgil. "Is that...?"

Sorun looked up to the Chao. "Oh, yeah, that's Virgil," he answered, turning back to Sally. "He did his weird egg-evolution thing and turned out like that. Guess his wing grew back, too."

"Ah, I understand. I'm happy to see he's all better now!" She sent a bright smile up at the Chao, and Sorun, with some amusement, noticed the way Virgil had crossed his short limbs while turning his head away, almost as if he was embarrassed at the attention. Sally giggled at the action and looked back towards Sorun. "Well, I won't stay in your hair any longer than needed. Oh, but one more thing."

"Mm?" Sorun gave her a questioning hum, but then instantly grew still when he saw her reaching into her vest.

"Nicole wasn't doing much and kept asking me when you'd be back from the mission you, Rotor, and Tails went on," she explained, brining out the handheld computer from a pocket inside of her vest.

"Getting a Chaos Emerald from Eggman is a big accomplishment, so I don't see any reason why you two can't take some time to-"

"Can't."

Sally froze at the interruption, and then gave Sorun a wide-eyed look when she realized what he'd just said. She was right in the middle of making the motion to hand him Nicole, too, though after hearing him speak she pulled her back a bit. "What?" she asked, almost as if to see if she'd heard right.

"Can't," Sorun repeated, eyes locked right on the handheld. "I'm doing the thing with Shadow right now."

"O... kay, but right after you can-"

"Can't." For some reason Sorun couldn't keep his eyes off of the computer that was being held in Sally's hand. Nicole's body. He'd felt his heart begin to beat heavily in his chest the moment he saw her, and in truth he desperately wanted to grab her from Sally. He couldn't, though. He just couldn't. "Shadow, let's go," Sorun quickly muttered, walking right past a stunned Sally and going straight for the stairs.

There wasn't anything said between any of the Mobians as they watched the human quickly storm up the stairs, his pet Chao following closely behind. Shadow had cast a single, curious glance towards Sally's way, but in the end this look had only lasted a second before he headed for the stairs following Sorun.

"Um..." It was the only response Sally, still staring up after where the human had gone up the stairs and out of sight, could form. She shook herself out of her stupor moments later, and then glanced down at the computer held in her hand. "Er, Nicole, I'm sure Sorun's just busy with something. Nicole?"

The computer didn't respond to her. In fact, the green screen on the top part of the handheld went completely dark, forcing Sally to sigh out and close the computer completely and then place it back into her vest. She then looked towards the other three in the room, who looked just as equally surprised and confused as she did.

"What was up with that?" Sonic was the first to speak, an eye ridge furrowed in confusion as he gestured towards the stairs. "Sorun always jumps at the opportunity to hang out with Nicole."

"I'm just as confused as you are, Sonic," Sally admitted with a shake of her head. Ever since they'd gotten to know one another Sorun never, ever turned down an opportunity to do something with Nicole, especially as of late. It went both ways, too; Sally couldn't recall a time where Nicole had said no to hanging out with Sorun without good reason whenever he asked, and being the good friend she was, of course she'd lent him Nicole whenever the time allowed it.

It was just supposed to be something to motivate Sorun at first. There was precious little else Sorun enjoyed doing, and sometimes it seemed like to Sally the mere prospect of doing something as simple as playing a game or talking with the AI was what got him out of bed. And she'd noticed he'd begun to become more proactive over time, probably as a result of it, so she'd been subtly shifting tasks around from time to time to make it so their free time lined up more and more with each others'.

For the most part, it had seemed to be a big success. Mentally speaking Sorun had been improving a considerable amount over time, especially after him accepting he was here to stay on Mobius and his continued sessions with Nicole. He'd even gone so far as to start volunteering for missions, which, if someone had told her the human would take on such initiative for the Freedom Fighters, she wouldn't have believed it. But he had, and he'd been getting good results. And these days she didn't even need to shift the schedules around anymore- Nicole made her own free time by moving her own work timetables around directly than Sally having to ask for her. Their interactions seemed to be doing them both some good, because while it was almost too subtle for her to tell, Sally still noticed that in the last month Nicole had become somewhat more productive in her own personal tasks.

But beyond all that, more than just helping each other improve they seemed to both be happy with the arrangement they'd made between themselves. So seeing Sorun straight-out turn down Sally's offer to lend him Nicole for a bit like that had her floored. He never did that. By all logic he shouldn't have done that. His behavior just seemed bizarre to her.

"Sorun did... act kind of off during the mission." Rotor's voice drew the attention of everyone present, causing three sets of eyes to focus over in his direction. "He just... I don't want to say he spaced out, but... I don't know. He just acted a bit weird," the walrus clarified with a shake of his head.

"Maybe all these missions he's been going on is taking a toll on him," Sonic suggested, shrugging his shoulders. "He's been doing a ton of them lately, so it'd be no wonder if he's a bit worn out. Guy's bound to act a little wonky if that's the case."

Sally slowly nodded at the logic, though an unconvinced frown was still present on her face. "That... makes some amount of sense, but I don't see why Sorun-"

"Look, Sal, I gave up trying to understand the guy. A lot of what he does doesn't make a whole lot of sense." Sonic leaned back into the couch, kicking his feet up on one of the cushions while locking his fingers behind his head. "Maybe he really is just tired. He just absorbed another Chaos Emerald- you know he gets tired whenever he does that. I don't know, but I'm sure whatever that was will work itself out. I don't think it's anything to worry about."

"Maybe," Sally mumbled in agreement, her hand unconsciously brushing over where Nicole rested in her vest. "Hopefully you're right, Sonic..."

So. Teleporting. It was tricky.

Ever since getting the Summoned Swords and Bringer Claws Sorun assumed that all of the powers he would get would be as easy to master as those two. Yamato put that theory to bed immediately, but Sorun had chalked that up to the sword being a special case among his powers.

But then he'd gotten the ability to teleport- or Trick, as he referred to it in keeping up with the games' terminology- and he began to realize that, perhaps, they wouldn't all be that easy. He was currently working on getting a good amount of control of it with Shadow over in Crate Land, the name he'd given the small training area full of crates he and Shadow frequented, but it was proving to be a challenge to wrap his head around.

Tricking was... an exceptionally odd sensation. He felt a small sort of "jolt" in his body whenever he did it. Not jolt in the sense of an electrical shock, but more like he felt his entire body just... shift. Like the feeling one would get when they would move at a high speed, only to abruptly stop and feel all their organs shake as a result. It was like that, except for his whole body experiencing this feeling simultaneously for less than a second. Though it was less he was moving rapidly and more that his body was bending space and literally teleporting him from one point to another. Or something along those lines, at least. He wasn't entirely sure how it actually worked. Chaos something-or-other.

Controlling where he would teleport to and doing as little as initiating the act of Tricking had been a bit of a struggle. Shadow had given him some tips: telling him to focus on where he wanted to go when he Tricked so he would actually end up where he wanted to go, while admittedly probably a no-brainer of a suggestion, was still immensely helpful. One big piece of advice he'd been given was to mentally associate the act of Tricking with a mental keyword he could focus on to control his Tricking so he didn't just randomly teleport whenever his thoughts went idle; a mental switch of sorts. Of course, Sorun had gone the simple route and went with the word "Trick" for his mental trigger phrase.

It hadn't exactly been an instant fix, but it was a long way away from where he started, which was randomly and uncontrollably Tricking everywhere. Shadow assured him it would get easier over time, and Sorun was inclined to agree with him. He had to have some faith that the guy who could teleport could teach somebody else how to teleport. But for now, Sorun had some degree of control over it. The disorientation from changing positions instantly was a hurdle he was slowly overcoming. He could at least initiate a Trick whenever he wanted to without it going off on its own.

Controlling where he actually went was a different matter.

"Agh!" Another unsuccessful Trick had landed him on the ground instead of on top of a pile of crates he'd been focusing on, causing his body to bounce off the ground and tumble in the complete opposite direction he wanted to go. "Egh-oof-ack-rrgh...!"

He finally stopped tumbling around when the momentum in his body finally ran out, causing him to roll onto his back and end up facing upwards. He huffed out an exhausted breath, his features soon settling into a scowl when he saw Shadow's face come into view as the hedgehog leaned over him. And the bastard looked smug.

"You look like you're having fun," Shadow commented. It was that superior tone of voice he had along with that smug smirk on his lips that made Sorun roll his eyes.

"Bite me." Sorun looked away from Shadow and towards a nearby crate. He focused intensely on that spot, thought the word "Trick", and before he knew it he'd ended up from laying on the ground to sitting on the crate. "See, I'm getting better."

"Any progress regardless of the rate you go still falls under the spectrum of 'progress', so yes, by technical terms you are improving."

"... You're not good at this whole sarcasm thing, are you? 'Cause that one fell really flat," Sorun said, shaking his hand from side-to-side in Shadow's direction. Shadow's smug grin instantly devolved into a frown, followed by a scoff as he trudged over to a crate right next to Sorun before sitting down on it. "You had the setup all right but you messed up on the delivery-"

"I don't need to take this from you," Shadow interrupted with a huff.

Sorun rolled his eyes in response, and then looked off to the other side. He saw Virgil hovering in the air besides him, and while he began to try and poke at the Chao as he dodged Sorun's finger, the human asked, "So did you have this much trouble when you were learning to teleport? Whenever that was?"

"Me? Have trouble honing my natural abilities?" Shadow opened his mouth to continue with this train of thought, but as he looked towards Sorun poking at his Chao he slowly closed his mouth and rethought his words. He opened his mouth to speak again, saying, "Admittedly... teleportation did give me some small amount of trouble in the beginning. I'm actually quite surprised how well you're adjusting to your... 'Tricking', as you call it."

"See, now that sarcastic jab from earlier really is worthless. You just obliterated your punchline by admitting I'm making good progress," Sorun said, turning back towards Shadow. "You're never gonna beat Sonic at wordplay at this rate."

Shadow's face actually scrunched up in mild disgust at hearing Sorun's words. He scoffed once again and crossed his arms. "As if I need to be better at telling meaningless jokes to be superior to him."

"It's not like you'd have to try very hard- guy's already worse than you. He just recycles the same one-liners over and over." A sad sigh left Sorun as he shook his head. "Always a shame to see such good opportunities for banter go to waste 'cause that guy just blows all his chances on petty, overused insults. It's freakin' frustrating doing missions with him."

"Because you don't approve of his witty remarks?" Shadow asked in an incredulous tone.

"That and other things. Y'know, just the way he does everything so easily, how he never seems to struggle and keeps that stupid grin on his face all the time." Sorun's hand snapped out and pressed down on the top of Virgil's head, the Chao flailing his arms as Sorun pushed him down slightly. "What's your deal with the guy, anyways?" he asked, easing up on the pressure so Virgil floated up only to push him back down again. "Every time you two are in the same room there's this real thick, competitive tension that fills the air and and I feel like I gotta swim out of the room just to get away from you two."

He felt a prick on his hand, and wincing slightly he reflexively pulled his hand away while also looking over towards Virgil. The small Chao, brandishing one of his bladed arms, simply gave Sorun a simple smirk as it floated closer to his side. Sorun snorted in amusement, and then he and Virgil both looked back towards Shadow.

The black and red hedgehog had a thoughtful look on his face, as if pondering the question Sorun had asked while at the same time picking his words out carefully. Finally, he sighed out loud and settled on saying, "We have a bit of history that lead up to where we are now. He thinks he's better than me, I know I'm better than him, and we've yet to definitively prove that I'm right and he's wrong."

"So it's like a rivalry?" Sorun asked.

"I suppose you could call it that, yes."

"Ohhh. Jeez, it's Dante and Vergil all over again, except the colors are reversed. Actually, that... that hits way too close to home. Egh." Sorun uncomfortably breathed out and shook his head. "So just because he's super fast and super tough and you got all your stuff that automatically means you have to keep trying to one-up each other?"

"It's more complicated than that. As I said, we've history," Shadow corrected him. "History I'd rather not get into."

Sorun blinked, looked towards Virgil who just shrugged at him, and then turned back to Shadow. "Fair enough," he said. "It's probably a good thing you don't rely on humor, anyways. Gives you your own style distinct from his. It's a thing you get to have that he can't, you know? This whole... sophisticated and overly-serious thing you got going on," he said, waving his hand in Shadow's direction.

Shadow's crimson eyes rolled away from Sorun, though his body straightened up just the smallest bit as if he was pleased with what he heard. "That's one way of looking at it," he said. A few moments passed, and he looked back to Sorun with an inquisitive look in his features. "What happened back there with the princess and the AI?" he asked.

"A little something I like to call 'none of your business'," Sorun answered, his sitting form going a big rigid as his eyes narrowed just the smallest amount. "Drop it, Shadow. I don't want to talk about this."

To his complete surprise, Shadow shook his head. "I told you about my struggles with learning to teleport and talked a bit about the Faker. You have to tell me what happened at the HQ now."

"What the- I never agreed to a quid-pro-quo convo with you," Sorun denied with a shake of his head. "Where's this coming from?"

Shadow sent Sorun a look mixed with confusion and annoyance. "This is how conversations transpire, is it not? A back and forth between individuals in order to progress the conversation?"

"I mean... yeah, but why do you care?" Sorun asked.

"I don't."

"... So why are you asking?"

"Because you seemed distressed and that can affect your performance," Shadow coolly answered. "The last thing we need is issues arising because of interpersonal problems. And you said you trusted me, did you not? I fail to see who else you would go to if not the AI if there truly is some issue."

"Her name's Nicole," Sorun snapped, but then closed his mouth when Shadow gave him a pointed look. He groaned a bit, and then turned to the side, only to then see Virgil giving him the same inquisitive look Shadow had, which caused him to groan some more. "You're the last person I would ever expect to care about this kind of thing. I'd sooner expect Eggman to walk in here asking about my feelings than you," Sorun mumbled, turning his eyes towards the ground. "Seriously, what gives?"

He would have believed Shadow was asking for purely pragmatic reasons if it wasn't for the fact he was pursuing the issue. Pursuing it meant interest, and Sorun had always thought Shadow considered himself above these kinds of things. That was always the air he gave off. So him coming in out of nowhere and asking this thing was left field for Sorun, and was making him confused. It didn't fit.

Shadow, seemingly sensing Sorun's distress and puzzlement, chose to answer. "I more concerned about the potential for this becoming a bigger issue than necessary more than anything else. If you really need a reason, though, then just call it payment for coming to me all the time for help with your powers."

A few seconds after Shadow's words reached his ears, Sorun's brows creased and he picked his head back up to Shadow. "How is that payment?"

"It gives me something to hold over the Faker. The fact you always come to me for help and not him gets under his skin, even if he won't openly admit it," Shadow answered, a ghost of a smirk playing across his lips. It vanished as soon as it arrived as he refocused on Sorun. "Why did you act so dismissive of Nicole?"

The small amount of appreciation Sorun felt over Shadow using Nicole's name was overshadowed by the urge to not tell Shadow why Sorun had done what he did. And he wasn't going to tell him. Even if... he did feel nice knowing Shadow was acknowledging the trust Sorun had said he'd put in him that one time, even if up until now he acted like he didn't. It was something, but not quite enough for Sorun to tell Shadow the truth on that certain matter.

Still, he felt he deserved something, so Sorun decided to go with what was on his mind to try and deflect the conversation.

"Shadow... sometimes in life it's easier to run away from your problems than face them head-on," Sorun said, form slumping slightly as his limbs went a bit limp. "This-this is essentially what I'm doing in regards to Nicole. I decided I'm just gonna do that forever now."

There were a few moments were Shadow continued to look impassively at Sorun's face, almost as if he'd not believed what Sorun had said or that he'd said some sort of jest. After some time passed, though, Shadow's face morphed into silent realization when he realized Sorun was completely serious, and right after his face set into a deep frown. "Sorun. That is completely moronic and ridiculous."

Sorun winced and turned away from Shadow. "You don't mince words, do ya?" he muttered.

"Chao."

The teen's eyes widened when he heard that tone of voice from Virgil, and when he looked to the Chao the small creature had his arms crossed and was glaring right towards Sorun, almost as if he was in agreement with Shadow's sentiment. This only caused Sorun's resolve to break even further.

"You shut up. I don't need this from you, too," Sorun hissed, turning back forwards to avoid both their glares. Despite him not having to see their eyes, though, he still felt them looking at him, and looking away had helped him none. "Look, this doesn't concern you."

"I would argue that is false, but we both know you're aware of this, so I'll save my breath," Shadow responded. "What happened between you and Nicole?"

"Nothing happened, I just... I can't take a break from somebody?" Sorun groaned out loud, leaning back on the crate he sat on to look towards the sky. "Geez, man, I try to diversify by hanging out with people outside my normal circle of my singular friend and you give me the third degree?"

"That isn't a circle."

"..." Sorun blinked, and then looked back down to Shadow. "What?"

"You and your friend, in this case Nicole, would only make two points. You can't make a circle with only two points," Shadow clarified.

It wasn't said as a joke, as Shadow had said this with a completely deadpan expression and serious voice. Any other time Sorun would have laughed at what he'd just heard, but right now the anxiety coursing through him was making him hold off on any laughing. "Straight line, whatever, you get what I mean," Sorun sighed out. "I just wanted to hang out with someone else for a change. Is that good enough for you?"

"No. It isn't." Sorun's eyes widened in surprise at the answer, whereas Shadow's just narrowed. "We aren't friends, and Nicole and I are the only two in Knothole you openly trust. She's your only friend. And this has nothing to do with the fact you told me you're running away from a problem regarding her." The scowl on Shadow's face deepened, and he leaned forwards on the crate towards Sorun. "Now stop lying and tell me the truth."

The extremely forward approach Shadow was taking with Sorun caused two reactions within the teen: the first was complete shock. He never expected Shadow to ever put much effort into anything Sorun had considered so mundane for him, and for Sorun of all people no less. It was... almost touching in a weird way only Shadow could produce.

It was also making Sorun more cross than he would have liked, because he refused to budge from his position and he genuinely felt Shadow had no business prying this far into a matter he absolutely did not want to discuss.

"You want me to tell you some truth?" Sorun's tone had shifted towards a more terse one, and the change had elicited some surprise in Shadow from the way his head just slightly twitched. "Here's some truth: I'm not telling you," Sorun continued. "You wanna have a chat with me so we can talk about some random whatever, then sure, I'm fine with that. But every time I ever ask something personal about you it's always 'I don't wish to discuss that', or 'that is none of your concern', so you don't get to sit there actin' all Mr. Mysterious and expect anything from me, especially after I told you all that personal stuff about my powers. I never even told Nicole about that."

He was fully aware that what he was saying came off as completely hypocritical, especially considering everything he was hiding from everybody, Shadow included. But Shadow didn't know that, so there was no way he would be able to call Sorun out on it and turn the argument in his favor. More importantly, it gave Sorun an out. A way out of this topic so he could stop scraping for reasons to avoid talking about the issue and focus on something else, or better yet just leave.

And as it was, he actually did just feel like leaving. Both to escape from this conversation and because he was legitimately a bit frustrated at Shadow and his own brand of hypocrisy. And it seemed like something Sorun had said got through to Shadow, based on the way he'd gone from an angry scowl to a small, almost surprised expression with thoughtful eyes. Either way, it was a chance Sorun was taking to get out of this mess.

"I think we're done here," Sorun said, standing up from his crate while keeping his eyes locked on Shadow.

"It would appear so," Shadow silently agreed with a small nod. "You're leaving, then?"

"Yeah. I gotta go clear my head." Sliding his hands into his pocket, Sorun nodded towards Virgil and then turned his back to Shadow. "Gonna go take a walk. I'll... talk to you later, I guess."

He began walking once Virgil floated to just over his shoulder, and as he walked he didn't hear Shadow say anything in response to Sorun's final words with him. He did feel the hedgehog's eyes on his back, but whatever face he was making was lost on Sorun as he refused to turn around and meet his gaze again. He just wanted to leave.

"Why does life here have to be so complicated?"

Maybe it was his fault. Going back and forth with people all the time while trying to maintain the cover that he was fine and that everything was fine when, no, everything was not fine and he never felt fine. But he accepted that as long as he maintained the illusion that everything was fine and tricked everybody else into thinking he was fine, that for long as he had that going, things would proceed smoothly and nobody would have to worry themselves into an early grave. That was his job. It wasn't something he took pride in, but seeing as how he'd given so much up already he figured it was his by right by now. So he just had to keep it up 'til he died.

But things always made his endeavors complicated. His wishy-washy relationship between the Freedom Fighters made it complicated. His thoughts on Nicole, oh, there were complexities aplenty there, but all he could do with those was hide from them and hope they would go away. Which they probably wouldn't, but a chance was a chance. Even if it was miniscule. Abysmal. Practically nonexistent. And made him feel even more awful than usual.

He felt like this should've been way simpler than it needed to be. Go to a new world, get powers, kill robots, kill fat tyrant, die. Why couldn't it have been that simple?

"I don't know, it's just- it's this whole thing , you know?" Sorun mumbled out in an exasperated tone, throwing his arms out in front of him as he shook his head. "I feel like I'm going out of my mind here. I probably am going out of my mind, but it's like, it's, I'm not the bad guy here, am I?"

"Chao."

Sorun cast a weary glance at the Chao floating next to him. He didn't know if walking through the outer edges of Knothole talking to a floating creature with the same energy of a madman mumbling out insane ramblings was the greatest of ideas, but as it happened Virgil was a great listener. Sorun didn't have a clue what he actually said outside of his expressions and visual cues, and his strange... emotion dot thing disappearing with his transformation wasn't helping in translation much, but he got enough of a gist to understand what the Chao meant. Usually. And right now he was giving Sorun judgmental eyes.

"C'mon, gimme a break, I'm doing the best I can here," Sorun grumbled out as he rubbed at the bridge of his nose. "And no, I'm not telling you my personal issues, either. You'll just have to deal with it like everybody else."

Virgil rolled his eyes, and then gruffly muttered, "Chao-chao."

"Because I figured it doesn't matter how much I suffer as long as everybody else comes out alright in the end, so it doesn't matter how people see me, but it's like, it's like I grew to like them all and tried to pretend I didn't and that's falling apart more and more like water on the daily. They probably see me as one part weirdo who can't make up his mind on what he wants and one part workaholic going on mission after mission, because somehow going out fighting robots to the death turned into a break for me." He sighed and let his hands drop to his side. "I don't even know why I care. 'Cause I care about them? Maybe. This is all... strange and confusing for me."

"Chaaoo...?" Virgil hedged, leaning in closer towards Sorun's face.

The human sighed and lightly pushed the Chao away. "No, I don't wanna talk about Nicole, just, just drop it. Don't wanna."

"Chao?"

"Because I don't want to, alright?"

"Chao," Virgil muttered, voice admonishing.

"I'm aware my solution's an awful one, but it's all I got. It's literally all I got! What else am I supposed to do, talk to her about it? Pfft. That ain't happening." Sorun sighed out and ran a ragged hand through his hair. "I mean, I could, but I don't know how that conversation would go and if the worst happened... ah, geez, this is all my fault. I shouldn't have gotten the ball rolling by avoiding her like that. Shoulda just kept the status quo up. Could have avoided this whole thing, but nah, I had to go and make it weird because I, because I didn't, I didn't want- rghh, I don't even know anymore." He frustratingly pulled at some of his hair, sighed, and pulled his hand away. "You get what I mean, right? Right? Virgil?"

When he didn't get a response from the Chao, Sorun looked to the side towards where he'd last seen Virgil floating. To his mild surprise he didn't find Virgil there, and after some light searching around, Sorun saw where the Chao had wandered off to: towards a tall tree near him, where the Chao was currently floating up to get at some of the apples hanging off the branches.

"I'm losin' my mind here," Sorun murmured to himself, shaking his head while rubbing at his eyes. "Guess that's what I get for trying to hold a conversation with a... hey now, what's this?"

He didn't think he'd find anybody out this far at the edge of Knothole, and yet Sorun did manage to spot a figure out in the distance up ahead. When he squinted his eyes and looked closer he realized it was Antoine, who was currently walking along while... talking to himself, for some reason. Sorun huffed out a breath at the sight, looked towards Vigil who was still going for the apples on the tree, and then looked back towards Antoine.

"... Screw it. I need a distraction." A mischievous grin formed on Sorun's face as an idea came to his head. "I'm gonna mess with him."

In that instant, his body disappeared only to then reappear right behind Antoine, who was none the wiser of the human teen suddenly appearing near him. Sorun's grin widened a large amount, and after mentally preparing himself he said, "Hey, Antoine."

He saw that the coyote's ears had perked up upon hearing his name be called out, though right before Antoine turned around Sorun had Tricked away out sight. As such, when Antoine had turned around all he saw behind him was empty air.

"Eh?" Antoine turned back around forwards, though when he still saw nothing his ears had flattened in confusion. "Strange... I could have sworn-ed I heard my name..."

"Antoine, behind ya."

Picking his head back up, Antoine whirled right back around towards where he heard the voice. But, yet again, there was nothing behind him.

"What in ze... Sorun, iz that you?" Antoine called out, turning his head left and right in search of the human. "Where are you?"

"Dude, right behind you. Been here the whole time."

"No, you have not!" Antoine hotly denied, turning towards the source of the voice yet again only to find absolutely nothing. He took in a deep breath, and then slowly lifted his hands up as a sign of surrender as a breathy chuckle left him. "Okay, Sorun, mon ami, I am having to admit I am not understanding how you are doing this, but can you please be stopping it?"

"Huh? What am I... oh, right." Once again Antoine turned towards the voice behind him, letting out a small sigh of frustration when he found nothing. "Yeah, I guess you wouldn't be able to see me-" continued Sorun's voice from behind him, "- seeing as I'm a ghost."

"Eh heh heh... heh... ghost?" Antoine repeated, trying in vain to turn around only to see the space behind him was empty. His shoulders seemed to reflexively hunch up in fear as he began glancing at the wooded area around him. "You are- you are being serious?" Antoine asked with a loud gulp.

"Yeah, in my zone people just turn into ghosts when they die. That not happen here?" By now Antoine had given up trying to find Sorun, though now his teeth were beginning to chatter as his eyes darted left and right at the sound of Sorun's voice. Sorun, still maintaining his position outside of Antoine's visual area, smirked at the reaction and continued with, "Sorry to break it to you this way, but it is what it is."

"S-S-S-Sorun, if this eez some kind of joke, I will tell you right now eet iz not very funny," Antoine stammered out, his whole body seemingly shaking in fright as he continued glancing around for Sorun. "You cannot seriously be ze ghostie type right now."

"Oh no I am. See?" And then, right after speaking, Sorun Tricked right in front of Antoine, his sudden appearance causing Antoine to completely freeze and his irises to shrink to pinpricks. "Boo."

The smile on Sorun's face increased to near-manic proportions when Antoine, upon seeing Sorun appear right before his eyes, let out a high-pitched shriek and fell over right onto his backside. Sorun couldn't contain his amusement and doubled over while laughing and pointing at Antoine. The Mobian's fright quickly began to subside upon hearing the human's laughter, and the scared look on his face turned into a heavy frown once he began to climb back to his feet. Sorun's laughter began to taper off considerably, though he was still making a few chuckles even after seeing Antoine stand across from him with that unamused expression.

"Tricked ya, Antoine~" Sorun softly called out, bending forwards slightly while still grinning at the coyote. He let a final sigh out and straightened up, running a hand through his hair. "Ahhh... yeah, I got a teleport power. Cool, huh?"

"Oui, oui, eet iz very 'cool' as you say. I am being very glad you have chose-ed to play a joke on me using it," Antoine remarked, brushing his hands against his jacket to discard any loose dirt.

"Yeah, ah agree." Sorun found himself frozen when he felt an iron-like grip clamp down on his left shoulder. And when he looked towards it, he saw that it was, in fact, a metal hand. Seeing that and hearing the feminine, Southern drawl behind him, Sorun didn't need to think too hard to guess who it was.

Thing was, Sorun hadn't expected that voice to be right behind him, or for that hand to suddenly appear right on his shoulder. And, due to his earlier actions, the word "Trick" had still been fresh in his mind. So as a consequence to all of this, when he realized it was Bunnie that was standing right behind him, Sorun had been startled enough that he'd accidentally Tricked away by a few feet.

Sorun had stumbled forwards a few steps from the unexpected teleportation, though he quickly caught himself from falling straight over. He would have sighed out from managing to catch himself, but then a strange sound reached his ears. An odd, electrical sparking sound. And, much to his uneasiness, he began to realize there was still a weight on his left shoulder.

Slowly, Sorun turned his head to the side to looked down at his shoulder. To his growing horror, he found that there was still a mechanical hand attached to his shoulder. The arm, however, was not where it was supposed to be. It was currently dangling down on Sorun's back from where it was grabbing onto him, and when he looked behind him at Bunnie, he saw that she was standing in place a few feet behind while staring wide-eyed at her missing left arm.

"Ooooh, that's... yeah, that's my bad..." Sorun slowly hissed out at the emotional anguish that was beginning to settle in him as he, with some effort, removed the cybernetic arm from his shoulder. He Tricked right back in front of Bunnie, an extremely apologetic look on his face as he awkwardly offered the arm back to her. "I'm... I'm so sorry, Bunnie. I just got this power a couple of hours ago and I'm still learning how to use it. I didn't mean to do that."

He was worried she was going to yell at him for literally disarming her, or, even worse, that she'd give him a cold glare while snatching the arm out of his hand. He'd feared these things, at least, though he didn't find himself all that surprised when Bunnie just sighed and gingerly took the cybernetic arm from his grasp using her flesh and blood arm. "This actually happens a lot more than ya'd think," she mumbled to him, her green eyes glancing down at her metal shoulder socket and the few sparking wires sticking out of it. "It ain't no worry, Sorun. It goes back on easy enough. Might need tah go to Rotor fer some adjustments, though."

"That's... good," Sorun said, still warily eyeing the sparking shoulder. "So what are you and Antoine doing out here, anyways?"

"We were takin' a walk together," she answered, stepping around Sorun to go to Antoine's side. The teen couldn't help but wince when he saw Antoine glaring at him, his own eyes constantly switching from glaring at the human to looking worryingly at Bunnie's detached arm. "We were talkin' an' my darlin' Antoine got into tellin' another one of his stories. Ah swear, his head got lost in the clouds, an' he plain just started walkin' the other way! I went to go lookin' for 'im when ah found ya messin' around with him."

"Non, zat iz not true at all!" Antoine denied, appearing to have completely forgotten Sorun as he turned to fully face Bunnie. "My head was perfectly on ze ground and not in ze sky!"

Bunnie sent him a flat look. "Antoine. You were walkin' off by yerself still talkin' while I was all the way behind ya."

Antoine sputtered in denial as a result, but Bunnie's look towards him remained unwavering. Realizing he wouldn't be convincing her, he just simply crossed his arms with a loud huff while turning his head to the side, a light blush on his cheeks. Sorun was mostly just glad that feeling of slight animosity he felt from Antoine seemed to have passed, and so he cleared his throat to gain Bunnie's attention back.

"Well, uh, glad you're okay," he said, voice quiet and still nervous. "You need any help, or...?"

Bunnie shook her head. "Not unless ya can use that fancy new power a yours to get us back to the HQ lickity-split."

His lips thinning, Sorun flicked his eyes back down to the detached arm and then looked back into Bunnie's eyes. "Yeah, I don't think it's a good idea to do that with people holding onto me. And I can't- I can't really go that far using it," he said to her. "Really helps with that mobility problem I have, but it's not really something I can use for travel. It's a short-range kind of thing, you know?"

"Ah. Alright." Bunnie nodded her head and stepped to Antoine's other side. She wrapped her remaining arm over the other Mobian's shoulder, hand still holding onto the artificial arm while a small grin formed on her face when she felt him shyly squirm under her grasp.

"Why do you insist on doing zis in front of him?" Antoine mumbled under his breath, looking so far away from Bunnie Sorun was surprised his neck hadn't snapped.

"Sorun ain't the only one that likes teasin' ya, Sugah..."

"And like that, I'm out." Sorun's hands were promptly shoved into his pockets, and he spun right around and began walking away when the two began acting like that. He was glad at the excuse to leave, too. The fact he'd accidentally torn Bunnie's arm off by Tricking wasn't something he was going to forget any time soon. "I really gotta learn not to Trick like that on accident. Might end up hurting somebody if I don't.

"Ah, but man, they sure seem happy together," Sorun thought to himself, going as far as to crane his neck over his shoulder to briefly glance at the couple before going back to looking forwards. "Guess it's not so surprising. Looks really nice, two people bein'... together like that... gah, quit it." He reached up to slap the side of his head, shaking it while incoherently mumbling under his breath. In the midst of his slapping, though, an unpleasant sensation shot through him. His footsteps stopped immediately, and before he knew it he began to uncontrollably cough.

He tried to contain the coughing, but that unpleasant sensation proved to be too great. His body began to uncontrollably shudder from the uncontrollable coughing, and after a bit he began gasping for breath when the coughing proved to be too intense for him to breath alongside it. He'd almost fallen over on the ground from the coughing, though fortunately it soon relented as that unpleasant feeling faded from his chest.

"Ack, ah... agh..." Bent over, Sorun was forced to take in a few heavy breaths to regain his bearings, after which he stood back up straight with a grunt of effort. Not long after, though, he felt something moist on his arms, and with his stomach dropping he looked down to examine his limbs.

He managed to ascertain what that wet feeling was in an instant when he saw specks of red dotting both of his forearms. He'd accidentally coughed blood onto himself.

"... Gonna have to wash this off in the river so nobody sees." Heavily sighing, Sorun re-pocketed his arms and continued walking forwards, trying his best to put the picture of his blood-stained arms out of his mind. "Guess I'll go do that then get Virgil. Hope he doesn't wander too far from that tree."

Chapter 33

Recursion Error

Episode 33- Bombs. Lies. More bombs.

By and large, the factory looked about the same as any factory Eggman constructed: a large, industrial complex with giant spires that constantly spewed toxic smog into the air and was devoid of any plant life all around. An absolute blight that polluted the land all around it. Patrols of robots constantly guarded the outside and inside of the factory around the clock, always aware and always searching for any possible threats.

One such robot, a common red Egg Pawn with a lance in hand, had been patrolling the chain-link fence that surrounded the factory's outer perimeter, near a large stack of shipping containers. It had walked past a space between two stacks of containers, but then stopped mid-step when it picked up something odd within its sensors. It planted its feet right onto the ground and, with its lance at the ready, turned to the space between the containers and looked down at the anomaly it detected.

The anomaly had been a box. An ordinary cardboard box.

The Egg Pawn stared motionlessly down at the box for a full ten seconds, and then lifted the point of its lance right back up to the sky as its posture straightened out. It turned its back to the cardboard box, and then began marching away.

It'd only gotten two steps in before the silver blade of a katana burst through its chest.

"Shh shh shhhh... sleep now and dream of electric sheep..." The lights of the Badnik's eyes and mouth went dark as the machine died, its body tilting backwards as all control left it. A pair of blue, spectral arms caught its body right before it hit the ground, and then proceeded to drag its corpse into the hidden space between the shipping containers as the arms' user quickly pulled the katana out from the robot.

Safely hiding the Badik in the hiding spot, Sorun dispelled the Bringer Arms, sheathed Yamato, and then looked out towards the large factory that was right in front of him. The pale teen ran a hand through his chin-length black hair, and then sighed out loud as he looked up at the black smoke being pumped up into the darkened, orange sky. "It's always so jarring going from all the clean air in Knothole to places like this. Surprised I'm not catching anything from all this smog..." he mumbled under his breath as he turned away. "Wouldn't really matter at this point, though, would it?"

From the corner of his eye, he saw a spot of air shimmer against one of the shipping containers. The shimmer soon solidified into the transparent shape of a Mobian, and then color faded in to reveal a purple chameleon Mobian leaning against the container, his eyes trained on Sorun and his arms crossed.

"This is the third factory we've been sent out to bomb this month. Third one," Sorun groused. "Sally doesn't have anywhere better to be sending us?"

A small, playful smirk formed on Espio's mouth. "And here I was thinking you liked seeing Eggman's factories explode."

"Eh, the first time, yeah, but you see on giant factory blow up and you see 'em all blow up. It just lost its charm for me."

"Did somebody call my name?" Both the Mobian and the human turned their heads to the side, where they saw a small bee Mobian fly in from over one of the shipping containers and hover up the ground next to them.

"No, Charmy, nobody called your name," Espio denied with a shake of his head, "but since you're here we'll go over the plan one more time."

"Five mobiums says it's the exact same plan it was all the other times we've done this," Sorun muttered out as he walked into the space between the shipping crates.

Espio's eyes followed the human into the space, and with a sigh he reached down to grasp one of the two satchels slung across his torso. "We're to sneak into Robotnik's factory, where me and Sorun-"

"Sorun and I," Sorun corrected.

"... Sorun and I," Epsio repeated, eyes twitching in the direction the human walked down, "will place these high-yield explosives at strategic points along the factory's interior at locations-"

"Do we seriously have to go over where we're planting the things?" Sorun interrupted, poking his head out from the space he'd walked into to look at Espio. "These factories are all practically built the same. The dang Badnik patrols are practically the same; I memorized all their routes and patterns the second time in when I saw them doing the same thing from the first time." Felt like he was grinding out repeatable side quests in an RPG at this point for the amount of repetition he was suffering through, but he wouldn't complain about his job being made easier for him. He would complain about the tedium, though. Which this kind of mission was slowly becoming: tedious.

Apparently there were so many of these factories that Eggman didn't bother to design every single one personally to meet the specific requirements of that area and its quota of production. Why this was Sorun didn't know, because it seemed like the madman had more time on his hands than he needed. Maybe it was just to make it easier on them so he could stroke his ego further, but whatever the case these factories were all little more than cookie-cutter recreations of a master design with only slight variations between each factory's construction. Same went for the Badniks, too. Always had similar numbers with routes, patterns and the such.

A slight, annoyed glare began to form in Espio's eyes. "Perhaps you would like to take over the mission briefing, Sorun?"

"You know what, maybe I do. You're always the one doing it." Clearing his throat, Sorun briefly stepped out from between the containers while pointing his thumb at himself. "Alright, Espio and I-" he gave the chameleon a look from the side of his eye, making Espio scoff and turn away, "- are gonna go place a bunch of bombs everywhere." He pointed to Charmy. "Meanwhile, Charmy goes and plugs Nicole into the factory's main computer. Like all the last times we did this. Simple enough?"

"Mm-hm!" Unlike Espio, who was scowling off to the side, Charmy was giving Sorun a bubbly nod while bouncing up and down. "I like Sorun's briefing way better than yours, Espio. His isn't boring and it's easy to understand."

"... My briefings aren't boring." An indignant, glum frown formed on Espio's face. "They're cool and professional," he quietly whispered.

Sorun, having heard the horned Mobian's whisper, snorted out a laugh and walked back into the space between the containers. "Keep tellin' yourself that, Espio. We'll head out in a sec, just lemme grab my box here."

As he crouched down in front of the cardboard box, he heard a disgruntled groan from Espio. "That box is not a viable tool for infiltration, Sorun," he heard Espio say from behind him.

"You're just mad because it works so well," Sorun countered as he picked the box up.

"It wouldn't hold up in a forest environment or anywhere else where a box would be out of place," Espio said, his tone slightly challenging.

Box in hand, Sorun turned around, exited the space, and gave the chameleon a look with a quirked eyebrow. "It's a good thing we're carrying this mission out in an industrial environment, then." He nodded his head towards the factory. "Y'know, where things like a box won't be out of place."

"A storage container or metal crate, yes, but I hardly think a cardboard box would be seen as normal in a Badnik factory."

"Nah, it totally works." Sorun flipped the box around to show Espio a crudely-drawn, red Eggman logo on the side of the box. "See, I drew a little Eggman symbol on it with a crayon. The Badniks just walk right past it, I swear."

"..." Taking a glance down at the symbol, Espio released a defeated sigh while reaching up to rub at his eyes. "Whatever works for you, Sorun."

"Ah-huh, yeah." Sending the chameleon a smug look, which the Mobian tried and failed to pretend to ignore which made Sorun's petty glee grow, he began to fold the box into a more compact shape as he turned his head to face Charmy. "You all good, Charmy?"

"Yep, me and Nicole are good to go!" The small Mobian held out Nicole's handheld in his right hand, Sorun's body stiffening at the sight of it. "It should be easy. All I gotta do is swoop in-" Charmy began making exaggerated movements with his arms, "- sneak into the computer room, take out any mean ol' Badniks along the way-"

Sorun silently watched the bee as he continued to bounce all around, now proceeding to flail his arms around wildly while acting out his words. The teen's eyes were drawn towards Charmy's right hand, which was currently clutching Nicole's handheld body. A body that Charmy was rapidly shaking around with his movements. Sorun's facial features began twitching when he saw this, and not even a second later he finally had enough and snatched Nicole out of Charmy's grasp.

"Could you not shake her!?" Sorun angrily growled out, shooting a glare towards Charmy. "She doesn't like being shaken."

"Okay, I won't!" Charmy had flown back a bit while raising his arms up, sending a pout towards Sorun's way all the while. After a bit he began looking between Sorun and the handheld he was holding, causing a thoughtful look to begin to form on the bee's face. "Hm... hey, why don't you just take Nicole instead?"

Sorun was fairly certain his heart skipped a beat there. "Huh?" He felt a sudden weight in his hand, and when he looked down he realized that Charmy had flown over and forcibly handed Sorun Nicole. "H-huh?"

"Yeah, since you keep complaining about all these missions being the same, we'll mix it up a bit!" Charmy proposed, a light smile on his face as he flew next to Espio. "I'm getting tired of doing the same job, too, so me and Espy can go and set all the bombs while you deal with the computers."

"Wait, hold on-" Sorun attempted to argue this new idea, though he was immediately interrupted when Espio handed one of the satchels he had to Charmy.

"Works for me," the chameleon said. Sorun couldn't tell if Espio was truly ignorant of the protest on his face, or if he was just ignoring it to spite Sorun, but either way it seemed his mind was made up. "Keep in contact. We'll meet back here when we're done."

And then, before Sorun could even get another word in edgewise, they were off. Charmy had shrunk down to a mere fraction of his size and carried himself and the satchel full of explosives out of sight. Espio had just turned invisible and disappeared entirely. All that was left was Sorun, holding a folded-up box in one hand and Nicole in the other.

The same Nicole he'd been completely avoiding for some time now. The same Nicole that he could have continued to avoid if he hadn't opened his mouth and put the idea of switching roles for the mission out for Charmy to hear. The one he was currently holding. That Nicole.

"... I really fuckin' hate myself sometimes," Sorun thought to himself as he looked down at the handheld. He was almost tempted to throw the thing out of frustration, but he knew he'd never be able to bring himself to do that. Instead he aired out his frustrations in the form of a heavy sigh, and then tried speaking to the computer. "So, uh... looks like it's just us now, Nicole. Nicole? You there?"

She must have been there; the green screen on the top portion of her handheld was lit up. Even so, at first nothing had happened in response to Sorun's question. And then Sorun felt it- a moderate electrical jolt zapped right into Sorun's hand from the handheld. He felt the electricity jolt through his entire arm, causing Sorun to hiss out in pain and reflexively stiffen his arm before the muscles finally relaxed. He sighed out loud and looked back down at the handheld.

"Yeah, I... I think she might be mad at me." He couldn't think of any other reason why she'd be acting like this. And admittedly he hadn't been expecting any good reaction from her considering the distance he'd put between them, but the thing was he didn't know what to even expect at all. He didn't know what an upset Nicole was like. A serious and focused one, sure. Even a downcast one from that one unsanctioned mission. But an upset Nicole? Specifically one upset at him?

He didn't have a clue. Apparently in involved shocking. And he had to carry her around now in hostile enemy territory.

As if his nerves weren't strained enough.

"What a great day I'm having," Sorun bitterly thought to himself as he began stomping towards the factory.

He knew from the get-go, ever since that heist mission for the second Emerald, that Egg Pawns were laughably easy to sneak past. They all followed the same parameters and fell for the same tricks. They were all uniform in their movements and easy to predict. And the cardboard box practically made him invisible as long as he didn't move in their line of sight.

Seriously, the cardboard box was shockingly effective against sneaking past Badniks. He didn't know what it was about it. Maybe because they didn't pick up as a biological thing from the box for them to analyze with their sensors they didn't register the box as a threat, or maybe the shoddy Eggman symbol he'd drawn on it actually did work, or at least somewhat help. Maybe they were all just idiots, which wouldn't be something he'd expect as he didn't know Eggman to poorly program his own combat AI, but a lot of the logic in this world was wonky, so what did he know? He was still trying to wrap his head around how Espio's shoes and gloves turned invisible with him and how the satchel bag with explosives shrunk with Charmy.

"Maybe it's not that his skin - scales? - turn invisible, but he puts out some kinda short-range invisibility field or something," Sorun thought to himself. He was currently crouched down in his cardboard box, peeking out from the handle slot on the box's side and watching the metal legs of a patrol of Egg Pawns walk right past him. "Just, like, some kinda field that only goes a few millimeters off his skin. That'd explain why his clothes turn invisible, too. So how the hell does Charmy's stuff shrink with him? Is it Chaos energy nonsense? It's probably Chaos energy nonsense."

It made some amount of sense. Apparently every being in this world inherently had some kind of link to the Chaos Force, and he'd already seen people like Sonic with a strong enough link that they had powers. And his own powers proved that abilities powered by Chaos energy did... some pretty weird stuff sometimes. So powers like that weren't completely out there. Not when the Emeralds had given him something like Yamato. Invisibility and shrinking were tame in comparison to that sword.

And yet, somehow, it still managed to freak him out sometimes.

"Alright, they're gone." Once the robots disappeared from sight, he waited for a few seconds until the sound of their footsteps disappeared before he began crouch-walking back up the hallway he'd been hiding in, box still over his form. "I still can't believe how much I'm getting away with this box cheat," Sorun continued to think to himself. "You'd think Eggman would patch this if it really is a programming error, but I don't even think they've caught onto the fact I'm using a damn box to bypass their everything. Maybe it's one of those it's-so-stupidly-obvious-they'd-never-use-it things, so he never bothered. Either way, I ain't complaining." He stopped, and then raised his free hand up to tilt the box upwards slightly so he could look up through the handle slot. "Okay, so left down here should be the control room."

Another perk to all these factories being built to a uniform standard: the layout was often almost, if not completely, the same, so locating noteworthy areas, such as the control room, were trivial as all Sorun had to do was follow the exact same route that had worked for him the last times he'd done this. They even left the door open, too. Not that it would have mattered for him anyways, but it was still nice not to have to bother.

A lot of Eggman's facilities, not just the factories, always had this one central control room, i.e. the room with all the computers connected to the entire factory, all of its systems, and the network. That was apparently a thing: Eggman had his own personal network most if not all of his facilities, structures, and even robots were connected to. Helped with instantaneous messaging, data exchanging, orders, those kinds of things. It was more or less just convenient tool for instant communication that Eggman and all his machines used, though, so they were always less concerned about breaking into the network and more about getting into the local computer's systems to see what was on it.

Usually it wasn't anything good; most of the time it was mundane information, such as orders designated for that specific factory, production numbers and manifests, ect. Sometimes, though, just sometimes, there would be some bit of information there that was usable by the Freedom Fighters, though eight times out of ten it was just locations of interests for other places for them to sabotage. And, as these central computer rooms were still connected to the factory's internal systems, it still helped having control. So they always tried to bring Nicole in on these missions just for her to plug into these central systems, scrub the databanks for any useful information, and then help out with the rest of the mission by messing with the location's systems.

Made sense in hindsight why Sally kept bringing Nicole around with her everywhere.

Crouch-walking into the computer room, Sorun saw the typical sight: long computer console at the front of the room. Lots of monitors on the wall. Two Egg Pawns sitting in chars and manning the computers. He couldn't help but to roll his eyes as he stood up, tossed his cardboard box to the side, and then began approaching the two Egg Pawns.

"Gentlemen," he announced, though before they'd even turned around to Sorun a Summoned Sword had appeared over each of their heads and fell downwards, the blades going right through their heads. The robots went limp and promptly fell out of their chairs, Sorun shaking his head at the sight as he held up the handheld in his grasp. "Alright, Nicole, now we just-"

Zap!

Sorun deeply inhaled as he felt the muscles in his arm briefly spasm again. "... Can you please stop doing that?" He calmly requested, looking down at the handheld. He still received no reply from the AI, but she'd stopped shocking him, so he took that as a sign that he could proceed. So he stepped in front of the computer console, gently set Nicole down on top of it, and after hunting around for a bit found a small cable with an attachment port, which he then plugged into Nicole.

Usually what would happen next was that Nicole's little face icon would appear somewhere on one of the computer monitors as a sign that she'd breached her way into the system and was good to go. That wasn't what happened. What happened was that a few seconds after Sorun plugged the handheld into the computer system a cloud of black and green pixels began to appear and congregate into a shape on the console. And then, before Sorun knew it, Nicole's holo-body just appeared. Sitting there.

If there was one thing that startled Sorun more than the holo-lynx's sudden appearance, it was the body language she was displaying. She was sitting right on the computer console, one leg crossed over the other with her arms crossed over her chest. But what stood out for Sorun was just that look on her face. None of the lynx's features seemed happy, from her mouth being set in a deep frown to her eyes being narrowed in Sorun's direction to even her ears being straightened and folded back in what almost looked like silent anger.

Yeah, no, she was definitely upset at him.

"... Alright, play it cool, Sorun." This was a conversation that could go any way possible, and frankly, Sorun didn't know how he was supposed to start it. He hadn't even expected or prepared for something like this. So he decided to just comment on Nicole's appearance and then play it by ear from there. "Um... are you sure you should be out and about like this without a Power Ring?" Sorun asked, pointing his index finger at Nicole.

"I'm drawing power from the factory's energy reservoir." She even sounded out of the norm. Her tone was mainly neutral with just a hint of something negative behind her words. "Thank you for taking me from Charmy. I know he means well, but he can often be too excitable."

"You're... welcome...?" His hand unconsciously rubbing the back of his head, Sorun began to turn his body away from Nicole. "I think I should go-"

"You've been avoiding me."

"Shieeeet..." Ah, so it was the one thing he'd been fearing. And now that he was looking back halfway at Nicole with one eye, he couldn't help but realize he had no idea what he was supposed to say. "No, I haven't," he tried.

That answer only drew Nicole's face into a deeper scowl. In a flash of pixels a small, hovering green screen appeared right in front of her. As Sorun turned around to fully face Nicole and the screen, he couldn't help but feel his mouth go dry. Because he recognized the image on that green screen as a recording. A recording of him talking to Sally inside of the Freedom HQ.

Sally's recording was the first to speak. "Getting a Chaos Emerald from Eggman is a big accomplishment, so I don't see any reason why you two can't take some time to-"

"Can't," came Sorun's response. The teen couldn't help but wince at how cold and detached his recorded self sounded.

"What?"

"Can't. I'm doing the thing with Shadow right now."

"O... kay, but right after you can-"

"Can't. Shadow, let's go." The video paused there, upon which Sorun looked up from the green screen to Nicole's green, narrowed eyes.

"... Man, I look like such a dick from a third-person perspective," Sorun thought, sighing at the sight of the video as he gave Nicole a half-shrug. "Nicole, look, that was right after the thing with the Emerald. I was tired. I don't see how a one-time-"

Sorun was interrupted when Nicole waved her hand behind the green screen, causing its image to shift and change. The new picture being shown was still of Sorun and Sally, though they were standing in a different location in the HQ. And it was with a sinking feeling that Sorun realized he recognized this recording.

"Hey, Sorun," Sally's recording began, "is everything alright with you?"

"... I suppose so," Sorun's recording answered. "Why do you ask?"

"Well, it's just... Nicole's been asking about you a lot. She says that it's been a week since you've even spoken with her."

"Ah. Yeah. That. I, err... there's just been a lot going on, you know? Haven't really had that much time for anything."

"Really? Doing what?"

"You know. Stuff." Sorun's recording slowly began to turn away from Sally. "I should go."

Sally's recording crossed her arms, and the real Sorun could see even past the green filter on the screen that Sally's face looked skeptical. "You're off-mission right now. What do you have to go do?"

"There's this library book I've been neglecting to return. Now seems like a good time." The recording of Sorun began to walk towards the HQ stairs. "Seeya around, Sally."

The recording ended right there. Sorun continued to stare down at it. He didn't even need to bother to look up. He could almost feel her glaring right at him with that same frown on her face.

"... In my defense, I really did have to return a book that day," Sorun said. "It was that Chao book."

Nicole didn't respond to Sorun at all. She instead just waved her hand behind the screen again as a new recording started.

This recording Sorun remembered all too well. It was of him laying down on the HQ's couch. Behind the couch was Nicole herself, resting her hands on the top of the couch while leaning over its top to look down at Sorun. They were both looking towards each other, Nicole's face questioning while Sorun had worn an empty, tired expression. The Sorun observing the recording remembered that, on the inside, he'd been leagues more anxious than how he'd appeared back then. Much like he felt right now watching these recordings.

"Sorun?" Nicole's recording asked. "May we please talk?"

"We're talkin' right now, Nicole," Sorun's recording dismissively replied.

"That is indeed correct," she said, "but I wished to discuss why it is you've been so withdrawn from me as of late."

"Withdrawn? I haven't been withdrawn from you."

"Then... perhaps you would like to play something with me? Or talk? Sally provided me with a Power Ring, so we have plenty of time." The face on Nicole's recording turned into a hopeful one, and even grew a small smile, which only went to hurt the real Sorun all the more when he heard what his recording said next.

"I would, Nicole, but, uh... can't." And then he just Tricked away. The couch instantly became vacant as Sorun teleported somewhere, the stairs if he remembered correctly, leaving a now downcast Nicole to stare at the empty spot he'd been occupying.

He just plainly hadn't had a good excuse to tell her, so he'd done the next best thing: he ran away. He didn't remember looking back to see Nicole's direction after he left. He'd just focused on getting away from her as quickly as possible, so seeing this recording of her shook something in him. She looked saddened that he'd left so abruptly like that.

Was this why Nicole was doing this? Because she was upset at the callous demeanor he'd grown seemingly out of nowhere? Because she was confused or even worried for him? He didn't know, and every single answer frightened him because here she was directly confronting him over the matter and he had no good answers to give her.

The green window closed and disappeared entirely. Sorun was left feeling extremely awkward and worried for what was to come in a few seconds, and when he looked back up at Nicole who'd re-crossed her arms while still frowning at him, he couldn't help but grimace. "Yeah, I got no excuse for that one," he finally admitted. "Do you record me every single time you're near me?"

"Those were not recordings. They're my memory files. Specifically memory files of you," she corrected. "I've been looking back at them frequently."

"Oh." Sorun blinked in surprise. He didn't know what to think of that. It made sense when he thought about it, but even still he was a bit off-put by it. "... That's kind of creepy, Nicole."

Seeing as that only seemed to make her mood worse, that probably hadn't been the right thing to say. "Do you find it 'creepy' when you look back at your memories of others?"

"I mean, no..." She had him there. He tried as hard as he could, but he couldn't find a good rebuttal to that. So instead, he just sighed out loud and trudged towards one of the previously-occupied chairs. "You got a good point," he conceded, sitting down in the chair and swiveling to Nicole's direction. "I take it you're upset."

"My friend has been actively ignoring and avoiding me at every single turn for reasons only known to him, as he refuses to discuss the matter," she poignantly stated. Her tone of voice caused Sorun to shrink back further into his seat, and he found it increasingly hard to maintain eye contact with her. "I only wish to know why you've adopted this behavior."

Sighing, Sorun leaned back deeper into his seat. "I get where you're coming from Nicole, but is now , right now, this specific time, the best time to be doing this?" he asked, and then gestured towards the door leading into the room. "We-we're in the middle of a Badnik factory. Espio and Charmy are running around planting bombs everywhere! I just- I really don't think this is the best time-"

"Then when is the best time?" Nicole asked, cutting Sorun off mid-sentence. "Every single other time I've tried to gain your attention has proved unsuccessful. The only opportunity I've had to discuss this with you is right now in the middle of a mission."

Sorun gestured his hand towards Nicole and opened his mouth, but when he tried to speak no words would come out. Fact was he just couldn't think of anything to say, and because of this all he managed to do was make a breathy sigh, lower his hand, and turn away from Nicole. The AI saw Sorun's reaction towards her words, her features softening just the slightest amount as her form slumped forwards slightly.

"I've missed our time together." Nicole's words shocked Sorun out of whatever self-absorbed trance he'd been in, causing him to shift his eyes back over to the lynx. "I've missed being with my friend. I... don't like what you've been doing, Sorun."

"You have other friends, you know," Sorun mumbled back.

"Yes, I know. Every single one of the Freedom Fighters is my friend. Sally is an... extraordinarily exceptional friend. But you're my friend, too. I enjoy playing those games with you. I always had an interest in games, but you're the only one I've ever managed to experience fun playing them with." Sorun's hands twitched when he heard that. "I like talking with you. I like that you put so much effort to manifest my Mobian form just so we can interact face-to-face instead of through a screen. And I have been unable to experience any of this because my friend has been acting so erratically."

Him acting erratic with people. It was almost enough to make him laugh. His inconsistency with how he handled his relationships with everybody was practically his own defining trait at this point for how deep he'd gone with it. Nicole had probably been the only person he'd been consistent with at all before he started doing this.

But this wasn't what he wanted. Her just writing him off and moving onto her own devices would have been ideal. Not this. Not her going so far just to ask him why her friend was avoiding him. Which he completely understood- hell, he'd probably do the same thing if he was in her shoes and one of his friends from Earth was acting this way. But he hadn't known she'd go this far. Maybe he was a fool for not seeing it. He didn't know.

"Is it me?" The question caused Sorun's head to snap upwards when he heard Nicole's question. "Did I do something to make you want to avoid me?" Her head dipped down a bit. "Is it... because I'm not real?"

"You are real. We've been over this." Sorun's tone came off as a bit snappish, as, for reasons unknown to him, he became almost angered that she'd insinuate he'd think such a thing. His response made Nicole look back towards him, too, her ears standing straight up in surprise. "You didn't do anything, Nicole. None of this is your fault. It's me. I'm..." Once again he failed to find the right words to say, and threw his hand up in frustration. "I... agh..."

He turned his chair towards the computer console, and then practically slammed his face down on it while also covering the top of his head with his arms. He couldn't even bear to look at her at this point from all the self-pity he was beginning to feel over his own, personal plight.

All he'd wanted to do was create as much distance between himself and Nicole as possible. To make it as easy on Nicole so that when he eventually died it wouldn't be so traumatic for her. And deep down he knew he already screwed this up. Screwed it up the moment he'd come back after leaving Knothole and accepted her as a friend. He'd wanted to try, though. For her sake. Because he felt bad for using her mere existence as a crutch just so he could get through this easier. Because she didn't deserve a friend so messed up in the head Sorun couldn't even tell if he was sane anymore.

He didn't want to keep being her friend because he liked being around her just as much as she apparently liked being around him. And he wasn't an idiot. Even an emotional neanderthal like him could see how he kept reacting whenever he was around her, or whenever he just thought of her. The way he'd lose focus on everything else and the way his heart would speed up. He kept feeling something that was completely foreign to him whenever he was around her, and it scared him. He didn't know what it was and he didn't know what to do with it. He had an inkling to what it was, though. And that just frightened him even more. Somehow almost as much as dying.

And he couldn't tell her this. He couldn't tell anybody this. None of it. Even if he could he wouldn't. They couldn't know he was dying. They'd hold him back. They'd stop him from gaining power. They'd waste so much just to save what little life he had left. So he had to keep it up. He had to keep it up until he died. He had to keep it up until everybody was safe.

He had to lie his ass off just to get out of this situation.

Problem was he didn't know if he could.

"... What the fuck am I supposed to actually say here to get Nicole off my back?" Sorun silently wondered to himself, still buried beneath his arms. "Go with the tired angle? Say all these missions are wearing me out and I just don't have the energy to hang out with her? My deteriorating condition backs it up, but that doesn't work for me in the long game. They might start putting me out on less missions. Can't have that. Say playing all those games with her makes me homesick and I just needed a break? Nah, she'd never go for something like that. She'd read my lie like a book." He searched as deep as he could into his mind for as much information as possible so he could string together some half-believable lie that would appease Nicole and end this conversation without telling her the truth, but try as he might, he couldn't find anything to use. "I got nothing," Sorun realized as his arms slid off his head, allowing him to pick himself back up. "There's nothing I can say to her that won't be detrimental in the long run or that she'd just see through. Nothing but the truth, but that isn't an option."

When he looked back towards Nicole, he completely froze and felt his senses cry out in outrage. It was that look she was giving him. The way her features were married in sadness, just like what he was feeling. The way her ears were completely flattened against her head.

She looked genuinely miserable. Sorun felt even worse for being the one to cause this.

"Damn it all." He had to say something. Anything. He couldn't leave her in a state like this. He just couldn't. "It's a secret," he finally blurted out, and right after saying this he just barely managed to resist the urge to clamp his hands over his mouth.

Nicole's reaction was readily apparent. Her black and brown ears picked up halfway, almost in confusion, and her face matched this in the way she tilted her head to the side in question while her features scrunched in equal confusion. "A secret?" she repeated, almost in disbelief.

"Yeah, a secret," Sorun confirmed with a nod. "You know, like that big secret project you keep working on. Sort of," he continued as he spun his whole body in the direction of the computer console, scarcely believing the own words that seemed to be automatically flying out from his mouth. "Okay, it's not exactly like that, but... it's just something I don't want to talk about, alright?"

"... Nanites."

Of all the words she could have said, Sorun hadn't expected that one. In fact, that specific word was probably at the bottom of the list of words he'd expected her to say. He didn't even know if that word was on the list of possible words, because it was a word so out of the blue he didn't even know what to make of it. So instead, he spun his head just enough to get Nicole into view of one of his eyes while muttering, "Huh-I-what-huh?"

"Nanites," Nicole repeated. "It's a surprise. For the Freedom Fighters, and for everybody else in Knothole. Admittedly it's something that's been ready for quite some time now, though I've lacked an adequate opportunity to finally set the wheels in motion, as it were. I've been going over all of my progress again and again in the meantime just to ensure it goes off without issue while making small tweaks every now and then." She leaned in closer towards Sorun, and he almost fell out of his seat when he saw the tiniest of smirks play on the edges of her mouth. "That is all that I am willing to divulge in the matter of my secret project. And I would sincerely appreciate you not mentioning this to any of the others, especially Sally. As I said, this is meant to be a surprise."

"Fuck, she wasn't supposed to give me any pull and make an excuse for me to spill! What does that even mean anyways!?" He knew what a nanite was from his vast source of fictional knowledge. What he didn't know was how the term "nanite" was pertinent to anything at all, and he didn't think Nicole would tell him. And he wasn't going to go and ask anybody else, either, for fear of breaking the massive amount of trust Nicole was putting on him on the spot. So instead he just silently gulped and asked, "So why... why are you telling me?"

"Because I realize that sometimes we keep secrets from others, and that the reason we keep these things are not always clear. What is clear is that these secrets are often kept for the sake of those we care for, such as with my project and what I assume whatever your secret is," Nicole answered. She slid off of the computer console and stepped in front of Sorun. "Am I incorrect in assuming this?" she asked him as she bent down to grab his arm, and then proceeded to pull him out of the chair to his feet.

Sorun felt his heart racing in his chest for two reasons. First was from the contact Nicole had on his arm, which he ended as soon as he could by gently but quickly pulling his arm from her grasp as soon as he was on his feet. The second reason was because her words resonated deep within him. The act of keeping secrets for the sake of others. He didn't know if that was exactly applicable to him, but it still felt somewhat right somehow. And Nicole understood that about him. It... made him feel warm. And also absolutely terrible knowing he was going to exploit what she just said as a way of getting out of this.

"Holy shit, is this actually happening? Is she giving me an out for free?" That'd be amazing if she was. It would let him circumvent this whole situation without creating a convoluted lie he had to juggle around with all the others. He decided to nod along with Nicole's question. "It's, well... I wouldn't exactly call my secret a surprise, er, well, guess it kinda will be, but... yeah, it's for everybody else's sake." He didn't even have to lie with that one.

Nicole's response was to fold her hands over her midsection and tip her head down slightly. Sorun could have sworn she almost looked relieved to hear him confirm her thoughts. "Then I won't pry into what you've been keeping secret from us."

"Aw, sweet-"

"On two conditions."

"SHIT." Clearing his throat, Sorun hesitantly tilted his head slightly to the side. "Uhhhh... sure. What are they?"

The holo-lynx lifted her head up just enough so that their eyes met. "First, I want you to promise me that at some point you'll tell me just what this secret of yours is. It doesn't have to be a specific date. You can take as much time as you need to tell me. But eventually I wish for you to tell me the truth."

Easy enough, he could just lie and never do it. "That's... okay, I can do that. It'll take a while, though. A long while."

"That's fine," Nicole said. "My second condition is that I want you to stop avoiding me so we can go back to the way things were before you started doing this. And I want to do something with you right after this mission is over."

"Well..." He clicked his teeth and began rubbing at the back of his neck. "Don't agree to it. It undermines the whole reason you did this in the first place. Don't do it." The hand rubbing his neck dropped to his side. "I, er..." His eyes flicked back and forth towards and away from Nicole's. "Don't you fucking do it." He sighed, looked Nicole right in the eyes, and nodded. "We can do that. Of course," he agreed, sighing right after. "Sorun, you fucking coward."

The look that had grown on Nicole's face was a stark contrast to how Sorun was feeling on the inside, even if he managed to keep up a mostly neutral expression on the outside. She was smiling at him, wide and brightly. "Thank you for listening to me, Sorun."

"Yep... yeah! D-don't worry about it, Nicole." A sudden beeping in Sorun's left ear caused his head to perk up, making him hold a hand up to make Nicole pause. "Uhp, hold on. Gettin' call here."

Nicole nodded immediately, turning back towards the computer console while Sorun stepped a few feet away. He held his hand up to his ear, pressing a small button on the ear piece attached to his ear. He heard a small burst of static, and after it ended he heard a high-pitched voice reach his ears.

"Er, guys? Charmy here. What, uh... what am I supposed to do if I run out of explosives to place?" came Charmy's voice from the device in Sorun's ear.

A noticeably deeper voice sounded from the earpiece in response to the bee's question. "I've noticed that I'm short on explosives as well. Would you care to explain, Sorun?"

The human shrugged. "Don't look at me. It was Charmy's turn in the rotation to pack the equipment," he said.

"Charmy?" came Espio's impatient voice.

"Hey, it's not my fault! The list you guys gave me said to pack six explosives in each satchel!"

"... You mean nine, correct?"

"Nine?" There was a pause from the other end of the comm. device. "Ohhh...! I, uh, eh-heh... I think I may have... read that upside-down..."

The loud slap of a hand impacting the owner's face was heard. "Charmy...!"

"It was just one number, Espio!"

"A number that's going to cost us the mission because we don't have the munitions necessary to blow this factory up!"

"Why do I have to deal with this?" Sorun asked himself, having taken his finger off the earpiece so the other two wouldn't hear him. He turned back towards Nicole whose attention had been drawn from the commotion, to which he explained, "Charmy misread something and shorthanded us on bombs. He read the number nine upside-down somehow."

"Yes, he does that sometimes. It's a bad habit of his."

"... Ngh..." He felt a massive throb in his brain when he heard that. He'd actually had to hold a hand to his forehead to soothe himself from the resulting headache. "... Okay, ignoring that, do we have any solutions? Aside from, you know, going all the way back to Knothole to restock." He ground his teeth and looked down at his right hand. "It'd totally be an option if I figured out how Yamato could make portals already..."

"One moment, please." Nicole closed her eyes, and behind her Sorun noticed that some of the computer monitors were beginning to flicker. The teen quirked an eyebrow when he saw this, but seconds later Nicole had opened her eyes back up and then turned towards the screens. "From what data I managed to gather, it seems this factory is primarily a production site for fuel cores used to power his Badniks. I'm displaying the storage depot."

She waved her hand in front of one of the computer monitors, causing it to shift to an image of what looked like the interior of a small warehouse. Sorun leaned in closer, noting that there at one of the ends of the warehouse were shelves containing seemingly hundreds of pallets, each stuffed to the brim in metal cylinders stamped with, as best as he could tell, caution symbols. He hummed in interest, and looked back at Nicole.

"So this is where they store the fuel thingies?" he asked, nodding to the screen.

"That is correct," she answered. "As is the case with most creations of Eggman's, those cores used to power his machines can often be volatile. One exploding is devastating enough, but if an entire storage unit of those cores were to go off at once the damage could prove to be catastrophic." She flashed a small smirk towards Sorun's way. "I would think that destruction of that magnitude would be sufficient in leveling the entire factory."

"Ahhh. Well, I don't have a better idea. We're going with it." He quickly gave Nicole a grateful thumbs-up, and then stepped away from the computer console and turned his back to Nicole too quickly to catch the smile she'd given him. He then put his fingers towards his earpiece and said, "Alright, you two, Nicole's got a plan. Apparently this factory makes whatever Eggman's using to power his robots, and there's a warehouse full of the things. Does anybody have any bombs left?"

"I have some I have yet to place, yes," Espio answered.

Sorun nodded. "Okay, that works. We're gonna use the bombs you have left to set off a chain reaction with all those fuel cores and the bombs we already have planted around. You think you can find the place alright?"

"I'm familiar with the layout of the facility from previous missions, and I seem to recall the general area of where the storage house was. I'll find my way there easily enough."

"Mhm, Charmy, do you think you can go to the control room and get Nicole? I'm gonna go to Espio in the depot."

"Yeah, no sweat!"

"Alright, cool. Espio, hang tight. Charmy, I swear if you shake Nicole again -"

"I'm not gonna! Geez!"

He didn't bother responding to Charmy. He simply removed his fingers from the earpiece and turned back to Nicole, who had been looking towards Sorun expectantly. "Alright, I'm gonna go to the depot place. Charmy'll swing by and get you. I told him not to shake you again, but if he does feel free to zap him a bunch like you did me, I guess." He paused and tilted his head at Nicole. "Why'd you do that, anyways?"

Nicole looked away from Sorun at hearing the question. Her eyes remained on the computer screens, and her left hand rose up to rub at her right arm in an almost nervous manner. "I was upset that you were ignoring me."

"So you couldn't have talked to me about it before you started shocking me?" Sorun incredulously replied.

"... I did what I wanted to. I'm not entirely sure myself why I did it." A blue, floating screen appeared next to her, which Nicole proceeded to tap at.

Sorun breathed out a laugh, rolling his eyes while turning towards his discarded box. "Maybe you're just a big teaser," he jokingly replied as he crouched down to fold the box.

"Teasing," Nicole quietly said, her tapping on the blue window slowing. "Perhaps that's it..."

"What's it?" Sorun asked, turning back towards the lynx.

"Nothing important to the mission," she quickly answered. "Sorun, I'm opening all the doors in your path to the storage depot while closing off all other routes to the patrolling Badniks. You and Espio should encounter relatively little resistance."

He blinked towards her, but then shrugged and tugged his cardboard box under his arm. "Alright. See you in, uh... I don't know, twenty minutes I guess?" Sorun stood up and walked towards the entrance to the control room, putting one foot out before turning to Nicole one last time. He opened his mouth, closed it, then opened it again. "Yeah, seeya."

"Goodbye." Even after Sorun had left she continued to stare at the spot in the doorway he'd been standing. After a few moments passed Nicole blinked, looked down at her feet, and then shifted her attention to the blue screen as she continued to calmly tap on it.

"Oh, you're real smooth at this, Sorun. Real fuckin' smooth."

Anger. Frustration. Hopelessness. The usual suspects for bringing down Sorun's mood. Most of the time, though, he didn't have a face to pin all of this negativity on. And right now he couldn't decide whether he was supposed to put all the blame on Nicole or himself, and after a bit of thinking decided that, no, this was all his fault. Because when was it not?

At the very least, this mission was going better then most others. Nicole had been true to her word and made the way to the storage depot relatively clear for Sorun. In fact, he'd only encountered a single Badnik on his way over there, which had quickly been cut down with Yamato. None of that was the problem, and frankly, he could barely even bring himself to think about the mission right now. Most of his thoughts were currently occupied with Nicole.

"We're right back on square goddamn one here. We were supposed to avoid her, not go right back to where we were." He rounded past a corner, continuing to think to himself while also beginning to cough into his closed fist. "But what was I supposed to do? She had me boxed in, there was nothing I could have said. All things considered I got out of that pretty okay. More than okay, even. She won't worry about the secret I'm keeping, and all I have to do is keep hanging out with her. And that's not so bad, is it? It's not like you can lie to yourself and say you didn't miss her, either.

"And... I like it when she smiles like that. Feels nice."

"Ack, hkc..." He had to stop and lean against a wall as he finished coughing into his hand. He quickly glanced around the hallway's ceiling, feeling a small bit of relief when he saw that there were no cameras watching him, and took a few seconds to let out a few wheezy breaths before pushing himself off the wall. He looked down at the hand he'd coughed on, and then began shaking his head as he wiped the blood he saw off on his pants.

"You're a goddamned fool, Sorun," he thought as he continued walking.

The storage depot was just that: a storage depot. A big warehouse connected to the factory that was mainly full of shelving units. Surprisingly, it was unguarded. At least it was when Sorun had arrived, as he came to the storage depot seeing the bodies of Badniks rent in half from something.

When he looked further towards the back of the warehouse, he saw the cause immediately in a wandering Badnik. One moment it had been walking along on its own, and in the next moment a small, metal object whirled right through the Badnik and caused it to collapse in halves. The object stopped once it lodged itself into a nearby shelf, revealing to be a shuriken. A shuriken that was picked up once its owner materialized right next to it while also reclaiming the lodged weapon in one sooth motion.

It was Espio, then. Sorun liked Espio. He was calm, quiet, didn't speak all that much unless necessary and didn't ambush Sorun out of nowhere to ask him personal questions. Just the opposite, he kept to himself for the most part and on the rare occasion he did speak he usually wasn't too boring to talk with. So Sorun had grown to respect him, both for not being too chatty and for being so efficient at what he did best, which was sneak around and throw sharp metal things. And he always thought ninjas were kind of cool. So by extension Espio was kind of cool to him.

"Geez, how hard is he whipping those things for them to cut through whole robots?" Sorun silently wondered to himself. He watched as the chameleon briefly inspected the shuriken, only to the conceal the weapon in his gloves before turning towards a nearby shelf. Even from here Sorun recognized the massive metal tubes and the caution symbols printed on their sides. "Guess those are the fuel whatevers. Espio beat me to it. Alright, guess I'll go and say hi."

It was just when Espio had crouched down in front of the shelved canisters did Sorun choose to Trick on top of the shelf in a seated position. The chameleon's immediate reaction was to reach into his glove for a shuriken, but right when he pulled it out halfway he stilled upon seeing it was Sorun staring down at him. He sighed, and then replaced the shuriken while crouching back down.

"You would do well not to startle people like that," Espio said, placing the satchel of explosives down on the ground next to him. "I could have accidentally taken your head off right there."

Even knowing it was said as an honest warning still sent a slight chill down Sorun's spine. He tried his best to ignore it. "Oh come on.

You're telling me you never messed with anybody with your invisibility?"

"Perhaps on occasion," Espio answered as he reached into the satchel. "Since you're here could you help in arming these bombs?" he asked, pulling out one of the bombs and tossing it up towards Sorun.

The human caught the bomb easily enough, turning the device over in his hand. Bundles of wrapped explosives duct taped together and wired to a remote detonator. Standard homemade bomb. "Yeah, sure," he said, scooting over to a nearby canister and sticking the adhesive back of the bomb onto it. "Okay, so... flip this switch, make sure this wire's connected..." he mumbled under his breath, sticking his tongue out in concentration as he fiddled with the bomb's controls.

He didn't know why, but somehow it felt stranger knowing he could arm live explosives with ease now compared to having powers. Maybe it was because arming a bomb was knowledge he'd earned and now owned after being taught it as compared to just being handed it for "free" by a magic rock. And despite him earning it fairly it was still a skill he never imagined himself ever having in a normal life. Unless he'd ever taken a career in something like demolition. Or terrorism.

And all it took was a bunch of trial and error and blowing Antoine up with paint bombs a lot until he got it right.

"I'm surprised you volunteered to come help me with this," Espio said from below Sorun, the chameleon in the process of arming his own explosive. "I would have thought you'd just let Charmy do this while you took Nicole out of here."

"Yeah, well... to tell you the truth I just needed to get away from Nicole for a bit," Sorun admitted after a long pause.

"I see. I had noticed you've been withdrawn with her as of late-"

"That word again, withdrawn, geez..."

"- and it made me wonder if something happened."

Shaking his head, Sorun flipped the last switch on the bomb to activate the transceiver for the detonator. "Nothing happened. We patched things up, actually," he said, moving back to the edge of the shelf so he could sit down and stare down at Espio. "Yeah, it was... it was this whole stupid thing, don't worry about it."

Espio paused in his work, flashed his yellow eyes up at Sorun, and with a small shrug turned back to his own bomb. "If you say so. Glad to hear you worked through your issues."

"Wouldn't that be the day." Rolling his eyes, Sorun Tricked back down to ground level only to then sit down on a nearby crate. "Guess you could say that. How've you been, Espio?" Sorun suddenly asked. "I guess you must have been away from your own home for a while now being here with the rest of the Chaotix and away from..." Sorun trailed off as his eyebrows scrunched in confusion. "... Hey, where are you from, anyways? I never asked."

"... I'm from a community of chameleons that live up on Angel Island," Espio answered, keeping his spine-lined back to Sorun as he continued arming his bomb.

Sorun hummed in acknowledgement. "Ah, the infamous floating island. Y'know, I've actually heard very little about the place. I thought I heard Knuckles mention once that the echidna live there?"

"They do, but there were others as well. The chameleon community I mentioned was one such group."

"Ah, alright." The human teen nodded in understanding. "So how're they doing?"

"I'm unsure," Espio answered. "Things up on the island have been... difficult."

"So I've heard. What happened up there, anyways?"

"More than I could tell in the time we have," Espio bitterly mumbled to him. "A while back Eggman's forces had... occupied the island for a time. We managed to do what we could, dismantled a prison camp that had been set up, but by then the echidna population had already been decimated." As one hand continued to work on the bomb another hand reached upwards to rub across an exhausted Espio's face. "It doesn't help matters that there's an entire faction of the echidna that are having a civil war amidst each other alongside everything else going on."

Sorun grimaced. Knuckles and Julie-Su had always been tight-lipped on things up on the island, and after hearing that from Espio he could understand why. Their people evidently had problems. The mention of a prison camp alone briefly made his hands shudder in anger. When he heard about the civil war, though, he couldn't help but tilt his head in question.

"What do you mean a civil war?" he asked. "They seriously have the resources to waste time on a civil war with the whole Eggman thing going on?"

"Eggman's presence on the island was completely diminished when we and the Freedom Fighters liberated it from him, and situations on the island were always self-contained up there. And even before Echindaopolis - the city they'd occupied before Eggman came - fell, they had problems with the Dark Legion Knuckles and the rest of us Chaotix always had to deal with."

Sorun slowly nodded in understanding, but then paused halfway. "The Dark Legion? You can't be serio- you are serious my god that sounds lame..."

Espio flipped a final switch on the bomb, arming the receiver, and then turned towards Sorun while still in a crouching position. "They're group of echidna who have a near-radical reverence of technology. You'd be hard-pressed to find a member of the Dark Legion that didn't undergo cybernetic augmentation of some kind, and they often clashed with the rest of the echidna civilization living on Angel Island due to differing beliefs over technology. Current events have made it so the group split off into two factions, a Flame and Frost Legion, and they've been at war with one-another since then. Otherwise they've kept to themselves for the most part."

"This is ridiculous." Sorun found himself pinching the bridge of his nose. "This is- this is actual nonsense I'm hearing. Doesn't even sound real. Dude, what happened up there to make things so dire?"

"As I said. Too much to explain," Espio said. "Between the warring Legions, the faction of dingoes that have been getting into constant skirmishes with the echidna, which is a separate situation entirely, and the loss of their city and massive portion of their population, all coupled with their isolation up on the island, it... things could be better. Much better." He closed his eyes and turned his head to the side. "And so... I'm unsure what became of the chameleon community up there amidst all that chaos, or any of the other Mobian communities that had resided up there for that matter. I don't imagine things ended well. Much was lost in all that fighting."

"Sounds like it." Even by Mobius standards what Sorun was hearing seemed a bit out there. Far outside of the normal brand of weirdness here he was used to dealing with. And it really sounded like there was some history that happened up there; lots and lots of history and fighting that happened way before Sorun ever got here. He was tempted to ask more, but another part of him dreaded hearing exactly how much there was to say on the island. "So the, er, normal echidna. The non-cyborgy ones. They're okay?"

"For however many of them remain, yes," Espio confirmed with a nod. "They've been holed up in a makeshift refugee camp ever since Eggman's occupation ended, though we've been out of touch with them since then. I'm unsure as to what their current state actually is."

"Knuckles doesn't keep in contact?"

"He... had a falling out of sorts. I shouldn't say more." Glancing back at the armed bomb, Espio nodded his head and stood up to his full height. "The bombs are ready to go. We should depart."

"Yeah." Nodding his head, Sorun put his finger up to his earpiece. "Charmy, we're all set. You and Nicole good?"

"We're already outside waiting for you," said Charmy's voice through the earpiece. "Hurry up and get back so we can go home!"

"I'll go extra slow just for you, Charmy." Sorun's finger was removed from the earpiece before he could hear a retort from the bee. He glanced towards Espio, the chameleon nodding back to him before his body phased into invisibility. Sorun stared at the spot the chameleon had been standing in before disappearing, rolled his eyes with a sigh, and then began unfolding his cardboard box once more.

"Any-takers-for-doing-the-honors-no-alright-I'm-hittin'-the-button."

This sentence was said in the same breath that Sorun pulled the detonator he'd been carrying out from his pocket. In the single second he'd blurted it out there was a moment where Charmy had reached for the remote in his hands, but before the bee had even gotten close Sorun's thumb had compressed down on the big, red button in the center of the device.

There was the sound of a small beep! , followed by a little red light on the upper right corner of the detonator lighting up. An instant later the ground beneath the group began to shake, and a large, deafening explosion was heard in the distance. From near the back of the factory they all stared at a large, orange fireball that broke through the roof and shot up towards the sky, the resulting shockwave rattling the entire building before causing it to collapse completely in on itself. Overall, the resulting complete destruction of the factory took less than ten seconds from the start of the explosion.

The ones responsible for this sabotage stood hidden in cover amongst the pile of shipping containers near the outer perimeter of the compound the previously-intact factory had occupied. Sorun and Espio both looked on towards the destruction with mainly impassive looks, while Charmy was pouting towards Sorun with his wings angrily buzzing behind him.

"I wanted to hit the button this time," Charmy grumbled out, crossing his arms and turning away in a small huff. Sorun had glanced back at him, shrugged, and then fully turned his body away from the smoldering remains of the factory.

"Maybe next time, Charmy," the human said. "Next time. Right now I just wanna go back to Knothole and away from here."

"As do we all," Espio agreed. "There were still a small number of Badniks patrolling outside the factory that will be searching the premises. Let's leave now while we're still in the clear."

With that said, Espio spun around and began walking in the opposite direction of the factory, towards where they'd parked the floating saucer vehicle they'd used to come here now hidden in the nearby woods. Charmy floated right behind him, still grumbling under his breath with his head hung low. Sorun stayed where he was, his eyes lingering on the handheld device held in Charmy's hand.

"... Man." He breathed out a small sigh, glancing back at the smoldering remains of the factory before turning back towards Charmy's back, and then looking down at the small computer again. "What... a... day." After turning his head to the side to let out a light cough, he calmly placed his hands into his pockets and began following the others.

Somewhere on the northern continent

"Man... gettin' bored here."

At one point this had been a factory. Before he came it was one of the bigger ones that churned out Badniks by the hundreds an hour, and when he arrived it had been home to thousands of the robots, all of varying size and weaponry.

Now he was surrounded by thousands of robotic corpses, with the factory being reduced to absolute rubble right behind him. In the middle of the graveyard of Badniks, their corpses packed so tightly together the ground was not visible, was a man in a red hood sitting on the corpse of a rather large Badnik. His claymore sword was stabbed right into the body of another robot right in front of him, his hands draped over the cross guard and his fingers tapping against the guard of the sword styled in the shape of a screaming skull.

"Egh... third one in the last hour. Wish the Freedom Fighters would hurry the hell up, but I guess it's good they're going at this pace. And while they're doing their thing I get to go around and hit the really big targets to pressure Eggman." His hooded head turned towards the remains of the destroyed factory. "... Should probably slow down, actually," he muttered to himself. "Can't let Eggman get too suspicious over all his factories blowin' up, and I can't tip the Freedom Fighters off that somebody's going around wrecking his shit. They gotta think everything's on them, and the big guy's gotta think the same."

With a small groan, he sat up from the robot while also pulling the large sword and its notched tip out from the robot's corpse. With one hand, he spun the sword around in a circle in a feat of inhuman strength before finally resting it on his shoulder.

"Pretty soon the tipping point for Eggman will get here, and that should prompt that whole mess to start. 'Til then, I gotta go and get my hands on a present for Eggman. 'Least I gotta get it before Sorun goes and eats it." He began to tip-toe his way down the hill of Badnik corpses, but then stopped midway. "Er, wait, don't I need two?"

Humming, Rubrum dug into the pocket of his cloak before bringing out a small piece of notebook paper. He flipped it over to read the contents written on the front, and then made a small "ah" of understanding. "Ohh, alright, I keep one and- okay, yeah." He pocketed the paper, and then resumed his trek through the graveyard of Badniks.

"A little bit closer," Rubrum mumbled to himself. "Just a little bit closer to the end of all this madness..."

Chapter 34

A/N- So I've been told it's Neo-Walkers and not Neo-Watchers. And then I looked it up and it is, in fact, Neo-Walkers. So now I gotta go back and change that because of big whoops on my part. Sorry about that, guys.

Recursion Error

Episode 34- The melancholic pair

So apparently there was a giant robot stomping its way towards Knothole City.

As far as Sorun was concerned that was par for the course at this point.

The entire city had been alerted to it early in the morning on account of the seismic readings picked up by equipment in the HQ's lab. Tails doing a quick fly-by confirmed that the source of the readings was the aforementioned robot. A hundred-meter tall Badnik that was slowly making its way towards Knothole. At a very liberal pace, according to the fox.

So they had that to deal with now. It was an hour after the fact, and everybody was huddled up in the Freedom HQ's lab to talk strategy. Everybody had crowded around the computer monitors which was displaying a recording of the robot slowly approaching the city, with Sally at the head of the pack to give a rundown of the situation. There was one exception, however, and that was in Sorun. Sorun, who was sitting on the floor near the back of the lab and tracing shapes in the air in front of him using the tip of the Yamato.

"Hmm..." There was a bit of blue power glowing at the tip of the sword, and when he traced the sword downwards a thin, blue line of power was left floating in the air behind it. Sorun's brows were furrowed in concentration, but when the line dissipated he let out a frustrated sigh. "Yeah, that's not it either," he thought. "How the... what the hell, this should work. Why isn't this working?"

Thus far his experimentation with Yamato had born little fruit. He mainly just wanted to figure out how to perform Judgement Cuts - and maybe, should he ever figure that out, something beyond even that -, but even more than that he wanted to figure out how to use the sword to make portals. Because he imagined instantaneous transport to literally anywhere on the planet had to have some use for the Freedom Fighters, and at the very least it would make getting around for him a hell of a lot easier.

But he'd made little progress in figuring it out. Cutting through things and long-distance cuts, yes. Portals? He... he felt like he was a little closer than he was when he first got the sword, but there was something missing. Like he was failing to grasp some crucial piece. He didn't know, but so far all he was able to do was make a bunch of pretty blue lines that float in the air.

Not even close to a portal. But progress was progress.

Sighing, he set the sword down on the ground next to him and craned his head over to the front of the lab, towards the computer monitors everybody was staring at. On display was the giant, hundred-meter tall Badnik slowly stomping its way towards Knothole. Bipedal and humanoid in shape, covered in blue and red metal plating. And to top it off was the head, which was little more than a giant ball shaped in the visage of Eggman's head. It even had a giant piece of jagged metal welded to its face to resemble his mustache.

"Pfft. Thing's a Gundam knockoff," Sorun thought. "Surprisingly Eggman trying to flatten Knothole with a giant robot isn't one of his more 'out there' schemes. Which says a lot about him and his insanity. And me for not even flinching at this point."

He took one last glance at the image of the robot, and then turned his eyes downwards so he could continue to fiddle with his katana. Sally's words just barely managed to reach his ears, his focus mainly on his blade.

"- And as you can see, this thing is on a direct path towards Knothole," Sally said, pointing towards one of the computer monitors displaying the gargantuan Badnik. "As far as we can tell purely from observation, there doesn't appear to be any external weapons of any sort attached to it. For all intents and purposes, it appears that Dr. Robotnik intends for this Badnik to literally stomp out Knothole." She made a low, displeased sigh and crossed her arms. "And judging from its size, it wouldn't have that difficult of a time."

A red arm in the crowd was raised. "So how long until it reaches Knothole?" Knuckles asked.

"At the rate this thing is going at?" Sally glanced at the robot. "Rotor and I worked out the math earlier. It's around one-hundred miles away from Knothole, so about one week."

The reaction in the crowd was fairly mixed. Most people began glancing back and forth at each other and Sally, confused looks in their eyes. There were even a few nervous chuckles spread around, almost as if some took what the princess said as a joke, but when the grim look on her face refused to budge those nervous chuckles quickly died down into questioning murmurs.

The murmuring ceased when a blue form stepped up in front of the crowd. "A whole week?" Sonic asked in disbelief, a lopsided grin on his face that directly contrasted with the concern in his eyes. "You're serious?"

"Yeah, it's going pretty slow, Sonic." This voice came from Rotor, who was sitting in a chair next to Sally and tapping away at a keyboard. He pushed himself away and spun around in his chair, affixing Sonic with a serious glare. "My best guess is that the power requirements for that thing are so huge that it needs to go that slow to conserve power. Or it's just Eggman taunting us. Either way, we got some time before that thing gets to Knothole, but if it does reach Knothole, then there's not much we're gonna be able to do. We might have to consider evacuation procedures if it comes to that."

"It's not gonna come to that," Sally denied with a shake of her head. "We're stopping that thing before it ever steps foot in Knothole."

"But how?" Sonic asked. "Are we just gonna walk up to the thing and shut it down from the inside?"

"That was the plan." Sally turned her head to Rotor and nodded at him. The walrus gave a nod in return, and then turned back to his keyboard and began typing away again. "Unfortunately, we hit a snag."

The screens displaying the colossal Badnik's image flickered, drawing everybody's attention. The view changed to the same image of the walking robot, in a slightly different location at a different time of day. What was immediately noticeable was the small biplane floating around the top of the robot, a yellow fox manning the pilot's seat. The plane had twisted in the air so that it was pointed right at the robot's face, and then from the front of the plane two yellow beams of light fired out and shot towards the robot.

The beams never hit the Badnik. Right before they impacted against its face, the two lasers collided with a patch of shimmery air just above the robot's chassis. That one disturbance caused the air all around the giant robot to shimmer, revealing a gigantic, transparent, dome-like force surrounding the walking titan of metal. The Tornado had swerved around and tried firing at the robot again and again to no avail, the transparent dome surrounding the Badnik protecting it from each attack.

With that, the footage paused, and all eyes were drawn back to Sally. "Tails attempted to probe the Badnik's defenses with the Tornado's weapons, but this proved to be futile. As best as we can figure, there's a... shield of some sorts surrounding the Badnik and protecting it from any outside attack. Tails reported that he tried to fly directly into it, but whatever that bubble surrounding the Badnik is wouldn't even let that in. He's fine," she explained, assuaging the concerned looks that had grown on the faces of some, "but the Tornado lost a wing as a result and Tails is working to fix that. In the meantime, until we find a way past that shield there isn't much we can do."

"C'est impossible!" This cry came from Antoine, standing in the middle of the gathering and who threw his arms up in outrage. "How are we suppose-ed to attack ze Badnik if we cannot touch ze Badnik!?"

"Dunno, Ant," Sonic answered with a shrug. "I mean if we had a way of teleporting past that shield or something that'd be one thing, but..." He suddenly trailed off, his eyes lighting up as an idea seemed to come to his mind. The others around him seemed to have come to the same realization, and in unison all of the gathered Mobians began to slowly spin around until their eyes rested on the sole human sitting on the other end of the lab.

Sorun, who had turned the Yamato the other way and was squinting at the tip of the sword, suddenly felt an entire room's worth of eyes on him. He blinked, and then turned his head to the side to find everybody staring at him. "Huh? What?" he asked, slowly putting the sword back down. "I didn't- I'm sorry, I didn't catch any of that. What's going on?"

The situation: simple. A giant Badnik was threatening all of Knothole and it needed to be deal with. The problem was that it had a shield that prevented anything from getting too close to it.

The solution: even simpler. There were two people within the Freedom Fighters that had teleportation capabilities: Sorun and Shadow. So they would slip past through the shield using their powers and deal with it.

What "deal with it" entailed Sorun didn't have a clue, because that was about the best everybody could think up before they shoved both him and Shadow in the Freedom Fighter Special to fly them out to the Badnik. They had to destroy the thing, that much was obvious to Sorun, but he didn't know how they were supposed to go about doing that. The thing was massive; the literal size of a building, probably even bigger.

To say Sorun was nervous was an understatement. He was sitting against the wall in the FF Special's cargo bay, nervously tapping at his knees as he thought about what was coming up. But when he looked towards Shadow, who was sitting at the opposite end of the cargo hold with one leg pulled up and an arm draped over his knee, he looked the very picture of calm. So calm that Sorun would think he was sleeping if it weren't for the fact his eyes were open, but even then he was unsure.

Funnily enough, Sorun had never once gone on a single mission with Shadow. In fact, he was the only person period he had yet to go on a mission with, and apparently, that wasn't outside the norm. He'd been told that the dark hedgehog preferred working alone. Always claimed that other people working with him would slow him down. Usually Sorun would roll his eyes at the claim and call him arrogant, but considering all the powers he'd seen the Mobian display, Sorun was inclined to believe him.

Which is why it came as such a surprise to Sorun that Shadow had agreed to come along with Sorun on this mission. No, even more than that, he'd asked . Said that the more numbers they had on the mission the better chance of success, and Sorun could see the logic in that considering there could only be a max of two people going in on this, and he was one of them. Though he still would have expected Shadow to shoulder the mission all on his own instead of just doing it alongside Sorun. He definitely had the ability to do so.

Well, at the end of the day, it was more help for Sorun, and it meant he didn't have to take on a giant robot by himself. So he'd simply shrugged and went along with it.

"Shadow the Hedgehog... I can never figure this guy out." Sorun exhaled slowly through his nose as he continued to stare at the unflinching Mobian. "He's like the exact opposite of what I'd expect a Mobian to be. Not... Infinite-level bad, but just... I don't know, kind of like me I guess. All distant from everybody and broody and never cracks a smile. He's got a lot of powers, too. Like, way more than anybody else. Because of that Chaos Control thing he can do? Something like that, I don't... he never went into detail with it."

The hedgehog was quite simply an enigma to him. He'd act so distant from everybody, and yet once in a while he'd do something that would act completely contradictory to his usual nature. Like that one time...

"Hey, you mind helping me out with something?"

Of course he'd found Shadow training in Crate Land. If it wasn't sleeping, eating, helping Sorun train his powers, or on a mission somewhere, he was here training. The guy was razor-focused in honing his abilities, Sorun would give him that much. Even more than he was in trying to figure the Yamato out.

Usually he wouldn't have come all the way out here to disturb Shadow with such a mundane task, but this was a special case. Special in that he didn't want any of the others knowing he was going out of his way to do this, but didn't care if Shadow knew. Whether the hedgehog would actually agree to come help him was a different matter entirely, and honestly Sorun was doubting it, but he figured it was worth a try.

Shadow, who had been tossing his Chaos Spears at crates, lowered the hand that had been holding one of the crackling lances and willed it to disappear as he turned around towards the human. He looked slightly annoyed at having been interrupted, but still nodded towards Sorun in greeting. "What is it?" he asked.

"Right, so do you know Rosie?" When Shadow sent him a blank look, Sorun elaborated. "She's this old Mobian lady that lives in Knothole, looks after these three kids that got orphaned I guess from the whole... you know. I was walkin' around Knothole earlier and met them and it turns out one of the kids lost a doll or something like that, so..." Sorun exhaled and looked towards the side. "I... kind of got roped into looking for the thing. And I don't really want to spend all day on this, so, uh... mind lending a hand?"

A displeased exhale left Shadow's nose, followed by him crossing his arms. "You're hunting down lost toys now?"

"I mean... they're orphans, dude. It was kind of hard to say no. Plus it probably woulda hurt the Freedom Fighters' image if I said no, and I'm affiliated with them, so, you know..." He sighed and rubbed a hand across his forehead. "Listen, can you please help me with this? I don't want the others knowing I'm doing this."

"And why not?"

"'Cause it looks laaaame, man," Sorun ground out in an irritated tone. "Look, if it's the two of us it'll take, like, an hour. Max. Probably not even that much."

Shadow just scoffed. "And you don't think I have anything better to do than hunt down some lost child's things?"

"Oh, oh yeah, 'cause you standing around throwing Chaos Spears at stationary crates is such a productive use of your time," Sorun snarked with a roll of his eyes. "Look, man, I'm asking as a favor. Alright?"

He'd known going in that the odds of Shadow actually agreeing to such a thing was a long shot. What he figured would happen was that Shadow would snap at him for interrupting him, tell him off, and then he'd go back to mindlessly throwing his Chaos Spears back at boxes as Sorun went hunting around Knothole like an idiot looking for a doll. The only thing that'd drawn him to Shadow was the vague hope that he'd say yes to helping. Sorun hadn't actually expected it.

So when Shadow had closed his eyes in thought, let out a deep sigh, and then nodded, Sorun didn't know what to think. "Alright, let's go. Where was it last seen?"

"Uh..." Sorun had begun rapidly blinking in Shadow's direction, and his mouth had dropped slightly open from how surprised he was at hearing the hedgehog. "W-wait, for real?"

His reaction only seemed to make Shadow more annoyed. "Pick your jaw up off the ground already. I don't have all day and I'd like to get back to this as soon as possible." He walked forwards, shoving Sorun aside with his shoulder as he walked past him. "We'll go the site of the last sighting and work outwards from there. If we're efficient enough we'll find it within the hour."

"Yeeeah..." Sorun cleared his throat, and then began following directly behind Shadow. "I, uh, I think she mentioned something about the middle of town..."

Eventually they had found the doll. It'd been in a tree the kids had been climbing and playing around in, and as far as Sorun and Shadow could guess the child who'd lost the doll had just accidentally left it there. Shadow had been the one to spot it. How he did it Sorun hadn't a clue, he must have had amazing eyesight to pick the doll out amidst all those branches and leaves for how far they'd been standing away from the tree. All he knew was that if Shadow hadn't been there to spot it Sorun himself would have likely spent hours looking around for the thing.

Of course, after retrieving the doll they went back to Rosie and the three children she looked after to return the doll. There'd been a lot of gratitude and, much to the chagrin of both Sorun and Shadow, the children had hugged their legs. There'd actually been a moment where both he and Shadow had been glancing towards each other with the most uncomfortable looks on their faces imaginable, and in that moment they'd both teleported away from as far from the children as possible. Once they'd escaped they'd silently looked at each other once again, and without so much as passing a word between one another they agreed to never speak of that again and then went on with the rest of their day.

It was a bit comforting knowing there was at least one person out there who reacted appropriately to that kind of attention like he did. Somebody a bit more normal compared to all the other Mobians around them. He liked Shadow in that sense. It felt like he was around a regular person.

"Hey." Shadow's smooth voice suddenly calling out to him drew Sorun from his thoughts, causing him to look up towards the hedgehog sitting on the other side of the cargo hold. "We're going to be dropping onto the Badnik from above. Are you okay to make a jump that big?" he asked.

"Yeah, Tricking cancels out momentum and inertia," Sorun confirmed with a nod. "I tested it. I mean theoretically speaking I could probably survive any kind of fall as long as I Trick somewhere before hitting ground, so... yeah, I should be good." He coughed once and turned his head to the side. "Also I, uh... have wings."

"Right. Of course." Shadow gave him a brisk nod, and then turned his head towards the cargo bay door upon hearing a quiet, grinding sound. The door began to fold open, prompting him to stand up to his feet. "We must be approaching our destination," he said. "Get ready."

Sorun copied Shadow's movements, pulling himself up and making his way towards the opening of the cargo bay. He stopped right next to Shadow, who was peering downwards with a scowl on his face. Sorun decided to look down with him.

The first thing his had to do was hold his hair back from whipping around everywhere from the intense wind blasting him in the face. Then there was the vertigo that hit him when he saw just how far up off the ground they were, though those feelings soon subsided when he saw what was just below them. The giant blue and red Badnik.

Even from all the way up here Sorun could see the giant footprints left behind by the robot making large indentations in the forest behind it. And it was going slowly. So slowly, in fact, that it felt like it took whole minutes just for it to raise and lower a single foot. When it did impact the ground with a foot, though, Sorun could have sworn he heard it. Despite the fact they were over a hundred meters off the ground and the engines of the FF Special were drowning out almost all sound, he still heard those giant footsteps. Almost felt them, even.

"This thing's gonna flatten Knothole if it makes it that far," Sorun thought to himself, slight dread filling his being when he looked down at the metal monstrosity below him. "This thing's already flattening a bunch of trees wherever it's stepping. We gotta stop it right now." He turned his head towards Shadow. "Hey, so what's the-!?"

Shadow had already jumped off of the lip of the cargo bay's opening and was falling right towards the giant Badnik. Sorun blew out a disbelieving gasp at the sight, roughly shook his head, and jumped right after him.

Falling from a deadly height like this didn't scare Sorun nearly as much as it should have. Maybe it was because he knew in the back of his mind he could just fly away should worst come to worst. Or teleport, even. He had so many ways of mitigating a deadly fall at this point that heights were practically meaningless to him. So as his body tore through the air, wind ripping past his face and clothes, he couldn't muster much more than an impassive expression as his eyes followed Shadow's body down towards the Badnik.

The robot itself was still giving Sorun some concern, as he still hadn't a clue on how they were supposed to take this thing out. But he trusted Shadow had some kind of plan for it. Or an idea at the very least.

Very faintly Sorun could make out the near-invisible force field spread out in a dome around the Badnik's body. Shadow, being much lower and closer to the Badnik, suddenly had bolts of greenish-yellow Chaos energy arcing around his body. Right before his form impacted with the faint shield, Shadow's body completely disappeared, and in the same instant Sorun saw a flash of green on the Badnik's left shoulder, followed by him just barely being able to make out the small dot that was Shadow's body.

Following his lead, Sorun simply Tricked away from where he was, appearing right next to Shadow on the shoulder. He'd stumbled just the slightest amount, the constant moving of the robot and the sudden reposition making Sorun just a tad off-balance, but soon enough he'd managed to catch his footing and find solid purchase on the metal surface he stood on. He sighed out, and then looked to the side towards Shadow. The hedgehog was looking closely at him, but soon enough gave Sorun an approving nod, making the teen sigh out again.

"Alright, so we made it!" Sorun called out, having to slightly raise his voice over the loud, mechanical clunking sounds of the robot and the high wind due to the altitude. "What are we actually doing to stop this thing!?"

"This Badnik will have a power source like any other machine of Robotnik's!" Shadow called back. "If we can get to the core of its power and destroy it, that should stop this thing for good!"

"Oh! Alright, that makes sense!" Sorun nodded towards Shadow, and then in a flash of blue the Yamato appeared in his left hand. "So I guess we're taking this thing out from the inside!?"

"That would be ideal, yes!"

"Works for me!" He didn't see any better alternative, and he wanted to get away from all this open air, even if it was into the innards of a giant robot. So he reached forwards and gripped the handle of Yamato with his right hand, pulling the sword from its sheath as he looked towards the machine's neck. Four straight cuts and a kick from Sorun later, and a square entrance had been cut into the side of the Badnik's neck. Sorun and Shadow glanced at each other, nodded, and then proceeded to walk their way through the hole.

Sorun hadn't known what to expect to find on the inside of a giant robot's neck. A lot of cramped space from tons of moving parts, he supposed, and to be fair there was a lot of that. The interior of the dimly-lit neck was host to all sorts of pistons and gears all around, working and moving in tandem with the motion of the Badnik while also filling the air with the sound of a soft, grinding noise.

Surprisingly, though, the neck wasn't completely stuffed with these metal contraptions. In fact, it was fairly spacious. They'd managed to crawl their way past all of the machinery easily enough, and after making their way past a pair of moving gears dropped down a few feet onto, of all things, a catwalk. A metal catwalk sitting right in the center of the robot's neck.

Sorun touched down on the catwalk with a soft grunt, with Shadow landing silently right behind him. Taking a glance around, it seemed that the neck was more of a hollow tube lined with pistons and gears than a crammed piece of machinery. Looking above all he saw was clusters of metal and wire, and when he looked over the side of the catwalk, down below, all he saw was a gigantic tube leading to darkness. Sorun made an uneasy hum and stepped away from the edge of the catwalk.

"This... isn't how I expected this place to look," Sorun mumbled as he turned towards Shadow. "And is it me or does it feel way bigger in here than it looked on the outside?"

"Perhaps. Eggman's always had a peculiar way of constructing his contraptions," Shadow replied in an even tone. "Regardless of what the inside of this thing looks like, our objective remains the same."

"Right." Nodding uneasily, Sorun looked upwards. "So would that be in the head, or...?"

Shadow shook his head. "No, I imagine the only thing up there would be this Badnik's main processor. Our goal is likely elsewhere. The Doctor has a habit of placing the power sources of his machines in obvious places. In this case it's likely somewhere towards the center of its body."

"Wouldn't destroying the main processor do the same thing, though?" Sorun asked, turning his head back down to Shadow. "That'd basically be destroying its brain. Badnik dies either way, right?" Not to mention he didn't really know if he wanted to traverse deeper into this thing.

To his dismay, Shadow shook his head. "There's no telling how this Badnik will react if we do that," he explained. "Do you really want to know how much would be destroyed if a Badnik of this size were to go ballistic due to you cutting its brain out?"

Grimacing, Sorun shook his head. That did sound risky now that Shadow mentioned it. In all likelihood the thing would just fall down dead, but every once in a while Sorun had cut off an Egg Pawn's head and it would do something funny. Like run around grasping randomly at random things. Or explode. He didn't want to find out how much devastation a Badnik this big could create by self-destructing.

He shuddered. They were likely far enough away that Knothole and the Freedom HQ would be fine, but that was still possibly miles of forest that would be scorched if this thing just happened to blow up. And that wasn't even concerning both him and Shadow, who were inside of the thing. No, Shadow was right. They had to make sure this thing would die without a chance of blowing up. And that meant going directly for the power core.

Which, unfortunately, meant they had to go deeper.

"Well... you make a compelling argument." Sorun took a deep breath, and then peered over the edge of the catwalk again. "Guess the, uh, the power core would be... somewhere in the chest region or something."

"I'd wager that's a fair assessment." Shadow peered down into the darkness along with Sorun, making no visible reaction at the sight. He then glanced towards Sorun, frowning a bit when he saw the hesitant look on his face. He loudly snapped his fingers to draw the human's attention, Sorun letting out a startled gasp before turning his eyes to Shadow. "Stay focused, Sorun," he said, his voice calm but commanding.

Sorun gave a jerky nod. "I'm calm. Super calm." He let out a low groan as his Bringer Claws appeared folded over his shoulders. "Gah, man, I hope this works out..."

He jumped down before he could have any second thoughts, with Shadow dropping down right behind him. Dropping down the long, metal tunnel that was this thing's neck was less eventful and more nerve-wracking for Sorun, but every so often as he dropped he would look back upwards towards Shadow's face. He was managing to maintain his focused scowl throughout this entire thing. Sorun didn't even want to know what kind of face he'd been making thus far. Probably an incredibly nervous one. He might have been slightly embarrassed if it weren't for the fact he couldn't find it in himself to care so much at the moment.

They'd eventually passed the threshold that separated the neck from the top of the torso of the Badnik. Surprisingly, Sorun first noted that there was more light in here than the neck. Not much- it was still a dreary, dark gray, but at the very least there was enough light that there was useable visibility.

The second thing he'd noted, even as he and Shadow continued falling down, was that the inside of wherever they'd dropped down into was unusually spacious. It was like they'd dropped down into a wide, open metallic chasm lined with moving pistons and gears, and right below them were several building-like platforms sticking up from the darkness that was deeper below into the giant Badnik's body. Platforms that were, oddly enough, all interconnected by what seemed to be metal railings.

"... Who designs something like this?" Sorun silently wondered to himself as his Bringer Claws beat down, slowing him down enough that he softly landed on one of the square roofs of the structures. Shadow dropped down right next to him, looking no worse for wear. "Seriously, what... what kind of weirdo psycho-maniac builds stuff like this inside a giant robot? The same kinda guy that builds a giant robot, I guess..."

Sorun had only taken a single tentative step forwards when something happened. Near the center of the roof-like structure he and Shadow stood on, something rose up. A small, tube-like pod had slid right up from the ground, and like a door the front of the tube opened up, prompting whatever was inside of it to step out.

It was a Badnik, that much was obvious. Sorun had almost mistaken it for an Egg Pawn, but there were some small differences he'd immediately noticed. This one was colored a bright gold color instead of the usual red, and in addition to the long lance it held in its right hand, it held a large, circular shield in its left hand that shined the same sheen of gold as its chassis.

"It appears we'll be encountering resistance on the way to our objective," Shadow noted, eyes narrowing in the direction of the Badnik. "This one's a rare type. Be on guard."

"Huh, the gold one's rare, who woulda guessed..." A small hum left Sorun as a Summoned Sword appeared right next to him. "Let's see how good that shield is."

The Summoned Sword shot forwards towards the golden Egg Pawn. Its blue eye-sensors seemed to flash, and right before the sword hit it raised its shield up in defense. Sorun heard a displeased sound leave his own throat when he saw the sword harmlessly shatter off the surface of the shield, not even leaving a scratch on it.

"... Alright, it's pretty good." He made a hapless shrug, Bringer Claws disappearing from his back as Yamato manifested in his hands. "Guess this one needs a personal touch," he continued, pulling the katana out from its sheath.

Without another word, Sorun Tricked right in front of the Badnik. Whether his sudden appearance did anything to startle the robot or not was unclear to the teen, as he'd wasted no time in slashing forwards with the katana the instant he appeared in front of it. As expected, the blade cleaved the shield completely in half, with both halves falling away from the Badnik's hand. In the same motion he spun Yamato around in a reverse grip, slashing back in the opposite direction and through the Badnik's body. Electrical sparks began flying out of the quickly-made seam in its body, and in the next instant both halves fell down to the floor.

From behind, he heard the silent hissing sound of another one of the tubes rising up from the ground. He turned his head around just in time to see another golden Egg Pawn charging forwards out of the tube and towards him, but right before it had gotten too close Sorun had Tricked behind it. His katana burst right through the robot's midsection, and then glided upwards all the way through its head where Sorun pulled the sword free.

All around him, from the right side to the left side of his peripheral vision to ahead of him, Sorun saw more and more of the tubes popping up from all the platforms located around the spacious rooms. Dozens of Egg Pawns were exiting out from the pods, mostly the red ones with a golden one mixed in here and there. Near the back of the room, past all of the platforms now filled with Egg Pawns, a small section of the wall began to open. Two sections like doors began to open up from that wall in the back, a small amount of white light flooding in through the opening to reveal a small, enclosed space occupied by ten Egg Pawns which shuffled out as soon as the doors opened.

"Well that looks important." A dark form blurred past Sorun, causing a few locks of his hair to brush past his face. Sorun himself remained motionless, his eyes trailing towards the blur to see Shadow skating forwards on his rocket shoes. He'd jumped forwards, and Sorun couldn't resist the scoff he made when he saw the hedgehog plant the bottom of his feet on one of the rails connecting to another platform and began to grind across it towards the waiting robots. "What a showoff," he thought, turning his eyes towards a different platform full of robots.

He Tricked onto the next platform, right in front of one of the red Egg Pawns. It seemed startled by his sudden appearance from the way it jumped slightly, but before it had time to recover Sorun had stabbed the tip of his katana through its face. He cut through the side of its head to free the sword, looking ahead as two Egg Pawns began charging towards him. Eight Summoned Swords appeared at his sides, the swords rapidly and consecutively firing off to skewer the charging robots. The swords found their marks, four swords impaling themselves into each robot and causing them to fall down lifelessly.

There was a flash of metal in the corner of Sorun's right eye, and right before the lance stabbing towards him made contact his right Bringer Claw manifested and clamped down on the lance, stopping it mid-thrust. Sorun whirled towards the golden Egg Pawn, one slash of his sword disconnecting the arm holding the lance, and a quick, second slash separating its body into two halves. With that one dead, he looked ahead to the remaining six Badniks remaining on the platform, and then took a deep breath.

On his exhale, he'd Tricked directly behind one of the robots and quickly cut it down with his sword. In the same breath, he'd once again Tricked in front of another robot and cut it in half in the same move. In just over four seconds he'd Tricked to and cut down all six of the robots, the human having to take another heaving breath to catch himself once finished. He sighed out in slight exhaustion, and then looked to the side at one of the distant platforms.

He saw that all of the robots that had been on the platform Shadow had been grinding towards all laid in a destroyed heap, with the hedgehog himself grinding on a rail towards the next platform. Sorun made the decision to go towards the same platform, the teen performing a Trick and appearing in the air right above the platform, held aloft by his Bringer Claws.

Looking downwards, Sorun spotted a normal Egg Pawn and a golden one looking up at him. He intensely frowned, and then willed his right Bringer Claw to reach out and grab the red Egg Pawn. It lifted the Badnik all the way up to Sorun's level, before promptly rearing backwards and throwing the Badnik's whole body towards the golden one. They collided, both bodies bouncing and skidding across the platform's ground before they both finally slid over the edge and fell down into the depths of the giant machine they fought in. A third Egg Pawn had stood its ground and watched the display, but was then thrown down to the ground when Sorun landed right on top of it with his sword stabbing right into its chest.

With a grunt of exertion, Sorun looked down at the robot he was crouching on top of and then pushed the sword downwards, plunging it even deeper into its body. When he saw its lights completely dim out, he sighed and prepared to pull the katana out from its body. He heard footsteps quickly approaching behind him, though, and with a flat face Sorun looked up and, without even looking behind him, willed his left Bringer Claw to clench its fist and backhand the Badnik that was approaching his back. The hit connected with the Egg Pawn's face, causing it to fly backwards off the edge of the platform.

There had been ten more Egg Pawns right in front of him, and as Sorun pulled Yamato out from the dead one below him he was more than ready to dispatch them. Before he could even make a move, though, a black and red spinning blur zoomed into view. The spinning ball of destruction cleanly and effortlessly cut through each robot in an instant, and in the time it took Sorun to blink all of them were completely destroyed. The teen was still staring at the small field of destruction in complete surprise, and by the time he looked towards Shadow the dark Mobian had already jumped onto another rail, fiery sparks flying away under his shoes as he slid towards the last platform.

Breathing out an exasperated breath, Sorun Tricked to the end of the platform he stood on to look down at the final one. There were not many there; just a small clustering of six Egg Pawns. One flash of blue later and twenty spectral swords appeared hanging over four of them, the swords then dropping down and impaling those four robots. As their lights died and they lifelessly fell to the ground, Sorun Tricked in front of the fifth one and cut in in half with the Yamato, and then glanced towards the final sixth one and willed three Summoned Swords to fire right towards it. Right before the three swords hit, Shadow had skated right past the path of the swords, just barely moving past them as they flew past his back and pierced through the robot they were aimed at.

Jumping off the edge of the platform, Shadow glared down at the final ten Egg Pawns standing in front of the opening in the wall. Greenish energy began crackling around his right hand as a spear made of pure energy formed in his grasp and, glowering down at the robots in complete contempt, Shadow threw the Chaos Spear down at the group. The spear flew down and pierced right through the torso of one of the Egg Pawns, who stood completely still as arcs of Chaos energy flew all around it and the spear impaling its body. In the next second there was a great explosion from the spear, the force of it being sufficient to outright destroy six of the Badniks that had been standing close to it and blowing the other three off to the depths below.

In the quickly-clearing smoke, there was a flash of green and another flash of blue and black as Shadow and Sorun teleported right next to each other. They both took a quick glance around to either side of the metal outcropping they'd teleported onto, and when they saw there were no further threats, both visibly relaxed. Sorun dispelled the Yamato and his Bringer Claws while Shadow's shoulders had grown just slightly less tense. They both began to slowly walk towards the opening in the wall, with Sorun in particular taking quick glances at Shadow's face.

"Man. The dude isn't even fazed by all of this." Shadow's expression was the very definition of collected. Completely calm and stone-faced despite the fact they'd just run through a miniature gauntlet of robots while inside of a giant robot. Even his walk was full of confidence and purpose, whereas Sorun was exhausted enough that he was having trouble staying on his feet. "I swear, he's just... he's too good."

They'd entered the small space the ten Badniks had exited from which, at a first glance, appeared to be a lift of some sort. Sorun walked towards the end of it, letting out a low sigh as he sat down against the back end of the lift, while Shadow walked towards a console that was attached to the back of said lift. He ran a single hand across its surface, humming as he examined its controls.

"So what do you think?" Sorun asked, lightly panting from the earlier exertion.

"They appear to be the controls to this lift," Shadow surmised, turning to adress Sorun and then looking back at the controls. "Constructing a massive Badnik such as this must have been quite the undertaking. I imagine this is a maintenance lift of sorts leftover from when they were building it." His hands made contact with the controls, and he began to fiddle with the buttons on the console. "I'm going to have it take us lower into the Badnik. My hope is that it will take us directly to the power core, or at least closer to it. We'll work further in from there."

"Sounds good, man." Sorun lifted a single hand up in agreement, letting it flop back down to his side as he saw the opening they walked through close. The lift suddenly shuddered, and before they knew it the lift began to slowly descend downwards.

Shadow nodded in satisfaction, and then stepped away from the console. Sorun watched as he looked around, settled on Sorun, and was then mildly surprised when the hedgehog walked over to him and slid down into a sitting position right besides him. The human said nothing in response to this, though he did keep his eyes affixed to Shadow before finally sighing and looking forwards.

"Are you doing okay?" It had only been a few seconds after Sorun looked away before he heard Shadow's voice address him. He looked back to the Mobian and caught both of his crimson eyes staring at him. "You're breathing a bit heavily," he noted.

"Yeah, I'm fine," Sorun assured him, waving a hand off to the side. "Just a bit tired, that's all."

Shadow continued looking at him, and then let out a light scoff and looked forwards along with Sorun. "You've been slacking in your exercises."

"Eh, yeah, maybe a little. I'm still good to go, though."

"Hmph."

That was the end of that, as neither Sorun nor Shadow said anything past that. They just continued to sit in silence, watching the walls move past them as the lift they rode on slowly carried them downwards. Sorun had shuffled in place at the uncomfortable silence, clicking his tongue as he looked left, right, and then back center.

"Slow ride," Sorun said.

"Yes, it is," Shadow replied.

More silence ensued, and with it came an almost awkward feeling that began to slowly settle in Sorun the longer this went on. He wanted to say something just so that they wouldn't be stuck in utter silence, and from the rate this elevator was going it felt like it was going to be minutes of this, but for the life of him he couldn't think up a single thing to say. A few more moments passed and Sorun was about to call it quits and say whatever was on his mind just so they didn't have to spend the trip in perpetual silence.

By some miracle, Shadow decided to start the conversation first.

"You did good back there," Shadow said, eyes flicking back towards Sorun. "You've been making acceptable progress towards becoming a better fighter."

"Wow. That almost sounds like praise coming from you," Sorun said, turning his head towards Shadow.

"It was praise," Shadow ground out in an irritated voice, turning his head fully to meet Sorun. "You've come so far compared to how you were when you first arrived that I hardly recognize you. And I approve of this version of you much more than the previous one."

Sorun blew a lock of hair out of his face. "Oh yeah, I remember. You pretty much hated me when I first got here."

"Well, that human was useless. The one sitting next to me isn't."

"You're not wrong there," Sorun mumbled out in agreement. "I can't really take all the credit. Most of the work is coming from the powers. Kind of like you, really," he said. "You and your Chaos... everything. I swear, you really lucked out in the power department compared to everybody else."

Shadow blinked. "It was less luck and more by design," he said.

"Huh?" Sorun tilted his head and shot the hedgehog a questioning glare. "What's that supposed to mean?"

"It means..." Shadow hesitated in speaking further. He looked down briefly, and then looked back up to Sorun's eyes. The teen couldn't really tell what the expression that had grown on his face was. Some form of resignation, maybe, but Sorun couldn't even say for sure it was that. He was so used to just seeing Shadow scowl all the time he didn't even know what many other emotions looked like on his face, so he couldn't place this one. "It means that... I've thought about what you said. About trust. You've confided a number of things with me, and I've yet to reciprocate any of that trust." He sighed out, and then looked forwards at the slowly sliding walls. "Evidently we have time," he continued, "so I will tell you the origin of my powers. As a... way of repaying the trust you've put in me."

It was Sorun's turn to blink, this time in mild shock at Shadow's claim. He felt something mix in with all that surprise he was feeling, an air of appreciation, and from that he realized he'd never actually heard Shadow ever share anything personal. Not just to him, but to anybody, actually. Not even Rouge despite the fact that they were partners on the same team.

Now that he really thought about it, Sorun probably actually was the one that spent the most time with him out of anybody else, during those small training sessions they had from time to time. Which was really strange to him considering he was the least social guy in all of Knothole right next to Sorun, but then again, maybe Shadow beat him in that regard. He had to if Sorun was the one he interacted with the most. That alone said a lot. So him going out and saying this to Sorun made him feel... honored, he supposed. Honored and strangely happy. And also a bit weirded out that Shadow was taking something like this so seriously.

"Er, uh... okay..." Sorun let out a little chuckle and scratched at the side of his head as he kept his eyes locked on Shadow. "You're, um, you're really making this out to be some big thing."

"It is a big thing," Shadow droned out.

"What, your super-secret origin?" Sorun said with a light scoff at the end of his sentence. "Does anybody else know?"

"Rouge and my colleagues at G.U.N., of course. And the Faker and his friends," Shadow informed him, and there was a slight edge to his voice in that latter sentence. "They know more because of circumstance than anything else, and I count it as a small miracle they never told you. They have some standards, at least. But that's in the past. With you, I'd rather you hear it from me."

The small chuckling from Sorun continued. "Geez, you're making this sound really serious." He rolled his eyes towards the ceiling. "What, is this the part where you tell me your mom was an alien or something and you're actually half Mobian and half alien?"

It was absurd thought. So absurd that it made Sorun's small chuckling progress into light laughter. What was even more absurd was the fact that Shadow was giving Sorun a deathly serious look with his mouth set in a thin line, and the longer Shadow maintained that look the quieter and more broken Sorun's laughter became.

"Ah-hah, hah, yeah, 'cause... 'cause that'd be just the craziest..." The laughter died out completely when Sorun realized just how serious Shadow was right now, and slowly he began to bring his palm up to his face when he began to realize why Shadow looked so serious. "Oh my- dude, I was joking ..." Sorun gasped out in an exasperated breath.

"You're only half right."

"Oh thank goodness, 'cause I was about to say-"

"I am half alien, but technically speaking I didn't have a mother. I was artificially created."

" Hoooo and there it is." In a single breath Sorun's entire form seemed to deflate, followed by him vigorously rubbing at his face as he deeply sighed out. "Again with the aliens. Why does it always come back to aliens in this world?" His hand fell away from his face, and with a defeated look gracing his features Sorun nodded towards Shadow. "Alright. Let's hear it."

Shadow gave a slight nod. "It all began on Space Colony ARK-"

"Wait, hold on, I gotta get comfortable for this one." Sorun's interruption caused an annoyed twitch in Shadow's eyes, who couldn't hold the impatient hum he'd made as he watched Sorun settle into a more relaxed position against the lift's railing. After a few moments, the human finally settled himself and then gave Shadow two thumbs-ups. "Okay, take it from the top."

Eyes slightly narrowed in the teen's direction, Shadow nodded and then began to speak. "Perhaps I should go back a bit further. It was fifty years ago- interrupt me again and we spend the rest of the trip in silence," Shadow threatened upon seeing Sorun open his mouth again. Then teen paused, slowly closed his mouth, and nodded towards Shadow to prompt him to continue. "... Fifty years ago the Overlanders established an orbital space station in the effort of scientific research," Shadow began. "The head scientist of this station, a Dr. Gerald, had endeavored to create an artificial lifeform for use in his research. It was around the same time he'd made a deal with an alien lifeform who had made contact with him." Shadow cut himself off when he saw Sorun raise his hand in question. "Yes?"

"So, like, an alien just... randomly called Gerald out of the blue? Some random science guy on random space station orbiting a random planet?" Sorun asked. "That... that seems kind of out there." Incredibly unlikely more accurately, but he'd allow Shadow to try and explain just how something like that managed to happen.

"From what I know the Black Arms have been planning an invasion of Mobius," Shadow explained, causing Sorun to freeze. He didn't like Shadow's use of present-tense in that sentence. "They're a species who sustains themselves by going from planet to planet to consume all life. They've had their sights on Mobius for some time now, but according to Sonic, he witnessed the Black Arms having a war with the Xorda. So they've been holed up for some time in invading."

"... The Xorda," Sorun repeated in a low voice. "The same aliens that originally gene bombed this Earth and turned it into Mobius?"

"The very same," Shadow confirmed with a nod.

"How come they're fighting?"

"Because the Xorda still want to exterminate all life on this planet, and the Black Arms want to eat everything on this planet," Shadow curtly replied, causing Sorun's pale face to pale even further. "They're essentially fighting because the Black Arms violated a military blockade erected by the Xorda in the effort of invading Mobius. This is all on Sonic's word, who saw the current war between them during his visit to space. One of them, anyways."

Sorun's eyes scrunched in confusion. "There was more than one?"

"Apparently," Shadow said.

"Oh, okay." Breathing heavily through his nose, Sorun looked down at his knees. "So... is that something we have to worry about?" he asked, voice a bit quiet as he flicked his eyes back to Shadow. "An alien invasion from these Black Arms guys?"

This was not a prospect he liked. Dealing with Eggman was enough of a problem. He only had enough life to deal with Eggman and his nephew. He couldn't throw another villain into the mix, let alone the whole alien invasion that Shadow was implying. The Neo-Walkers had told him that the limited future they read only concerned Eggman, though, but even so he took everything they said with a grain of salt. He couldn't help but be worried.

To much his relief, Shadow shook his head. "The Faker said that the war was on a stalemate due to an even level of power between the two forces. They're essentially fighting themselves into a deadlock, and I don't see either giving in to the other. The most likely scenario is that they'll fight each other until their numbers dwindle to a point that they are no longer an issue." He looked deeper into Sorun's eyes, and even with his mouth set in a small frown he still managed to look at least a little reassuring. "They're not an issue, Sorun. Neither the Xorda nor the Black Arms. Eggman is our only concern."

"Alright. Alright, if you say so." He'd trust Shadow on that since he seemed to know a fair bit about this. And Shadow wasn't one to ignore threats for the sake of convenience and ease of mind, far from it. So if he said they weren't an issue, Sorun felt he could breath easy knowing that was the truth. "So the Black Arms contacted Gerald," he said, "for... what exactly?"

"Even all the way back then they were planning to invade Mobius. Their entire species resides inside of a comet, and it was on a course for Mobius," Shadow explained. "Black Arms are natural users of Chaos energy, more so than Mobians by a large margin, so when the leader of their species, Black Doom-" Shadow's eyes narrowed in Sorun's direction when he heard a barely-contained snicker from the human, "- contacted Dr. Gerald, he'd used his powers to transport a sample of his DNA to the doctor. The deal made between them was that Dr. Gerald was allowed to use his DNA in his experiments to create an artificial lifeform, and in exchange, in fifty years when the comet home to the Black Arms finally reached Mobius, the creature born from his experiments would act as the vanguard for the Black Arms' invasion of the planet." Shadow's face scrunched in displeasure. "Gerald, for his own reasons, accepted the deal due to the opportunity being too great to pass up. It was for the sake of his research, but just because he accepted the DNA did not mean he would allow an alien force to have its way with the planet. He made preparations against the Black Arms for when they invaded. One such preparation was an orbital cannon of his design installed onto the ARK, though it's irrelevant now as the invasion will never reach the planet."

Nodding along to the story, Sorun's eyes began to widen in Shadow's direction when the implications began to become clear to him. "Then you're...?" he began, which only caused Shadow to nod.

"Yes. I'm the artificial lifeform created by Dr. Gerald. Shadow, the Ultimate Lifeform."

He'd stopped talking after fully introducing himself to Sorun. His crimson eyes bored deeply into the human, expectantly awaiting whatever response he would give upon finally learning the truth about him. His features locked and mind prepared for whatever reaction, no matter how horrible, would be thrown his way now that his true biological nature had fully been revealed.

He was put at a loss when the human suddenly started laughing and pointing at Shadow.

"Wow, dude, you're old !"

That was it. That was Sorun's reaction: a single, gleefully-said sentence and laughter. Not fear. Not horror or revulsion. Laughter. Shadow had been so caught off guard by it that he didn't know how to react, and could only stare at the human in utter bafflement and confusion as he continued laughing at him. But as the laughter continued, the dark hedgehog found it grating to his nerves, and when he found it to be too much he barked out, "I'm not fifty years old! I was cryogenically frozen for the better part of my whole life!"

"Same difference, it totally counts!" Sorun laughed out, having to hold a hand to his stomach. "Oh, man, no wonder you never want to talk about your age!"

"Hmph...!" With an indignant face Shadow crossed his arms roughly and turned away from Sorun. "I'll have you know one of the abilities afforded to me by my Black Arms DNA is immortality," he informed the human. "Whether I was frozen or not doesn't matter one way or the other as to how I look. I'm eternally youthful."

That had quieted Sorun down instantly. So instantly, in fact, that Shadow seemed slightly startled by the sudden quiet, causing him to quickly turn back towards Sorun. He was surprised once again when he saw the human looking at him with large, almost pitying eyes, followed by Sorun softly humming at Shadow.

"Immortality, huh?" Sorun mumbled out in a sobering tone. "That sucks, man."

"... You don't think immortality is a good thing?" Shadow asked, surprise lacing his voice as he uncrossed his arms. "Why not?"

"Pfft. Who wants to live forever?" Maybe it was ironic coming from a dying man, but it's a sentiment Sorun had all the same. He'd seen enough character in games, shows, and movies to know it wasn't something worth having. And personally he just didn't like the concept. "Living on forever as everything you know dies around you until you're the last thing left standing? What's the point of living a life like that? Life's meant to be lived and passed on, not constantly existing for no other reason than to exist. That's not life. That's stagnation. And if that's what the Black Arms are all about, an immortal race of aliens who only live to take life from those living for the sake of a stagnant existence, then, well... can't say I approve of them living." He cast a sympathetic look towards the hedgehog. "My condolences."

"That's certainly one way to look at it," Shadow replied, voice quiet and contemplative at the human's words. "Nobody has ever expressed such an outlook to me before." He paused, and then looked down at his gloved hand. "Discounting my time on ice, I've had less time experiencing everything this planet has to offer me than anybody else in the Freedom Fighters. Immortality's toll... hasn't reared its head towards me quite yet. What my outlook when that time comes will depend on what kind of person I become, but until then... I've learned to live with it."

"I guess that's the best anybody could do under your situation," Sorun admitted with a shrug. "I can't think of a better way of lookin' at it, but then again I'm not immortal."

"Indeed you're not," Shadow agreed, dipping his head down slightly. "You... truly hate the Black Arms based on their mere description, don't you?"

"I'm supposed to like a race of aliens that want to come here and kill the world I'm working myself to death to save?"

"Fair point. It's a sentiment I share," Shadow said. "Just because I'm part of their race doesn't mean I agree with them. I won't have this planet destroyed just on their say, regardless of what I am, regardless of that deal made between my creator and Black Doom." He said the word "deal" with such contempt it almost came out as a snarl. "Though... admittedly I'm glad they'll never arrive here to begin with. It's one less headache."

"On that, we can both agree." Sorun slung one leg over the other, and then interlaced his fingers behind his head while still keeping his eyes on the half-Mobian sitting besides him. "But you're okay, Shadow. Y'know, for a weird half-hedgehog half-alien dude."

Shadow snorted, but whether it was in amusement or otherwise Sorun couldn't tell. "You're taking this remarkably well."

"Dude, after everything else I've seen here? Knowing you're a weird Mobian-alien hybrid isn't even the weirdest thing yet. This whole story of yours doesn't even breach the ceiling of weird my inner psyche created to cope with living in this world. I don't even know if I have a ceiling in there anymore."

The dark hedgehog rolled his eyes. "Understandable," he said. "Well, for the record, you're not too bad for a fragile human yourself."

"You got me there, Mr. Immortal." At that, they both paused and glanced at each others' eyes. What followed next was a small, humorless chuckle that left both of their mouth as the looked away from each other and back forwards to the crawling walls in front of them. The shared, dry laughter left as soon as it arrived, after which Sorun decided to continue speaking. "Kinda explains why you're the most antisocial Mobian I've met yet," he said. "They teach you any people skills up there on that space station?"

There was a loud scoff from Shadow. "Like you're one to talk. You have more difficulty with the others than I do."

"Yeah, well, can you blame me?" Sorun sputtered and threw his hands in front of his body. "You've seen they way they act. Sonic and Tails and all the rest of 'em. All... overly friendly and supportive and all that. Honestly, it's exhausting."

"I know," Shadow agreed. "Every single one of them can be so obnoxious. Time and time again they'll persist in bugging me over the most inane things under the notion that we should all be 'friends'." He scoffed and rolled his head to the side. "Comrades in arms working together towards a greater good is one thing, but it seems like I always have to fight just to get some space to myself."

"I understand exactly what you mean." Sorun leaned to the side, lightly slapped Shadow on the shoulder to gain his attention, and then pointed at himself. "You and me? We're normal. Probably the only two normal guys in all of Knothole that don't act all, you know, affectionate around everybody and their mother. It's just weird."

"You've no idea how right you are." Shadow nodded towards him, and Sorun could have sworn he almost looked appreciative over the human's words. "They pester me on and on about socializing more, even Rouge. They just never seem to realize I like myself the way I am now."

"Man, you think I don't deal with it, too? I gotta live with Sonic. Sonic . You know how often he gets on my case about this kind of thing?"

Shadow actually mildly shuddered at that. "I can only imagine."

"No, man, you can't." Both of them sighed, and leaned back against the lift railing while looking back ahead. "I don't know. Maybe it's just Mobians," Sorun continued. "They're not all that way, but it's like, it's, it's like a general thing with them."

"Perhaps. I couldn't tell you for a fact. Most of the Overlanders I worked with over at G.U.N. tended to ignore me in favor of their own business," Shadow said. "Whether it was out of professional courtesy or they just didn't want to interact with me was something I never cared to learn."

Sorun slowly nodded in understanding. "Was it bad working over there, or...?"

"No. It was adequate. The commander treated me with respect and placed trust in my abilities. Nobody ever acted untoward at me. A comment here or there behind my back from some of the younger recruits, but nothing major. I was satisfied in my position there. I think Rouge was in it more for the thrill and paycheck than anything else, but she's an acceptable partner regardless."

"And how'd you end up working for them to begin with?"

"I simply asked," Shadow stated with a shrug. "I can't speak for Rouge, but they knew of me and my abilities. G.U.N. had... ties to Space Colony ARK and its research. Like you, I... wanted to help the world, and the Freedom Fighters seemed tied up with their own affairs with Eggman. I judged G.U.N. to be a better place to lend my skills." He looked down a slight amount and sighed. "When Eggman obtained the seven Chaos Emeralds he overthrew G.U.N. and occupied their base of operations. The rest of the Overlander settlements fell shortly afterwards. There's been talks of reclaiming it."

"Oh...?" Sorun hummed in interest. "Really now?"

"Eggman's numbers have been slowly but surely dwindling due to our efforts. The princess has been planning things with others from some time now. I know she still has contacts with that human settlement, Station Square. Recently Rouge has managed to get her own line of contact in occupied G.U.N. territory. They've all been coordinating something while we've been going around damaging Eggman." Shadow shifted his head so that he was looking upwards. "It's still a bit of a ways off, but eventually we'll take it back. And with a proper military up and running once more we could push Eggman all the way back to his own city."

"I see." Well, that was good. It was progress. Not the bordering-insignificant, minute progress he and the rest of the Freedom Fighters had been making in opposing Eggman all this time. Defend a settlement here, foil a scheme there, sometimes blow up a factory to hurt his numbers. Something like what Shadow was describing sounded like taking not even a step, but a legitimate leap forwards in finally kicking Eggman off his high tower and taking the planet back.

It made Sorun feel a bit better. Knowing they were actually working towards a means of attaining their ultimate goal of freeing the planet instead of just flying by the seat of their pants like it seemed like they'd been doing so far. And Sally usually knew what she was doing when it came to these kinds of things, she had to. And Shadow sounded sure of himself. To Sorun it seemed like an actual plan was being made in the background. He was fine with that as long as he could help out using what little time he had left, and ended it with his sword going through Eggman's brain.

Though it was strange, hearing how well Shadow and Rogue had worked with Overlanders. He would have thought there would have been some awkwardness there, even maybe some leftover scorn from the war on the Overlanders' end, but it sounded like that was left behind there for... something, Sorun wasn't sure. Professional courtesy like Shadow had said, perhaps. Whatever the case, it seemed like they adjusted well to working over there. He was glad for them.

Even after all this time, though, Sorun couldn't say for certain if the same applied to him. And seeing as Shadow was apparently in a talking mood, he decided to share his troubles.

"I don't think I fit in at Knothole," Sorun admitted to the hedgehog. "They're just... I don't know, everybody over there is great and everything, but I don't... I'm just not like them, you know?"

"... I only ever grew up around Overlanders. On Space Colony ARK," Shadow said after a long moment of silence. "I see where you're coming from. Despite being half Mobian myself, a majority of my life had been spent away from them. Perhaps that's why I fit in so well with those at G.U.N. I find myself more easily able to associate with Overlanders than Mobians. Mobians, the ones in Knothole at least, can just be too... suffocating, I suppose you could say. Good people. But suffocating in how good they are."

"Yeah," Sorun said with an agreeing nod, "but for me it's even worse. I'm not from this world, so it's like... it's like there's nowhere I can fit in to, you know?"

"Mm." Another beat of silent passed between them. "You should come with me to G.U.N."

Sorun scoffed out a small, quiet laugh at that, having assumed from the absurdity of the suggestion that Shadow had been kidding when he said that. When he looked at the half-Mobian from the corner of his eye, though, he saw that Shadow had turned back to Sorun and was staring intently at him. The quiet laughter died in Sorun's throat, and turned to look at Shadow with disbelieving eyes. "Wait, you're serious?"

"Your talents are wasted with the Freedom Fighters," Shadow grunted, a slight grimace on his face. "I want you to come join G.U.N. with me after Eggman is dealt with."

"Talents?" A disbelieving scoff that matched the shock in his eyes left Sorun as the teen gestured at himself. "What talents? I got powers and a limited skillset accrued in fighting a guerilla war against a mad scientist, sure, but I'm not- I'm not a soldier."

"You could learn. You're young enough, not even an adult by Overlander standards, and you've already shown you learn fast. And the powers you already have put you leagues above any other agent G.U.N. has besides Rouge and myself," Shadow told him. "You'd do more than well there. You could join Rouge and I and be a part of Team Dark."

"U-uh..." Sorun stammered, not quite sure how he was supposed to respond. "Why, why are- why are you asking me this?"

"Because I think you would do better there than with the Freedom Fighters in Knothole," Shadow said. "You made it clear to me that you realize not every single problem in the world can be handled cleanly. It's something people like Faker and the princess, what everybody in Knothole, refuses to see. G.U.N. doesn't have the same limits they do. They help protect the world no matter how grim the task. One of the reasons I chose to work there in the first place was because they didn't shy away from such work. Because they know that sometimes a threat like Eggman needs to be permanently eliminated. Like you do."

"... I did say that," Sorun hesitantly admitted. "And, well, you're not wrong , but... I don't know, Shadow, that doesn't really sound like something I-"

"You'd be among Overlanders," Shadow continued. "You could finally have a home with others like you if life in Knothole with those Mobians really makes you so uncomfortable."

Sorun shook his head. "It's not just that, man. And Overlanders aren't humans. They're close, but... they're just not."

"Then settle in Station Square," Shadow suggested. "A whole city full of humans. One of the Overlander settlements. You don't have to settle in a place like Knothole."

"It's not just that, Shadow," Sorun denied with a shake of his head. "The Overlanders, the humans in Station Square, sure, they look human and may act human, but they're not my people, you know? They don't share the same history and culture that the humans of my world share with me. They're not... Earthlings like me, I guess you can say. It'd be no better living with them than the Mobians, and at least with the Mobians I already know what I'm dealing with." A heavy sigh left him. "It doesn't matter where I choose to live after the war's over anyways."

Shadow blinked, and then tilted his head. "Why would it not matter where you live after Eggman is dead?" he asked, genuine curiosity lacing his voice.

"It just doesn't, alright?" Sorun mumbled out, choosing then to get up to his feet and step forwards away from Shadow. "Look, I appreciate being offered a spot in your mega-cool ultra-secret government black-ops team, but I don't think that it'd be for me. My only concern is Robotnik right now."

He heard a resigned sigh from Shadow behind him. "I can see you're hesitant on the idea. Perhaps in the future you will reconsider." There was a small shuffling sound as Shadow rose up to his feet along with Sorun. "In any event, it seems that we have arrived."

True to Shadow's word, it appeated that the lift they had been riding on the entire time finally took them somewhere. The wall they'd been staring ahead at finally ended as an opening began to creep up from the bottom. The lower the lift went, the more it was revealed that the pair were being lowered into a large room. Very large, as the big, circular room looked at least to be around twenty meters in diameter.

As the lift finally stopped and the two stepped out of it and into the room, Sorun's own eyes couldn't move away from what was all the way on the other end of the room. A large, metal sphere bigger than a bus bolted right into the wall with multiple, metal tubes and cables attached to it and sections of the wall behind it. There were multiple clear panes along the surface of the sphere, too, and a sickly, yellow light was bleeding out of those panes and into the dimly-lit, gray room.

"Well, that's a power core if I ever saw one," Sorun said, he and Shadow walking side-by-side towards the large sphere. "Whaddya know. Lift took us right to it."

"I wouldn't relax just yet." Shadow suddenly stuck his arm out in front of Sorun, halting both of them in their tracks. "Up ahead. Two contacts."

Just as Shadow said, there was movement to either side of the power core, behind two giant bundles of metal cables. Two figures stepped out from behind those cables, stepping forwards and slowly moving towards the center of the room. Shadow's entire form began to tense up at the sight of the two, whereas Sorun's eyes just squinted in confusion.

They were both Badniks. One painted red and one painted blue. What was strange about them was that they were both quadruped with long legs and lower torsos, almost akin to a horse. On top though was a different story. Where the lower torso looked like a mechanical horse, the upper torso was a more humanoid shape, left arm attached to a giant, rectangular shield while the right clutched a long spear, the sharpened head of which nearly scraped against the ground. And of course, much to Sorun's disgust, was the round head each one had built in the visage of Eggman's own face, grinning down at them.

"So what would these things be?" Sorun mumbled to Shadow, Yamato manifesting in his left hand. "Centaurs? Egg Knights?"

"Doesn't matter, don't care," Shadow mumbled back, Chaos Spear appearing in his right hand. "You take left, I'll take right."

"Sure." They split off and began walking in opposite directions, the two Badniks across from them doing the same. Sorun stared down at his own opponent, the red Badnik, a small scoff leaving his lips as he used his thumb to lift Yamato from its scabbard. "Alright, time to die."

As if responding to his provocation, the red Badnik reared back on its hind legs as Sorun fully unsheathed Yamato. From the other side of the room, Shadow had already teleported to his own opponent and began battling the blue-painted Badnik with his Chaos Spear. By contrast, Sorun calmly stood in place as the red one planted all four of its mechanical feet on the ground, and then began to charge forwards with its spear pointed right at the unmoving human.

Right before the spear thrusted into Sorun's body, the human Tricked away, making it so that the spear stabbed into empty air. In the same instance Sorun appeared in the air right in front of the Badnik's upper torso, and then he swung the katana in a wide, horizontal swing. The Badnik responded by raising its shield to defend itself, but that had only ended with the shield being cut in half and destroyed completely.

The Badnik took a quick step backwards and stabbed upwards towards Sorun. The human Tricked away again, this time appearing behind the Badnik, though when he swung Yamato once more the Badnik had extended all four legs and jumped slightly to the side. Sorun frowned, and then Tricked a third time to right in front of its feet. He tried swinging his sword at the Badnik's horse-like legs, but like before, the red-painted robot had jumped back away from him.

"Quick-footed bastard, ain'tcha?" Sorun thought, looking up at the Badnik. "I got just the thing for you."

With a single thought, eight Summoned Swords began rotating around Sorun. He Tricked up in front of the Badnik's upper torso again, the Spiral Swords spinning around Sorun catching the Badnik in the chest before it could move- a giant gash was sawed onto its chest as a result. The red robot attempted to stab upwards with the spear, but it was caught by Sorun's left Bringer Claw, and promptly cut in half and rendered useless by his katana. The Spiral Swords stopped spinning and compressed closer to Sorun's body, and then fired out, two of the sword nailing the Badnik right in the chest wound and causing it to stumble.

In the same moment the Badnik stumbled, Sorun took the opportunity to Trick down to its legs, and then cut left with Yamato. The katana glided right through the robot's leg, the severed appendage falling to the ground and causing the robot to slump to the side. Sorun Tricked back a few meters away from it, sheathing the katana while staring forwards at the Badnik.

Due to its missing leg, the robot was left stuck in place with its three legs trying and failing to get it to move. The large gash was still present on its chest and sparking, and the two Summoned Swords jammed into its torso was causing its body to further stutter and spark. Sorun took a deep breath, and then slowly gripped Yamato's handle with his right hand.

"This is the end..." Blue energy began crackling along the length of the katana's scabbard, and in the next instant Sorun unsheathed and slashed the katana outward in the same movement. Following that slash, a long, blue, diagonal line appeared across the Badnik's entire body. Sorun spun the katana around afterwards, holding it in a reverse grip and slowly sliding it back into its sheath. The moment the sword's guard connected with the bottom of the scabbard, the blue glow faded and the Badnik fell away in two halves.

Exhaling slowly, Sorun quickly wiped away the bead of blood that began to drip down his nose and turned to his right towards the other end of the room. It seemed that Shadow, fighting the blue counterpart to the red Badnik the teen had just destroyed, was having some amount of difficulty in destroying it. He managed to dodge the blue Badnik's spear just fine, though every time he threw a Chaos Spear the Badnik would doge out of the way, or when Shadow would Spin Dash into it the robot would raise its shield, causing Shadow to bounce harmlessly off of it.

After a successful knockback, Shadow had slid backwards while keeping one hand on the ground for stability. He eventually lost all momentum and came to a complete stop, at which point he slowly removed his hand from the floor and looked back up at the Badnik.

His face was marred in a deep, angered scowl with all of his contempt aimed at the blue Badnik standing before him.

And then he did something so peculiar that it had Sorun reeling in bewilderment.

Shadow had tightly clenched his hand right in front of him, and then threw it to his side as his hand opened up. After that there was a flash of yellow-green energy, and six Chaos Spears were summoned around Shadow. Six Chaos Spears that were spinning around his body in a circle, all pointed outwards.

"What?" Sorun found himself blinking rapidly at the sight, his eyes transfixed on the six spears of Chaos energy that were rotating around Shadow's form. "T-that's my...!"

The next instant found Shadow teleporting right in front of the blue Badnik's body. It had tried to defend itself with its rectangular shield, but under the onslaught of the six Chaos Spears rotating around Shadow, it couldn't hold its defense. It was less that the spears cut through the shield and more that the raw Chaos energy making up the spears melted right through the shield. Once through, Shadow had Spin Dashed right onto the Badnik's upper torso, the Chaos Spears having all but obliterated its chassis, servos, and all the wiring and circuitry beneath from the power emanating off the spears while Shadow's Spin Dash did nothing but exacerbate the damage done to it.

In the end, the blue Badnik had collapsed in a smoldering, half-melted mess. Shadow flipped backwards and landed feet-first on the ground, the six Chaos Spears spinning around him freezing in place. He reached out and took one of the spears in his hand, while the other six slowly disappeared from sight. He looked down at the wrecked Badnik and, making a "tch" sound at the sight, threw the Chaos Spear right into its melted body.

The Chaos Spear had exploded upon impact. The smoke and dust kicked up from the explosion blew away seconds later, and from what Sorun saw absolutely nothing of the Badnik remained but a black scorch mark burned into the ground. Shadow made a satisfied huff at the sight, and then teleported right next to Sorun in a green flash.

Sorun couldn't even form words, his mouth agape as he stared at Shadow in complete and utter disbelief. Shadow, in response, eyed Sorun's face that at the moment looked closer's to a fish's face than a human's, and to Sorun's further bafflement he had the gall to actually smirk at Sorun. "Try not to look so surprised," Shadow said. He had smugness practically dripping from his voice, and the air of superiority floating around him was so intense that Sorun was almost stifled by it. "I'm the Ultimate Lifeform. A technique like that was a simple one to take for my own."

"... You copycat." In the end, all Sorun could do was sigh out and shake his head as a small grin formed on his lips. "You ganked my Spiral Swords."

Shadow shrugged. "What can I say? It's a very good technique." The smirk on his face fell away into his normal scowl as he turned towards the giant sphere attached to the back wall. "Now, then. Onto more pressing matters."

The hedgehog began walking towards the sphere. Sorun remained in place for a few moments to stare at his back, and then he sighed out again and began following him. "Can't believe he stole my Spiral Swords. Spiral Spears? Eh, I dunno. Good for him, I guess."

He supposed it was flattering, in some way. That Shadow would think his Spiral Swords were so great that he decided to use them himself with his Chaos Spears. It might have been more flattering if Sorun himself hadn't originally stolen the move from a video game character, but he'd take solace in the fact that Shadow had still gotten it directly from him. Made him feel some small sense of pride in himself, which was a welcome change from how he normally felt.

They both stopped in front of the power core, Sorun eyeing it in curiosity while Shadow looked towards a small computer console connected to the sphere via a bundle of wires. The hedgehog immediately set to work typing away at the console while Sorun began to slowly unsheathe the Yamato from its sheath.

"So should I just, like... should I just cut it?" Sorun asked as he pulled the sword completely free from its scabbard.

"I would think so, but I'm just trying to figure out what exactly it's... oh." Shadow's fingers froze above the console's small keyboard as he read the screen, after which his eyes turned up towards the sphere. "That power core is a nuclear fusion reactor."

"... This thing's nuclear?" Sorun took an unconscious step backwards and lowered his katana. "You sure I should cut it...?"

"It... should be fine," Shadow said, though the fact he'd had to pause and didn't sound a hundred percent sure of himself did nothing to assure Sorun cutting the nuclear metal ball in front of him was safe. "I'm no expert, but I do know the process these types of devices undergo to produce nuclear power is incredibly complex, and the same goes for producing an explosion. I doubt you'll cause a meltdown by cutting the core in half. As long as you do it quickly." He made a low hum in the direction of the power core. "A nuclear Badnik... Well, it wouldn't be the first time Eggman employed nuclear weapons in one of his ploys. It makes me wonder if he truly intended for this Badnik to stomp out Knothole or if he was planning on detonating this when it got close enough."

"Guess we'll never know now." Sorun rose his katana back up, though there was a noticeable tremble in the sword from his hands slightly shaking in fear. He looked towards Shadow for a last-minute assurance, but while he saw the hedgehog nod towards him, his saw that his eye ridges were furrowed in uncertainty. That made Sorun's hands shake even harder. "You're absolutely sure this thing isn't going to blow up if I do this?" he asked.

It took him a moment of thought, but Shadow eventually nodded at Sorun. "A nuclear bomb must undergo a very specific activation process in order to detonate. It's a failsafe to ensure they don't unintentionally go off. Destroying even a single component of this thing should render it inoperable, let alone cutting it completely in half. We should be fine."

"This isn't a bomb, though," Sorun pointed out. "It's a power core."

"It runs on the same mechanisms, Sorun."

"Alright, alright!" Taking a deep, shaky breath, Sorun rose Yamato up above his head. "If we get vaporized in a mushroom cloud it's your fault." He exhaled, tightened his two-handed grip around the Yamato's handle, and as blue energy roiled down the length of the blade he attempted to cut downwards in a straight overhead slice.

"Attempted" being the keyword, as his blade only made it an inch before he froze up again and looked back at Shadow.

"Like on a scale of one to ten how sure-"

"Sorun!"

Startled from Shadow's raised voice, Sorun had successfully sliced the katana downwards in a knee-jerk reaction. He hadn't even realized he'd done it until he saw the blue line vertically bisecting the entire power core, and it was only after the fact did he wince and begin to step back. The blue line faded, leaving a clean seam running right through the power core. Each half listed off to the side, the two pieces still held up by the power cords and bolts connecting it to the wall, though the yellow light bleeding out from the clear panels on the core's surface slowly dimmed until they went completely dark.

Gritting his teeth, Sorun turned back towards Shadow. The hedgehog seemed calm, though he was starting intently at the segmented power core with what seemed to be a locked jaw, and if he looked closely Sorun could see that he was gripping the computer console hard enough that his fingers were denting the metal.

There was a sudden jerk that rocked the entire room, making both Sorun and Shadow dart their eyes around wildly. Sorun himself had begun to hold Yamato in a death grip, and part of him considered trying to madly slash Yamato in the air in the vain hope that it would randomly make a portal to get him and Shadow back to Knothole. But just as he began to prepare for the worst, there was a strange sound. The faint humming sound of running energy and working machinery that had been faintly heard in the background began to slowly whir down, before then going completely silent. At the same time the lights that were just barely lighting the room slowly dimmed more and more, and then cut out completely quite suddenly, leaving both Sorun and Shadow in complete darkness.

A full ten seconds of utter silence passed in the darkness. The sound of a long, drawn-out breath was heard afterwards, that breath coming from Sorun who'd been holding his breath in anticipation. There was a small flash of blue light as Sorun's Bringer Claws then manifested, the soft blue light being just sufficient enough to illuminate the human's form. Moments later there was a flash of green energy nearby, Shadow's form being lit up by a Chaos Spear being held in his hands. They both slowly looked towards each other, blinked, and then sighed out in tandem.

"Great call, Shadow. Great call," Sorun murmured, sounding weary enough to pass out right there.

"I told you it would be fine," Shadow said, though he sounded slightly weary himself.

Running a hand over his face, a light sheen of nervous sweat over it, Sorun let out a single laugh. "So it's over? We're done?"

"Everything appears to be shut down, and there doesn't appear to be a backup generator or anything of the sort." Shadow took a quick glance around the room, and then gave Sorun a short nod. "We'll need to go outside and ascertain the condition of the Badnik to be completely sure."

"Okay." Sorun looked away from Shadow into the darkness, and then looked back to Shadow. "So, uh... I don't imagine the lift will be working now that there's no power."

"I... imagine not, no."

"..."

"..."

"... You wanna just, like... grab onto me and I'll fly us out the way we came in?"

"..."

"..."

"..."

"... I mean it'll take me way longer to cut us a new way out if-"

"Just..." Shadow held up a hand to silence Sorun, breathed out a quiet grunt, and then nodded his head. "Fine, but be quick about it."

"Yeah, trust me, you don't gotta worry about me takin' my time here..."

It was quite possibly the most awkward flight Sorun had ever taken in his life, and he honestly didn't think he'd ever experience anything similar again, but in just a few short minutes he'd managed to fly himself and Shadow back up the lift shaft, through the large room filled with platforms and dead Badniks, up the giant Badnik's neck, and all the way up to the square hole Sorun had originally cut in the side of the titan's neck .

Sorun's body emerged from the square hole, Bringer Claws disappearing and allowing him to drop down onto the metal giant's shoulder. Shadow, who had been clinging to Sorun by grabbing onto his shoulders, quickly removed himself from the human and rapidly stepped over to the edge of the shoulder. Sorun himself set to quickly dust his shoulders off, shake his head, and then began mumbling under his breath as he followed Shadow.

The pair soon found themselves sitting down at the shoulder's edge, a good distance between them as they stared out onto the forest's horizon at the setting sun. Sorun found himself taking a long, quiet breath at the serene sight, at the orange-colored sky and the vibrant trees stretching as far as the eye could see. The calming sight along with the relief at seeing that the giant robot they were sitting on was completely frozen was enough to put him completely at ease, and even help him to forget the awkward flight back up the robot.

"It seems that we successfully managed to stop the Badnik. It's halted its movements." Shadow voiced Sorun's own thoughts about the now-dead Badnik, followed by the half-Mobian reaching down to tap his gloved knuckles against the robot's shoulder. "Mission accomplished. Good work."

"Yeah. Same to you." Letting out a tired groan, Sorun leaned back onto his elbows to relax his body. "So I guess this giant robot is just here forever now, huh?"

"I sincerely doubt anybody is willing to expend the resources to dismantle an inert Badnik the size of a skyscraper standing in the middle of nowhere, so yes, it seems that this thing is here to stay."

"Neat." He clicked his tongue as a thought came to him, and he turned his head to the left to look at Shadow. "Hey, you wanna do something when we get back to the HQ?"

There wasn't a response at first. What happened was that Shadow swiveled his head around so that his eyes could meet Sorun's, and what followed next was him blinking his eyes in confusion. "Excuse me?"

"You know, just go and do something," Sorun clarified, shrugging his shoulders as best he could with his elbows supporting his body. "Big mission success requires a big mission break, right?"

"Yes, we have sleep for that."

"Pfft." Sorun shook his head in slight amusement. "Look, I like sleep as much as the next guy, Sonic can attest to that, but I meant actually doing something." He looked back towards the orange sky and began to idly kick his feet against the robot. "You don't have to or anything, I just thought, y'know, it's still a bit early and I'm not feeling completely exhausted here, so... just, just an open offer. If you wanna hang out or whatever since we're done with the mission now and the day is saved and all that."

"Haah..." Shadow tilted his head upwards and breathed out slowly towards the sky, as if contemplating Sorun's request. He closed his mouth, and a few silent moments passed before he looked back down at Sorun. Somehow, the human wasn't completely surprised to find an agreeing look in Shadow's face. "What did you have in mind?"

"Game Over!"

Shadow stared towards the screen, eyes widened in shock and hands clenched so tightly around the controller he grasped that the plastic began to creak. On the other side of the couch was Sorun's much more relaxed form, his body sagging against the couch and his own controller loosely gripped in his hands as he lethargically stared at the screen.

"..." Blinking in disappointment, Sorun slowly turned his head to the right at a frozen Shadow whose eyes were still glued to the HQ's TV's screen. "You freakin' suck at this," Sorun muttered, and then proceeded to throw the controller at Shadow. It bounced off the striped hedgehog's shoulder, causing him to growl out and toss his own controller against the ground.

"I should have never wasted my time with this garbage," he angrily grumbled as he stood up from the couch. "I'm going to sleep."

"Ultimate Lifeform's got nothing on the Ultimate Gamer," Sorun lazily called behind him. Shadow responded by slamming the door to his room in the HQ shut, causing Sorun to quietly scoff to himself. He waited a moment, and then reached over to grab his discarded controller, only to then exit out of the screen the game was on and navigate to the single player menu of the game that was currently on.

He spent the rest of his night whittling away at the video game until he'd grown bored enough to shut the TV off and head home.

A/N- I know there's a small fanmade Sonic fighting game out there, and in the game one of Shadow's moves is literally a straight rip of Vergil's Spiral Swords but with Chaos Spears, so that's where I got that idea from.

Chapter 35

Recursion Error

Episode 35- Diabolical sword, calamitous edge

"There it is..."

Even peering through a pair of binoculars at over a mile away it would be impossible to miss such a thing. A large, sprawling complex. A factory bigger than any other factory ever constructed by Eggman, save for the construction yards located in his own personal city of New Megaopolis used to construct the mad tyrant's Egg Fleet. A factory complex so large it could hardly be called just a factory due to its massive size.

The Freedom Fighters had been gaining some intelligence of the factory for a long time now. It was a major target; something that took a priority in eliminating. And until very recently its location had remained a secret. That had ended when they'd finally gotten wind of a possible location, and after looking around a bit, it was there.

"That's the factory that's been giving us so much trouble for so long. And one of the last ones outside of New Megaopolis to boot. If we manage to take that out it'll really go a long way in pushing Eggman back."

"You think I should get a hat?"

The sentence said by the voice near her caused the red-haired chipmunk to slowly lower the binoculars held up to her eyes. She looked down a bit, silently repeating the sentence she heard before shaking her head and turning to her right. "What?" Sally asked, looking down into the trench she stood in at the human sitting down with his back pressed against the trench wall next to her.

"A hat," Sorun repeated. "Y'know, like a fedora. Somethin' stylish. Bunnie manages to pull off a hat so I was just wondering if I should spring for one."

Sally's mouth opened to rebuke this, but when she realized just how absurd these words were she quickly changed her mind with a shake of her head and glared down at the other teen. "Sorun, I don't think now is the time to be thinking about this."

Sorun rolled his eyes at that. "Sally, you've had the both of us scouting around out here in the sticks for four days straight looking for this thing, and hey, we found it, so now is hat time."

"Could you please be serious about this?"

"I am serious about this. We already found the place so it's not like there's much else for us to do other than go back to the HQ and think up a plan of attack." With a soft groan Sorun stood up to his feet, turned around, and stepped to the top of the trench alongside Sally. "You think Honey'd make me a hat? She's probably a good milliner, right?"

"Maybe. I don't know." At this point Sally had slumped her body over the top of the trench, supporting her head with one of her hands as she continued to look at Sorun from the corner of her eyes. She wanted to scold him for acting so flippantly in the face of something so serious, but inside she knew that his logic in that there was nothing else for them to do at this point was sound. So instead she chose to give up a losing fight and let Sorun ramble on about his hats.

"I'm just saying, good headwear-" The human cut himself off suddenly, making Sally raise her head a bit in his direction. She blinked when she saw that he had completely stilled, his eyes widened in the direction of the factory. And then, without warning, he held his hand out towards Sally. "Gimme the binoculars."

"Wha-"

"Give them to me," Sorun demanded, his eyes still trained on the factory. Sally had started a bit at the snappish tone Sorun had taken, but nonetheless she still placed the binoculars in his hands. His fingers immediately curled around them and brought them up to his eyes, and after a few seconds of looking out from them a sound like a growl left his throat. "Tch, you're not gonna believe this. Check it out."

He removed the binoculars from his face and held them out to Sally. The princess looked down at the viewing tool being offered to her and then looked up at Sorun's face, but when he shook the binoculars at her with hurrying intent she snatched them up and looked back towards the factory. She brought the binoculars up to her eyes, and then looked around where Sorun had just been looking.

A soft gasp breathed past her lips when she pointed the binoculars near the front of the factory. There was a gathering of Egg Pawns- a large gathering, at least a hundred of them. Fifty were standing shoulder-to-shoulder in a line on one side, with the other fifty right across from them in another line, creating a small aisle that lead right into the factory. On the other side of the aisle of Badniks was a small ship parked right on the ground, black and red with Eggman's logo stamped on the side, and most startlingly, slowly moving down that aisle of Egg Pawns, was him . Eggman himself, sitting in some small, floating, egg-shaped chair. She saw his mouth moving, evidence of him talking, but due to the enormous distance between them she couldn't hear a single thing. She was less concerned about not being able to hear him, though, and more worried about the fact he was there in the first place.

"Robotnik..." The name was practically spat with utter disdain as Sally lowered the binoculars. "What in the world is he doing there...?"

"Who cares? He's there." Sally glanced to the side at Sorun, and then did a double-take on him. Sorun's left hand was clenching his sword, Yamato, by the bottom of the sword's scabbard, and Sorun himself had a certain... look on his face. An almost eager expression that Sally just quite couldn't place. "He's right there... I could go there right now and-"

"And do what?" Seeing where this line of thinking was going, Sally reached over and shook Sorun's shoulder roughly so that he'd face her. "Sorun, there's a hundred Badniks standing between you and him. You'd get swarmed."

"Yeah, but I could get to him before they get to me..." Blue bolts of energy began to crackle along the length of Yamato's scabbard, worrying Sally even further. "Just one single Trick right in front of him and I could-"

"Sorun. No ." She grew serious enough that'd she'd grabbed Sorun by both shoulders and whirled him around so that they were directly facing each other. "I don't know what you think you can do, and I understand Eggman being over there makes it really tempting to take a chance and go for him, but there are too many enemies . I'm not losing you over a stupid chance like that, okay?"

She could somewhat understand Sorun's position. Sally herself wanted nothing more than to run over there and attack Eggman. To beat him unconscious and drag him all the way back to Knothole to answer for his crimes. To finally lock him up and end this war once and for all. Him being just all the way over there created such a tempting urge to go for it.

But with that many Badniks over there, right in front of the biggest factory outside of New Megaopolis, that urge was little more than a daydream. They'd never successfully pull an attempt like that. The two of them would get captured- or worse. They couldn't run head-first without thinking. They needed to prepare. They needed the other Freedom Fighters.

They needed a plan.

She felt that Sorun was shaking in her grasp, and it was only then she realized how badly Sorun wanted to go over there and attack

Eggman. He had a strained, conflicted look on his face, and his hand was so tightly wrapped around his sword's scabbard that the knuckles were white. However, to Sally's relief, he gave her a shaky nod, at which point she released his shoulders.

"Alright... alright, fine." Sorun took a deep breath, ran his right hand through his black hair, and then shook his head while making a low, frustrated growl. "I'll leave him alone, but if he's right there in that giant factory, Sally, then we gotta do something. We already need to destroy that place, but if he's gonna be there while we're doing it-"

"It's a great opportunity, I know, but we need to think this through," Sally told him, speaking slowly and calming in an effort to sooth Sorun. "We'll head back to Freedom HQ and think something up." She began reaching into her vest. "I'll call Tails right now and have him fire the Tornado up-"

"Don't bother, I'll get us back." Sorun walked past Sally towards the middle of the small trench they stood in, Yamato still in hand.

Sally's fingers briefly brushed against the communication device tucked into her vest, but she froze when she saw Sorun stop in the middle of the trench. Curious, she removed her hand and turned her body towards the human. "And how exactly do you plan on getting us halfway across the continent without a plane?" she asked, placing a single hand on her hip while she raised an eye ridge in his direction. "I thought your teleporting power didn't have enough range to cover that distance?"

"Tricking. And it doesn't." His right hand drummed across Yamato's white handle, and a ghost of a smile stretched over his lips as he turned his head halfway to Sally so that a single eye was visible to her. "I finally figured out how portals work."

"... Portals?" Sally's hand dropped off her hip, and now both eye ridges were risen in surprise. "What do you mean?"

"I mean I can do this."

Slowly, Sorun unsheathed Yamato from its scabbard. Once the blade was fully pulled out, he rose the sword upwards and made a single, vertical slash downwards. Sally had noted that a thin, blue line was left hovering in the air as a result of the slash, but before she had time to contemplate this Sorun had made another slash, this one horizontally. Another line was left in the wake of the second slash, forming a small, blue cross hovering in the middle of the air.

At first, nothing happened. Sorun was simply staring at the blue cross expectantly, and after a few moments Sally made the conscious decision to ask what was supposed to happen now. Before she could so much as open her mouth, though, the cross seemed to... open. The center of the cross folded into itself, and the space around the cross seemingly followed it. What was once a small, thin cross in the air was now a vaguely rhombus-shaped, two-dimensional hole floating in the air. What exactly was in that hole was unclear, because as far as Sally could see the interior was little more than a constantly swirling mass of dark blue energy, but it certainly looked like a portal. Not one she'd ever seen before, but definitely a portal of some sort.

"That leads to the HQ." Sorun's voice drew Sally's attention away from the portal, forcing her to looks towards Sorun in shock. "Just step in and it'll drop you off there."

"You're kidding me." Astonished, Sally's mouth had dropped open a tiny bit as she looked back towards the blue, rhombus-shaped vortex in front of her. "You... are you sure it's safe?"

"Sally, I promise you that this is completely safe." Sorun stepped to the side of the portal, crossing one leg over the other as he used his katana to point towards the center of the portal. "Princesses first, milady," he said, raising up his free hand to tip an invisible hat towards her with a small smirk on his face.

She actually laughed at bit at the display, though her quiet giggles quickly tapered off when she glanced back at the portal. The chipmunk took a hesitant few steps forwards, stopping just in front of the portal. The swirling, blue colors of various dark shades were even more vivid up close, and at this distance she could just barely hear a small thrumming sound coming from the inside of the blue vortex. Taking another glance towards Sorun, who gave her an encouraging nod with his head, Sally nodded back and stared towards the portal.

"Well... if he says it's safe..." Sorun usually wasn't too mistaken about his powers. In fact if there was one thing he put an unusual amount of energy into, it was mastering the abilities given to him by the Emeralds. So she trusted him when he said the swirling thing in front of her acted as a portal. "Here goes nothing..."

Taking a deep breath, Sally stepped into the portal.

Sorun felt a large swell of pride well up in him when he watched as Sally disappeared into the portal created by Yamato. He had a right to; the process and journey of figuring out how the Yamato was actually able to create portals had been an exhaustive one. He'd actually had to go and commit research to it after a while of getting disparaging results.

Well, it'd been a lot of work, but he'd pulled it off. He figured out how to use his magic katana to make portals. He already started imagining the use it would have in his personal life, as well as any possible uses for the Freedom Fighters. Instantaneous travel to anywhere in the world had to have some uses, and if he thought hard enough, he foresaw many congratulations from some of the Freedom Fighters for coming up with such a thing. It was a nice thought that made him feel warm.

And then he received a startling thought that made all his pride crash right down.

"Oh fuck. I never tested it with anything other than myself and some rocks." It hadn't even been that long ago, either. It was only just yesterday he'd finally figured it out, during his scouting with Sally.

She'd been sleeping at the time, during which Sorun had been tossing rocks through a portal to teleport them all the way to the room he shared with Sonic in Knothole. He'd of course then walked through himself, and after concluding that he and the rocks made it stepped back out to the other side.

So he knew it worked for him. And he knew it worked for inanimate objects. But he didn't know if it worked for somebody who didn't have a connection to the Yamato like he did.

"... I mean it should be fine, right?" Sorun thought to himself, looking towards the portal with an uneasy look on his face. "Nah-nah-nah-nah, nah, I'm overthinking this. It worked for the rocks, so Sally... yeah, she shouldn't need a connection to Yamato for it to work. It's just a portal. She should be fine."

That's what he told himself, at least. Inside he was actually terrified he'd just done something horrible by having Sally walk inside of there. Like strand her on some random point on the planet. Such as a cave somewhere. Or under the ocean. Or even worse some kind of wonky in-between realm or something like that.

"Shiiiiit- okay, alright, let's just walk through and check it out." Sorun began to briskly walk through the portal. "Please be okay please be okay please-"

"- be okay- oh, hey, look at that."

Walking through the portal was just like walking through a doorway, with the addition of his vision being overwhelmed in blue, swirling colors in the second it took to transition between one location and the next. And so, he'd walked right into the middle of the Freedom HQ's main living room, the couch to his left and, much to Sorun's relief, the princess standing on his right. Sally was looking herself up and down with a surprised look in her eyes. Off to the side of Sorun's peripheral he saw Sonic's blue form sitting on the couch, his green eyes widened as he looked back and forth from Sorun, Sally, and the portal.

"Ohhhh thank goodness it worked..." Sorun mumbled in-between a wheezy breath. Sally's ears had perked up at that, causing her to look towards the bent-over human.

"What was that?" she asked.

"Er, nothin', don't worry about it." Sorun lifted up Yamato and slashed it backwards towards the portal. The rhombus-shaped opening in space collapsed in on itself, and then disappeared entirely to leave an empty patch of space behind. "Anyways pretty cool, huh? Instantaneous travel."

"Umm..." Both Sorun's and Sally's eyes were drawn towards the couch, where Sonic was still staring at them both with great confusion in his eyes. "What just happened?"

"That," Sorun began as he moved towards the couch, "was a portal, Sonic. Because that's a thing the Yamato can do. Make portals." With a sigh he sat down in the middle of the couch, crossing one leg over the other while placing Yamato and its scabbard over his lap. "I just transported me and Sally back from the scouting mission we were on."

He expected at least some congratulating praise following this. Receiving it wasn't one of the reasons he'd endeavored to figure portals out in the first place, but he still would have figured he'd get some recognition for it. What he was getting instead was confused, lost looks not only from Sonic but from Sally, too. The hedgehog was glancing at him from the corner of his eyes while Sally stood in front of Sorun, arms crossed and eyes looking down at him.

"So... portals," Sally said, as if trying to confirm for herself the phenomenon Sorun had created a mere minute ago.

"Yeah, portals," Sorun echoed with a nod. "It's good, right?"

"Yes, but I... I thought your sword could only cut things?"

Sorun shook his head. "No, it separates things," he corrected. "What part of 'separates everything' isn't clear here?"

The simple explanation didn't seem to do anything to ease Sally's confusion. In fact, she just seemed even more lost now. "But how does that make portals?"

"It... uh..." Clicking his tongue, Sorun glanced to the side at Sonic. "Hey, can you go get me a piece of paper real quick?"

The hedgehog looked just as stumped as Sally was over the development with the portal, but he still agreed to Sorun's request with a small nod. He stood up, and before anybody present could blink he was off in a blue speed blur trailing towards and up the stairs. Sorun stared off after him, and then looked back towards Sally.

The princess's eyes had briefly trailed along Sonic's path, and then with a soft sigh she looked back down at Sorun. "Out of curiosity, how far can those portals go?" she questioned.

Sorun shrugged. "Anywhere on the planet, I guess," he said. "I haven't really tested it out that much. The portal we just came through was the furthest I ever tried- oh, hey Sonic."

He saw Sonic's body stop right next to the couch before the loud, zipping sound that usually accompanied Sonic's running hit Sorun's ears. He saw that the hedgehog was clutching an ordinary, white piece of paper in his hand, which Sorun reached over to take from his grasp. He sat a bit forwards on the edge of the couch afterwards, watching as Sonic stepped besides Sally with both of them looking expectantly towards Sorun.

"Alright, I saw something like this in a movie once, so I think I can explain this," Sorun began. "You guys ever hear of a Einstein-Rosen bridge?"

Both the Mobians in front of him shook their heads, with Sally asking, "A what?"

"Maybe they call it something different here, doesn't matter." The human teen held up the piece of paper for the other two teens to see. "So imagine the three-dimensional space that this world inhabits is represented as a two-dimensional space, in this case this paper I'm holding. Now we say point A-" he pinched one end of the paper with his fingers, "- is where we are right now, Freedom HQ. And point B-" he pinched the other end of the paper, "- is, I dunno, Knothole City. And Sonic, you'd agree with me when I say the fastest way from point A to point B is a straight line, right?"

Slowly, Sonic nodded in agreement. "Totally, yeah," he said.

"Okay, but what if... we did this?" Sorun folded the paper in half so that the two points he'd been pinching were touching. "Basically what Yamato does is it folds two points of space together, and then," he continued as he used his free hand to pick the blade up, "it cuts a hole through those two points." He lightly jabbed the sword's tip through the piece of paper, puncturing the two points. "Now this is a 2-D representation of what it does, but in real life 3-D the concept is pretty much the same thing. Yamato separates the distance between two points of space, hence, portal."

Throughout the entire explanation it didn't appear that Sonic got what Sorun was trying to say. His face had been scrunched up in concentration most of the time, and there were even a few points where he seemed to begin to understand, but then as Sorun would continue the understanding would fade from his eyes and he'd degrade right back into befuddlement. In the end he seemed just as puzzled as he was at the beginning of Sorun's explanation.

Sally was the exact opposite. Unlike Sonic, she'd actually been nodding along with Sorun's explanation throughout the whole thing, and near the end her eyes had lightened up in realization. "Oh! So you mean to say it's a wormhole?" she asked.

"You actually understood that...?" Sonic mumbled out, sending Sally a helpless glance.

Sorun snapped his fingers and pointed at Sally. "Wormhole, right, that's the word," he said with a nod. "Yeah, the Yamato makes wormholes. I just kinda think of a location really hard and, you know, do a little of this and a little of that with the sword, and then we get a wormhole."

"Okay..." Sally trailed off, her eyes flicking down to the sword in Sorun's lap. "And you don't think that at any point in time something like the ability to generate wormholes to any location on the planet could be useful to us?"

At hearing that, Sorun's expression grew flat. Even more, that small, hopeful sense he'd get to hear some praise had been washed away and was slowly starting to be replaced by some other emotion he couldn't quite place. "I literally just figured this out yesterday. N-not even yesterday. It was last night!"

"Last night? When we were supposed to be sleeping to conserve energy for the extended scouting mission we were on?" Sally asked, her eyes narrowed slightly.

"I had a burst of inspiration!" Sorun argued. "You know how long I've been trying to figure this out? I've been trying to make wormholes with the Yamato since I first got it!"

"And it really took you this long to figure it out?"

There was an air of disbelief about Sally that Sorun found that he didn't like. And he was beginning to be able to identify that unknown emotion welling up in him. It was anger. "... I'm sorry, Sally. I'm sorry the guy with an intro-level education in physics took so long deciphering quantum physics to make wormholes so you , because I mainly did this for the sake of the Freedom Fighters, could use them." He crumpled up the paper in his hand, tossed it aside, and stood up to his feet. "I'm not even exaggerating when I say that. I literally had to go to the library and check out a book on quantum theory just to figure this out. You know how awkward it was going back there after I turned in that Chao book so late!? It wasn't even that one blonde dog lady manning the front desk this time! It was some bigger dog dude, J-something, I don't remember, I couldn't pay attention past all the scolding because he wasn't nearly as forgiving for my late return as she was!"

"Sorun-" Sally had tried to calm Sorun down by raising her hands, but the other teen's response was to turn his back to Sally while crossing his arms. She reached out a hand towards him, stopped halfway, and then slowly lowered her hand back to her side as her face downturned into a small frown. "Why didn't you come to any of us for help with this?" she asked in a quiet voice.

Glancing back at Sally, Sorun felt the tightness in his arms go slack when he saw her face. He sighed, and then faced back forwards while letting out a string of unintelligible grumblings. "Grmbfm... wnntbcl... wanted to impress Nicole... ffmgr..."

Sally blinked, her ears flicking in an attempt to hear what he was saying. "I'm sorry, but what was that?"

"I said I don't like asking for help a lot, okay?" Sorun said, turning his head to look at Sally out of one eye. "Seems like all I do all the time is ask people for help, and it... makes me feel useless, so I wanted to do something on my own, 'cause I thought..." He cut himself off with a sigh, shook his head, and then fully turned around to face Sally. "It doesn't matter what I thought. Can we just focus on the bigger issue here?"

"Sorun..." Sally shook her head in denial, and then took a step closer to him. "You're not useless," she said in a low, almost admonishing tone. "Don't think like that. I understand you worked very hard for this and I'm very grateful you did this with us in mind."

"... Hmph." He spun his head back around so he was facing away from her. "You're just saying that."

"I'm really not." He felt Sally's hand grasp his shoulder and softly squeeze it. "You know you don't have to be upset at asking us for help every now and then. You never had a problem with it before, and look how far it got you."

And yet he did. He always detested asking them, asking anybody, for help. It made him feel week and insignificant, but he always had to whether it was training in some skill he didn't have or help with his powers or assistance during a mission. He always did it without complaint because necessity demanded it, but that didn't change the fact he absolutely loathed asking for help. He preferred doing things on his own so others saw him as capable. Not looking like he couldn't do anything on his own without help from somebody.

That's why he wanted to be recognized for figuring portals out. Not because it was a power given to him, but because it was something he'd used his powers to make all on his own. And that... maybe it would make her a bit more impressed at him. But he couldn't deny that Sally sounded genuinely apologetic towards him. And it did feel somewhat nice being praised like that, even if it was mixed into an apology.

"... You really think the portals are cool?" Sorun mumbled out, still keeping his eyes away from Sally.

He could almost feel her roll her eyes from behind him. "Of course I do. Why wouldn't I?"

"I want to hear you say it."

She sighed. "Sorun, I think the portals you make with your magic sword are very cool and useful to the Freedom Fighters."

"Apology accepted, you're forgiven." In a single beat Sorun whirled around to face Sally, his cold, sulky demeanor completely having vanished in a flash as he stared towards her. She had a light grin across her face, which made him breath out a single chuckle as he pocketed his hands and looked off to the side. "Seriously, though, there's still the whole factory thing we have to address."

"Right, I know." The small grin faded away from Sally's face as she turned towards Sonic, who had been mainly standing to the side the whole time. "Sonic, I'm going to need your help. Something big has come up..."

Tap.

An idea had been brewing inside of Sorun's mind.

Tap.

It was a pretty good idea. A fantastic one, even.

Tap.

The idea was simple: what if he just went and killed Eggman right now?

Tap.

"He's in that factory. Right there in person. In the flesh. Very stabable flesh." Sorun was sitting on the HQ's couch right now, idly tapping Yamato's tip against the ground as he was lost in his own thoughts. Others Sally had gathered for the impromptu mission were gathered all around him, though he tuned their voices out in lieu of his own internal thoughts. "Why do I gotta go kill myself getting the rest of the Emeralds if I can just go and kill the guy right now?"

The plan had been to wait until he had all the Emeralds. That had been one of the reasons he'd been so desperate to obtain the ability to make portals with the Yamato. Not only because it would be incredibly useful to the Freedom Fighters in their efforts to free the planet and for the praise, but because it gave him an in. An in to Eggman.

Get all the powers from the Emeralds. Use Yamato to make a portal in the general area where Eggman was in at the time. Go kill him. That was the general plan he'd been formulating for a while now. A plan portals made much more viable. He was usually in that city of his, New Megaopolis. Sorun never knew where, but with all the powers the Emeralds afforded him, he had to believe it wouldn't be that difficult to find him. And if not then to wait until he was in a easier area for him to search through. Somewhere he could reach, which, with the Yamato, was everywhere.

But if he was just in that factory right now he could skip all that and just go kill him.

"So that's forty-eight years lost to Emeralds, plus my normal sixteen years, which makes... sixty-four years in terms of my body's health. If I killed him right now and stopped getting Emeralds, that'd buy me, what, a few decades of life? Maybe four? Shit, it ain't much, but... but it's better than outright dying after I get number seven." He breathed heavily out of his nose and looked up at the HQ's ceiling. "Man. Maybe if I had a year or two to work up the nerve and ask her... jeez, something like that might actually be viable if I had some life to spare..."

A pipe dream, maybe, possibly, but that possibility only existed if Eggman died right now, and Eggman was in the open. Why, Sorun didn't know, probably planning something nefarious at that giant factory. It didn't matter. He was there. Vulnerable. Ripe for the killing.

Tap.

Fuck whatever prophetic nonsense the Neo-Walkers thought up. He was doing this his way if the opportunity was there.

Tap.

"Sorun, could you... could you please stop doing that? You're kind of making me nervous here..."

Ceasing his tapping, Sorun tilted his eyes upwards to the right side of the couch. Amy was sitting there, her hammer slung over her shoulder and her eyes nervously trained on Sorun's katana. Wordlessly, he lifted the sword up and, mimicking Amy, slung it over his own shoulder while giving her an apologetic look.

"Sorry, Amy. Pre-mission nerves," he lied, slowly drumming his fingers over the handle.

She pursed her lips at him in slight concern. "Yeah, this is looking like a pretty big one, huh? I'm kinda a little antsy myself here..."

"Ah-huh." Sorun absentmindedly nodded at Amy as he stared ahead, towards Sally who was standing near the end of the HQ's living room in front of everybody.

Credit where credit was due, Sally was quick to act. Whether it was because she realized that factory was a high-priority target that needed dismantling or she, too, was eager to strike while Eggman was there in person, Sorun didn't know. But whatever the case, she wanted to go attack that factory as soon as possible, possibly before Eggman left. Suited Sorun just fine. More people meant a greater chance of success. And with the Yamato's ability to make portals, he could transport them all inside of that factory and strike while he was unawares. Which would just further increase Sorun's chance of successfully ending him.

He just had to find him. While everybody else was going to town on that factory, he just had to find Eggman. He had something that would take care of the rest at that point. And then... then he just had to kill him. And then it would all be over.

"In terms of the interior layout, I don't expect this one to be similar to all the others considering its size." For a bit of time now Sally had been giving a briefing to those gathered, at multiple points addressing a crudely-drawn rendition of the target on a piece of paper taped to the wall behind her. "It's hard to say just what kind of numbers we'll be finding in there, but it's nothing we haven't dealt with before. We go in hard and fast, take out anything in our way, do what we need to do, and then get out." She turned her head back towards the drawing, eye ridges furrowed. "Furthermore, Eggman has been sighted on the premises. A target of opportunity like that is too good for us to pass up, so we're going now while our window of encountering him is open. Our mission objective is still the same: plant the explosives and then regroup so we can exfiltrate, but if anybody is to encounter Eggman you're to contact the rest of us immediately so we can converge on the target." She sent a pointed look in one of the Mobian's direction. "That means you, too, Sonic."

"Yeah, I get it, I get it," Sonic said, nodding at the princess. "No flyin' solo trying to get after Egghead. But you don't want us looking for him?"

"Dealing with him once and for all would be ideal, but we're already heading into this with a lot of unknowns." Sally shook her head. "As much as I hate to say it, he's a secondary objective in this mission."

"Well that's a problem." As much as Sorun hated to admit it, he saw the logic. It was Eggman. The man was dangerous. That was on top of whatever they were going to find in that factory. But if he was really going to carry out his own plan he couldn't follow that order. "Sorry, Sally. Afraid I'm gonna have to ignore that 'calling others for help' bit. You'd all try to stop me when I try to kill him."

There was another concern of Sorun's as he took a look around at those gathered. As it stood it was a pretty sizeable group: the entirety of the Chaotix. Amy, Sonic, Sally. Himself. That was it, though, which gave Sorun some concern. "Shouldn't we have more people on this?" he asked, voicing his concerns towards Sally.

"Trust me, I'd like everybody in on this, but some of the others are busy at the moment," she told him. "Antoine and Bunnie are running critical supplies to some of the outlying settlements, Rotor and Tails are performing critical maintenance on the Freedom Fighter Special, Rouge and Shadow-"

"They're occupied and we can't afford to wait, got it." Sorun breathed heavily through his nose as he palmed his face. Rushing into this because Eggman was there only to not make him a priority... he understood the reason behind it, but it still seemed somewhat ridiculous to him. Especially since they were going into this shorthanded now. "Nicole?" he asked, peering at the chipmunk through the gaps in his fingers.

"With Tails and Rotor," she answered.

"Mm." He nodded and lowered his hand away from his face.

Sally continued to look towards Sorun to see if he had anything else to say, but when he remained silent she looked towards Knuckles. "Are you and the Chaotix prepared for this?"

"We're as ready as we could be." Knuckles gave her a nod, and then turned to his side. "How we doing on explosives, Espio?"

"For our purposes we should have more than enough. We paid a special visit to the royal armory and carried back as much as we could per Sally's request," the chameleon answered. "I made sure to count."

The small glare that was sent his way from Charmy went ignored.

"Alright then." Sally turned back towards the sole human in the group. "This is all possible thanks to Sorun's new development. Sorun, if you could explain?"

All eyes turned towards Sorun, immediately straining his nerves. All this attention focused solely on him made him a bit uncomfortable, and he was already a bit restless over what was to come. But this was important, so he took in a deep breath and began his own explanation.

"My katana, the Yamato, has the ability to make portals to other locations. I'm not gonna get into the science of how it works, if I can even call it science, but I've... ehhh, I won't say extensively tested, but it's still a tried and true method," he said. He saw some of the others widen their eyes a bit, Knuckles in particular, and he tried his best to ignore it as he continued. "I know where the place is, so I'm gonna open a portal right into the middle of the factory. Where inside of the place that is I don't know, but it'll still be in."

"Exactly," Sally agreed, drawing all attention back to her much to Sorun's relief. "With Sorun's power we'll be teleporting right in the center of that factory, catching Eggman off-guard. We're going to use the chaos of our sudden appearance to our advantage and get those explosives placed before the Badnik forces have any time to organize any defensive action against us.

"Now, once we get in I want us all splitting off in pairs to go and set the explosives. Except... Sonic. And Sorun." Both teens perked their heads up when they heard Sally call of their names. "Surprise or not, there's still going to be a large amount of Badniks inside of that factory. I want you two running a distraction."

"A distraction?" Sonic repeated with a tilt of his head. Sorun remained silent, breathing out slowly as he thought over Sally's words.

She nodded. "It would take a lot of heat off of everybody else if the Badnik security forces inside the factory were preoccupied with two targets smashing through everything, and you and Sorun are the quickest at dismantling robots. So I want you two pairing up to basically run around the facility destroying everything in sight." She crossed her arms and looked in Sonic's direction, a small smirk playing across her mouth. "And if you just happen to run across Eggman while you both are tearing through the whole factory, well, more power to us."

"Ahhh, that's her play," Sorun finally realized, nodding to himself in understanding. "She wants us drawing attention away from everybody, and since we're gonna be running around everywhere there's a good chance we're gonna find Eggman. Then we call everybody and we show up to take him down." He glanced to the side at Sonic. "She's probably pairing me up with him just so he can make sure nothing happens to me since I'm our ride out, and because my powers make taking these things out real easy. And since I'd likely be there with Sonic when we first encounter Eggman, I'm right there to make a portal out for us if something goes wrong. Which it probably would with him. Pretty smart thinkin', Sally." Considering they had no idea what the inside of the place looked like, it was probably the best way to go about doing this. The main thing was just blowing that factory up to bring Eggman's Badnik numbers down even lower. He would have preferred just going straight after Eggman, but he could see why Sally wanted to play it safe. He himself didn't want anybody to be lost because they took a risky bet to try and end this prematurely. A great opportunity if the chance came up, but otherwise she was going for a safe, methodical win here. A guaranteed small victory for the long game with the lowest chance of life lost as opposed to a chancy instant win where something horrible could happen to them all. He could understand and respect what she was doing.

At the same time he couldn't go along with it.

"Still... it's gonna be pretty tricky dodging Sonic so I can go after Eggman on my own," Sorun continued to think. "I'm gonna have to ditch him at some point before finding Eggman. If we're together and we both get to him, then that's it. Nothing I'll be able to do. If I do it before, though..." His fingers idly tapped on Yamato's handle. "All I need is a few moments alone with him so I can use 'that'. It won't matter if they find us afterwards as long as I have it in my back pocket. But I'll still need to find some way to separate Sonic from myself..."

"I'm perfectly capable of doing that on my own," Sorun called out to Sally. "Just have Sonic help you all with the bombs. It'll go way faster if he's on that detail anyways."

He kept up a cool face on the outside, though he couldn't help but be overcome with silent frustration when he saw Sally shake her head.

"No, I want everybody with a partner on this so we can all keep each other safe."

"Then pair me up with Knuckles. He can do as much damage as Sonic, and Sonic can take his place and set bombs," Sorun suggested. "Plus it'll be way easier avoiding a guy that can't run faster than sound."

Again, much to Sorun's consternation, Sally shook her head. "I'd feel better if you went with Sonic, Sorun."

"I knew it. She wants me protected since her entire exfiltration strategy hinges on me and my portals. Not even a day after I get it and she's already planning stuff around my power. It's as admirable as it is maddening." He let out a soft sigh as he looked down to the floor. "And I guess there aren't many other people she would trust more than Sonic to make sure nothing bad happens to me. Looks like I'm stuck with him."

"Aw, what's the matter?" There was a brief sound of rapid footsteps, and then Sorun noticed a pair of red sneakers in his peripheral. He looked up to see Sonic smiling down on him. "Don't feel like smashin' some bots with little ol' me?"

"Perish the thought, Sonic," Sorun mumbled in response, sitting back upwards while kicking his feet forwards. "Alright, fine. Me an' Sonic will go wreak havoc to keep the bots off you guys."

"And we'll make sure to keep an eye out for Eggman in the meantime," Sonic added, nodding towards Sally.

"Okay then." Sally closed her eyes, breathed in deeply, and then slowly exhaled as she opened her eyes to everybody gathered in front of her. "So are we all set to go, then?"

There were cries of affirmation and grins all around. Everybody gave Sally readying nods and eagers eyes, causing her to smile the barest amount as she stepped away from the wall.

"Alright. Then we're a go," she announced. "Sorun?"

"One portal comin' up." Sorun bounced up off the couch and walked to the center of the room. He held Yamato's blade up in the air, but stopped short of cutting downwards as he looked towards Sally. "Just to be clear, when all the bombs are set we regroup and I make the getaway portal whether or not we found Eggman, right?" he asked.

She nodded in confirmation. "Yes, that's correct."

His eyes narrowed the smallest amount, though he'd turned his head away to cover them with his hair before anybody could see. "Just checkin'," he said, closing eyes to concentrate before cutting downwards. A blue line was left hanging in the air, followed by a second line bisecting it to make a cross. The blue lines and space itself folded inwards to create rhombus-shaped portal of swirling blue energy.

The portal made, Sorun exhaled and stepped away, swirling Yamato around in his grip and pointing the tip towards the portal. "Alright. Just step inside and we're in," he instructed them.

A few moments passed, but, for some reason, nobody stepped forwards. Eyebrows furrowed in curiosity, Sorun looked back at the crowd behind him. He saw from the corner of his eyes that Sonic and Sally were giving everybody else the same look he had, too, as they were all staring towards the portal Sorun had just made with some apprehension.

Hesitantly, Vector was the one to raise his hand. "Yo, uh... y-you're sure that thing is safe, right?" he asked, pointed towards the portal.

"Yes," came the laconic reply from Sorun. "It's safe."

"... You're sure, right?"

"I could always throw you through, Vector," Sorun threatened, a few spectral feathers appearing over his shoulder. "Have you take a real close look for yourself."

"N-nah, I'm good," the crocodile assured him, raising his palms upwards towards the human. "Though, uh, it's your portal. Why don't you go first?"

Besides him, Charmy gave a nod of agreement as he looked towards the portal. "Yeah, I'm with Vector. You go first."

Most of the others, save for Sonic and Sally, gave agreeing nods to the bee's request. The latter two just looked back towards Sorun, giving him shrugs as they nodded towards the portal. Sorun watched the entire display with slumped shoulders, and then finally gave a relenting sigh as he turned around to face the portal.

"Christ on a crutch you guys..." Rolling his eyes at the ceiling, Sorun stomped his way towards the portal, shaking his head a slight amount the whole way there.

Just as last time, the travel through the portal had been an uneventful, second-long walk of blinding blue light. The environment on the other side of the portal was wholly different from the interior of the Freedom HQ once he exited the portal: metal walls wherever he looked. A metal ceiling that was so high Sorun could barely see it. There wasn't much else to see besides a few metal support beams scattered around and, interestingly enough, a few conveyer belts suspended high near the ceiling and extending from a hole in one wall all the way to the other end of the room through another hole.

He heard footsteps behind him as the others began following Sorun through the portal. Sonic and Sally were the first ones to walk through the portal. Amy and the Chaotix came next, and once the last one came through Sorun walked back to the portal and slashed it with the Yamato, causing it to close and disappear.

There were some quiet mutterings from everybody as they looked around the giant room they'd walked into, some clutching the weapons few held or the satchels of explosives slung around their torsos. Sorun himself walked over to Sonic, tapping the blue hedgehog on the shoulder to draw his attention away from the room around them.

"Alright, let's go," Sorun said as he slid Yamato into its scabbard.

"Huh?" Blinking, Sonic whirled over to Sorun. "Already?"

"Yeah, we're here, clock's ticking." He tossed the sheathed katana up in the air, caught it halfway up the sheath with his left hand, and pointed it towards one of the myriad doorways at one of the ends of the room. "I have a good feeling about that direction."

"That direction, huh?" Sonic mused, turning to where Sorun was pointing while placing his hands on his hips. "What's so special about over there?"

Sorun shrugged. "Nothin', really. There's just so many ways to go that I picked a random place."

Breathing out a sigh, Sonic could only let out a small chuckle while shrugging his shoulders along with Sorun. "That's about as good as what I got." He craned his neck backwards to address Sally. "Hey, Sal, me and Sorun are gonna head out and do our thing. You good to go?"

"Yep," she said with a nod towards the hedgehog. "We're all good here. Stay safe you two."

"I always do," Sonic claimed, staying behind to shoot the princess two finger guns. Sorun had already started walking towards the doorway he'd pointed to earlier.

Rolling her eyes in amusement, Sally turned towards the others. "Alright guys, first things first we should..."

The rest of the Sally's words faded out as Sorun lengthened the distance between himself and the rest of the group. He was only able to enjoy the silence for about two seconds until he heard a small whoosh besides him, followed by a blue shape walking besides him.

"So this is exciting, huh, Sorun?" Sonic asked, his tone light and a smirk on his face as he interlocked his fingers behind his quills. "You and me, bustin' bots right in the middle of Egghead's base right under his huge nose."

"Yeah. Exciting," Sorun droned out, eyes still forwards.

"Ah, come on, man, lighten up. It's just a buncha Badniks. Nothin' special."

A short sigh left Sorun. "You're always so carefree during these things, aren't you...?" he tersely muttered, his grip on Yamato tightening. "You never change."

"Never have, never will." Sorun didn't even think he picked up on the human's tone of voice. He just maintained that casual demeanor as he kept walking alongside Sorun. "Well, in any event, we gotta make some noise to cover our pals. So let's shake the lead out and do it-"

"Don't you dare say it-"

"- to it!"

Sorun visibly recoiled, shuddering just the slightest amount as a soft groan slipped past his lips. "I hate that saying of yours..." he mumbled under his breath. It made no sense grammatically speaking and just sounded awful to Sorun's ears. But to his chagrin, Sonic, for reasons beyond Sorun's understanding, chose to make that phrase his go-to catchphrase. And he was fairly certain he died a bit more inside every time he heard it.

"Eh, you're no fun," Sonic said. "Let's find you some Badniks to go swing your sword at. Cuttin' some bots up should loosen you up."

For once, Sorun found himself agreeing with Sonic.

They'd tripped some kind of alarm at some point.

Sorun wasn't too sure when it happened. It wasn't as if he and Sonic were being subtle about what they were doing- they were basically nonchalantly strolling through the whole facility, destroying any robot they saw room after room. Perhaps a camera had seen them, or a stray robot had tripped an alarm, or some wandering patrol found the remains of one of their attacks. It didn't really matter since the whole goal was to draw as much attention to them anyways, hence the lack of subtlety on their part.

It seemed to be working for the most part. They'd entered another large room, mostly empty save for some high conveyer belts, some random crates scattered about, and the six Egg Pawns waiting for them as both Sorun and Sonic sauntered through one of the doorways.

"Feels like we're going around in circles from the way all these rooms look so similar," Sorun said, barely sparing the six robots in front of them a glance as their heads were skewered with Summoned Swords.

There was a loud, blaring sound as a large door to their side automatically opened up. Another squad of four Egg Pawns ran out, clutching their lances with their mechanical eyes affixed to Sorun's form. Before they even got close a blue, spinning ball collided into each one, the object cutting clean right through them with seemingly no effort whatsoever. Once the last robot was cut down the blue object stopped and untucked itself to reveal Sonic, who, with a light smile on his face, proceeded to brush the soles of his sneakers against one of the robots to brush them off. "Sorry, guys. You're just too slow."

Sorun rolled his eyes at the display, getting ready to say something before he heard another short alarm. Another door on the other side of the room began opening up, another squad of Egg Pawns rushing through towards them. Sorun had lifted up his sheathed Yamato to defend himself, but before he could even grab its handle Sonic's blue form had zoomed past him towards the approaching robots.

"Move it or lose it!"

As with the previous group, Sonic had made short work of this group of Egg Pawns by easily and effortlessly Spin Dashing right through their bodies. More and more alarms sounded as more doors opened, followed by more small squads of Egg Pawns pouring out, but before Sorun could even move to retaliate Sonic had beat him to it. The hedgehog's spinning form flew right towards each and every one, destroying them in a short and efficient manner before quickly moving onto the next.

"It's juicin' time!"

"Hah! Almost got me! Not!"

"Nice try, ro-butt!"

"This hurts to listen to." By now Sorun had given up on even attacking any of the robots, and had just let the hand holding his katana go slack to his side as he watched the blue hedgehog completely and effortlessly tear through all the robot forces around them. He couldn't help but momentarily grimace every time he heard a one-liner come out of Sonic's mouth, and the longer this went on the more tight his facial expression grew.

It was always like this working with Sonic, though "working with" may have been generous as Sonic always took any opportunity he could to smash more robots than anybody else. It was like a competition to him; something that used to have Sorun scoffing in amusement, but nowadays it just caused a quiet anger to simmer inside of Sorun whenever he had to witness Sonic and his antics.

If there was one single Mobian in all of the Freedom Fighters that got on Sorun's nerves the most, it was Sonic. It was always Sonic that drew his ire. Everything about him irritated Sorun to his core. The way Sonic always managed to go on these missions and take out all these robots without even trying. The way he always kept up that same flippant, devil-may-care attitude no matter what. That same carefree smirk on his face even as he recklessly charged into the most dangerous situations, and always made it out on top no matter what.

There were so many things Sorun felt every single time he did a mission with Sonic and had to watch him absolutely dominate the opposition. Admiration that was soon marred by resentment. Camaraderie mixed with anger. There used to be deep respect, but after a while of seeing the way the hedgehog acted around his adversaries it slowly started to erode into something else, and for a while he couldn't quite place what it was. But after having to see that same smile plastered on Sonic's face all the time as he sawed his way through all those robots, Sorun was able to finally place it.

Intense jealousy. It was an ugly thing to feel towards the blue Mobian, Sorun realized it, but he just couldn't help it. He felt it whenever he looked at himself, at all his powers that were slowly killing him, and then he looked at Sonic. Sonic, who had so much power that all these robots trying to kill him were little more than a minor inconvenience to him, and all he'd ever had to do to gain his powers was be born with them and collect a bunch of rings. It wasn't that he was so careless, it was that he was so powerful that he could afford to be careless and then some. Because that's who he just was. Sonic.

Sonic. Who, no matter what, always made it through whatever challenge Sorun had seen the world throw at him with no effort whatsoever because he was just naturally that powerful. Who could go around with a smile permanently affixed to his face because everything just went right for him. Someone so admired by those around him that pretty much everybody adored him. A hero to the whole world. Somebody who had a loving family to go back home to.

What was Sorun compared to that? Somebody with powers that were slowly killing him, that didn't even put him on the same level as Sonic. He could never smile because every single day he was reminded of everything wrong with his life. He was always having to hide his true feelings away from everybody to spare them of his own suffering; he'd had to periodically stab himself with Yamato in secret just so they wouldn't see him having a panic attack and worry for him. His vain, basically thrown away, effort of distancing himself from everybody was all but in shambles at this point, and because of that Sorun himself didn't even know what his relationship with those around him was. He was a human stuck in a world of Mobians who barely even knew who he was, and his family was a whole other world away and lost to him forever.

Sonic had the opportunity of living an actual life once the war was over. Maybe even find somebody to settle down with. Die old and happy.

Sorun didn't.

He... couldn't outright hate Sonic. Deep inside Sorun knew these were all factors that Sonic had no control of. He knew from living and interacting with him that Sonic was a pure, kind-hearted, perhaps the most kind-hearted person Sorun had ever met, individual who always put the needs of others before himself. A completely selfless person who was putting his life on the line just as much as everybody else by being in the Freedom Fighters. He was the very definition of a good person. Sorun couldn't hate that.

At the same time, he couldn't help but absolutely resent Sonic for having everything Sorun didn't have and wanted. And these feelings always made themselves known whenever Sorun saw Sonic act this way on missions.

"Whoo! And that's another thirty down!" Sonic zoomed to a stop right in front of Sorun, looking absolutely no worse for wear and wearing that same cocky smirk on his face. "So what's the score up to now?"

"I stopped keeping count a few rooms ago," Sorun rumbled out, maintaining a blank stare towards Sonic's way. "You could always try and leave some for me instead of hogging all the enemies to yourself."

"What, and let you have all the fun? Not a chance," Sonic said.

"Tch..." Sorun turned his head away from Sonic and began walking forwards, Yamato tightly gripped in his hand. He sensed Sonic walking right besides him, and he felt the hedgehog's green eyes locked right onto his face.

"Say," Sonic said, "what's got you all grumpy?"

Closing his eyes to take a breath, Sorun stopped walking and then turned to face Sonic. "Your one-liners," he said. "They drive me nuts."

Sonic scoffed in disbelief at that. "My one-liners? No way, my one-liners are great. You just must be hard at hearing."

"You have absolutely no class. You just spew off petty insults at everything," Sorun claimed.

"What, and yours are so better by comparison?"

"I actually put a lot of thought into mine," Sorun said, brushing his right hand through his dark hair. "You gotta get creative when you insult somebody. It adds that all-important edge of intellectual superiority you need to make the insult legitimate. Without it all you have are cheap jabs."

Sonic blinked towards Sorun, tilting his head in thought and nodding along to Sorun's words as he seemed to think them over. And then he shrugged while shaking his head, saying, "Nah, Sorun, I think you're putting way too much thought into this."

Thump!

Sorun was ready to retort when the ground beneath them lightly shook alongside the sound of a distant thump. More and more loud thumps, almost sounding like footsteps, reached their ears as the pair turned towards the source the noise: a large, garage-like door built right into the wall they stood next to. A flashing, orange light above the door began flashing as the door automatically began to roll open, with Sorun's shoulders tensing when he saw what was on the other side of the door.

"Oh, it's one of these guys," Sorun mumbled under his breath as he watched the large, purple-colored Badnik walk into the room he and Sonic were in, giant hammer slung over its shoulder. "An Egg Hammer."

"Pfft. It's got nothin' on Amy," Sonic said, confident smirk on his face as he sized the Badnik up and down with his eyes. "Want me to take it out?"

"No. There's something I actually want to try out on this thing." Sorun walked past Sonic and towards the front of the giant Badnik, Yamato still clutched in his left hand. "It's my new move."

He stopped right in front of the Egg Hammer, with the robot's green, menacing eyes staring down right at the human. It hefted the hammer off of its shoulder and gripped it with both hands, readying itself to lift up and smash the hammer down at a moment's notice. Sorun, in response, breathed out slowly as he wrapped the fingers of his right hand around the katana's handle.

"Alright. You got this. You practiced it." Sorun's eyes narrowed up at the Egg Hammer as arcs of blue energy ran along Yamato's sheath. "Just concentrate... and aim it right..."

The power running along the length of the sword's sheath began to grow in intensity. It got a point where it began to glow so brightly that the entire sword, from its handle to the black sheath, had turned into a brightly-glowing blue color, with more wisps of blue energy slowly wafting off of it. There was enough Chaos energy that some of the quills on the back Sonic's head began to stand up, and he found himself taking an unconscious step backwards.

In the span of a single second, multiple events occurred. The first was that Sorun had pulled the Yamato out of its sheath a quarter of the way and, in seemingly the exact same movement, re-sheathed it fully. At the same time, a white-blue slash appeared in the air in front of Sorun, and then quickly disappeared. The space all around the Egg Hammer's body began to shift and warp afterwards, as if a dark blue, barely-perceptible bubble had wrapped around it.

And then the cuts assaulted it. Dozens of white-blue, crescent-shaped slashes appeared all at once in the air around the Egg Hammer, all curving in every conceivable direction at the same time and carving through the Badnik's body in the same instance. Slashes that cut with such intensity that they caused a chromatic aberration around the space they slashed in, slashes of red and blue flickering into existence for milliseconds besides the main slashes.

The display came to an abrupt end. The distortion in space and the myriad floating, crescent slashes disappeared almost as soon as they arrived, leaving behind an Egg Hammer covered in dozens and dozens of slash marks along its body. And then it tipped over and fell apart into innumerable pieces, all of which scattered along the floor.

All of this had taken place within the span of a single second.

"That..." Sorun breathed out, straightening up his posture as he ran his right hand through the dark hair hanging in his face, "... was Judgement Cut."

"... Wow." Eyes widened, Sonic stepped next to Sorun while peering down on the ground the Egg Hammer had been standing on. The nearly-uncountable amount of slashes that had completely decimated the Badnik had cut with such fervor that there were a number of straight grooves cut into the metal ground where it had been standing. "What did you do?" he asked as he turned his head to Sorun.

The human teen answered by holding the sheathed Yamato up for Sonic to see. "Eh, it's kinda complicated," he began. "First I make a slash, and then use Yamato's power to separate the distance between me and what I'm slashing at. Then I separate the time it takes for me to make the actual slash, so real-time it looks like I didn't really do anything. Then around the general area I'm trying to cut in I use Yamato's power of separation to break down the dimensional barriers around there, so once the space is broken up enough the one slash turns into multiple..." He trailed off when he saw Sonic's shoulders begin to sag in confusion, and after registering the lost look on the hedgehog's face he sighed and shook his head. "I use Yamato to slash at something from far away really fast," he explained. "Now if only I could figure out Judgement Cut End..."

"Why didn't you just say so?" Sonic mumbled out. "How'd you even figure out how to do something like that?"

"A lot of studying from that book I checked out and theoretical practice."

"You mean that quantum-whatever book?"

"It pays to read, Sonic." Sorun lifted his right hand up and tapped the side of his head. "Pays to read."

"I guess." Sonic's gaze travelled back to the rent-apart Badnik. "You didn't say a cool one-liner, though."

Sorun scoffed. "What, I'm supposed to waste my words on trash mobs like this? Please." More loud thumps stopped Sorun from saying anything further, and caused the two teens to turn around. On the other end of the room two more large doors had opened up, with two more Egg Hammers emerging and stomping their way towards them. "Looks like we have a couple more," Sorun said as he gripped his sword's handle. "How about-"

"I got it!" Before Sorun could get another word in Sonic had curled up into a spiky ball, began spinning, and shot forwards to the two Badniks. Sorun's eyes followed after the spinning hedgehog in surprise, and he found himself cursing under his breath as he stepped forwards to help Sonic with the robots.

Only, it seemed that Sorun's assistance was wholly unnecessary. Sonic's spinning form had locked onto the rightmost Badnik, curving upwards to connect with the spot its head connected to its body. Sonic's spinning body carved right through the Egg Hammer, and the robot's head soon fell away as Sonic uncurled and landed right on the headless robot's shoulder. The second Egg Hammer saw the decapitation of its twin, and soon unslung the hammer from its shoulder and reared it back in preparation to beat it downwards. Sonic, still standing on the headless Badnik's shoulder, stood completely still while cockily smirking at the second Badnik.

The Egg Hammer swung its hammer. Sonic had jumped upwards mere milliseconds before the hammer hit, the first Badnik's body crumpling under the hammer's weight. Sonic, still in the air, began spinning once more and launched towards the second Badnik. Similar to the first one, Sonic's body had sawed right through the head of the second one, ending with the blue hedgehog landing feet-first on the ground. The Badnik with the split head behind him wobbled on its feet, dropped the hammer it had been holding, and then finally tilted to the side far enough that it tipped over completely and fell down.

Sorun had been watching Sonic attack the two Badniks the entire time. When the first Badnik had fallen he felt his jaw clench tightly, and by the time the second one fell down he was clutching Yamato hard enough that his hand was shaking. And during the entire time

Sonic had kept up that same, infuriating smirk on his face, which only served to make Sorun all the more upset.

"Of course. Of course the one moment I finally get to show off my Judgement Cut... he has to go and invalidate it by taking out two of those things like it was nothing." Sorun found himself looking downwards at his hands. At the small cuts covering his hands that were a result of practicing that move so many times until he'd gotten it right. Until he'd figured out a move that could instantly take down any Badnik. Something he could be proud of and call his. He didn't feel nearly as accomplished in acquiring Judgement Cut and destroying an Egg Hammer with it when Sonic had managed to destroy two with almost no effort at all on his part. "Why does he always have to make me feel so useless...!?"

He always did this to Sorun. Always. Even all the way back on the first day he came here, with that foot race. Even if it was indirect, he always had to find some way to make Sorun feel this way. To feel like his efforts amounted to nothing because of the natural power he wielded. Inferior. It was yet another thing Sorun couldn't help but feel whenever Sonic had the urge to show off in front of him.

And he always had to do it with that damn smirk ...

"Whew! That was a great workout." Sonic blurred back to Sorun's side, wiping his gloved hands off on each other as he glanced at Sorun from the side of his eyes. "Let's keep movin', huh? I got a feeling we're gettin' close to finding Egghead in this heap."

"... Yeah. Let's," Sorun quietly agreed, spinning on a dime towards a nearby open doorway. He and Sonic walked side-by-side, the hedgehog absentmindedly whistling a small tune while Sorun silently fumed besides him, just barely managing to hold up a blank, passive face.

"Huh, get a load of this place, huh?"

"Mh." Sorun grunted in response, looking around the new room they'd both walked into with a disinterested look. "It's... empty."

The room they'd walked into was rather wide and circular in shape. In front of them was little more than a wide, metal walkway that connected all the way to the other end of the room. There was no floor otherwise; when Sorun walked to one of the edges of the walkway and peered down, all he saw was a drop so long it lead into darkness. He hummed from his crouched position at the edge of the walkway, and then craned his neck back to Sonic who stood behind him.

"Where do you think this drops to?" Sorun asked, pointing down into the abyss below.

Sonic shrugged. "Into a lower level or something maybe, I dunno. This place is huge enough for something like that."

Humming in response, Sorun stood back up to his feet. "Interesting." He turned back to Sonic, asking, "You think Eggman would be down on a lower level?"

"I mean, probably?" Again, Sonic shrugged. "Hard to say, but... eh, to be honest with you, Sorun, we've been at this a while. The others are probably gonna be finished pretty soon setting the bombs, so maybe we should think about heading back after a few more rooms. Shame if we don't find Eggman, but as long as this place goes bye-bye I'm cool with it."

"Well, I'm not." Sorun took a final glance towards Sonic. He gave him an empty look, and then turned back down to the drop below. "I wonder..."

BWAAN!

Both teens shuddered when a loud, blaring alarm sounded throughout the room a single time. All around the circular room orange lights lit up to highlight eight circular portholes that were built right into the walls. The eight holes opened up simultaneously, and something flew through each of them that made Sorun snicker at how ridiculously absurd they looked.

He thought they were small, green airplanes at first until he noted the mechanical wings were actually flapping to keep the small devices that were a bit bigger than Sorun himself aloft. And then he saw that, instead of a normal nose cone at the head of each small plane, was a round and bulbous nose cone styled into a face resembling Eggman's. The eight flying things surrounded the walkway Sorun and Sonic stood on in a tight circle, the light sounds of their metal plane wings flapping reaching Sorun's ears and causing him to scoff.

"A flying type?" he quietly mused as he slowly pulled Yamato from its sheath.

"Yeah. Egg Flappers," Sonic supplied, the name causing Sorun to snicker again. "They're about as annoying as they look, but be careful."

"They look ridiculous is what they- oh, they have guns." He only just now saw them as he looked closer at one of the floating, green Badniks. Just under its body was what looked like the small barrel of some kind of gun bolted right to its underside, the opening of said barrel aimed right at Sonic and Sorun. The same could be said for the rest of the Egg Flappers surrounding them.

Before any of them could get another word in edgewise, the barrels of all the guns surrounding them began to glow a bright yellow color. Sorun had reflexively surrounded himself in crossed Summoned Swords, and moments later yellow laser beams fired out of the gun barrels. The beams impacted the crossed swords defending Sorun all around, causing noticeable cracks and breaks to appear along their surfaces. Sonic hadn't missed a beat, and zoomed off to Spin Dash completely through one of the Egg Flappers. A few of the other green Badniks had fired their lasers at the hedgehog while he was still there, but through feats of exceptional prowess he'd flipped over and dodged through all the shots while spinning up again and smashing through another robot in the same movement.

"There he goes again. Being all amazing and showing off." Letting out a small scoff, Sorun turned his head around as more swords appeared around him to defend his body. He looked upwards, humming when he saw another walkway hovering right above the one he stood on. "Now there's an idea. If there was ever an opportunity to lose Sonic... well, it'd be now."

He glanced over at Sonic, watching as he smashed through his third Badnik. Clicking his tongue, Sorun glanced back up at the walkway above. He flicked Yamato upwards once in a tiny movement, and then twice, the movements having been so small his own eyes barely registered the sword moving. Two thin, blue lines appeared at each end of the walkway, causing Sorun to nod to himself as his lips thinned.

In that moment Sonic had hopped back onto the walkway in front of Sorun, a fourth destroyed Egg Flapper falling down into the blackness. From the corner of his eyes Sorun saw a fifth plane-shaped Badnik charging its laser cannon up, prompting him act. A Summoned Sword appeared in front of it at an odd, low angle, and when it struck forwards and impaled the Egg Flapper the machine was flipped upwards. At the same moment it flipped upwards its small laser cannon, having been pointed upwards, fired a laser right up to the walkway Sorun had cut earlier.

The yellow laser struck the walkway. There was a faint creaking sound, and then all of a sudden the walkway began falling directly down to the walkway both Freedom Fighters were standing on. Sorun blinked up at it, then looked to the side at Sonic who was too busy focusing on the remaining Egg Flappers hovering around them.

Two things happened in the same moment. The first was that Sorun, yelling "Look out!" at Sonic, manifested his Bringer Claw and pushed Sonic all the way to the entrance they came from. The second thing to happen was that he jumped right off the walkway mere moments before the falling one collided with it, the impact destroying the aforementioned walkway and causing both to plummet into the darkness below. Sorun followed the falling debris, his own body succumbing to gravity and falling downwards.

Sonic himself wasn't able to react at first, the shove from the Bringer Claw having been so forceful his body was sent stumbling forwards. He caught himself quickly with his sneakers sliding against the ground, though by the time he looked back the walkway from above had already crashed into the one he'd been shoved off of and fell down into the pit below. It was at the same time he saw Sorun's body plummet downwards along with the debris. He reached out to him and called out his name, but by then the human's body had already fallen out of sight.

Deeper inside of the factory the Freedom Fighters were assaulting, a faint, distant sound could be heard. The sound of light whistling, emanating from the red-cloaked figure that was slowly walking through the halls. His left hand clutched a piece of notebook paper, whereas his right hand was hefting a large sword that was currently resting on his shoulder.

Continuing his whistle, Rubrum continued to calmly saunter down the hall until he came to a crossroads: a fork in the hallway he was in. His whistling was disturbed a bit when he stopped walking mid-step, hopping back a few inches on his one foot until he finally set both feet down at the ground. He looked at the corner of the wall nearest to him, glanced at the paper in his hand, and then with a hum he shrugged the sword off of his shoulder.

With three quick swipes an arrow had been carved into the metal wall, pointing left. Satisfied, he rested the sword back on his shoulder and resumed his whistling as he made his way deeper into the factory.

And here he was again. Falling. It seemed like he was doing a lot of that recently.

Whatever this shaft was apparently went really deep, too, because he was about ten seconds into this fall. On the bright side, though, his plan was coming through real great. Sonic? Gone completely, or at least far enough away that he wouldn't be able to disturb Sorun if he found Eggman. When he found Eggman. If he was really here Sorun wasn't wasting any time in finding him and finally killing him so this war could end right now. He just had to worry about actually locating him.

But that came later. Right now he had to survive this fall.

"Ah, man, I just realized I'm gonna have to think up some excuse for why I didn't just fly out of here after falling," Sorun realized. The teen fell with his body parallel to the ground, his hands interlaced behind his head with one leg crossed over the other. "Eh, I'll just lie and say I got hit in the head by something. Should be believable enough. More importantly is how I'm supposed to find Eggman in this huge place."

He began humming as his body slowly spun around so that it was facing downwards. "Guess I'll just make a mad dash and hope I get lucky. The others should be fine in the meantime." He heard a loud crashing sound from the debris below him colliding with ground. "Oh, that's my stop."

Sorun saw that his body was quickly approaching flat ground. Right before he impacted it, he Tricked a few meters away from where the broken walkways crash landed. He appeared right on his feet, looked behind himself at the pile of twisted metal behind him, then made a light scoff as he turned back forwards.

"Sorun? Sorun!?" A voice, Sonic's voice, rang out in Sorun's ear and made him wince, and then he realized he was wearing an earpiece. It must have been Sonic trying to contact him. "Sorun, are you alr-!?"

The earpiece was removed from Sorun's ear without a second thought. Sorun looked thoughtfully down at the small, black device he held in his hand, and then shook his head as his hand clenched around it, crushing it in his grasp.

"Sorry, Sonic, but I'm doing this my way," Sorun said, tossing the fragments of the earpiece over his shoulder. "Now where the hell'd I end up?"

It was another walkway, it seemed. Wider and more heavily built by the looks of it. Where he was seemed to be a different story: a vast, open cavern that was so wide Sorun couldn't even see any walls when he looked left or right. Just more metal walkways and conveyer belts everywhere, all leading into giant metal spires that extended up into what Sorun presumed to be the cavern's ceiling, back up into the factory. He whistled at the sight, slowly making his way down the walkway he stood on as he glanced around at the environment.

"Man. I'm getting major nostalgia vibes from this place. Reminds me of the underground factory level from 'Automata'..." Sorun mumbled under his breath as he faced forwards. "Just how huge is this factory, anyways? I wanna believe that the factory up above caving in from all the explosives the other guys are placing is enough to bury this place, but sheesh... I just don't know." He shook his head and began jogging forwards. "Don't think about it too much, Sorun. Won't matter a bit as long as you kill that guy."

Running forwards, Sorun saw that the walkway he was running down was, oddly enough, leading right into a dead end. Specifically, the wall of one of the giant spires that lead up from the darkness below all the way up to the metallic ceiling. He saw that there was a small staircase to the side that wrapped up and around the spire, though, and to save himself some time Sorun Tricked to the highest point on the staircase he could see.

One Trick and some stair-climbing later, Sorun made it to the top of the staircase. Unfortunately he didn't find a door leading into the giant metal spire he'd been climbing, though he did find that the top of the staircase branched off into another walkway that connected to another spire on the other side. Sorun began running down it, but then he stopped halfway and huffed in frustration when he saw that this walkway just lead to another staircase wrapping around the other spire.

Glancing around, Sorun saw a conveyer belt across the way over the giant pit everything seemed to be suspended over. With another Trick, he'd teleported over there and arrived standing on a small, metal panel that was being carried on the conveyer belt. However, when Sorun looked down at the panel, he couldn't help but cringe in revulsion when he saw a bump in the plate that just barely resembled Eggman's face. The start of an Egg Pawn's head, with hollows eyes and a smile where the electronics would no doubt be socketed.

The teen heard a sudden whirring sound reach his ears, and looked up just in time to see a drill connected to a robot arm attached to the conveyer belt swing towards him. He yelped and jumped back a bit as the drill lowered onto the plate, louder whirring heard as the automatic tool began drilling rivets into the plate Sorun stood on. When he looked ahead, he saw identical plates ahead of the conveyer belt being worked on by other automatic tools. Welding guns, saws, drills and hammers working against the metal plates and slowing shaping the metal into the beginnings of a Badnik.

Sorun Tricked multiple times from plate to plate, ducking under and narrowly dodging a number of automatic tools that kept bearing down on the plates he kept teleporting onto. Their movements were repetitive and in sync with each other, though, and with a few seconds' glance he managed to ascertain the pattern they kept lowering into. Afterwards he was able to dodge and avoid all the tools with ease, and by the time he Tricked all the way to the end of the conveyer belt he found himself sighing in relief. The conveyer belt was rolling into a small, rectangular hole into the side of one of the spires, but when he looked slightly above the hole, he saw a small metal outcropping sticking out of the side of the spire. And a door right in front of that outcropping.

And then he heard a loud, hissing sound, causing the relief to fade from Sorun as he looked up. Right above him he saw what looked like a giant, rectangular press held above him from a mechanical arm hanging high over his head. Eyes widening in panic, Sorun Tricked out of the way just as the giant press smashed into the metal plate Sorun had been standing on previously. He appeared on the metal outcropping in front of the door, with the teen glancing back just as the press lifted up from the plate it pressed into. "Too close..." he whispered out as Yamato appeared in his hands.

After a few quick slashes a hole had been cut inside of the door, which Sorun quickly walked through. He entered to find a small staircase leading to the center of the spire he'd walked into, which, by all accounts, was rather brightly lit. It was only a few steps down into a large, circular room, though what alarmed Sorun the most was the fact that the walls of the room he'd entered were lined with three Egg Hammers hung up on racks inserted into large, tube-like grooves cut into the walls.

Even more alarming was the fact that, the moment Sorun stepped into the dead center of the room, the green eyes on all three Egg Hammers suddenly lit up.

The pale teen failed to suppress the groan he instinctually made when he saw the three large Badniks begin to detach themselves from the racks they hung off of. All three dropped down onto the floor beneath them, with Sorun feeling a slight tremor every single time one's feet touched down. Even worse was that it seemed each one had their own respective weapon on a separate rack right besides where they had been hanging previously, which they proceeded to reach upwards for and remove. While this had been happening Sorun slightly widened his feet as his hands clamped down on Yamato, his eyes glaring up at the three Egg Hammers.

"Alright. Three. It's no biggie." Sorun slowly exhaled when he saw the three large Badniks begin to slowly converge on him, each on holding a hammer of massive proportion in their hands. His sword began glowing blue. "Sonic makes it look easy. It should be easy for me, too."

In a quick draw and re-sheath, the middlemost Egg Hammer was consumed in a vortex of ethereal slashes. Unabated, Sorun shifted his attention to the right Egg Hammer and attempted to perform another Judgement Cut in order to destroy it just like he had the first.

Something had gone wrong, though. He'd managed the instantaneous draw and re-sheath, but a vortex of cuts hadn't completely dismantled the robot. The floating slashes had still appeared- sporadically, spread out everywhere and cutting to and fro uncontrollably. One of the slashes had appeared right next to Sorun, and although the teen tried leaning out of the way of it, the slash still caught him in his right shoulder and caused a cut to appear. A small thing that barely bled, but it still caused Sorun to bite back a growl of frustration when he saw he'd been the one wounded and not the Badnik.

"Still can't do them consecutively..." The ground underneath his feet began to softly shake as the two robots began closing in on him. Sorun's grip on the Yamato's handle tightened. "Of course I couldn't destroy two at once with it. Of course he had to go and show me up again... it's always him..."

Blue energy began wafting off the blade. Sorun glowered up at the two Badniks that stood before him, teeth grit in rage as more energy continued to gather around and leak off of his sword.

"Sonic...!" His frustration had reached a tipping point right as Egg Hammers raised their respective hammers in the effort of smashing Sorun. Yamato's blade had turned a solid blue color, bolts of electricity continually arcing off of it as Sorun's grip on the sword's handle became so fervent that the joints in his fingers began popping. This went ignored by the Egg Hammers, both of which proceeded commit to the motion of lowering their hammers.

In the blink of an eye, Sorun slashed outwards one single time. Following that single slash was a wide, blue line that trailed the entire wall that he was facing, with said line bisecting both Egg Hammers at the point their heads met their body. The blue coloring soon faded along with the energy wrapped around the blade, revealing a wide, deep cut inside of the wall that made it through all the way to the other side. The two Egg Hammers crashed down to the ground shortly after, their hammers and sparking, severed heads dropping down along with them.

The sound that came next was the intense sound of coughing and hacking. Yamato clattered to the ground after Sorun had lost his grip on it, the teen falling over onto his knees and hands while coughing violently towards the floor. Each cough came with a small splash of blood that flew out of Sorun's mouth and splattered on the ground right below him. After a few more heaves, the coughing fortunately ceased, leaving Sorun on all fours and staring down at a blood-spattered floor.

"... Can't even kill more than two of those things without becoming a bleeding mess," Sorun bitterly thought, using the back of his hand to wipe away the blood leaking out of his nose and mouth. All the frustration and envy from earlier began to simmer into cold animosity. Whether it was at himself and his own weakness or Sonic was unclear to Sorun. He didn't even have the energy to think it out and find an answer. But there was enough residual frustration for him to bang his fast against the ground. The throbbing sensation that followed this went to prove that it had been a mistake to do that, but something happened that distracted Sorun from the slight pain in his hand. A curious sight right next to where his fist banged down on the floor that only now caught Sorun's eye.

An arrow. For whatever reason, there was an arrow carved into the metal floor right next to where he'd slammed his hand down. Sorun blinked in confusion, and then traced the direction the arrow was pointing to the furthest corner of the room he was kneeling in. His eyes widened a bit when he saw that the arrow was pointing directly towards what looked like an elevator at the end of the room. And what's more, the elevator's doors were open.

"... What?" Sorun looked back down at the arrow, turned to the elevator, blinked, and then slowly stood up to his feet after scooping Yamato back up in his grasp. He slowly walked towards the elevator, taking careful steps as to not stumble, and then walked to the inside of the elevator while keeping a wary eye out. For all intents and purposes, from what he saw, the interior was just a normal elevator. When he looked at the control console, he felt an eyebrow rise up when he saw that there was another arrow scratched onto the wall. An arrow that was pointing to one of the elevator buttons, the second one from the top.

Though he was incredibly suspicious over the arrows he was seeing, Sorun was also intensely curious as to where they lead. And so, he decided to hit the button the arrow was pointing to. The elevator doors slid shut, and Sorun felt the elevator itself quickly shudder as it began moving up the shaft it was inside of. A couple minutes passed, mainly spent with Sorun impatiently tapping his foot in waiting, until he felt the elevator shudder again as it came to an abrupt halt. The elevator doors slid back open, Sorun poking his head out and looking all around to see if there were any enemies nearby. When he saw none, he stepped out of the elevator.

The area Sorun had stepped into wasn't all that much. It was just a tight corridor, one hallway going left and another hallway going right with low, overhead lighting on a high ceiling. Not interesting at all, save for the fact that, right in front of where the elevator opened and scratched right onto the dreary, dark blue metal wall, was yet another arrow carved onto its surface that pointed down the left hall. And even more interesting was the fact that "control room" was scratched onto the wall right underneath the arrow.

"... Someone out there is either looking out for me or this is a huge trap," Sorun thought to himself as he looked down left towards the empty hallway. "Either way I'll take it. 'Long as it takes me to Eggman, at least."

He didn't know if these arrows would, in fact, take him to Eggman or whatever this control room was. Nonetheless, it seemed incredibly convenient and suspicious for him to find these out-of-place markers so easily in such a big place. And, as it was, he had no other better places to be looking around in. So, against his better judgement, he started to follow the arrow.

It'd been around five minutes now since Sorun started following these mysterious arrows. So far it felt less and less like there was any rhyme and reason to these things and more like they were just leading him on a wild goose chase because, for as far as he saw, there wasn't a single control room in sight. Just more and more winding hallways.

And lasers.

"This is actual bullshit!" Sorun's thoughts screamed as he ducked under a yellow beam that swiped over his head. "It takes a special kind of maniac to put so many traps in the middle of a nothing hallway like this!"

He didn't know what he'd done - stepped over an invisible laser trap or stepped on a pressure plate or something - but there were times where he'd turn a corner, walk down a hallway, and traps would spring to life. Little emitters connected to rails built into the walls and ceiling that would make moving lines of deadly lasers Sorun would have to physically dodge to get by. Or just Trick through, though he felt himself alternating between dodging and Tricking just to conserve his strength going forwards.

"Whew, man..." He felt a ray pass over his back just as Sorun leapt forwards. He spun around right after, holding a hand to his back and sighing in relief when he didn't feel a charred spot on his back. His expression was soon wiped off along with an accompanying whine of dismay when he saw the hood of his blue, sleeveless hoodie lying on the ground behind him, the laser having cut it off. "Oh, man, Honey's gonna be pissed..."

Shaking his head in a dismissive manner, Sorun turned away from the severed hood and continued down the hallway.

After that it was more walking. More following arrows. The occasional laser trap. He did notice that the turning to a new hallways was becoming less frequent, though. And, more than that, by the time he noticed that he also noticed that the hallway was getting narrower. And much more linear.

There was a second thing he noticed, too. Talking. He couldn't make out the words or even the voice, it was just faint sounds, but he heard somebody saying something. That egged Sorun on to keep going a bit further, the teen straining his ears so he could try and make out that faint voice he was hearing.

Pretty soon, though, he was able to make out that voice. That grouchy male voice that grated Sorun's ears so much it made him want to tear them right off his head. That voice he grew to hate so much. The voice he associated with the one man who ruined this entire planet.

"Oh, yeah. That's him alright." He felt a strange combination of emotions begin to well in his chest when he finally made out Eggman's voice in the distance. Emotions that were accentuated by the look of grim determination in his eyes mixed with the strained, excited smile he had on him. Feelings of intense hatred and glee. Intense anticipation.

If he killed him, than all of this would finally be over. No more fighting, no more Emeralds... no more none of it.

"Alright, Eggman... your curtain call's here." Walking with a bit of a bounce to his step, Sorun tossed the sheathed Yamato up in the air and caught it with his left hand. "One last fight. Let's go."

At the end of the hallway there was a brightly-lit, rectangular exit. Sorun reached it without issue, calmly walking through as he gazed around the new room he'd walked into. There were two levels: the one he was currently on, and the second one that had no floor save for an outcropping of metal that wrapped around the entire room. Mainly empty, save for what what was on the second level at the direct opposite end of the room. A large computer console with multiple monitors displaying various images, two Egg Pawns manning the console at either side, and him . Eggman, sitting in that strange, floating chair of his. And from the looks of it he was currently yelling and pointing down at the two Egg Pawns.

"I don't care how many of them there are! Find them and detain them at once!" Eggman screamed down at the two Badniks, his face pointed directly at the monitors. Even from all the way in the back Sorun could make out a few of the images from how large those monitors were. He saw one image of Sally at a large, metal pillar, planting an explosive. Julie-Su was at her back, shooting down Badniks with that laser pistol she carried with her. "This is absurd... how did they manage to infiltrate my factory so quickly?" Eggman loudly muttered to himself, sitting back in his chair while tapping a finger against his chin. "I didn't even have any time to make the preparations I'd planned for them. It's as if they just appeared out of thin air..."

Any other of his ramblings were cut off when two Summoned Swords appeared in the air and dropped down through the heads of the two Egg Pawns. The sight startled Eggman enough that he leapt back a bit in his seat, holding his arms to the side with his fingers splayed out.

"Doctor Julian Robotnik!" Sorun called the name out loudly but almost lackadaisically, his arms lazily swinging from side to side as he slowly walked towards to the center of the room. Eggman's posture relaxed immediately upon hearing the voice, one of his fingers reaching over to press a button so that his floating chair would turn around to face Sorun. "Face-to-face and in the flesh at last! Only took four friggin' months..."

The expression Eggman's round face, which to Sorun was even more repugnant that his holographic counterpart, was about what Sorun expected: bored. Even past those blue spectacles hiding his eyes and the large, fiery orange mustache, the round man managed to look completely unimpressed at Sorun, leaning back in his chair while folding his arms over his lap. "Sorun," he called out in greeting. "It's Doctor Ivo Robotnik, actually. I changed my name all the way back when I first began my coup against the Kingdom of Acorn."

"Oh. Sorry," Sorun apologized, stopping in the middle of the room. "Kintobor, Robotnik, Eggman... what's in a name, anyways?" he asked, shrugging his shoulders up at Eggman. "Same douchebag behind the title no matter what you call yourself."

"Charming as always," Eggman drawled out. "So you and the rest of the Freedom Fighters have come to snuff out my final factory outside of my empire's beautiful capital city? Well, your timing is as punctual as it is annoying," he complimented, his head turning back to one of the monitors. "I had such a grand plan for you all, but then you showed up and ruined it all before I even got the wheels in motion! I only just finished drawing the blueprints up yesterday!"

"Well, you know, you always manage to stay one step ahead of us in these whack job schemes of yours. Nobody felt like letting you hold the streak," Sorun said. "To be completely transparent with you, finding you wasn't even a primary objective. Sally just wanted the place to blow with or without you in custody. Can you believe that?"

"It doesn't surprise me a bit. The Acorn brat never did have the stomach to make the hard choices," Eggman said, waving his hand aside. "So why is it that you're here, then?"

"I really didn't like her way of thinking. Figured if I brought your head back to her she'd forgive me for going against orders."

"Oh-ho!" A short, amused bark left Eggman as he tilted his head back to let the laugh out. He lowered it back down to look at Sorun, a small, challenging smile gracing his face. "Is that right? I'm not surprised in the least." He leaned to the side of his chair, propping his head up with one of his arms as he leered down at Sorun with that twisted smile of his. "I have to ask, Sorun. Why did you do it? Why did you side with the Mobians in Knothole instead of with me?"

Sorun scoffed and shook his head. It was the way Eggman had asked that question, his words. They were still packed with complete maliciousness like with most of the sentences he said, but there was something else at the back of that. A questioning tone that made it sound like he was legitimately confused at Sorun's actions. "You really have to ask something like that?" Sorun questioned. "You're that depraved?"

"Depraved, but not stupid," Eggman corrected him. "You could have had it all, Sorun. You have the drive. The will. You would have fit in no problem standing at my side. At having a place in my Eggman Empire and actually making something of your life. You could have had a place besides your own kind."

"'My kind'?" Sorun spun Yamato around so its handle landed in his right hand, his left still clutching the shaft of the scabbard. His eyes looked up and down the sheath, the teen muttering out loudly enough for Eggman to hear, "I don't have anything like that in this world. Not the Overlanders. Not the humans in Station Square. Not the Mobians. None of them are a part of my kind. An Earthling." He began running his left thumb along the sheath's surface. "Least of all you."

"But why them? Why the Freedom Fighters?" Eggman pressed. "They ruined your life by forcing you onto Mobius, and yet you still threw yourself in with them! Why? What could they have possibly had to offer you that I don't? What possible gain could you have had by siding with them when they're doomed to failure!?"

"You honestly can't figure it out yourself...?" A light, disbelieving laugh left Sorun as his eyes trailed upwards to Eggman. "I just don't like you. That's all."

Eggman's face scrunched up a bit, one part in irritation and one part in confusion. "That can't be all there is to it," he said, shaking his head down at the teen.

"What more is there to say? You flipped the world upside-down and made it a game of ruining and tormenting everybody. You treat torturing the planet like a hobby. Making everybody in Knothole suffer is little more than a pastime for you. You're trying to make an empire on the back of everybody's anguish for no better reason than you want to." Sorun's fingers tightened around Yamato's handle. "Frankly, Eggman, I'm sick of it. Sick of playing your game. And hey, you know what? I'll give you props. You're a master at playing this fucking game of yours. The fact you've been going up against people like the Freedom Fighters and Shadow and Sonic and made it this far with a winning hand just goes to show that behind that goofy exterior is a terrifyingly brilliant, insane, sorry excuse for a man. So you know what I'm not doing? I'm not gonna play your game fairly. That's just folly." Blue energy began to run along Yamato's length as he pulled the sword halfway from its sheath. "I decided... I'm just gonna cheat."

With a dead-set face of certainty, Sorun slammed Yamato back into its sheath. Eggman watched on in slight interest, humming under his breath as his glasses-covered eyes watched the sword. The entire katana began to glow a solid blue color, and as Sorun let it go it began to vertically float off the ground, handle pointed to the ceiling, and even began to slowly spin as it slowly rose up towards the center of the room.

"What would happen now is that we would have our big fight, and you would pull something out of your ass like call for a bunch of robots to distract me while you make a dramatic getaway or something along those lines. Then you go back home, cook up another scheme while me and the others keep fighting your forces, you deploy your plan we narrow managed to beat, and then this goes on repeat 'til people start dying." As Sorun spoke there was a peculiar sound akin to glass breaking. Eggman only continued to hum as around the edges of the room there were white, jagged lines appearing everywhere, like reality itself was breaking down, though seconds later they disappeared completely, leaving him, Sorun, and the floating, blue katana hovering in the middle of the room. "Yeah, that ain't gonna happen," Sorun finished off. "This place will be your grave."

"Is that so?" Eggman asked, drumming his fingers along the side of his skull as he stared at the sword floating in the middle of the room. "And you're going to do that with what? That sword?" He scoffed and tilted his head back. "I know from the combat footage I've seen the cutting abilities of that katana, but I fail to see what this little display here is supposed to do to intimidate me."

"I guess a little explanation is in order then," Sorun said, lazily looking up at Eggman with his hands in his pockets. "That sword is called the Yamato. To put it in terms you would understand, it's from a... storybook, I suppose you could say. From where I'm from."

At the end of his final sentence, Sorun Tricked out from Eggman's sight. The round man became startled and glanced wildly around, and then looked up when he heard a whistle gain his attention. Sorun was up on the ceiling, sitting on one of the ceiling's support struts and looking down at Eggman. His left hand was still in his pocket, while his right hand held a Summoned Sword that was resting on his shoulder.

"In this story the demon king Urizen, one of the Yamato's wielders, made a shield with it," Sorun continued. "I struggled for a while to understand how such a thing was possible, Yamato's power is the ability of absolute separation, you see, but while I was doing some reading it hit me. It wasn't a shield; it was a separate dimension entirely." He removed the spectral sword from his shoulder and poked it up towards the ceiling. Right before the tip managed to make contact with the ceiling, however, it was stopped. The air between the sword's tip and the ceiling wavered, as if there was an invisible barrier separating the two. "What I've done is I've taken Yamato and used its power of absolute separation to separate the space this room inhabits with the space the rest of the world inhabits," Sorun explained as he lowered the Summoned Sword back on his shoulder. "Where we are right now, Eggman? This room? It's a pocket dimension now. And you're stuck in it with me."

Eggman listened intensely to Sorun's explanation, his bald eye ridges furrowed in deep concentration. Eventually the full implication of Sorun's words began to seep in, though, causing him to lean forwards and grip the edges of his floating chair. "You didn't..." seethed Eggman, his fingers pressing down at the edge of the seat.

"Oh, but I did!" Sorun Tricked again, appearing on the other side of the room from Eggman on the second level outcropping. "Look around, Eggman!" Sorun called out, gesturing from side-to-side. "There's nowhere in the world for you to run because this room might as well be the entire world!" He stopped and pointed the tip of his sword at Yamato, which still hung in the center of the room. "Yamato's acting as an anchor to keep this room grounded to the rest of reality. You destroy it? That's that- this space gets destroyed and we both die. The only way to return this space with the rest of this world is if either I willingly dispel the Yamato or you kill me and cause it to dispel on its own. And I'm not dispelling it until you're dead."

That was the plan. Nobody, not even him, could enter or exit the separated space that was this room until Yamato ceased separating this piece of reality with the rest of reality. That meant that Eggman's chance of escaping from Sorun was practically nil. Which meant that Sorun... just had to kill Eggman.

Sorun expected a lot of reactions from Eggman. Shocked disbelief, sputtering rage, maybe even a bit of bargaining from his part. For the crushing reality of the situation to hit him when he realized there was no escaping the separated space Sorun had trapped him in. No escaping from the teen's wrath. And from the looks of it, at first, he was getting the reaction he wanted. Eggman, was folded over the edge of his seat, his arms still gripping tightly onto the edge even with his body doubled over it.

And then, he began shuddering. Sorun had assumed it was in rage or fear at first, but then he heard it. The laughter. Laughter that was quiet and almost inaudible at first, but then completely switched to booming, boisterous laughter when Eggman threw his whole body back. The mad cackling enraged Sorun as much as it confused him, making him lower the Summoned Sword down to his side as a deep scowl settled on Sorun's features. Finally, Eggman ceased his cackling with a loud, drawn-out sigh and looked towards Sorun.

"Oh-ho-ho-ho! So, you've gotten tired of my game and want to play your own, eh, Sorun?" A mad grin on his face, Eggman reached forwards and pressed one of the buttons on the console of his seat. "Okay, I'm game. We'll see just how willing you are to play with the big boys by the time I'm through with you."

"Yeah, keep talkin'..." Sorun muttered as the Bringer Claws appeared behind him. "They'll be your last words. Get 'em out while you can."

As he spoke, Sorun watched as a white, dome-like covering began to extend up from the seat Eggman was sitting in. His scowl deepened, and he willed four Summoned Swords to appear by his side and fire off towards Eggman. They reached their mark too late, though, as the white plates had already fully encapsulated Eggman, and the swords merely shattered off of their surface. What had once been a floating chair now looked like little more than a giant white, floating, mechanical egg. A mechanical egg whose bottom opened up and allowed something to drop through.

Sorun tensed up his body as he saw the object drop, eyes furrowed in concentration as he readied himself for whatever it was. When he finally got a good look at it, though, he felt his form instantly begin to relax from the absolute bafflement he felt at what he was seeing.

It was a wrecking ball. An honest-to-god checkered wrecking ball colored in light and dark browns connected to Eggman's floating chair by a chain. Sorun blinked and tilted his head to the side, as if waiting for the wrecking ball to perhaps transform or something, but it never did. It just continued to simply hang off from the chair by the chain.

"... You can't be serious." Sorun actually dropped the Summoned Sword he'd been holding, not paying attention at all when it shattered against the ground. "You're going to fight me with that ridiculous thing?"

"You got that right!" Eggman called out, his voice seemingly projected from an unseen speaker somewhere in the egg-shaped chair he was inside. "It isn't too late to back out now if you're not feeling up to it, you know. Not even Sonic has ever succeeded in destroying my Checker Wrecker."

"This condescending bastard..." The snappy remark jabbed at Sorun's pride, enough that both his arms began to twitch. "That's it, you're dead!"

His Bringer Claws beat roughly against the ground, causing Sorun to shoot towards the egg-shaped chair and the wrecking ball hanging below it. The chair just hovered motionlessly in the air, almost as if Eggman was waiting for Sorun to make the first move. This just enraged Sorun and caused him to stop right in front of the enclosed chair, his right Bringer Claw curling into a fist, rearing back, and punching forwards at the checkered wrecking ball.

The spectral fist made impact. This was evidenced enough by the loud gong! sound that reverberated throughout the separated space Sorun and Eggman were in. What didn't happen, which immensely shocked the teen, was that the wrecking ball hadn't been smashed to powder by the punch. It hadn't even cracked in the slightest; just knocked back. What did happen was that that chair the ball was connected to spun around in the same direction it was knocked back in, causing the wrecking ball to spin completely around back towards Sorun. The movement had been so fast that Sorun had barely been able to register it, but when he did, he didn't have the opportunity to think about avoiding it with a Trick and instead instinctually rose his Bringer Claws up to block it.

The spectral arms blocking Sorun's body were directly hit by the checkered ball. Sorun felt intense vibrations assault his body as a result, and with a grunt was sent sailing backwards a bit. The arms flapped to stabilize him, and without missing a beat Sorun Tricked down the the ground floor.

"This thing's tough." Sorun began walking to the side of the egg-shaped chair, keeping his eyes up on it while he continually fired Summoned Swords at it. To his growing frustration, the swords continued to break off on the chair's surface, as well as the checkered wrecking ball and its chain. "I can't use Yamato while it's keeping this room separated. Guess if I can't cut him out, I'll have to just rip him out of that thing."

Ceasing his volley of Summoned Swords, the teen Tricked up to the top of the chair. Gripping onto the top of it with his bare hands, Sorun willed his Bringer Claws to beat down on the egg-chair's shell over and over again in an attempt to try and beat the metal paneling off to get to Eggman. No matter how many times to spectral arms rapidly punched the metal covering, though, it wouldn't dent. And when he gave up trying to punch it and instead tried having the claws pry the metal off, he found there wasn't a large enough seam in the metal plates for the spectral claws to find purchase on.

And then, the chair began spinning. It was slow at first, just fast enough to let Sorun know what was happening and make him grip onto the chair with both his real arms and spectral, feathered arms. The spinning increased to a faster and faster speed, though, and eventually it got to the point that the centrifugal force was beginning to pull on Sorun's body. Soon enough the speed proved to be too great, and as a result, Sorun was flung right off the pod.

Spinning around uncontrollably, Sorun's body was flung all the way towards one of the side walls. The palms of the spectral hands slammed into the wall right before Sorun impacted it to stop him from impacting it, a gust of wind from the sudden stop blowing Sorun's hair about as he breathed a heavy breath out. He looked back up towards Eggman, and then he physically felt his irises shrink in fear when he saw the wrecking ball heading right towards him.

His Bringer Claws attempted to push forwards in an attempt to block the wrecking ball. To Sorun's shock, the mass of the ball combined with its speed proved to be too much, and to his dismay the blue claws were destroyed completely when they made contact with the approaching ball. Thinking quickly, Sorun Tricked out of the way just as the ball reached his location and buried itself halfway into the wall.

Reappearing on the second level of the room nearby to where the wrecking ball smashed into the wall, Sorun was forced to stumble back a few steps. A dizzying sensation had hit him, and he began to feel a pained sensation run throughout his body as a few drops of blood began to pour from his nose. At the same time, the floating egg chair had pulled the wrecking ball out from the wall by its chain, and then began to quickly fly towards Sorun's position. It spun around once it got close enough, making a full rotation and then abruptly stopping to allow the wrecking ball to fling towards Sorun.

In an effort to protect himself, Sorun had erected wall after wall of crossed Summoned Swords. The Checker Wrecker smashed through each and every layer, though, however enough of its momentum had been halted so that Sorun had just enough time to reform his Bringer Claws to block yet again. The ball hit him, and, due to his weakening constitution, Sorun watched as his Bringer Claws dissipated on direct contact with the ball as his own body was once again sent spinning away.

With a pained grunt, Sorun's body impacted the ground floor of the room. It'd hit with such force that he bounced off, hit the ground again, and then began rolling with a pained cry leaving him with each roll. He fortunately came to a complete stop, lying prone against the ground. He laid there completely still for a few moments, after which a small groan left Sorun as he attempted to stand up.

He never made it up to his feet. Not because of the light bruising throughout his entire body, though he was certainly feeling that. No, it was that other feeling again. The feeling of his body crying out in pain and just giving out from the overuse of his powers. The feeling of deep, stabbing pains in all his organs that were intense enough that all Sorun could do was raise up to a single knee in a kneeling position. He coughed once, a spurt of blood flying out of his mouth, and then he looked up at the egg-shaped chair, panting heavily while a stream of blood dribbled out of his nose.

"I'm not... letting him get away..." He pulled deep within himself to manifest a single Summoned Sword in a vain attempt at attacking Eggman again. The sword had formed completely cracked and dim, though, and before he could even fire it off another fit of coughs assaulted Sorun, causing the sword to shatter completely right there next to him. "Damn it all..."

"Well, Sorun, I think I've senselessly beaten you around enough for me to get the idea across." Sorun's eyes trailed up to the egg-shaped chair, just barely being able to suppress his pained growl of rage when he saw the top metal plates fold back into the chair, revealing the man that was sitting inside of it. He was grinning from ear-to-ear, arms crossed and looking right down at Sorun. "And my oh my, just look at you. I didn't mean to bloody you up that much. You spend so much time around Mobians and you forget how fragile humans are compared to them, I tell you."

Saying nothing in response, half because he was too livid and half because he was physically capable of doing so at the moment, Sorun just watched with absolute fury in his eyes as Eggman's floated chair hovered over to the floating, blue katana in the middle of the room. Eggman hummed in intrigue at the sight of it, uncrossing his arms and rubbing at his chin with his right hand as he inspected the sword.

"The Yamato, eh...?" Eggman leaned closer towards the floating sword. Close enough that its glowing image was reflected off of the blue-lensed glasses over his eyes. He hummed once more, and then leaned back in his seat as the hovering chair floated back a bit. "Quite an interesting sword you have there, Sorun. The power to separate space itself... quite remarkable indeed. But not good enough." The chair began rotating backwards, as if getting ready to swing the brown wrecking ball hanging under it. "I'm afraid I'm going to have to call that little bluff of yours!"

The chair swung to the side, swinging the wrecking ball along with it. The weighted ball smashed right into the katana before Sorun's eyes, shattering it completely and causing the shards to dissipate into blue ash. The effect was immediately plain to see: the the space around the outer edges of the room began to slowly dissolve, as if there had been a large, invisible bubble around them that was slowly evaporating. The process had only taken a few seconds, and by the end the effect had gone away completely. Both the room itself and its two occupants were left completely intact, and Eggman, upon seeing this, began laughing again while Sorun felt even more anger begin to burn through him.

"Ah-ha-ha-ha-ha! Ha..." Wiping an invisible tear away from his eye, Eggman leaned over the edge of his floating seat. One arm hung down limply while the other was folded over the chair's lip, Eggman smiling down at the defeated teen all the while. "You lose, Sorun. You've lost at your own game. Did you honestly think I was going to buy that whole 'the sword was an anchor' bit? You insult me, you really do.

"Now, I could end you right here and now, but where would be the fun in that?" Eggman's chair turned towards the computer monitors that were near the back of the room. He then leaned a bit back and began typing at a few of the buttons that were on a small console right in front of him. There was a single loud, blaring sound from the speakers inside of the computer console at the back end of the room, and as he continued to motionlessly kneel down on the floor

Sorun saw all the computer monitors above the console turn red. The words that were flashing across the red screens, however, was what nearly made the teen's heart stop right there.

SELF-DESTRUCT SEQUENCE INITIATED

Self-destruct. The madman was actually going to blow the whole factory up himself. And soon, too- there was a five-minute countdown timer on the lower-right corner of all the screens. That only served to make Sorun panic even more.

"That's right. I'm going to blow you and the entire resistance to kingdom come," Eggman gloated, his devious smile turning gleeful when he turned back around to Sorun to see the dire-stricken look on his face. "Now, I have no doubt that you'll all pull off some miraculous feat that will save you from this catastrophe, and then we can do this again some other time. In the event this does just so happen to be the end for you, though, let me just leave you with this."

The floating chair carrying Eggman lowered itself and hovered closer to Sorun. He stopped right in front of him, close enough that Sorun was able to see his own reflection in Eggman's glasses. His kneeling body, completely beaten and at Eggman's mercy. It caused feelings of frustration and self-loathing the likes of which he'd never felt before in his life to erupt inside of Sorun. To see himself brought so low in front of somebody he hated so much and tried so hard to kill. He couldn't stand it.

"Look, Sorun, you got moxie. I'll give you that much. But that's all you've got. You really thought you could just waltz in here with all your shiny new powers and thought you could beat me ? Someone who's been playing the game far longer than you?" A short bark of laughter burst out of Eggman. "Face it, kid. You're a complete newbie I can ride circles around because you're nothing but a punk riding on the coattails of a bunch of powers that were handed to you. You're not special. You're not fast or strong or clever like all the other Freedom Fighters.

"And you are certainly no Sonic."

Those were the words. The words that sent Sorun's ears ringing so loudly he could barely hear anything else over it. That made him go completely still as he looked up helplessly at Eggman, irises shrunken and shaking in indignation at what he just heard. To be compared to him and told that he was absolutely nothing compared to that hedgehog everyone around him adored.

To know he was right.

It hurt.

"Well, I think I've taken enough of your time. What little of it is left, anyways." Darkly chuckling, Eggman pressed another button on the console of his chair. The chair began to raise up towards the ceiling, where a section began to open up to reveal a well-lit shaft going further up into the facility. "Until next time, Sorun! Or goodbye in case this truly is the end for you! It's been a blast!"

"Get back here...!" The mocking wave that Eggman was sending down to Sorun as he ascended up the hole in the ceiling only further fueled Sorun's rage as he attempted to reach up towards the mad scientist. But despite his best efforts, nothing would come up. No Bringer Claws. No Summoned Swords. Nothing. Even the mere action of just raising his arm was so labor-intensive it shook from the effort. "He needs to die... I need... goddamn... goddamn it..."

His entire body flopped face-first onto the ground. Try as he might, nothing would respond to him. The best Sorun could manage was twitch his appendages and barely move his head enough to look up. Every single attempt at moving something resulted in a lance of pain that forced all his muscles to seize up. He couldn't even move, let alone summon one of his powers. And from his peripheral vision he could already see that Eggman was long gone.

And out from the corner of his vision he could see the computer monitors. The monitors and that countdown timer that was slowly counting down to the destruction of the facility. He had to leave. If his body wasn't failing him he could have easily left by summoning Yamato and making a portal out of here. But every single attempt was met with another spike of pain going through him.

"Come on... just let me do it..." A few wisps of blue power began to gather around his immobile left hand. The beginning shape of a katana began to form, but then Sorun's chest had tightened, and a pained cough accompanied by another splash of blood leaving his mouth caused the blue particles gathering around his hand to dissipate. "Everyone's gonna die if I don't..."

He couldn't do it. His body just wouldn't let him.

It was when the crashing feelings of failure, the feeling that he'd just let everybody down, began to hit him that he heard it. The sounds of rapid footsteps right behind him, out of the hallway Sorun had walked through to get into this room in the first place. A rapid set of footsteps going so fast it sounded like a continuous, zooming sound. Sorun knew fully well what that sound was. Those footsteps were Sonic's footsteps.

A myriad of emotions assaulted Sorun when he realized this. There were emotions of immense relief and ease knowing he wasn't completely helpless and there was now actually a chance of him not being blown up in a factory. All of that was buried under everything else that started to rise up in Sorun, though. He felt sheer mortification that Sonic was going to come and find Sorun in this state. This broken, defeated state that made it so he couldn't even stand up on his own feet. And even worse was knowing that it was him that had to come and save Sorun. He would have been fine if it was anybody else. But the fact it was him that was coming to his rescue had Sorun feeling even worse than he already felt, if that was even possible.

"Sorun!" Even hearing Sonic call his name out made Sorun painfully flinch. He hated this. He absolutely hated what was happening right now. The fuming rage he felt when he saw Sonic's red sneakers stop in front of his view was almost enough to override the pain he was feeling. "Sorun, are you alright!?"

"... I look alright to you?" Sorun rattled out, his voice low and breathy. He couldn't even manage a resentful expression to match the emotions he was feeling right now when he slowly tilted his head up at the blue hedgehog. Feelings of absolute resentment that only multiplied tenfold when he saw that look of intense concern on Sonic's face.

"Er, well... no, but it's gonna be okay, pal!" Sonic bent down and began to pick Sorun's body up. "Something got set off and this whole joint's gonna self-destruct! We gotta get out of here!"

"Get your goddamned hands off of me..." If he had the strength to do it Sorun would have fought to wiggle out of Sonic's grasp just so he didn't have to suffer through this. But as it was he couldn't move at all, so Sorun had no choice but to quietly sigh and submit. "I can't make the sword..." Sorun managed to murmur out.

"It's fine, buddy, it's fine. I already ran everybody else out of here. They're all safe, so we just gotta bail and we're good."

"Of course you did... How did you even find me, anyways?"

"I kept running around until I found a bunch of those arrows you scratched into the walls a few hallways back!" Sonic answered as he turned around back to the hallway entrance, Sorun cradled in his arms. "Smart thinking, by the way. Made tracking you down a whole lot easier."

"I didn't... yeah, sure." He was too tired to argue the point and Sorun felt that taking the credit for the arrows would let him save some miniscule amount of face. Regardless, he just wanted to leave and get this day over with. "Just go."

"You got it! Let's juice!"

Sorun didn't know whether it was the wind tearing at his body from moving at super-sonic speed keeping him from passing out or the increasingly dismal feeling he felt in himself. He settled on his utter hatred for that phrase of Sonic's keeping him up.

The factory had blow up, of course. It hadn't been an overly showy affair. a loud boom, lots of crumbling metal and even more fire. Over the course of a few seconds the factory that had once stood tall was reduced to little more than flaming rubble.

A large distance away the Freedom Fighters that had went on the mission to destroy the factory looked on with victorious faces. There were cheers all throughout the group, some among them high-fiving others or giving each other congratulating pats on the back. Seeing how big an accomplishment this was, it was little surprise that spirits were high all around.

Sonic should have been happy along with them. He should have - he felt like he wanted to - but he just couldn't seem to bring himself to celebrate alongside everybody else. His thoughts kept being drawn back to the sole human in the group, and while everyone celebrated behind him the hedgehog found his eyes being drawn towards Sorun.

In his mad dash to get everybody out of the factory before it blew up Sonic had grabbed everybody one at a time and sequestered them all in a faraway hill that overlooked the factory in the distance. The hill, along with everything else around, was barren and filled with dead, decaying gray grass, though there was a tree in the middle of the hill. A black, dead tree that Sorun was sitting against. Completely isolated away from everybody else, and sitting on the other side of the tree so he didn't have to face them.

This was the reason Sonic couldn't be in a celebratory mood with everybody else. Because of how Sorun was acting. Ever since Sonic brought him to the hill here with everybody else the human had been acting extremely withdrawn, refusing to even speak with or look at anybody. For the life of him Sonic couldn't understand why; he'd thought it'd had to do with his injuries at first and that Sorun was just too tired, but that was minutes ago. Now the pale teen was moving around fine on his own, and even managed to make his katana which he was now staring down at in his hands.

He didn't know what the deal with Sorun was. So Sonic decided to go ahead and ask him.

Moving away from the rest of the group, Sonic began to slowly approach the human who sat with his back to everybody, full attention still down on his sword. He didn't even seem to register Sonic was approaching him at all, and Sonic himself felt his footsteps begin to slow when he heard Sorun utter a single word out.

"Power..." It was a word hissed out so quietly that Sonic had to perk his ears up just to hear it, and even then he almost wished he hadn't. There had been so much malice and hatred said with that word that it barely even sounded like a word to Sonic. More like a feral growl. It was enough to send a chill up his spine, causing him to gulp and reach out towards Sorun.

"Hey, Sorun? Buddy?" Sonic softly called out. "You doing okay there?"

Sorun's head had snapped up so suddenly it had startled Sonic. He sat completely still at first, and then softly exhaled as he shook his head and then turned to look at Sonic. He'd cleaned himself up and looked relatively fine now, though his black hair was a disheveled mess at the moment. And there was something to his eyes that made Sonic intensely worried over Sorun. He didn't know what it was. There was just something off about the way Sorun was staring right at the hedgehog, and he just couldn't place what it was.

"What do you want?" The question was succinct and seemed almost harsh in the way it was spoken by Sorun. It caused Sonic to falter in his movement, followed by him sighing as he stepped around the tree to stop right in front of Sorun, the human's eyes and head following him.

"Just... checking up on you," Sonic answered, finding himself nervously reaching behind his head to scratch at his quills. "So what happened when we got separated?" He decided to go to the matter directly to see if he could try and piece together what was going on. Or at least get some picture of what happened to Sorun to leave him in the state Sonic had found him in. He was glad he was fine now, but he'd be lying to himself if he said he hadn't been incredibly worried when he saw the human's body lying still on the ground like that.

Sorun slowly blinked, regarding Sonic with an expression he just couldn't read. Finally he sighed out again and began speaking. "I fell," he said. "Something was going to fall on you. So I pushed you out of the way and fell."

"Yeah, I got that much. Thanks, by the way," Sonic said, genuinely grateful for the quick save Sorun had pulled. "Couldn't you have just flown out, though?"

"Something hit me on the head."

Sonic found himself wincing. He'd wondered if something had happened, but he didn't want to think it was something like that. "Well, why didn't you call for help?" he asked him. "I was running around all over the place looking for you. You had me really worried."

"My earpiece fell out when I hit my head. I lost it."

At that, Sonic groaned and rubbed a hand across his face. "See, this is why I keep saying you need to get a wrist communicator like the rest of us so stuff like that doesn't happen. What was I supposed to do if I couldn't find you in time before the factory blew up?"

Sorun rolled his eyes up to the dead tree's bare branches. "I made the arrows, didn't I? I didn't want to slow down and wait for you when Eggman was somewhere."

"Oh..." So that was the issue. Sorun had been chomping at the bit pretty hard to get at Eggman now that Sonic recalled it. And he supposed the human had a point- he'd at least laid a trail for Sonic to follow to find him. He'd have to give him that much. Though the hedgehog felt a pit in his stomach begin to grow when he realized why it was the human was looking so dour and why he'd been in the state he'd found him in. "So did you find him?"

"..." Sorun shuffled uncomfortably against the tree and looked away from Sonic's eyes. "Yes."

"And what happened?" Sonic hesitantly asked.

"... Do I have to spell it out for you?"

"I... guess not, no." And that had what he'd been afraid of. Sorun didn't take loss well- Sonic knew that much from living with him for so long. He could barely even imagine what it must have felt like to him to lose to someone like Eggman, though he could sympathize, at least. "Are you okay?"

"... I shouldn't have lost." Sorun's eyes fell down to the sheathed katana in his lap, which he began to idly stroke at with his fingers. "I should have beat him. Not the other way around."

"Hey, I get how you fe-" Sonic cut himself off when Sorun's entire body violently twitched halfway through his sentence. His hands seemed to seize up on Yamato's sheath, and he began to lightly shake in place as the human's breathing became more shallow. "Er, uh, look, Sorun, nobody here was expecting you to beat Eggman."

"You could have."

The words felt like they cut deeply into Sonic. Inside, he knew that Sorun was probably speaking the truth. He didn't know exactly what had gone on in there, and honestly, Sonic wasn't really sure he wanted to know how badly the fight had went for Sorun. Physically speaking, though, he seemed alright. That's what mattered most to Sonic. It was the mental part that had him worried, and so, he decided that a bit of positive reinforcement was in order to get the human's spirit up.

"Sorun, listen. You did great." Sonic kneeled down in front of the other teen and extended hand towards his shoulder. Sorun flinched at the contact, though he did slowly turned his eyes upwards at Sonic as he gave the human his best reassuring smile. "I mean, all this that we did? We wouldn't have been able to do any of it if your cool sword hadn't been able to teleport us in there like that," he said. "Yeah, sure, it didn't end the best, but Eggman's a dangerous and crafty guy. And the important thing is that the factory is gone. That's a step closer to winning, right?" He gave Sorun's shoulder a reassuring squeeze. "Don't beat yourself up over this, okay? You did the best you could, and we all made it out safe and sound. Everything's fine."

Not once had Sorun's facial expression moved in the slightest as Sonic talked. Despite his best efforts, the pale human had only continued to stare at Sonic with that same unreadable, almost disturbing look in his eyes. Even as Sonic finished speaking Sorun's face didn't soften up in the slightest. He only breathed lightly out of his mouth and looked back down at his sword.

"Give me a minute or two and I'll make a portal back to the HQ." That was all he said. He didn't look back up at Sonic or even make the motion to speak any further. He only continued to look down at his sword.

Frowning, Sonic slid his hand off of Sorun's shoulder and gave the human a quick nod. He stood up and moved to go join the others, but then quickly stopped and craned his head back. "Hey, Sorun? I'm really glad you're okay."

"... Leave me alone, Sonic. Please."

His attempts at cheering the human up practically burning to cinders, Sonic decided to it call it quits there. "Sure," he muttered out, casting one last glance at Sorun before walking away.

"It's so easy for you to say that, Sonic. Somebody like you with power."

He'd failed. Worse than failed- he'd doomed himself. All because he couldn't beat Eggman.

What had gone wrong? That's what Sorun contemplated to himself as he continued to stare forlornly down at the sword in his lap. His plan had been flawless, or so he'd thought. Isolate Eggman in a pocket dimension using the Yamato so he couldn't escape and kill him with Sorun's remaining powers. Even tell a lie about destroying the sword destroying the pocket dimension instead of just destroying the barrier separating the space to scare Eggman into not attacking it. That hadn't worked at all. None of it did. He'd lost, Eggman escaped, and Sorun almost lost his life. He would have lost his life, and everybody else's lives, if it wasn't for him. Sonic.

Even as he heard Sonic step away from him, Sorun's thoughts on the hedgehog were so conflicted he couldn't make sense of any of it. He knew he had just been trying to make Sorun feel better. He knew and appreciated it because deep down he knew Sonic was a good person. But none of that changed what he was . How his very existence and all that speed and power he had seemed to invalidate Sorun's own existence and the life he was giving, especially when he failed in a situation Sonic would have won in.

And where did that leave him? Here, defeated. He'd wanted so hard to kill Eggman right there, end the war, and preserve what little life he had left. That's all he had wanted. But Sorun couldn't have even done that. Because, because why? Because he just wasn't powerful enough? Was that it? Was the issue truly that he simply didn't have the power necessary to defeat him yet? He needed even more Emeralds, perhaps all of them? Most assuredly that had to be the case.

So it'd been for nothing, then. That entire fight against Eggman had been nothing but a humiliating reminder to him that he was too weak to do anything on his own without these powers. That was just one single emotion swirling around in him- intense humiliation. Humiliation at being so weak compared to Sonic, and even having been called out on it by Eggman. At having been so weak he had to be saved by Sonic and entrust everybody else's safety to him. To be seen in that state, that helpless, vulnerable state that caused no end to the shame tearing through his very being. Frustration at his own weakness, and frustration at Sonic's seeming lack of weakness.

He'd just wanted to live a bit longer. Why couldn't he have had even that? He just wanted all this pain to finally end.

"... Fine. I guess it was too good to be true." Sorun jammed the end of Yamato into the ground, using it as a crutch to stand up to his feet. "I need all of them to take him down. I need power... more power..."

"Hey, Sorun?" The human straightened his body out a bit and turned his head to the side at the source of the voice. It was Sally, who had a look of worry on her face that was almost identical to the one Sonic had worn minutes prior. He could tolerate her, at least. She didn't make him feel absolutely worthless. "Are you doing okay?"

"If you mean am I good to make a portal for us to go back, then yes," Sorun answered. When Sally continued giving him that look, he sighed and turned his head away. "If you're about to go and lecture me for going off on my own like that-"

"Sonic told me. I know it wasn't your fault, Sorun, but..." He heard her stop speaking, and then watched as she stepped around him so she was back in his view. "He's really worried about you, you know."

"Mm-hm." Sorun pulled Yamato out of its sheath. "And?"

"I wanted to say..." When Sorun looked back up at her after inspecting his blade, he saw Sally wringing her hands together, as if searching for the right words to say. "You... did really well, getting us into that factory," she settled on, turning her eyes back up to Sorun. "I know I didn't make it very clear before, but it's really great you're putting in so much effort for the cause. I just wanted you to know that."

It was hollow comfort to Sorun's ears, and it did little to visually improve his mood, but it was still something. Acknowledgement. Something that said what he did meant something. Justification to his existence.

"Just," Sally continued, "if you can, please try not to go and run off on your own like that again. I know you have all your powers and taking on Eggman like that was really tempting, but you're not Sonic."

"You're not Sonic."

"You're not Sonic."

"And you are certainly no Sonic."

The words kept playing in Sorun's head over and over again. Like a constant reminder. For a single moment he'd even flashed back to that room, to him lying defeated under Eggman as he grinned maniacally down at him. But then he blinked, and he was brought back to the reality of him standing next to a dead tree with Sally right in front of him.

"... Why does he get to be so special, Sally?" Sorun's voice had come out quiet and cracked, his head turning back to his sword so that he could see his own miserable visage in the metal's reflection. "Why?"

"Sorun, you... don't talk like that." Behind Sally's chastising tone was a hint of worry that Sorun manage to detect. Even a bit of distress. A pitying tone of voice that did nothing to help his mood. "Sonic, he's just... he's just Sonic, I don't know what to say. But everybody's special. He has his speed, you have your sword... and without your sword none of this would have been possible." She took a step closer to him. "You should be proud for what you've helped us achieve."

Pride. He didn't feel prideful at all. He felt like his pride had been stripped away from him the moment he lost. From the second Sonic had seen him like that and had to go save him.

Sally seemed to see that Sorun's mood hadn't shifted in the slightest. It made her look a bit more upset, the chipmunk glancing back at the group near them before focusing back on Sorun. "I know you said that accepting help makes you feel useless, but we're a team, Sorun. Helping each other is what we do. Because all of that?" She gestured her hand out in the direction of the flaming factory remains. "Sorun, that wasn't just Sonic. It was us. All of us. And you're a part of us. You're far from useless. You mean a lot to all of us."

"... Sure, Sally." Yamato's edge cut through the air twice before she could respond. Space folded inwards, and a portal back to Freedom HQ was made. "Portal's ready." He took a step forwards, paused, and glanced back at Sally. "Thanks."

And without another word, Sorun stepped through it. The indescribable amount of self-loathing he felt made it so he couldn't even look back at anybody.

Chapter 36

A/N- Oh, this site sometimes...

So here's what happened. If you couldn't read last chapter and kept getting an error message, it's because apparently for a few days now the fanfic site's been affected by a bug that wouldn't allow new chapters to show up on the browser version. Apparently it was affecting a lot of other authors attempting to post and it was real bad, though the app version reportedly worked alright. As of now it looks like the boys behind the curtain managed to fix things, hopefully, don't know if the emails are even working right now, a bit ago the story updated and showed chapter 35 so I assumed all is good. Fiddled around with some things, even went and deleted and reposted it, and for all intents and purposes it looks good. So if you didn't read it 'cause of the bug go back and read 35.

Anyways, this chapter wasn't really planned. In fact it only exists because I wanted something short to post to make sure that the site's working again. So yeah, here ya go. I turned a bug test into some plot.

Recursion Error

Episode 36- A little help

There'd been a big hope by Sorun that after the one-part successful mission to destroy the giant factory and the one-part utter botching of his personal mission, all he needed to do was sleep it off. Emotions had been tense, mostly his, everybody else had been doing great, and he... well, he just hadn't been in a good place. So he figured he'd sleep it off, recuperate his physical and mental strength overnight, and in the morning he'd feel better.

He didn't.

He felt worse, actually.

The entire hedgehog household had been avoided by Sorun that morning. He couldn't stand to be in the same room as Sonic or his family members that resembled him. Couldn't even talk to him since just being in his presence dug up all those emotions from yesterday he wanted to forget. The envy and resentment and shame.

So he left. Specifically through the window. And then he made a portal to Freedom HQ. Somewhere he could just go to be away for a bit. And perhaps with someone if his hunch was right, which he hoped it was.

Thankfully she had been there as he'd hoped. Plugged into the lab's computer, doing something. He didn't even know what happened between him finding her and him just sitting down in the chair and talking with Nicole. He vaguely recalled words of greeting being exchanged between the two, but before he'd known it he'd just started laying out everything right in front of her. The whole mission, what had happened, his feelings. Everything.

It was strange. Strange the way Sorun felt all his troubles just... melt away whenever he was with her. Less strange was the reason why he always sought her out, he knew the reason and he cursed himself for it every day, but at the same time he just couldn't help himself. She was one of the only people he allowed himself to confide these things in, to be vulnerable around, and it was nice to get this out.

"And I just... I just lost, Nicole. I lost super hard." He was leaning so far back in the chair in front of the lab's computer that his body was practically parallel with the ground. He could still see the computer monitors, though, just from the bottom of his vision. And just barely he could make out Nicole's head icon on the screen looking at him. "And it doesn't feel great."

"I was lead to believe your mission against that factory was a success." Nicole had been quiet throughout most of the story Sorun had told. The most she ever did was stop and ask questions, particularly around Sorun's process of making portals with his sword. She'd been unusually inquisitive over that, especially over the scientific aspect of it. Any other time and he would have seen it as cute in a way, but right now he wasn't feeling it at all. "Your battle with Dr. Robotnik... it truly went that terribly?"

Softly groaning, Sorun ran a hand over his face. "In a manner of speaking, yeah." He sat further up in the chair so that he was facing the computer. "It's not even that I was getting smacked around by a wrecking ball-" Nicole's icon glitched and disappeared for a single microsecond, too fast for Sorun to notice, "-, it's... he said some things." With a sigh, Sorun manifested Yamato in his left hand. He wasted no time in pulling the sheath off the sword, and then nonchalantly tossed the scabbard over his shoulder. The sound of wood clattering against the ground behind him barely even reached his ears as he inspected the katana's blade. "... I don't know. Maybe he's right. I have a lot of doubts about myself all the time. He was just saying what I'm thinking."

"Must you put yourself down so much?"

Sorun's eyes flicked up briefly when he saw Nicole's form manifest into reality from besides him. He regarded her for a moment and stared back down at his blade. "What am I without this thing?" he mumbled, more to himself than Nicole. "What am I without my powers? These abilities I can barely call my own? How many mission successes can I attribute solely to them?" He held the blade up over his head, squinting at his reflection. "I'm a worthless nobody without these things, Nicole. Anybody from Earth could have wound up in my position and done this. And they probably would have been able to do it better, too. You guys could have gotten some special forces guy, a Navy SEAL or someone like that, but instead you got me. And I'm not really good for anything."

"I do not know how seals pertain to this conversation. I thought your zone did not have Mobians?"

He felt a headache begin to come on. "It's things like this that make it not fun to live here, Nicole."

She briefly paused. "Regardless, what you say about yourself is simply not true."

Sorun would have scoffed at that if it weren't for the fact that Nicole stepped in front of the chair and grabbed both its arms with her hands, startling him. Even more startling was when she forcibly spun the chair so he was directly facing her. Most startling of all was how upset she looked. Not the sad kind of upset, either, but the more mad kind of upset. The same kind of upset look she'd had on her face when she'd ambushed him during that other factory mission.

"What's with that look?" Sorun asked, lowering the sword back into his lap as he looked up at Nicole's eyes.

"I do not like it when you talk about yourself like this," she said. When Sorun grew uncomfortable enough he tried to use his feet to push away from her. To his dismay, she held firm on the chair. "You're not worthless. You're Sorun."

At that, Sorun scoffed. "And what's so great about that guy?" he asked.

"Plenty." She dragged the chair back so that Sorun was closer to her. "Even without powers you are somebody everybody within the Freedom Fighters admires."

"I don't believe that for a second," Sorun denied, turning his head away from Nicole. "Nobody likes me."

"That's false," she assured him. "Whenever I am being carried around by Sally I hear things whenever she talks with others. Bunnie and Antoine both seem quite fond of you, Antoine in particular."

"Antoine just likes having someone he can beat in sword fights."

"Antoine likes having somebody with a common interest he can spend time with." Sorun blinked in surprise at Nicole's words, which prompted the lynx to continue. "Sally admires the dedication you put into the Freedom Fighters. Tails looks up to you as someone who does the right thing, even if you sometimes act like you don't like it. Which is just that; an act."

The more she spoke, the more Sorun found himself shrinking further back into his seat while quietly breathing out in quiet acceptance, his eyes still down on his own reflection. He hadn't known. He knew all along they wanted to befriend him, but he'd always assumed that was for their own reasons. Because they were polite like that. He hadn't realized there were qualities to him that the all actually liked. Qualities that didn't involve his powers...

"Rotor's warmed up to you," she continued, "Knuckles has commended you in your ability to show little hesitation during fights, Sonic-"

"Don't bring him up." Those wounds were still too fresh for him to be hearing about the blue hedgehog. At the same time, part of him couldn't help but admit he was curious as to what Sonic had to say about him.

" Sonic ," Nicole repeated, outright ignoring Sorun's request, "is under the impression you act so aloof around the others because you think it makes you look cooler, and somewhat deplores this aspect of you, but at the same time he greatly admires that you choose to do the right thing for the sake of others despite it going against this act of yours." She smiled a bit and looked to the side. "And he's also said that he enjoys that you give him such a challenge at video games, and has vowed to get better and one day beat you at one behind your back."

"Pfft. That's never gonna happen. He's worse than Shadow." A beat passed. "Wait." Now that he thought about it there was one thing that he had over Sonic. Video games. It wasn't really practical in any sense of the word, but goddamn, it was something he could call his. All the speed in the world didn't help him when he couldn't control how fast the electrical signals from pressed buttons travelled. And even with his reflexes he'd yet to beat Sorun at a single game.

It brought a small smile to his face. It was something. Something to call his.

Nicole seemed the see the change in Sorun's demeanor, and in turn began to smile so earnestly at him. "And," she finished off, "I like that you spend so much time with me and give me many enjoyable memories to look back on."

"You make it so hard for me to stay upset..." A light, breathy chuckle left Sorun. He couldn't deny it, and he sure as hell didn't know how Nicole managed to pull it off, but he felt better. Still a bit sore over what Eggman had done to him, metaphorically and literally speaking, but... but what she said helped. Helped a great deal.

He found himself looking back down at Yamato. He saw his own reflection to the left side of the wavy temper line that ran down the center of the blade. He saw Nicole's reflection on the right side, her image upside-down and right next to Sorun's image. Even if both images were slightly wavy and distorted due to the imperfect reflection, it was still an image he couldn't help but admire. He liked the picture.

Sometimes he really wished he had more time.

"None of this really covers people like Sonic being stronger than me, but Sally already gave me that lecture... I get what you mean." He noted that the area around him had gotten darker, like a shadow had been cast over him. He looked up, and then pressed his back so far into the seat in surprise he heard the chair's frame squeak. Nicole was still gripping onto the chair's arms, only now she was leaning over him. That smile was still on her face. "Could you stop doing that and let me up...?" he nervously asked.

Nicole blinked in response, and then looked down as if Sorun's words caused something to register in her. "Oh. Right. Of course." She immediately let go of the chair and stepped back, holding her hands behind her back while unblinkingly staring towards Sorun. The human used his legs to push the chair back a bit, and then stood up off the chair with his sword still in hand.

"Anyways..." Sorun sighed out, running a hand through his hair, "I, um... thanks, Nicole. For this. I really needed it." He exhaled through his nose and turned his head to the side. "Don't know what I'd do without you sometimes."

"It's no trouble at all, Sorun," Nicole assured him. "I'm happy to see that you're-"

She was cut off when her image began to distort and briefly flicker. Sorun's eyes snapped back to her, slightly widened in surprise, while at the same time the smile on Nicole's face lowered by a substantial margin. She looked down at her right hand as her image stabilized, her shoulders slumping a bit as she looked back towards Sorun.

"The power reserves," she explained.

"Ah." Nodding in understanding, Sorun began to awkwardly rub at the back of his neck. "It's fine, I understand. I can still stick around to talk if you-?"

"No. I... actually did have some work that needed doing, Sorun." Nicole glanced back towards the lab's computer, a small, frustrated frown set on her blank face. Her form flickered again, and with hands still clasped behind her back she turned to Sorun. "I trust you'll be well now?"

"Better than I was coming in here. Again, thank-"

Nicole's form completely disappeared. Her icon reappeared on one of the monitors, and at the same time Sorun saw a little black hand giving a thumbs-up appear next to the icon. Sorun gave the computer a sad smile, and then turned his back to it. Two slashes were made in the air, and a moment later a portal was created in front of him. Without a moment's hesitation Sorun stepped through the portal, making a few steps through the blue void and appeared through the other side.

"Must be rough for her. I always feel bad she's gotta live like that," Sorun thought to himself as he slashed the portal behind him closed. He sighed afterwards, and then looked up at the house he'd stepped out of the portal in front of. Sonic's house. "As much as I'd like to avoid the guy forever, I don't think I could pull that trick off. Ugh, man..."

He stepped up to the front door and reached forwards to open it. He never even made it that far, as the door swung open before he made contact with the handle. Sorun's hand as a result froze mid-grab, his eyes slightly widened and locked onto the blue form that was on the other side. Sonic, who was in much the same position Sorun was for a good moment, blinked and slowly lowered his hand away from the door as Sorun did the same.

"Oh, uh, hey. Sorun." The greeting by Sonic was about as stilted and awkward as Sorun felt right about now, and he imagined that Sonic felt the same. He couldn't quite blame him. "You're back."

"Yeah, I... needed some time alone to think," Sorun said, slowly pocketing his hands as he continued to stare towards Sonic. Sally's words from yesterday still rang in his head. Nicole's rang about a hundred times louder, and he found them a thousand times more comfort in them. At the very least, they helped quell the feelings of envy he felt inside. Enough that he could stand to look at Sonic and think rational thoughts.

"You really needed to go through the window?"

"... I do what I want."

"Right, right." A small, amused grin found itself on Sonic's face, his overall demeanor looking extraordinarily relaxed. Like he was relieved of something. "It's still early," he said, moving aside to allow Sorun an entranceway into the house. "Mom's up making breakfast. You down for having some with us?"

"..." Sorun hummed in thought, looking down at his feet. It was a strange thing. He didn't want to say yes, but at the same time he felt more strongly that he didn't want to say no. The feelings of hunger he had outright denied him from just walking away from potential food.

"And you are certainly no Sonic."

He felt his hands tighten inside of his pockets. How he hated that man and how right he was. But... he supposed there was no helping it. At least not the way he was now, anyways. Maybe in the future when he had more Chaos Emeralds that could change. For now he'd settle for being second fiddle. Or whatever line of fiddle he was compared to everybody else.

If nothing else, he still had mastery of games over Sonic. He took a bit of solace in that.

Nodding to himself, Sorun finally made up his mind and looked back up at Sonic. "Sure, let's go."

Chapter 37

A/N- Finally managed to pass that 100-review threshold. Yay for that. Thanks to all those who helped the story get this far and everyone for reading, as always.

Recursion Error

Episode 37- One is a really lonely number

There were a lot of places that Sorun expected his journey of life, or whatever it could even be called at this point, would take him. Some places were expected. Random forested areas around the northern continent, the occasional Eggman factory, places like that. Then there were the wackier, out of this world locations Sorun's adventures in this world found him in. Like the digital world, or under the ocean.

And then there were cases that were sort of in the middle. Like being inside of a mountain. Or, in this case, at the peaks of snowcapped mountains. With him falling downwards and slicing his sword right through the middle of an Egg Hammer as it threatened to smash a group of Overlander soldiers with its hammer.

Oddly enough the journey to get here was more strange than the actual events currently transpiring...

---

6 hours prior

"Sorun, Sorun, Sorun...~" A musical hum left the golden-furred cat as she held up a torn, blue hoodie that was somehow scorched and drenched at the same time. "How in the world did this happen?" Honey asked, the sweet tone of her voice hiding the malice layered underneath as she looked up at the human standing across the counter from her.

Not even fazed by her voice, Sorun sent the cat a flat look. "You ever fight a robot frog with a flamethrower in its mouth, Honey?" Sorun asked her. "I did. I had to fight two. At the same time. It wasn't fun." It sucked, actually. He didn't know how something could be so scorching hot and wet at the same time. Eggman found a way, somehow. He was a master at building contradictions like that.

The ruined hoodie was slammed down onto the counter with enough force that it created enough wind to blow back both the teen's and cat's black hair. "I don't care what you're fighting out there!" she screeched at him. "How could you let something as egregious as this happen to my poor product!?"

"You know, I'd like to see how well your red dress would hold up while you're getting tag-teamed by fire-breathing murder frogs," Sorun said to her, voice bland and lacking all energy. "Look, this was my last hoodie. You think you can fix it?"

"What am I going to do with you...?" Turning her gold eyes down to the hoodie, she regarded it for a whole millisecond, and then looked back up at Sorun. "Nope. It's shot. Finished. Gone to the great beyond. I can't salvage this hot mess."

"Fantastic." Reaching a hand up to rub at the bridge of his nose, Sorun asked her, "Is there anything you can do for me? I ain't exactly opposed to running into battle in nothing but pants and a t-shirt, but, well..."

He gestured down to his body, causing Honey to lean over the counter to get a better look at him. The cat's face scrunched up into an expression of absolute disgust when she saw the multiple scuff marks, burns, rips and tears all through his shirt and pants. Surprisingly his black boots were almost as pristine as the day Honey first gave them to him. He didn't know how the hell that happened. She built 'em good, he guessed. Either that or whatever she made the leather out of to make the things was real tough.

He still didn't know where people in this world got leather from. And frankly, he wasn't sure that he wanted to know. He hoped it was some sort of artificial substitute, which would go to explain how it was they lasted so long, but he just didn't know, nor was he tempted to seek an answer out.

"I should slap you for going out in public looking like that. While wearing my brand, no less. Wait here." Grumbling under her breath, Honey stepped out from around the counter and made her way towards her back room. Sorun watched her depart, and then began to quietly hum under his breath as he leaned his back against the counter while waiting for her.

"It's always so fun coming here," he sarcastically thought. He never knew what to expect whenever he walked into this place, only that it surely wouldn't be a boring experience and there was a good chance of something horrible and mentally-scarring happening. Honey had that effect, and in a way, somehow, it had grown to be refreshing for Sorun. Maybe it was because it served as a break to Sorun and him having to deal with all the other Mobians he dealt with on a daily basis. That or Stockholm Syndrome. Considering he was basically an indentured clothes slave to her at this point it was probably the latter.

But despite all the craziness, Honey made quality goods. The fact his boots made of a leather of nebulous origins were still in one piece after all this time alone spoke volumes. He quite honestly didn't trust anybody else to make clothes for him other than her, and she had a way of fitting things so that they fit him just right . He'd never admit it to her face, but the woman was a genius when it came to clothes. And also insane. He'd admit that to her face.

Still, dealing with her eccentricities was worth it for her clothes. About the only reason he went so far to advertise her brand, really. That and because he couldn't afford not to exploit that discount she gave him.

"Alright, here it is. Your new ensemble." Sorun was stirred from his thoughts when he looked up at the sound of Honey's voice. She'd walked back into view, hefting a small box of clothes on the counter he leaned on before leaving yet again to go towards a nearby rack of clothes. "I've been mulling over that style of yours for a while now. I think I got something down."

"You did, huh...?" Humming, Sorun leaned over the box and began rifling through its contents. Overall, he wasn't all that impressed with what he saw. A bunch of pairs of pants similar to the pair he already wore, except dark blue in color. And a bunch of plain black long-sleeved shirts. "Wow, so instead of having me wear a blue shirt and black pants, you decided to make me wear blue pants and a black shirt." With a flat face Sorun looked back up at Honey. "Ingenious," he drawled out.

"The blue top blended in too well with your outer layer, and your bottoms need to contrast with your top," Honey said, her hands shuffling through a line of clothes held up on a bunch of hangers. She made a "ah-hah!" noise, and then pulled something off from the rack. "I decided that the punkish vibe you were making from the hoodie wasn't suiting you and sending the right message to what my brand is all about, and honestly, sleeveless on you was lacking class. We're ditching that altogether and going for something more refined."

Sorun scoffed. "Yeah, 'cause nothin' says refined like long sleeves instead of- mph." He was interrupted when a cloth something was thrown over his head, muffling the human's words. His hands automatically flung up to his face to remove the offending piece of clothing, and with a huff he tore whatever was on him off his head.

He almost threw it back at Honey when he saw her giving him a coy smile, but then he saw what it was he was holding in his hands and held off so he could actually look at it. On closer inspection, he saw that it was a long coat. A blue long coat, expertly stitched together from the coat tail all the way to the blue sleeves. Black interior, light yet sturdy from the feel of it, and he could just tell by looking it'd fit perfectly over him. Eyebrows raised in genuine surprise, Sorun looked back up to Honey. The eyebrows lowered back down when he saw her smug expression.

"Well...?" she asked, tail wagging mischievously behind her as she leaned in closer to Sorun to gauge his reaction. Sorun rolled his eyes in response to this, though he couldn't help but admit that there was something deeply appealing about the coat to him. She was right; it really did look refined. Stylish, almost.

"... Yeah, alright. I like it." He slung the coat over his shoulder, and with his hands sliding into his pocket Sorun re-leaned against the counter while still looking towards Honey. "So what do I owe you for it?" he asked.

"Hm? Oh, nothing. It's on the house."

Sorun almost tripped on his face when he heard that. Generous, Honey was not. In fact he'd known her long enough to know that she was a pretty ruthless businesswoman that didn't do things for "free". Tasks that offered no monetary gain for her but still ultimately benefited her in the long run, like making Sorun advertise for her, sure, she was all for that. Completely free, though? That was basically unheard of.

"What exactly did I do to earn all this for free?" Sorun asked, voice laced in suspicion as he sent the golden cat a raised eyebrow.

Honey hummed, rolling back forth on her feet with her hands clasped behind her back as she gave Sorun a wide, knowing grin. "Oh, nothing much. It's just for the past couple of months I've been getting a lot more business run through here. Even got a couple of Mobians traveling in from some of the outlying villages who said they came here just because some human Freedom Fighter told them about the place. You wouldn't happen to know anything about that, would you?"

Ah, he was caught. "Nah. Nothin'," Sorun said, shrugging as he feigned ignorance. "Musta been some other human you do business with. Can't believe you'd cheat on me like that."

"Ignoring that I'm not and you're the only human I've ever even met, do you know of any other humans in the Freedom Fighters situated in Knothole?"

"... Yeah, that guy. He goes around, does stuff here and there. Good old... Jjjjjjimmy."

"Jimmy."

"Yeah. Jimmy."

She rolled her eyes completely around, her irises falling back on Sorun. The grin on her face had only widened. "Well, Jimmy, I very much appreciate you having promoted my business so well. The clothes are a way of repaying that. And also showing off a bit more of my product."

"Ahhh, there it is." Altruism. It was somewhere down there in Honey's heart. Somewhere deep, deep down. And Sorun supposed he should have felt honored that he was someone Honey liked enough to show that side. But then he remembered how she acted, and he quickly realized he didn't feel this way. "Well, Honey, as always it's been an experience. I gotta go back to my unpaid job now."

His words caused Honey's ears to straighten upwards. "They don't pay you to be a Freedom Fighter?"

"Nah," Sorun said with a shake of his head, "I get paid in more more valuable, less materialistic things."

"The satisfaction of helping other people and admiration of those around you while ultimately working towards the goal of a free world?"

"Something like that I guess, yeah, sure. 'Least that's what I tell myself to get me up in the morning. One thing, anyways," Sorun said. "But every now and then Sally throws some cash my way since I'm pretty much the only person in all the Freedom Fighters without a source of income. Sally's a princess so she's basically bankrolled for life, Sonic and Tails still live with their parents, Antoine and Bunnie live together and apparently Antoine gets a pension since he has an official position as a commander of the kingdom's forces the lucky son of a gun , Amy... don't know what her deal is, Rotor... makes stuff I guess, I don't know, and the Chaotix are basically broke like me, too, but they get to mooch off all the food in the Freedom HQ since they're all bunking there." He was fairly certain that Shadow was broke as well due to losing his status as a G.U.N. agent as a result of Eggman's takeover. He'd assume Rouge would be in the same boat as him, but she always seemed well-off every time Sorun saw her.

She was a mysterious one, that bat.

Honey tittered in amusement. "What, Sonic's family doesn't feed you?"

"No, but even with that discount you gave me most of what I do get goes to you. And food for my pet Chao. Fruits and nuts and stuff like that." Left unsaid was all the stress aid items Sorun had wasted money on. Like that puzzle ring set he'd tried out and broke out of frustration, the scented candles that did absolutely nothing to help with his nerves, and that stress ball he'd squeezed so hard that it'd popped. In the end all getting that stuff did was make him more stressed for having wasted time and money on them. "Anyways-ooh," he suddenly said as he glanced at the clock, "yeah, hate to cut this short, but I gotta go."

"Resistance stuff?" Honey asked. When she saw Sorun nod his head as he made his way to the door, box of clothes and coat in hand, she then asked, "so what's on your docket for today?"

Already halfway out the door, Sorun paused and stuck his head back into the shop. "Oh, this one's a doozy. I get to go liberate a whole city from robot tyranny."

Honey blinked, and the amused grin she'd had on her face dropped right off. "Wait, really?"

"Yeah, we're going to Station Square," Sorun answered with a nod. "The time's finally come to go to that place, so... yeah."

"Ah, alright." Ears drooping back to their normal position, Honey moved back to the clothes rack besides her and began to dig through it. "Well, I gotta get ready for today. You be careful out there." She reached a hand out and pointed towards Sorun. "And don't you dare ruin that coat I just made you. I put a lot of effort into that."

"I'll put forth my best attempt." Sending her one last wave, Sorun exited the shop. Honey shook her head at the direction he left, and then focused her attention back on her clothes.

---

5 hours, 40 minutes prior

"You're late!"

"I know I know I know!" He'd only taken a single step out of the portal before he heard Sally yell at him. Slashing backwards to close said portal behind him, Sorun looked towards Sally with an apologetic look on his face. "I got wrapped up in something." And what a something it was. He'd yet to try the coat on, but these new pants and shirt? They fit spectacularly. And Honey was right- the sleeves did make him feel refined.

His apology seemed to mean very little, though, as the princess crossed her arms right in front of him. Behind her Sorun could see the open doors of the hangar the Freedom Fighters kept their aircraft in, and a few of the Freedom Fighters themselves scrambling around the FF Special as the giant ship's engines fired up. Somehow the sight of that and knowing where it was about to carry him was more nerve-wracking to Sorun than the princess standing in front of him.

"I'd like to think somebody who can make wormholes out of thin air could be a bit more punctual, especially considering what we're about to go to pull off, Sorun." She sounding chastising, but the small grin on Sally's face gave away how she truly felt. "Glad you made it."

"Yep." Sorun took another glance at the ship behind Sally. "So we're all good to go?"

"All the supplies are packed and everyone's ready and waiting, so yes," she said with a nod. "Rotor's up in the Special's cockpit preparing for liftoff. We'll be heading out any minute now."

"Ah, great." Sorun began to walk past Sally. "Well, guess all that's left to do is find a seat and-"

"Wait a sec, Sorun." Sally quickly stuck her arm out in front of Sorun to block his path. "There, um... there's a slight development we should probably address before leaving."

The human teen glanced down at the arm blocking his path, and then looked towards Sally herself. She had a slightly uncomfortable, awkward look on her face, and the look in her eyes almost seemed apologetic towards Sorun. "Okay? Can I ask what-?"

"Chao."

"Ah, I see." He understood the moment he heard that one sound be uttered to him. Sighing out, he turned around to the source of the voice, and wasn't at all surprised to see his Chao. Virgil was just floating there, his bladed arms crossed over his chest and his head adorned with silver crest-like horns staring straight at him. There was a large frown across the Chao's face, making him look like he was displeased with something, and Sorun, knowing precisely what the problem was, sent a blank look towards Sally. The chipmunk, in response, began to sheepishly rub at her arm.

"Your Chao has been very insistent in coming along with us," Sally explained to him. "He flew over here on his own and refuses to go back home."

"The fearsome princess Sally Acorn couldn't remove a single Chao...?" Sorun disbelievingly muttered out.

"Have you seen what he looks like?" she asked him, gesturing a hand towards Virgil. "For the life of me, I don't know what you did to make him evolve into such a scary form, Sorun." She shook her head and looked at Virgil. "Also we... can't."

Sorun rose an eyebrow. "What do you mean 'can't?"

"None of us can actually catch him," she said, making both of Sorun's eyes widen. "And Sonic doesn't want to try anymore because every time he grabs at Virgil he cuts his gloves." She looked back to Sorun. "Do you know why he's acting like this?"

"Yeah, yeah I do." Huffing out a breath, Sorun turned his eyes towards the Chao. "Virgil, Virgil..."

It'd been a problem ever since he'd first gotten the Chao. He didn't like to be separated from Sorun for too long. It was to the point that he practically had to force the Chao to stay at home whenever he went out on a mission, and even then he'd still sometimes fight Sorun. All because he... well, Sorun wasn't quite sure. Because he didn't like Sorun being in danger all the time and wanted to protect him since he was his caretaker, maybe? He'd seemed really eager to fight that wasp mech that one time.

But that was before he'd evolved; after was a different story. He was a lot less vocal, more cool and relaxed, his overall demeanor was just a lot less energetic and more relaxed, and as a whole he was just easier to deal with. But there was still a certain... discontent with him that Sorun could see whenever he left him at home to go on a mission somewhere. He could always tell the Chao was upset from the way he'd cross his arms and refuse to utter even a single sound, and this would persist while Sorun was gone to a whole day after he'd return home.

Sorun supposed that he should have known at one point Virgil would go and do something like this. That his patience would wear thin or he'd just decide enough was enough. He didn't know he'd go and be so aggressive with the matter, though.

"You wanna come with me, don't you, Virgil?" Sorun asked the floating Chao.

"Chao."

That was a yes. "Well, you can't. Go home."

"Chao-chao."

That was a no. And it caused Sorun to groan and rub at the bridge of his nose. "Why do you want to come with me?"

Virgil did three things. First he uncrossed his arms, and then pointed one of his appendages at the sheathed katana Sorun was holding in his left hand. And then he twisted his right arm, just enough that the sunlight gleamed off the black blade jutting out of his arm and curving up past his shoulder.

Sorun understood this immediately, and after glancing down at Yamato looked back up at the Chao. "I know you're all evolved and everything, Virgil, but it's still too dangerous for you to come with me."

"Chao, chao-chao." Virgil gestured towards Sorun, and his frown deepened.

A frown that matched Virgil's grew on Sorun's face. "Yeah, I know it's dangerous for me, too. It's dangerous for everybody. But I'm not putting you in danger just because you want to go."

"Chao?"

He recognized the inflection at the end as Virgil asking a question. "Because everybody else is experienced and used to this kind of thing, and I got powers. And you're just, well..."

"Chao..."

Sorun reared back a bit from how hostile that "chao" sounded. Even Sally seemed a bit off-put by it. And then when Sorun looked towards the Chao's blue eyes, at the way they were narrowed so threateningly towards him, he understood immediately.

He laughed. It was a small, quiet laugh, barely above a chuckle, and it was something that made Sally look at him oddly. But Sorun couldn't help it- he'd laughed because he understood exactly what the hostility radiating off of Virgil meant. Why he was being so aggressive and insistent on going on the mission with Sorun. How could he not, when he'd been feeling the same way himself whenever he looked at Sonic.

"Little guy doesn't like being called weak and wants to be useful. Figures. He's so much like me." It was almost amusing how much he'd imprinted off of Sorun. There had to be something Chaos energy-related about it. That book he read outright said they were natural conductors for the stuff, and there was no way he naturally just became this way. The fact he'd developed into that form alone said enough. "Well, Virgil, I understand where you're coming from. But if something happened to you I wouldn't be able to live with myself."

His mind made up, Sorun acted midway through a laugh. The smile on his face was wiped in the same instance he snapped his arm forwards in an attempt to grab the dark blue Chao floating right in front of him.

Except, he didn't manage to grab him. Virgil had dodged and dipped his entire body downwards, fast enough that Sorun's eyes barely managed to track his body. And the entire time the Chao's indignant eyes were still locked onto Sorun's.

"The hell...?" Eyes narrowing, Sorun slowly exhaled as his Bringer Claws manifested on his back. "You really gotta make it this hard for me?"

A major issue was beginning to present itself. The issue was that with his evolution came the regeneration of Virgil's lost wing and flight. And apparently that meant he was just a bit too agile for Sorun to grab, because, try as he might, he couldn't so much as lay a finger on Virgil. His human arms never came close to brushing against his flying body. The Bringer Claws came closer, but he still wasn't able to grab him. It was enough to make Sorun grin. Even with four arms, he couldn't catch the little guy.

When he felt a weight settle on his head, Sorun all but gave up. He didn't even need to look up to know that Virgil was up there, sitting on his head and more than likely still carrying that indignant frown of his. Sorun didn't doubt that any further efforts on grabbing the little guy were futile. So, with a weary sigh, Sorun shrugged and gave up.

"Alright, fine, you can come. But the instant it gets too dangerous I'm opening a portal and sending you back home. Deal?"

"Chao."

"Sorun!"

Flinching, Sorun glanced to the side at Sally. She didn't look nearly as agreeing as Sorun was. "What do you want me to do, Sally?" he asked her. "He's gonna follow me no matter what, and unless you wanna tell Sonic to stop being a baby and take his gloves off so he can carry him home, he's coming."

She looked a slight bit more convinced, but not completely. "Sorun, I don't-"

"Look, he's my responsibility, alright? Just let me worry about it."

Sally bit at her lower lip in thought. She looked hesitant at the idea, very hesitant, her eyes continually flicking from Sorun's face to the Chao sitting on top of his head. Finally, something akin to an agreeing groan left her, and as one hand rubbed at the space between her eyes the other hand waved Sorun off. "Fine, fine," she said, "he can go. But you're looking after him."

"Naturally." Sorun felt the weight lift off of his head, and then saw Virgil float next to his head from the corner of his eye. The Chao still had his perpetual scowl over his face, but at the same time he looked appeased. At least that's how it looked from the way his eyes were slightly more relaxed-looking. Taking note of the sight, Sorun looked back to Sally. "So we're good to go?" he asked.

Nodding, Sally said, "We should be. All that's left is for us to board and head off."

"Right." Sorun turned right around and began walking to the giant ship in the hangar, Virgil floating right besides him. Sally followed closely from behind. "Well, time to go save a city, I guess."

---

5 hours, 20 minutes prior

Apparently Sally had been a busy girl in the background.

Shadow had made mention of it, but the princess had been in contact with important people. Getting a connection with the president of Station Square, because that made sense to Sorun's ears, was easy enough as from what Sorun heard the Freedom Fighters had helped out a lot in Station Square in the past, so he and Sally were on good terms, and so, by extension, the Freedom Fighters were on good terms with Station Square. Even if Station Square's integration into technical UF Overlander territory caused communication between them to become a bit more sparse before Eggman's big takeover.

The other contact was only possible because of Rouge and Shadow's connections, which, pragmatically speaking, made sense as Sorun would be very worried if they wouldn't be able to get into contact with their boss. The Commander of G.U.N., Mr. President Man, and Sally had all been colluding this big move for a while now while everybody else had been going around dismantling Eggman's operations. The goal of this big move was simple: liberate Station Square from Eggman's control, and liberate G.U.N. HQ from Eggman's control. Simultaneously.

Something like this was only possible now due to greatly diminished numbers on Eggman's part. They all must have been doing something right, because across the board of the whole world the number of Eggman's robots had been falling at a dramatic rate. Sorun himself hadn't known that all those operations he and the rest of the Freedom Fighters had been doing had had that big of an effect, and even some of the others were a bit surprised at how effective all those sabotage operations of theirs were. But, the results spoke for themselves: Eggman's ground forces were a fraction of what they used to be. Not to say he still didn't have a massive force, it was still practically an army, but with all the heat he'd been getting as a result of all the pushback from them he'd decided to reorganize a bit and shuffled most of his forces back to his own city.

So what did that mean in essence? Basically, it meant that a majority of the Badnik forces were centralized in New Megaopolis. This meant that the place was even worse than a fortress from the sheer concentration of enemies and whatever else was in that city. Virtually impenetrable. An impossible target for them to attack due to the density of Badniks. And because Eggman's city was shored up so well with Badniks, that gave him free reign to use the factories there to manufacture more Badniks. That wasn't even accounting for the fact he still had a whole fleet of warships just sitting around. So that was still a major problem.

On the upside, it also meant that his forces were greatly spread thin pretty much everywhere else in the world. That included the forces that were occupying the territories he conquered, such as Station Square, G.U.N. headquarters, and all the UF territories and Overlander settlements.

With this in mind, the powers to be, meaning Sally, her brother, the president of Station Square, and the G.U.N. Commander, had all decided that the time to act was now before Eggman managed to replenish his ranks with more robots.

It was meant to be a two-pronged attack. Rouge and Shadow, already affiliated with G.U.N., were to go and help with the assault on their HQ in order to wrest it from Eggman's control. They'd already left a while ago, and from what little Sorun heard so far things over there were going well enough. Once they regained control the idea was to launch a campaign to take back all the Overlander territory from Eggman once settlement at a time, city by city, gathering more resources all the while to build their strength back up.

But that was all their problem. The Overlanders'. Station Square got saddled with the Freedom Fighters, half the reason due to geometric positioning. The UF territories were all congregated towards the eastern continent, mostly around where the European nations used to be. Station Square was in the west, down in what used to be South America near where Brazil had once been. It was easier for them to fly down and deal with it than G.U.N. to divide its resources and fly across the ocean just to help liberate them when they had all those occupied UF cities to free. The other half was because Station Square was already allies with the Kingdom of Acorn, and, with Station Square being allied with the Overlander territories, by extension, it helped the kingdom's relations with the Overlanders in the long run.

Complicated politics Sorun cared none for aside, it still made enough sense why they had to be the ones to go and liberate Station Square. And seeing as how it was going to be such a big operation, it was all hands on deck save for Team Dark, who were busy dealing with the situation at G.U.N. Sorun didn't mind it all that much. He figured it might be nice, seeing humans again after months of life among Mobians. Even if they weren't Earthlings like him.

"Alright, we're coming up on Station Square now." That was Rotor's voice, who sat at the helm of the FF special. Sally was standing right besides him, leaning forwards with one hand on his seat for support as she looked out the viewing window of the ship. Sorun was standing just behind them, making an interested hum every now and then as he examined the thin, black shirt slipped over his torso.

"It's been a while since I've worn anything with sleeves. Feels weird." It really was a refreshing look for him, especially as the hoodie had grown old on him. Brushing his hand over a sleeve and making a satisfied sound, Sorun stepped forwards right next to Sally so he could go and see just what they were dealing with.

From what he'd been told, Station Square was supposed to be a city inside of a mountain. Well, he saw the mountain- or what was left of it, anyways. Now it was less a mountain and more a giant crater, at the center of which was a city. And what a city it was- even from all the way here in the sky he could make out a huge, sprawling, metropolis the likes of which dragged some sense of nostalgia out from somewhere deep in Sorun. It definitely looked like a city built by humans.

"I thought Station Square was inside a mountain?" Sorun questioned as he turned his head to Sally.

She nodded. "It was." She glanced to the side at Sorun. "I told you the mountain was lost a while back, remember?" When the human teen just blankly stared back at her, she extrapolated with, "It's a long story."

"... Okay then." He exhaled deeply out of his nose and decided to just take that in stride. "So you want me to just drop right in the middle of the place?"

"We need to establish a safe landing zone so we can unload all the supplies we brought in from Knothole," she explained to him. "There's a rather large clearing near the edge of the city. The plan is for the resisting forces here to meet up with us, and we'll go from there."

"And those would be...?"

"The police and small military force that operated here before Eggman's takeover," she answered. "They were greatly diminished from the occupation, but over time they've been working up towards something in preparation for this. All we have to do-"

"Yeah-yeah-yeah, I'll leave the details to you." Sorun waved a hand over in Sally's direction, who rolled her eyes at the human. A sudden shudder beneath his feet signaled the ship stopping midair, prompting Sorun to look over at Rotor. "This the spot?" he asked.

"Yup," Rotor confirmed with a nod. "You, um... you sure you're able to make it down there alright?"

"Between the wings, teleportation, and portals?" He missed the exasperated gasp that came from the walrus as Sorun grabbed his new coat off a nearby chair. "I dunno, Rotor. I'll make something up on the way down." He opened the door leading out of the cockpit, called back "I'll call you when it's clear", and then closed the door behind him.

Walking through the length of the ship had been a short trip. Walking through the cargo hold had been a more interesting sight. The liberation of the city was also part of a relief effort, so Knothole had spared some essential supplies for the city. Basic things: food, water, medicine, miscellaneous clothing items. No weapons, though, considering Badniks were bulletproof and humans like Sorun didn't have the physical capability to defeat Badniks in any sort of close-combat. He had to wonder just what exactly the human resistance down below were planning.

Sitting around were all the Freedom Fighters and the Chaotix. They'd given him encouraging nods as he passed, which Sorun returned in kind as he made his way to the back door. He winced slightly as he heard the door begin to open, wind rushing in and blowing past his face.

"Yo, Sorun!" The pale human turned around at his voice being called out. He saw Sonic zoom right behind him, same carefree grin over his face as always. "You headin' down?"

Sorun didn't have it in him to form a witty remark. "Yeah," he answered. "Just gonna go clear the landing zone real quick. Hey, you seen Vir- oh, hey." Another blue thing, significantly smaller in size, floated into his view. The Chao gave Sorun a quick nod, the teen blinking back in response and refocusing on Sonic. "Anyway, yeah, I'm goin'. Shouldn't take me more than five or so minutes."

"Sounds good. Seeya soon. Nice new threads, by the way." Sonic clicked his tongue and pointed at Sorun, and then turned around to walk back to the others. He'd passed Virgil along the way, the Chao giving him a single, scornful look that caused Sonic to flinch away from him. Sorun chuckled at the sight, but the amusement was soon wiped off his face when he turned back to the open hangar door.

"Chao?" Virgil floated right next to Sorun, and he, too, was staring at the opened hangar door. Sorun couldn't help but note the apprehension he saw in the Chao's eyes, which caused him to scoff and gesture to the open air in front of them.

"What are you complaining about? You have wings," Sorun pointed out, looking towards the Chao's two split wings. "Don't tell me you're afraid of heights."

"Chao-chao." Virgil vehemently shook his head as a negative response. It didn't remove the apprehension from his face. "C-chao."

Sorun sighed and pinched the bridge of his nose. "Look, you're the one that wanted to come with me on this. Guess what, jumping from really high places is part of the job. For some weird reason."

"Chao-chao. Chao."

"Okay, look, Virgil, I get it. It's a new experience for you, and heights are scary. I totally understand." As Virgil continued staring towards the open doorway, Sorun's hand began to subtly creep up behind his floating form. "But listen, sometimes the mother bird needs to push her baby bird out of the nest. What I'm about to do isn't too dissimilar to that. In fact it's pretty much a one-to-one recreation." When his hand got close enough he managed to wrap his fingers around the previously distracted and now surprised Chao. "Don't worry, you get used to it!" Sorun finished as he began running to the open exit.

"Chao!" Virgil's protest had fall on deaf ears, as Sorun had already jumped out.

The familiar feeling of wind rushing against his body was the very first thing Sorun took note of as his body began falling towards the very far away but quickly approaching ground. The second thing was the struggling Chao in his grasp, which Sorun perceived as Virgil struggling against him.

Sorun reacted by throwing him.

"Little bird needs to learn!" Sorun yelled out as he reared his arm back, and then pushing it forwards to throw the Chao. Virgil's distressed chaoing were soon drowned out from both the wind and distance as he sailed away to parts unknown. Sorun sighed in relief, and then allowed himself to relax as he continued to fall. Then he started to panic a few seconds later when he realized he didn't have his coat draped over his shoulder.

"What the- where did- oh!" As he spun around in the air, he finally found sight of his coat. It was just behind him, falling at a slower rate due to its lighter mass and quickly growing further and further away from Sorun the closer he got to the ground. Sorun was quick in manifesting a Bringer Claw to reach up and grab the coat, and then had it reel it back all the way to him were he proceeded to grab it with his normal hands.

Putting on a coat while falling at terminal velocity towards the ground was evidently a difficult task. The cloth would keep whipping into his face and the sleeves and coattail would continually blow past him. There'd even been a couple of times where he had lost his grip on the coat and had to re-grab it. After a bit more effort, he finally managed to push both of his arms fully through the coat's sleeves.

And just in time, too, because Sorun could see ground fast approaching. In a large patch of green with a few trees and sidewalks scattered around. A park, of some sort. A park infested with a few Egg Pawns. And a gold one.

Mere meters before Sorun hit the ground, he Tricked and disappeared. The next instant found the blade of a katana bursting through the front of the golden Egg Pawn spotted earlier, only for the blade to then slice through the entire upper half of its body. Sorun then nonchalantly walked past the robot's corpse, not even paying attention to all of the other normal Egg Pawns that had set their sights on him. He instead reached his open hand up, where a small blue and black creature landed standing in his palm.

"See, told you it wasn't so bad," Sorun said, lowering his arm so that he was eye-level with Virgil. "I mean, come on, you can fly. Heights shouldn't mean anything to you."

"Chao..." Virgil turned his head away from Sorun so that he didn't have to look him in the eye. Snorting in amusement, Sorun looked forwards towards all the robots that began to surround them, lances in hand. Rolling his eyes, Sorun clicked his tongue twice to gain the Chao's attention, who then turned around on Sorun's hand to look at the robots.

"Well, Virg, you wanted to see what it's all about. Here it is." Sorun brought the hand the Chao was standing on closer to him, and then fully thrust it out towards the nearest robot. "Time to go to work!"

He hadn't been expecting much when he'd decided to bring his pet Chao to the field with him. He'd done it mainly so he'd stop complaining to Sorun, and Sorun had figured that once he fought a single robot and realized he was outmatched, Sorun would just take a second to open a portal back home, shove Virgil through, and carry on with the rest of the mission. A little reality check that would finally get the Chao off his back.

Under no circumstances did he expect to see Virgil fly directly towards one of the Egg Paws while pointing his bladed arms out to the side, and then start spinning around like a demented little spinning top. Sorun expected even less for Virgil to cut right through the Badnik's head.

"... Whoa." Sorun found himself blinking in surprise. The robot fell forwards at the loss of its head, with Virgil floating still in the air right behind it. The remaining Egg Pawns were looking back and forth between Sorun and the Chao, acting like they were confused on which one they should be targeting. Virgil hadn't even given them the time to deliberate on that, as he immediately got to work flying to the other robots and spinning through them. Sorun watched the sight for a bit, and then got bored enough to look down at his sleeves.

"Man, this coat is really comfy. You outdid yourself with this one, Honey." He flicked his eyes back up to Virgil, who'd already dispatched half of the Badniks surrounding them, and let out a quiet scoff. "Why wasn't I taking him out on missions sooner? Goddamn.

He's like a little monster that can fit in my pocket. A... pocket monster of sorts." He blinked. "Oh, that's where that comes from..."

He hadn't even finished thinking his own thoughts before the last Badnik had fallen. Virgil floated victoriously among the mechanical bodies, staring towards Sorun with half-lidded, bored eyes and a lazy frown. Sorun gave him an approving scoff.

"Alright, fine. You proved me wrong. Nice job." He gave the Chao a thumbs-up, which caused just the barest of satisfied smiles to form on Virgil's mouth. Sorun couldn't help but roll his eyes as he rolled up the sleeve on his left arm to reveal the small watch-like device strapped to his wrist. He clicked his tongue as his right hand began to fiddle with the small dials on the device's face. "Man, this thing itches like crazy... Hey, you comin' in?" Sorun asked into the device as he took a glance around at the empty clearing. "Yeah, we should be all good..."

---

4 hours prior

There was something wrong with the humans that resided in Station Square.

Not something wrong in the sense that they were sick, or that there was something off with them mentally speaking. Sorun saw a few. Didn't talk to them personally, but hung around as they talked with Sally and the rest of the Freedom Fighters so they could organize things. They'd asked about him , though. Why a human was working with the Freedom Fighters, and where that human got powers from. Sorun had made a request to the others not to divulge these things, as he didn't really want the attention. He was too focused on these humans.

He thought he'd feel something when he first saw them. That he'd feel some insane rush of nostalgia, or that he'd just feel... something . Some relief, something to tell him that even though they weren't technically his kind, they were still humans and he was somewhat among his people here. That he'd feel a sense of being at home.

But there was something wrong with their faces.

Sorun couldn't place it. He just couldn't place it. Their proportions were right. Heights were... average for human heights. Which meant they were all taller than him. Which also caused some snickering from the Freedom Fighters behind his back that he pretended not to notice but in actuality really did notice and was sent fuming from it. Skin tones varied from light tones to tan tones to dark tones. Hairs wildly varied but were mainly just browns, blacks, and blondes, a few reds here and there. Eyes were also the normal range of colors. All that was good. They were human. They acted and sounded like humans.

But their faces were... off. Off in a way Sorun couldn't very well describe. It was like some proportions of their features, their jaws and cheekbones and noses, were either wildly pronounced or the exact opposite randomly on everyone. Not to a grotesque degree, but it wasn't normal, either. Hell, it was only to a point on some people that it was barely noticeable. But Sorun noticed it.

Currently he was sitting on a box inside of a building. A police station that was fortified into a kind of miniature command center for the human resistance here. He looked to his right at a window, where he could barely make out his own reflection in the glass. His face was normal. Pale, thin, symmetrical. Angular features. Eyes that were- Christ, were they always that sunken in?

"Fuck, that can't be healthy..."

Aside from the eyes, his face was normal. Good-looking if he said so himself. But then he'd look away at one of the humans sitting nearby, and Sorun would find himself almost recoiling when he saw their face. Not because they were hideous, they weren't, but because there was just something inherently different with their faces that didn't give Sorun the impression they were human despite the fact that they were human.

And that was the crux of the issue. He didn't feel a goddamn thing standing around them. They felt as much as total strangers as Mobians did. They were humans, but not his humans. Not Earthlings.

A heavy sigh left him as he looked down at the katana resting in his lap. He idly began playing with the dark blue ribbon tied around the scabbard as he thought back to recent events.

The humans here had given the Freedom Fighters an overwhelmingly positive warm welcome. Sorun had just thought it was because they were here to help free the place, but he'd been corrected and informed that Mobians were well accepted here. They'd been lead to this police station after supplies from the ship had been unloaded, and Sally had been in talks with some of the higher ups in charge here while everybody else waited around for orders. She'd come back, and after that the time to get to work to freeing the city had started. And during that time Sorun had gotten his answer as to what kind of resistance the humans here had been putting up to Eggman's Badniks.

Short answer: they couldn't do shit.

Long answer: the humans of Station Square weren't exactly equipped to handle a situation like this. Most of it stemmed from the fact that Station Square was an isolated, self-sustaining community that until relatively recently had been completely secluded from the rest of world. By all appearances before Eggman rolled in the city had been a pretty great place to live in, too, so it wasn't overly militant by any stretch of the word. So the police force was just that: a police force that at best just had sidearms using standard ballistic ammunition to arm their officers. And since they were so self-contained, their military force was less a military force and more an advanced SWAT group with higher-grade equipment and that numbered about the same as the police force.

So what did that give the humans of Station Square in terms of weapons to fight the Badniks? Not much. Sidearms and small-arms conventional rifles that did about zilch in terms of damage to even the weakest of Badniks. A few explosive weapons to be sparingly used. Some vehicles like armored APCs that were used more to move civilians around than anything else. That was about it.

Essentially the Freedom Fighters were the only chance these people had.

Fucking great.

Now, did that mean that liberating this city from the Badnik occupation would mean copious amounts of fighting on the Freedom Fighters' part? To go feet-first into the battlefield, fighting hordes of robots to retake the city one piece at a time? To put their lives on the line in such a dangerous task that it would require utmost focus and utilization of all their skills on their part?

Well, yes, but Sorun didn't get to partake in any of that. And that was part of what was vexing him so much at the moment.

See, what the humans here lacked in strength, they made up for in other ways. Specifically speaking, since they'd been under the robot occupation for so long, they knew a thing or two. They may have been trash fighters, but they were more than capable scouts. Enemy encampments, oil and power supply depots to fuel the robots forces, weapon caches, and pretty much every single location of interest that needed to be taken out in order to gain back control of the city was all neatly marked down on a map, right down to the exact coordinate. The problem wasn't locating them. The problem was getting there and effectively dismantling those locations while under heat from the numerous robot forces scattered about.

Fortunately the Yamato and its ability to create portals circumvented all of that.

The stupidly simple formula was thus: open a portal to an important location. Have a group of Freedom Fighters or Sonic or Knuckles and his team go through and clean house, all made easier from a sudden and unexpected appearance. Send a second group to another location to divide the Badnik forces. Have their own attacking forces come back to base after successfully dismantling their target and rotate them out for other teams of Freedom Fighters, and then have the returning group rest by delivering the supplies they'd brought to civilian camps located throughout the city in safe locations. Which, again, were made trivial due to Sorun and his portals. Rinse and repeat until they were done.

It was a plan thought up by Sally, who'd been the one to designate the teams and decide the rotation and locations they'd attack, as well as the one allocating all the supplies to the civilians at the advisement of the humans working with them. Had this plan been effective thus far?

Well, seeing as they'd already taken more than a quarter of the city back with zero casualties Sorun would say so.

That was the bright side to all of this. The liberation of Station Square was going swimmingly well. So well, in fact, that for a people that had been oppressed by a mad tyrant for months, spirits were pretty high. And above all it looked like they were all going to win this and go home safe and sound. The downside was that Sorun was relegated to portal duty and he was bored to tears.

Sighing, he slid himself off of the crate he'd been sitting on and, seeing nothing better to do, went and approached a pair of humans donned in police uniforms he'd seen talking down the way. Two average-looking men, one of them bald. Nothing special about them at all except for the fact they were people. Humans. And Sorun should have felt something when he saw them.

But when he approached them and they both looked down at him, he felt nothing. Nothing but irritation at their height and how he had to look up at him. He'd almost forgotten this feeling, what with living with animal people his height for so long.

"Er, hey... guys," Sorun awkwardly greeted the two officers. "How's the, uh, how's it- how's it going?"

They both blinked down at him, almost liked they were confused why a short teenager like him was standing in the middle of a police station converted into a command center in the middle of a battle. But then he saw their eyes drift towards the katana he was holding in his left hand, and a light of recognition flashed in their eyes.

"Oh, hey! You're the guy that came in with the Mobians everybody's been talking about!" one of the officers, the bald one, exclaimed.

"Yeah, that's... that's me," Sorun said with a nod. "You holding up okay?"

The second officer was the one to respond. "Yeah, we're doing good. Your, uh... people have really been helping out. That and the freaky, er, portal stuff you can do. No offense."

"Slightly taken." The two officers stiffened up at that. "You guys need anything?"

They relaxed a bit. "No, we're good," the first officer said, "but thanks anyways. If you don't mind us asking, though, why... why's someone so young like you running around with them?"

More irritation spiked in Sorun that he suppressed. "... I'm about as old as the rest of the Freedom Fighters." He was older than some, even. Tails was only eleven. And Amy... well, with how she'd artificially aged her body, he wasn't so sure how to classify her age.

"Fair point." The two officers flicked their eyes at each other, and then back to Sorun. "Don't, um, is your parents okay with you doing this?"

Sorun decided he didn't like talking with these two. "Listen, I got things to go do. But feel free to call for me if some robots come and attack the place again. Wouldn't want the station to wind up like a scene right out of 'Terminator'."

"Out of what?"

When he saw the confused looks in both of the officers' eyes, it caused a sense of frustration and sadness to build up in Sorun. He said nothing in response, instead waving the two off as he walked away.

Walking through the halls and rooms of the precinct hadn't been all that illuminating. Mostly he just saw other humans around, talking about current events or planning and preparing for an excursion out into the field or some such thing. He did note that he caught the eyes of a few, and he had to wonder if this height thing of his really was working against him. Did they think he was younger than he actually was? Was that it? He supposed he couldn't be all that surprised that they thought this, he had similar problems back on Earth often, but he still couldn't help but feel more than a bit insulted over it. He never had this problem in Knothole.

It was this in conjunction to the fact that there was just inherently something wrong with the way humans here looked that made Sorun not want to talk to any of them. So he distanced himself with them and tried to keep to himself as he made his way to the vehicle depot, which was where the Freedom Fighters had been holding up for the time being while not somewhere out there and where Sorun was sending them off in portals. He just wanted to go there and stay there until it was time to leave.

Of course he had to run into Sally as he crossed a corner on his way there.

"Oh! Sorry, I was- oh, Sorun!" Sally's demeanor relaxed at the sight of him, and she immediately went to straightening her vest out. "I've been looking for you."

"Ah, lemme guess." With a blank look Sorun held Yamato up and shook it. "More portals?"

"More portals," she confirmed with a nod. "Come on, we'll go to the depot."

Wordlessly, Sorun began following Sally as she lead him to the back of the station, where the vehicle depot was. Along the way Sorun continued to cast glances at any humans they passed, and, when they'd passed the section of the police station where the jail cells were present, he had to do a double take. The jail cells had been converted to makeshift shelters for any civilians they managed to hide away here, and among the human civilians he saw there, Sorun noticed that there were a few Mobians, too. Not any Freedom Fighters he knew, but normal, civilian-looking Mobians. Some dogs, cats, a bird he was pretty sure he saw.

Curious.

"Why are there Mobians here?" Sorun asked Sally as they continued walking side-by-side. "Thought this was a city of humans."

Sally took a look over to where Sorun was looking. "Station Square is a lot more accommodating to Mobians as opposed to any of the Overlander cities over in their territory. In fact Overlanders... actually don't accept Mobians living with them at all," she said, voice slightly quiet. "But Station Square does," she continued in her normal voice, turning to Sorun. "A lot of Mobians looking to make a life outside of Knothole or a village somewhere came here for work, and due to our past presence, the city generally welcomes them with open arms. But that was before the occupation."

"Right." Well, that was nice of them. The humans. He frowned at the thought. "Do I look different than them to you?" he asked her.

She looked confused at the question. "What do you mean?"

"I mean I... I don't know, I thought I'd probably feel at home when I got here, that it'd be like living back home, but I keep looking around at all these people and they're not..." He hesitated when he struggled to find the right words. "They just don't feel like how people back on Earth feel like," he decided. "I don't know. I think it's how they look."

"How they look?" Sally repeated.

"Yeah, they're... I, I don't know. There's just something different with their faces, I guess. I mean they're humans from a whole alternate dimension, so... so I guess it would make sense they wouldn't look exactly like Earthlings. Maybe it's the weird colors here. Or the lighting." He gave a half shrug. "What do you think? Do I look any different from them to you?"

She hummed, her blue eyes looking Sorun's form up and down, and then ending on his face. She stared for a bit, and then a small smirk crossed her features. "Well, you do seem awfully short compared-"

"Knock it off with the short thing, I'm serious," Sorun bit out. "I swear, I get cursed with short genes and you people never let me hear the end of it. It wasn't a problem until we came here since I'm as tall as you all are!"

"I'm joking, Sorun, calm down." Sally waved him down with that same mirthful grin still on her face, though there was still a contemplative look in her eyes. "Well, Sorun, you... well, you've always seemed a bit different than any of the humans I've ever met here."

That hadn't been the answer he'd been expecting. He didn't know how he was supposed to perceive that. "Different... how?" he asked her.

Sally shrugged. "Just something about you."

Well, that told him absolutely nothing. "Could you be more specific, please?"

He stopped walking when Sally stopped walking. She leaned a bit closer to him, eyes narrowed as she scrutinized his features closely. Finally she backed off and turned back around. "I can't really say for certain. You're... just you."

"I'm... me?" he repeated, voice unsure. "Of course I'm me, Sally, but what does- what does that even mean?"

"I don't know, Sorun. You asked and that was the best I had." She continued walking, with Sorun staring at her back for a bit before sighing and following closely behind her. "You're just a bit different. That's all. Everybody is, and the things that make them so different from everybody is what makes them unique. That's the beautiful thing about life."

Sorun found himself blowing a lock of hair out from his face, an unsatisfied feeling settling within him. That was the Mobian outlook on the matter. The completely unbiased and open-minded mentality they all possessed that made them look past the surface of those around them. A mentality born from living among so many different species of Mobian. Appearances just didn't matter that much to them. It was a factor, but to them, not a very important one. Something he was honestly a bit thankful for, as it made living among them that much easier, but in this instance he wasn't finding himself being too appreciative of the mindset and the vague answers it was making Sally say.

"I am from a whole different universe," Sorun eventually reasoned. "I imagine that probably contributes something."

"Maybe," Sally agreed, stopping when they came to a door. "Here we are."

The door was swiftly opened, the two walking right through into the large room on the other side. There wasn't much to say about the vehicle depot; it was little more than a giant garage that was currently stacked with boxes of various supplies. Off in the distance, towards the middle of the garage, Sorun could see a Mobian with a red shell carrying a large wooden crate twice as tall as he was with a single hand. Sally had whistled to gain his attention, causing Mighty to turn towards them and wave with his free hand.

"Hey guys!" Mighty greeted, still hefting the giant crate over his head even as the other two stopped in front of him. "Everything going well?"

"It's going great, Mighty," Sally said. "Are those the supplies for the camp set up in the school they were asking for?"

"Yep." Mighty turned his head to Sorun. "Uh, hey, you mind-?"

"School again, got it." Two slices later and a portal was made hovering in the air between them. Mighty nodded his thanks to Sorun, and then quickly made his way through the portal with his crate still in hand.

Sorun watched the armadillo disappear through the portal with a sigh, and as he closed it with Yamato he turned towards Sally. "You know, I can do more than just open portals," he said.

"Yes, I'm aware, but it's because you're opening these portals for us that the attack is going about as well as it possibly could." She turned towards Sorun, single hip on hand with a small smile on her face as she looked at him. "You're doing a very important job nobody else can do."

"Yeah, I get that, but I could be-"

"Everybody else is handling it, Sorun." When she saw that he didn't look too satisfied, her smile softened a bit and she stepped closer to him. " If , and only if, something comes up, though, I'll turn to you, alright?" she amended, going as far as to place a hand on his shoulder. "Until then it would really help out if you could keep teleporting everybody everywhere so we could finish this as soon as possible."

Sorun made a low sigh. It was hard to argue with her point. His powers were essentially a linchpin in what was shaping to be a winning strategy, and if he was in her shoes he didn't know if he'd want to go and jeopardize that. It didn't change that he still wanted to go and do something besides open portals all day. Not when everybody else was out there fighting.

But, he trusted her judgement more than his own. And she just had to go and hook him with that promise that maybe she'd let him go do something out there. A promise that entailed an opportunity he doubted would present itself, but it was more than nothing. And he really didn't think she'd settle for much more than that.

"Alright, fine," he relented, brushing her hand off of his shoulder. "Was there something else that needed transporting while we're here?"

Sally put on a thinking face for a few seconds, after which her ears straightened up. "Oh, yeah. Knuckles called back a bit ago and said he was done with attacking..."

---

3 hours prior

As it turned out an opportunity did arise, so Sorun supposed some miracles did exist.

It wasn't really something that overly dire. One of the teams being sent out was Bunnie and Antoine, as they were working as a pair. And when they'd called in and said they were having a little bit of trouble taking out a large group of Badniks they'd been sent to take out, they'd, of course, radioed in for assistance. And Sorun, being the only one available at the time, volunteered to go.

Sally had been hesitant, of course. Very hesitant. It'd taken some convincing on Sorun's part and using the logic of it wasn't that dangerous a task for him, but she'd caved eventually and let him go. So Sorun, elated that he finally got to go out there and do something, had practically jumped through the portal to the couple's location once it had been given to him.

Except when he'd arrived it hadn't exactly been the intense battle he'd been expecting. In fact when he'd arrived to a small street corner, all around him were the destroyed remains of Badniks. Antoine was off to one end stabbing an Egg Pawn to death with his saber. And at the other end Bunnie was standing there, enveloped in a translucent, pink shield emanating from her artificial arm as she was weathering fire from... something. And when Sorun turned to look at that something he couldn't help but groan in irritation.

A new Egg Pawn. A blue one, in fact, with the same blue eyes and wide smile reminiscent of Eggman. In fact the only difference this one seemed to have over all the other Egg Pawns he'd seen was that this one was blue. And that instead of a lance in its right hand there was was looked like a gun firing yellow lasers at a shielded Bunnie.

"Jesus, they have guns now?" Sorun thought to himself as he grasped Yamato. "Well, whatever. Judgement Cut."

The robot that was assaulting Bunnie with laser fire was soon engulfed in a bubble of warped space. Uncountable blue, ethereal slashes rent it to bits, after which the bubble disappeared and the remains of the Badnik scattered across the ground. Bunnie had lowered the energy shield to look at the pile of destroyed robot in front of her with astonished eyes, while Antoine had pulled his sword out of the dead robot underneath him to do the same.

"You know... when you guys called for help, I figured there'd actually be something for me to do." They both turned behind them to spy Sorun, who was holding the sheathed Yamato over his shoulders with both hands grasping it. "Then I come here and there's just, like, a single dude. What's up with that?"

"Oh! Bonjour, Sorun!" After sheathing his own sword and letting it hang off his side, Antoine began to approach Sorun while waving towards him. Bunnie was not far behind. "Er, oui, pardon moi but ze Badneeks were beginning to become a handfilled, so I-"

"Antoine, Sugah, didja seriously call fer backup jus' 'cause ya panicked seein' me pinned down?" Bunnie had outstretched her real arm and grasped Antoine's shoulder to stop him, and then spun him around so they were looking at each other eye-to-eye.

Antoine gave her a sheepish grin. "Bunnie, ma cherie, I did not paneek. We 'ave been fighting here for so long zat I begin to grow weary, zo when I saw you fighting all on your own I... may 'ave called for assistance, oui."

"It was one robot. Ah could've-"

"Alright alright alright, settle it somewhere else you two." A portal had already been opened behind Sorun, who was gesturing towards it with his sword.

They looked ready to keep arguing between themselves, stopped when Sorun cleared his throat and pointed to the portal again. They fortunately quieted down, and then walked through the portal alongside Sorun.

"Okay, so it's a good thing you guys are here now. 'Cause I need a small favor," Sorun said upon the three of them exiting the portal into the police station. The teen quickly cut the portal behind him, and then turned to the two Mobians giving him their attention. "I lost track of Virgil a little bit ago. He got bored and wandered off somewhere, I dunno. Could one of you go and look for him, 'cause I got more portals to make."

It wasn't the biggest issue, and if it were any other time he would have used looking around for the Chao as an excuse to not get bored. But Sally was having him pull overtime with these portals, and he only had a few minutes left before he was scheduled to go and make some more. And while he wasn't exactly explicitly worried about Virgil wandering around on his own, well, it still made him a bit antsy not knowing where he was. In unknown territory. Which was ironic given this was a police station full of friendly officers now that he really thought about it.

"Your, er... Chao, was eet?" Antoine asked, looking the slightest bit nervous. "Are you being sure eet iz safe for moi?"

"... Yeah?" Sorun rose an eyebrow at the coyote. "Why wouldn't it be safe?"

"I see ze way your Chao acts around Sonic," Antoine answered. "He iz not ze most friendliest of Chao."

"No, that's just Sonic, he doesn't like him. He's not gonna attack you, Antoine. Promise." He turned the Mobian around by his shoulders and began to push at his back despite the slight protesting movements he made. "Just don't, you know, grab at him. He only lets me and Nicole do that. Just lead him back to me."

"And if he does not follow moi?"

"Entice him with some nuts or something, I dunno. We're in a police station. There's gotta be a... nut-laced donut or something lying around." He lightly pushed Antoine away and began waving him off. "Thanks man I owe you seriously don't grab him!"

He waved the coyote off as he began walking down the rows of police desks they'd teleported near. Antoine turned back towards Sorun, slightly hesitant look on his face, though he still waved back at Sorun after the Earthling gave him an encouraging nod.

"Are ya 'sho yer little critter ain't gonna hurt Antoine?" Bunnie, who still stood besides Sorun, asked. When he turned to look at her he saw that the rabbit looked slightly concerned. "Ah've seen 'im around, and li'l Virgil can be a might bit... vicious, Sorun."

Sorun shook his head. "Nah, Antoine's actually one of the people Virgil likes. He won't bite."

That made her relax a bit, though she didn't look completely convinced. "An'... what about the way he acts 'round Sonic?"

"Oh, yeah, he tries to cut him all the time. It's really funny." He let out a single chuckle, though it was cut off halfway when he saw the disturbed look Bunnie was giving him. "What? It's not like he could actually hurt him. He's got that weird billion ring durability thing on him. Virgil can't even scratch him."

"And if he didn't have that?"

"Considering I saw Virgil cut through solid titanium earlier? Eh, probably best not to think about it." Sorun placed his free hand inside of his pocket, left still gripping his sword. "But yeah, nah, Antoine'll be fine. Don't worry about him."

It was a bit strange, but Virgil had an internal list of people he preferred. At the top, of course, was Sorun himself and, oddly, Nicole. Sorun was the only person the Chao let pick up and handle, and usually tried to stay near him and would be relaxed around. For some reason he gave Nicole the exact same privileges as he gave Sorun, which was doubly odd as he didn't do that with anybody else, and even odder he sometimes saw the Chao actually smile near Nicole whenever he let them close to one another. He didn't even do that with Sorun.

Below them were Sonic's parents, Antoine, Bunnie, Amy, and Sally. Sonic's parents, Sorun imagined, because they cared for the Chao whenever Sorun was out on a mission and couldn't do it himself. The other four, he wasn't too sure of. All he knew was that Virgil tolerated them enough that he'd freely hang around them when possible and would let them have very liberal amounts of physical contact with him, usually in the form of rubbing and petting. The Chao silently fumed every time though, something he rarely did with Sorun and never did with Nicole.

Shadow was unique in that Virgil seemed to act respectful towards him. It was in the way he would go a bit straighter and keep a wary eye on the dark hedgehog whenever they were near. Sorun wasn't really sure what the Chao saw in him. Shadow had added his two cents in as "the Chao knowing the pecking order of things and showing respect to those due respect". Maybe he was right. It could have also been the fact that Sorun caught Shadow sneaking the Chao an apple once when he thought no one was looking, which were Virgil's favorite food.

With the exception of Sonic, everybody else Virgil just generally ignored. He'd cast them dismissive looks here and there, sometimes let out breathy scoffs, but otherwise he was well-behaved. Cold, but behaved. He'd sometimes glare at Tails, though, when the fox wasn't looking.

Sonic he outright attacked at every available opportunity, which Sorun found hilarious.

Why the Chao acted this way? Sorun didn't have a clue. Maybe a lot more of himself had imprinted onto the Chao than he first realized, which, if that was the case, did go to explain a bit. Though, truly, Sorun didn't know for certain. And really he didn't care all that much to look too deep into it.

Turning his focus away from the Chao, Sorun turned his eyes back to Bunnie. "So what was up with you two back there, anyways?" he asked her.

"Oh, don't you worry none about it, Sorun," Bunnie said to him as she brushed her hand through her hair and readjusted her hat. "Sugah-Twan means well. A bit too well. He gets worried about me all the time, frettin' ovah every li'l thing. Ah love him tah death, but ah swear he can be downright suffocatin'."

"Ahhh, it's one of those things. Well in that case I got nothing for you."

The rabbit sent him a flat look. "Gee. Thanks."

"What do you want me to say? If you can't tell him that his fiancé is a cyborg capable of defending herself, probably more than he could, then I'm not gonna be able to do anything."

She exhaled and rolled her eyes in response to Sorun. After a moment, though, a thoughtful look came to her, but then she shook her head and gave Sorun a skeptical look. "Ya think ah should go an' tell him ah'm more capable of lookin' after me than he is?"

"... No, don't say that. He wouldn't like that," Sorun denied with a shake of his own head. "Bunnie, guys don't like it when you say someone is stronger than them. They especially don't like it when you say someone's better at protecting something they love because that someone is stronger than them, and for you, that'd be a double whammy. Really hurts the ol' pride center."

Bunnie snorted at that and crossed her arms. "Ah already figured me sayin' that to mah Antoine wouldn't do no good. Plus seein' him flounder all ovah me has its cute moments," she said, making Sorun tiredly breath out. "I didn't take ya fer the prideful type, though," she added.

"Mm, I try not to be. Some people just bring the worst of me out, though." Sorun turned from the cyborg and began walking away. "Alright, I gotta go make more portals. Good luck with literally everything going on around us."

"Alright, then. Stay safe," Bunnie called behind him. Sorun lifted up a hand and gave her a two-fingered salute from behind his back, and then kept moving forwards.

"'Prideful type'. Pfft. Everybody is at some level. Some people just let it go easier than others," Sorun thought to himself as he crossed an open doorway. "I usually like to think I'm in the audience of people that don't really care about stuff like that. But I guess I'd be wrong there, Bunnie. Because some people just go and make that really, really hard for me..."

2 hours prior

Silently, Sorun willed his Bringer Claws to set down the giant crate of supplies he'd been carrying. A crate that was so big that he was confident he wasn't strong enough to lift it on his own, but that's what he had the Bringer Claws for. And why whenever he had to lift something that looked even remotely heavy, he deferred to them.

Right now things were going a bit slow and they'd needed an extra pair of hands to get things moved around, so Sorun, with little else to do, had volunteered. He wasn't so sure he would have done such a thing if he knew beforehand how mind-numbing the task of moving boxes around was, but he was already in it, so there wasn't much to do there. That lead him to here: moving boxes out of a portal to the basement of one of the buildings the human resistance were using to house civilians amidst all the fighting.

And that would have been the end of it, too, if Sorun hadn't heard a pair of voices begin to be heard coming down the stairs that lead into the room he was in right now. Worse still, Sorun recognized those voices. And so, while silently cursing to himself, Sorun did the most reasonable thing he could think of in order to avoid contact with the owners of the two voices he was hearing right now: he hid behind the crate he'd just set down. And just in time, too, as he heard the voices and their owners make it to the bottom of the stairs and into the basement just as he hid.

"- I'm tellin' ya, Tails, it's going smoothly. I wouldn't be surprised if we made it back home in time for dinner." That was Sonic's voice, who sounded like he was walking besides Tails as they both entered the room. "We're takin' back whole pieces of the city by the minute , and with how few of Egghead's bots are runnin' around, it's practically a cinch. You don't have anything to worry about."

"Yeah. I guess," came the voice of the young fox. "I'm just worried it's one of those things where it's too good to be true, you know?"

"Trust me bud, I feel ya, but I really think we just caught a break this time." There was a small creaking sound as Sonic sat on something wooden. "Sally's managing us around, and since there's so many of us the bots can't even keep up. I haven't even broken a sweat since we got here it's been so easy."

"I think a lot of it is because of Sorun," Tails said. "You now, with his portals."

"Oh, yeah, for sure. This thing's going a million times faster 'cause of him." There was a pause. "He's real cool."

"Cool? Me?" Sorun felt himself furrowing his brows in confusion. "He still thinks that after all this time? How?"

In a statement that just furthered Sorun's confusion, Tails added, "Yeah, it's really great how much he's been helping out with his portals. I really wish he'd come to me for help when he was trying to figure those out, the concept behind them sounds really interesting."

"If by interesting you mean boring, then yeah, sure. Still can't figure out how he wrapped his head around all that science stuff," he heard Sonic mutter. "But," he continued in a cheery voice, "it's not even just that. It's all the other stuff he does whenever we're fighting robots together, you know? He's got this... style."

"Style?" Tails repeated, in confusion that didn't even come close to matching Sorun's.

"Yeah, style," Sonic confirmed. "He's all quiet and calm and collected, but not in the boring brooding way Shadow does it. His is... it's just cool, you know? The way he's all showy with his sword, and his- oh, oh! And he's got this one really cool move he showed me!" A light laugh left Sonic. "Oh man, Tails, you have to get him to show it to you sometime. It's way past cool. He does this thing were he pulls the sword out and back in really fast, and there's this really weird whooshing sound like hhhmmvvvshzzz and the Badnik he's aiming at just gets sliced to pieces out of nowhere! Even gave it a cool name, too. Calls it Judgement Cut. Ha-hah! It's the best!" A drawn-out, mirth-filled sigh was heard leaving him. "He's just really cool, you know? A lot of what he does reminds me of some kinda comic hero, but he manages to pull it off with that weird style of his.

"But honestly, Tails, I got a ton of respect for the guy. It's all the little things he does, you know? He never talks like he cares all that much, but he acts like he does. It's that and the way he's always improving himself, getting more powers and getting those stronger like with the portals... he's just so cool."

"..." Sorun himself, still eavesdropping on the entire conversation, couldn't even so much as formulate any thoughts on Sonic's words. He was so baffled by how highly the hedgehog was speaking of him, something he never anticipated, that he didn't even know what he was supposed to take away from it. He couldn't even begin to describe the pleasant sensation he was feeling in himself.

"Wow, Sonic." That was Tails' voice, which sounded a bit quieter than usual. "I didn't know you thought so much of him."

"Well, yeah. Of course I do." There was a small sigh from Sonic. "The guy could stand to be a bit more open with everybody and drop the cool guy act so he doesn't act like a weirdo all the time, but yeah."

There was a disagreeing hum from Tails. "He isn't that bad. He helps me out fixing the plane sometimes when he doesn't have anything else to do."

"... He does?" Sonic asked, sounding genuinely surprised. "With what?"

"Well, those arms of his can reach really far and lift heavy things, so it makes handling the plane's parts really easy."

There was something akin to a confused groan from Sonic. "See, this is what I mean. He never acts the same way he talks. He's always gotta be confusing like that."

A small sound, like something being lifted up, was heard before Tails began speaking again. "Who knows, Sonic? Sorun's always been weird like that. Maybe he does it just to mess with you."

"Hah, yeah, at this point I wouldn't even be surprised." There was a small tap sound as Sonic's feet hit the ground. "Alright," he said, pausing to pick something up from the sound of it, "let's get this stuff upstairs to all those people, alright?"

"Mh-hm!"

Sorun continued to sit motionless against the crate as he listened to the two Mobians depart back up the stairs. He waited until he'd heard their footsteps fade so much that he couldn't hear them anymore, and after that he didn't even bother looking past the crate to ensure that they were gone. He just quickly held his katana up, formed a portal as silently as possible, and tiptoed right through it to the other side, back to the police station. He dismissed the portal in nearly the same breath he'd summoned it in the first place, heaving a deep breath afterwards.

"Honestly... I really don't understand that guy."

---

1 hour prior

"You swapped out bees for a scorpion? Well, that ain't gonna help you here."

Sorun never imagined that the final charge during the liberation of a whole city wasn't something that happened mere hours after the initial attack. But, that said, the decommissioning of the Badnik presence in Station Square had been going no less than stellar due to Sally's leading, Sorun's portals, and the efforts of everybody else involved. It certainly helped that they had Sonic, Knuckles, and Mighty there, who had all pretty much torn through whatever target they'd been pointed at, as well as everybody else backing them up.

All in all? It'd been a very short, decisive battle so far that was going so well Sorun hardly believed it. And so, with little surprise, the time for the final push had come where everyone had gone out to attack specific targets to finally free the city. That even included Sorun, who Sally had let off the metaphorical leash to go and attack something due to his portals no longer being needed in this final phase. She'd even been nice enough to save him a satisfying target. A telecommunications tower near the center of the city that had been used to keep in contact with Eggman over in New Megaopolis. Sorun had been more than happy to go. He'd been less happy that Virgil kept bugging him to take him with, but in the end he'd relented and brought the Chao along.

Well, as it happened, Sorun's least favorite lackey in all of existence just happened to be there. Whether he was there to oversee the city and it was sheer coincidence he was present during their attack or he was there because of the attack was unclear to Sorun, and he hadn't cared enough to ponder on it. He really only cared about destroying the small tower located in the center of a city plaza, the surrounding Egg Pawns, and then beat Snively into unconsciousness. Because he really didn't like that guy.

Right now he'd Tricked onto the top of a nearby rundown bus, with Virgil hovering just over his left side. On the other side was what was once a telecommunications tower that had been about twenty meters in height and functioning before a Judgement Cut had torn it asunder. The same was said for the surrounding Badniks that had been protecting it.

And then there was the thing in front of him that Snively was riding around in. Another mech. A mech that was styled after a giant black scorpion, with Snively riding in a open cockpit inside the mech's head. Sorun recalled having burst out in short laughter when he saw it due to the sheer ridiculousness of how it looked, though he'd quickly regained his composure for the task at hand. Even then, though, he couldn't resist mocking the short Overlander piloting the thing.

"I think you'll find this Egg Scorpion is more than sufficient for the likes of you ." A button somewhere on the console in front of Snively was pressed. The tail of the scorpion mech, the end of which was the barrel of some sort of weapon with a large blade bolted at the bottom of it, began to glow an intense yellow as light particles began to gather around its opening. Sorun, eyes half-lidded in boredom, yawned and reached to the side to lightly shove Virgil away, nodding his head over at the mech's left side. The Chao nodded to him, and then began to fly away as Sorun continued standing in place while staring right at the charging tail.

Right when the end of the tail brightened up, Sorun Tricked away somewhere. Not even a moment later a blinding yellow beam of energy streamed out of the end of the tail. The laser passed by where Sorun had been standing, melting the top of the bus under it, and then slammed into a nearby building that had just happened to be behind Sorun. A large, gaping hole was created in the building as a result of contact from the laser, and Sorun, who had Tricked a few meters away to watch the display, shook his head in disappointment at Snively.

"Look at that. You blew up some poor guy's building. I'm actually gonna feel really bad if someone lived there." Sorun clicked his tongue in disappointment. "Anyways, Snively, it's slappin' time." He twirled Yamato in his hand and rested it on his right shoulder. "Every word you say, I'm gonna slap you. So you either run now or, well, eh..."

"So you're to thrash me, is that it?" Snively asked, drumming his fingers along the mech's control console. A mocking grin spread along his face. "The same way Dr. Robotnik thrashed you around, perhaps?"

Sorun bristled at that, taking in a sharp inhale as he thrust Yamato out to his side with enough force that the sheath came flying off and clattered off the ground far away from him. "Oh baby. That's seventeen slaps."

He Tricked away again, causing Snively's eyes to go wide as he searched around the area looking for him. A short whistle drew his attention behind him, where he saw Sorun standing right on the back of the Egg Scorpion just behind the cockpit Snively sat in. Sorun was looking down at the scientist, mouth set in a neutral frown and eyes baleful as he glared at him.

"Hey, Snively, since I got ya already, mind answering something for me?" Sorun requested. "Do all Overlanders look weird like you, or are you just a special case of bein' this ugly li'l gremlin dude? 'Cause I'm doing a bit of a case study here, and seeing the humans in Station Square is raising some serious questions for me-"

"Perish, fool!"

"Nineteen!" Hearing the scorpion tail behind him shift, Sorun tilted his head straight upwards. He saw the laser tail with its bladed end hovering right over him, and right when it made the move to thrust downwards, Sorun Tricked. As a result, the bladed tail pierced right into the back of the mech.

Sorun had reappeared on the right side of the scorpion, right next to its large, clamp-like claw. From the other side he saw Virgil floating next to the other claw, and then gave the Chao a nod. While Snively feverishly tapped at the mech's controls to try and dislodge the tail stuck into its own back, Virgil began spinning while Sorun gripped both hands around Yamato's handle and prepared a swing. Virgil then flew forwards, his spinning form and bladed arms cutting right through the thin joint that connected the clamp-like claw to the rest of the mech's body. At the same time Sorun had made a single downward slash that separated the claw on his side from the mech. Both claws were heard simultaneously hitting the ground, at which point Sorun slashed outwards to cut away the eight mechanical legs on his side.

The damage done, the Egg Scorpion listed off to the side with the loss of half of its legs. Sorun then Tricked up into the air, his body held aloft by his newly-formed Bringer Claws as he made a third slash, this one severing the scorpion's tail in half in a shower of sparks.

"You ready to get slapped!?" The second the final word left Sorun he Tricked right in front of the cockpit on the scorpion's head, his right Bringer Claw reaching out and clamping around Snively's head before he could make a move to go anywhere. The long-nosed Overlander looked up at Sorun with fearful eyes, his entire body shaking and teeth chattering from fright, while Sorun just continued to calmly stare with an almost contemplative look. "Ah, you know what? We'll just call it at twenty. Nice even, round number."

When he stopped speaking, the Bringer Claw holding Snively's head slammed him face-first into the mech's control console hard enough that sparking sounds were heard. The spectral claw holding him in place, Sorun rose his right leg up and stomped down on the back of head twice, eliciting a muffled cry of pain each time. The blue hand lifted Snively face's back up, where Sorun's left Bringer Claw punched him in the stomach five times, and then in the face five times. After that, Sorun willed the hand to lift Snively up to his level just so that he could slap Snively across the face with his real hand five times. The claw then slammed Snively's face back down into console, where Sorun proceeded to stare down at him, let out a calming breath, and then quickly stomp the back of his head one more time.

Finished with his assault Sorun finally dispelled his Bringer Claws and watched as Snively's body went limp face-down against the console. Sorun blinked at the sight, and then crouched down in front of him. The catharsis he felt from the beatdown was quickly beginning to wear off.

"Uh, Snively? Snively...?" Humming, Sorun grabbed Snively by the individual hairs vertically aligning his scalp and lifted his head up. "I didn't accidentally kill ya, did I?"

The state of Snively's face when Sorun finally saw it wasn't a pretty sight, though it was one that made Sorun somewhat happy to see. Both of his eyes were blackened and swelled halfway shut, there were multiple bleeding welts along his face, and his bleeding nose was bent at a crooked angle. He did see him breathing, though, and he even heard a low pained moan leave the small man's mouth. Satisfied, Sorun released his grip on the hairs and let his body flop back on the console.

"If Eggman didn't have a whole fleet pointed at Knothole, I swear... Although..." Sorun's thoughts mused as the teen looked up in thought. "I wonder if I could teleport to the police station real quick and steal a gun from the armory. Freedom Fighters don't use guns, and I sure don't. Eggman would just assume one of the humans here did it if he found his nephew riddled with bullet holes and not sword holes, right? Knothole'd be in the clear."

It was an idea that the teen was seriously considering going through with, and even more found himself wanting to go through with it. Unfortunately, during his silent contemplation Snively, beaten, battered, and apparently still conscious, slowly extended a quavering finger and hit one of the buttons on the control console.

Sorun's thoughts were cut off when the head below him began to shudder. He looked down at Snively, eyes widening when he saw his finger compressing a button and then widening further when he saw the head of the scorpion mech begin to detach from the main body. He Tricked a short distance away on the ground, and watched as panels built into the head of the scorpion began to open up. Jets of fire burst out of the opened panels, propelling the head upwards and lifting it up into the sky. The jets built into the head increased in intensity, and all Sorun could do was watch with a blank expression as the robot head carrying Snively lifted off into the sky far enough that it disappeared from sight.

"... Well, that's tough." Sorun sighed, and then looked back down. He saw that Virgil had floated right next to him, and absentmindedly began to stroke him between his silver crest with one finger as he brought his other hand up to his mouth. "Hey, I'm all done over here," Sorun spoke into the device strapped onto the hand's wrist, his eyes looking towards the destroyed communication tower.

"Sorun?" Sally's voice sounded out from the wrist communicator's speakers. "You're done dismantling the telecommunication tower already? How did things go?"

"..." A loud rumbling sound interrupted Sorun from answering Sally. He turned towards the sound, and then blinked when he saw the building shot by Snively's laser from earlier collapse in on itself entirely. Both Sorun and Virgil glanced at each other, followed by Sorun raising his wrist back to his mouth and saying, "Yeah, it went pretty okay."

---

10 minutes prior

And just like that, they saved the city.

It was amazing how fast the general mood changed once the last Badnik had been dismantled and the city officially declared free. The streets had practically flooded with more humans who had been hunkering down and waiting for all the fighting to die down. Spirits were high as practically everybody was out celebrating.

For Sorun, it was a strange feeling. He'd honestly expected it to be much harder than this, but no, they'd done it. He knew that some of the other Freedom Fighters felt the same way as him, but in the end he decided that after everything else that had happened, maybe it was best not to look a gift horse in the mouth. So he decided to just be happy for the people they'd just helped liberate.

Though, he had a hard time with that. Not because he wasn't happy he'd helped free a city from Eggman's tyranny, that was always great, but he couldn't help but feel that large disconnect from all the happy people around him. He felt about the same seeing them all rejoice in their newfound freedom as he felt whenever they saved some random Mobian village from a robot attack. He couldn't help but think that, if they were his people, Earthlings, he would have been overjoyed along with them. But, try as he might, and admittedly he didn't try all that hard, he didn't. Still glad for them, but that was about it.

So he tried not to interact with anybody as he made his way back to the FF Special. He failed in this endeavor when he was ambushed by, of all things, a news crew. A lady with a microphone and some guy holding a camera in Sorun's face. Not even an hour into a free city and the news was already up. From what little he gleaned some of the officers back at the station had pointed him out, and he'd been subsequently hunted down for a statement.

"You seriously don't have anything better to do with your time?" Sorun grumbled, tone irate as he tried to dodge the lady attempting to shove a microphone in his face. "I'm gonna break that damn thing if she gets any closer with it."

"We're just collecting statements from all the Freedom Fighters that helped free the city from Dr. Robotnik," the newswoman explained to him, which made Sorun slightly relax. "We've already collected statements from most of the other Freedom Fighters, so we were just hoping to get yours as well."

Sorun scoffed. "I guarantee you'll get something way more inspirational out of whatever Sonic or Sally said to you. I got nothin' else to add."

"Just a single statement," she insisted, the woman who was uncomfortably taller than Sorun shoving the microphone close enough to his mouth to make his eyes narrow. "And... perhaps you'd be willing to answer a few questions about how you came about working with-?"

"Nope." Sorun pushed the microphone away and shook his head. "One statement and I dip out, a'ight?"

She frowned, but then nodded towards him while still pointing the microphone at him. Sorun glanced towards the camera afterwards, staring into the black lens and sighing when he realized he didn't have anything on hand to actually say. He wracked his brain for anything he could use, and then straightened up a bit when an idea came to him.

Clearing his throat, Sorun turned so that he was fully facing the camera. He inhaled a breath, exhaled it and shook his head when he realized what he was about to say, and then stared right into the lens as he began tugging at his blue coat. "Buy Honey. Located in Knothole."

No doubt his statement caused confusion between the cameraman and newswoman, but he didn't stick around to see what looks their faces made. He'd quickly formed Yamato and made a portal behind him, hopped through, and then closed it behind him all in the same breath. He heard himself sigh in relief when the familiar interior of the FF Special met his eyes, and without another thought he began walking to the front of the ship.

"I can't believe I just did that. Honey owes me so much for shilling out for her," Sorun thought to himself as he made it to the ship's cockpit. He opened the door leading to it, and felt his eyes widen a bit in surprise when he saw a large, purple form sitting in one of the chairs. "Rotor? What're you doing here?"

The walrus, who for the most part seemed to have been fiddling with some of the control, stopped and looked over his shoulder. "Oh, hey Sorun," he greeted before turning back to the controls. "Nothing much. City's free and I didn't really feel like hanging around, so I decided to come back to run some last-minute checks and diagnostics on the ship before we head back. Tails radioed ahead and said he was coming by in a bit." He didn't look up even as Sorun stepped besides him, the teen's eyes affixed to the windshield. "Why are you here?"

The teen reached up to scratch the side of his neck. "Ah, you know, from what I heard the president himself wanted to speak to the Freedom Fighters personally and congratulate them on their service to the city and all that, but I didn't really wanna go."

"Mm, why not?"

"You know, as much as I've always wanted to get a medal from a president, I didn't want a medal from a president," Sorun answered. "Plus I'm not really one to bask in the limelight. That's more Sonic's thing. Or Sally's, I guess, since she's pretty much the public face for us."

"True."

"Also I, uh, I, I don't, I-I don't really handle crowds that well," Sorun sheepishly said after a few moments.

Rotor sagely nodded in agreement. "Yeah, I can understand that. Not everybody can handle public relations like Sally can," he said. "Kinda like Amy. I remember the day she had her ceremony when she officially became a Freedom Fighter. She looked really excited and happy, but you could tell from her eyes she was really nervous to be standing up there in front of all those people."

"Well, I guess that- wait what there's a ceremony? Amy got a ceremony? What the heck I only ever got a handshake from Sally what is this why am I only hearing about this now?"

"Oh, yeah, it was because she was getting a medal for services provided by her to the kingdom. Amy got it through her own merit because of a lot of good work she did. Well, her and her hammer," Rotor added in with a small chuckle. "But yeah, Sally used the ceremony as an opportunity to ask her to officially join us, and she said yes. Not really surprising seeing as she always wanted to be a Freedom Fighter."

"There's a medal, what...?"

"Yeah, the Acorn Medal of Valor."

"I didn't even know that was a thing. Feels like I shoulda gotten like ten of those by now."

Rotor chuckled when he heard that. "Well, things were pretty hectic back then when you first met us. Never had the time. Maybe sometime down the line Sally'll give you that ceremony. You've more than earned it."

"Damn right." Forget the president and whatever medal he probably wasn't even offering them, he wanted that medal. And a ceremony if that was really a thing. A ceremony sounded nice. And it'd be another thing to look back on before he died.

Sighing, Sorun leaned over the dashboard of the ship as he continued to stare out the front window. Rotor continued messing with the ship's controls, Sorun periodically flicking his eyes over to the walrus. After around a minute of this, he turned his head over to Rotor again.

"You ever hear back from Shadow?" he asked. "He and Rouge are still helping G.U.N. out, right?"

Rotor shook his head. "No, haven't heard a thing."

Sorun hummed. "You think they're alright?"

"Shadow? Alright? Don't see why not," Rotor said. "They're better equipped over there to handle Badniks than Station Square here is. And Shadow and Rouge can take care of themselves. They're fine."

"I guess." Sorun's hands began to tap against the dashboard. "Out of curiosity where is G.U.N. HQ located again?"

Rotor stopped tapping against the control panel. His eyes glanced towards Sorun who was looking at him, and the walrus narrowed his eyes a bit at him in question. "Why are you asking?"

"Just curious," Sorun repeated with a shrug. "I know Tails went and flew them out there, and that all the Overlander UF stuff is across the ocean in Europ- Eurish, I mean. Just wanted to know where."

"... Okay..." Eyes still locked onto Sorun, Rotor reached down and tapped a few buttons. A small black screen with a green grid-like pattern on it, sitting in the dashboard between the two, lit up. Sorun leaned in closer as a green rendering of the world map came into view, and then zoomed in on the eastern portion of the world, around what was once Europe and now Eurish. The map settled on large piece of land just barely disconnected from the rest of Eurish, where Rotor proceeded to tap at the screen with one of his claws. "G.U.N. HQ is located on a mountain called Guardian Mountain. It's near Spagonia and right next to Central City, which are both Overlander cities."

"Ah, that's where it is." Sorun nodded and then extended his left hand. "Thanks, Rotor. I'm gonna head over there," he said as Yamato manifested in his grasp.

"What? You're doing what!?" When the pale teen walked away from the console towards the center of the cockpit, Rotor spun around in his seat to continue addressing Sorun. He seemed rather distressed by Sorun's claim. "Sorun, come on, you just now got done taking back a whole city from Eggman!"

"I've spent the last five-ish hours opening portals. I'm fine."

"Sorun-!"

"Look, Rotor, it'll be fine." Stepping back towards Rotor, Sorun fumbled with his wrist communicator, removed it from his wrist, and held it out for the walrus to take. "This thing doesn't really suit me, so here. Early birthday present."

The purple Mobian stared down at the device sitting in the middle of his palm, a flat look on his face. "Wow, a gift that I made for you. You're the most thoughtful person I've ever met," he droned out as he looked back up at Sorun. "You're just giving me this so Sally can't call you and order you to come back."

"Ehhhh you can't prove that." A vertical slash was made in the air with Sorun's katana. "I'm just going over to check and make sure everything's alright." A horizontal slash. "If I'm quick enough she won't even know I'm gone. It'll be out little secret."

"No, if she asks I'm telling her you went over to G.U.N. HQ."

The portal opened up. "... That's fair," Sorun conceded. "Welp, I'm off. Seeya," Sorun said as he began stepping towards the portal.

Rotor stared after him, looked down at the wrist communicator again, and with an irritated expression called out, "This isn't the kind of attitude that wins medals, you know!"

"'This isn't the kind of attitude that wins medals, you know'." Sorun mockingly repeated under his breath as he entered the portal. "Pfft, right, don't see you with a medal, pal."

It wasn't like he was worried about Shadow or anything; he knew he was capable of looking after himself. But Sorun needed an excuse to leave Station Square, or at least get away from it for a while. He didn't want to deal with the people there. They reminded him too much of home and yet at the same time reminded him that they weren't his people.

But there was another reason he wanted to go to G.U.N. HQ. Overlanders were there.

Functionally Sorun knew the line separating humans and Overlanders was a thin one. The humans in Station Square only existed because they'd lived in that city in what used to be a mountain for thousands of years, hadn't even been touched by the Xorda and their gene bombs. The Overlanders, the humans that had survived past the Xorda, the ones who had been exposed to those gene bombs... Sorun needed to know. What they looked like, how close to Earthlings they were. Humans in Station Square were close, but they weren't quite there. They just didn't look right. Too different. Too minutely different on such a maddeningly small scale it practically didn't make a difference. But it did to Sorun. It mattered to him.

The Overlanders, though... he needed to see for himself. He wanted to see Overlanders with his own eyes while the faces of all those humans in Station Square were fresh in his mind. So he'd go and help out Shadow with G.U.N. HQ under false pretenses of wanting to help just so he could go and look at some Overlanders.

Unfortunately, traveling such vast distances with portals was new for Sorun. He'd never travelled halfway across the world before, let alone up a mountain. As such, when he walked through and closed the portal behind him, he realized there was no ground beneath his feet.

"Sh-!"

Present

And that was that.

Looking at all the powers at his disposal, he wasn't too worried about the fact he'd accidentally teleported so high into the air and was falling down. It was something for him to keep in mind the next time he made a portal to somewhere so far away, though. The difference in elevation. Making a portal somewhere he'd never been to and only knew the location of was always a tricky affair for him. Seeing it on a map helped, and coordinates sometimes helped even more. Having been there in person in the past made it a trivial affair. But when he had to ballpark it on little more than an image on a map, it wasn't always so exact. Hence why he was falling through the air right now.

Ah, well. Something new for him to learn, and he'd be fine in the end. He was more concerned with what was going on down below.

Rotor had been right when he said G.U.N. HQ was in a mountain. All around him were tall, snowcapped mountains stretching out for as far as the eye could see, and right below him was a curious sight. A long, metal runway extending out the side of a mountain, like some kind of landing pad for aerial vehicles. A giant, metal door was installed into the mountain where the runway connected with said mountain, but otherwise, he didn't see any type of vehicle on that metal platform. What he did see was a barrier of sandbags placed halfway through, with a line of human-shaped soldiers in gray uniforms lined up against the sandbags with their backs to the door in the mountain. They were firing the automatic rifles they had in their hands at an Egg Hammer that was slowly lumbering towards them, giant hammer in hand and ready to smash down on all of them.

Interestingly, there was damage being dealt to the thing. Not enough damage to stop it, but even from here Sorun could see its metal chassis was pockmarked in damage from the G.U.N. soldiers' guns. It made a small hum leave his lips.

"They must be using really high caliber rounds if those guns can hurt Badniks. And that's an Egg Hammer, too. Hmm..." He readied his sword in his right grip. "Guess I'll help 'em out."

With a single Trick, Sorun teleported right above the Egg Hammer with his sword held above him. He dropped straight down the Badnik, his sword tracing a line through the center of its entire body. He landed in a semi-crouch, fanning his sword out to the side as the two halves of the massive Badnik fell away from each other and landed on either side of Sorun. He then breathed out, standing back up to his full height while twirling the sword around once.

"Okay, play it cool." Taking a deep breath, Sorun fully turned around to the line of soldiers that were standing behind the wall of sandbags. For the most part, they looked extremely confused. So confused that some of them had aimed their guns downwards, as if unsure what to do, while others were sending each other questioning looks. "Yo...~!" Sorun called out, waving the hand holding his scabbard at them. "I'm Sorun! You guys seen Shadow around? Or Rouge?"

Multiple loud, clanking sounds behind him interrupted Sorun. He clicked his tongue in irritation and turned around, letting out a small sigh when he saw Badniks begin to appear behind him. From green Egg Flappers flying in from somewhere to Egg Pawns of red, gold, and even blue colors climbing up from the side of the platform and unveiling their various weapons. And all of them were looking right at him.

Sorun let out a small sigh, and he was ready to Trick forwards to begin cutting all those robots down. He was stopped in his tracks when something zoomed in from the corner of his vision. A black and red blurry sphere that shot forwards and cut through the Badnik that was nearest to Sorun. The robot exploded in a shower of parts, sparks, and oil, and the figure that had been the one to destroy it backflipped backwards and landed feet-first while facing Sorun. The teen wasn't that surprised to see that scowl on Shadow's face directed right at him.

"Just what do you think you're doing here?" Shadow asked him.

"Ah, you know." Sorun Tricked away, and then reappeared behind Shadow with his sword going through a red Egg Pawn that had tried to sneak up on him. "Had some free time, figured you could use some help. So here I am."

After he finished speaking, Sorun formed a wall of crossed Summoned Swords to defend himself from the laser fire of one of the blue Egg Pawns. It was promptly destroyed when Shadow threw a Chaos Spear at it.

"I was lead to believe you and the Freedom Fighters were busy with Station Square," Shadow stated.

Sorun shrugged as his Summoned Swords turned midair and fired out, piercing and destroying multiple Badniks. "Would you believe me if I said we solved that problem way sooner than we thought? As it happens, portals cut down the time it takes to liberate a whole city really short. We just now finished up."

"Hmph." Shadow dodged to the side of a lance that attempted to skewer him, and then jumped up and kicked the offending Egg Pawn in the face. Its facial plate crumpled completely under the force of Shadow's kick, and it was sent flying back into a group of robots behind it. "I'm...perfectly capable... of handling this... on my own!" Shadow said in-between Spin Dashing through more robots.

"Oh, come on!" Two Bringer Claws reached upwards, grabbed two Egg Flappers, and slammed them together hard enough that both their forms flattened completely. "You're gonna say no to me helping out? I already came all the way out here and everything!"

He Tricked again, appearing between a red and golden Egg Pawn. He immediately slashed through the golden one, though before he could turn to the red one Shadow had slammed feet-first into it, kicking it away as he landed on the ground behind Sorun.

"Did the princess even sanction you coming here?" Shadow asked as he tossed another Chaos Spear at a robot. "I sincerely doubt she'd let you hop right into another combat scenario after the work you all did in Station Square."

Sorun moved his head out of the way to avoid being stabbed by a lance, and then cut the offending robot down. "Eh, she doesn't exactly know I'm here."

"You went on your own?" Shadow huffed and flip-kicked a Badnik away. "That's not the kind of work ethic you should adopt if you're going to be working here."

"You say it like I agreed to that," Sorun grunted as he cut through another robot. "You don't honestly think I'm still considering that offer?"

"I'm biding my time for you to come to your senses." After spinning through another blue Egg Pawn, Shadow crossed his arms while looking towards Sorun, who turned to face him right after using a spectral claw to slam another Egg Pawn to death on the ground. "Rouge and I, as well as the G.U.N. soldiers here, have already repelled the Badnik occupation here," Shadow informed him. "We're merely cleaning up the stragglers before resuming operations. If you're truly so insistent on helping, I suppose I can let you handle a few robots."

"How generous of you," Sorun drawled out. He twirled the scabbard he held in his left hand around as he began walking towards a nearby group of Egg Pawns, who themselves began to back up away from Sorun as he flicked his sword out. "But sure. I got time to kill."

---

30 minutes later

Shadow had been truthful when he said a majority of the Badnik forces had already been decimated by G.U.N. personnel by the time Sorun had gotten there. He'd arrived to little more than a cleanup operation, at a point where his assistance was completely unnecessary. It was fine enough for Sorun. The only reason he'd even come here was just to see Overlanders.

He'd stuck around with Shadow for the most part while they'd helped dispatch the remaining robots around the base. And it truly was around the base, as he'd never been lead inside the actual place. The closest he got was a giant multi-level hangar bay full of all sorts of jet and helicopters and other vehicles and formerly a bunch of killer robots before he and Shadow got to them. The entrance to that had been from the giant metal door he'd seen in the side of the mountain, and Shadow had insisted he stick close by to him as they went around destroying robots. So Sorun hadn't had the honor of seeing the base in its entirety.

That was then. Now Sorun was still walking throughout the hangar, long after they'd finally killed the last robot. Not feeling a sense of urgency, unlike everybody else around Sorun, he'd chosen to just meander around the place. Looking around at all the vehicles and the people. The G.U.N. soldiers and engineers running around doing their own tasks were ignoring him for the most part. Just them acting professional, Sorun supposed, though he did get a couple of looks here and there from some of them. Then again, maybe a short human like Sorun walking around the place wasn't the strangest sight these people saw, because for some reason there was an actual child here.

He saw her while he was looking around the place. A small Overlander girl who had to be a child due to the fact she was shorter than Sorun was. A blonde girl who, much to his bewilderment, was handling welding tools and working on a helicopter with other adult engineers nearby. Compared to that what was a pint-sized human like him in a blue coat carrying a katana around?

"... Okay, that's just weird," Sorun had thought to himself as he walked past the girl fixing a helicopter. "Why do they got a girl- holy shit they have ED-209s..."

Yep, there they were. Straight out of 'Robocop'. They didn't look exactly like the droids from the movie, it looked like the main body had a pilot seat for an Overlander to operate it, but it was still a seat attached to a pair of robot legs with guns for arms. All lined up in rows on the side of the hangar bay next to a bunch of helicopters. It was enough to make a small laugh leave Sorun when he saw them. But then he looked around at some of the Overlanders he saw and he felt that laugh die right out of his mouth.

Overlanders. The whole reason he'd come here in the first place. He saw them and at first he'd seen them as indistinguishable from humans. But then he'd gotten a closer look at some of them to better discern their facial features.

At first, he found himself to be a bit delighted. Their faces were more like his. Natural, smooth proportions. They didn't have that "off" feeling he felt whenever he looked at a Station Square human. He had been happy, but then he looked closer, and he realized that... something was off with them. A different kind of "off" he'd felt from the others. Their features, some of them were too smooth. Too angled. Like their faces were sculpted and not natural. And their hair and eye colors... they were all so wild. He saw normal browns and blacks here and there, but then he'd be surprised to find blues, greens, reds, and purples in both eyes and hair in some of them.

"They look like 'Final Fantasy' characters. Like they just walked right out of a friggin' anime..." Sorun realized. It was in those unrealistic proportions in their facial features. It wasn't present on everybody, some were normal like him, but it was there on most people. That wasn't even addressing the wide range of colors he was seeing. "And what the hell- some of them only have four fingers. Gah, they... what the hell..."

He'd felt his heart sink when he noticed these miniscule details. Part of him wondered if he would have been better off if they were all short, diminutive people like Snively was. At least then he would have been able to tell at a second's glance that Overlanders were nowhere close to being like Earthlings and he could just call it there. But no, they'd had to bait him first. He'd had to get all excited seeing that they were normal, only for him to look closer and realize, no, they weren't normal.

"Guess it kind of figures. Don't even know what I was expecting anyways." While walking he saw Shadow over near the end of the hangar talking to some Overlander in a gray uniform. He saw the half-Mobian glance towards his way and immediately begin to approach him, causing Sorun to internally cringe and turn away. "I think I just want to go back to Knothole-"

"Sorun, wait a second." He'd just started to twitch his right hand to Yamato's handle when he heard Shadow's voice call out to him. He bit back the curse that was beginning to form on his lips and turned around just as Shadow stopped behind him. "Your assistance here was unexpected, however we wanted to let you know your help was appreciated."

The "we" part caught Sorun off guard. "Is that G.U.N. talking or you talking?" Soru asked.

"Both," he instantly answered. "Additionally, there was somebody that wanted to talk to you."

"Huh?" Sorun sent the hedgehog a questioning glance, and then looked up. He saw that the Overlander Shadow was talking to earlier was approaching them. A very important Overlander if all those colorful stripes on his uniform said anyth- oh he knew where this was heading. "Ah no- listen, I actually just want to go back to Knothole," he told Shadow as he began backing up, "so thanks and all, but-"

"He just wanted a moment of your time," Shadow insisted.

"Well, I don't want to talk to him." Sorun attempted to leave, but he found himself stopped when something held firm on his right sleeve. He turned his head around, and then quietly exclaimed when he saw Shadow holding onto his coat sleeve. "You're being serious right now?"

The scowl on Shadow's face said enough. "He's the Commander of G.U.N."

"Good for him, let me go." Sorun tried tugging his sleeve away, but Shadow stubbornly held onto him.

"Sorun, I truly think you should-"

"You are pushing really hard for something that's not gonna happen!" Sorun hissed out, taking a step towards Shadow while pointing at him with the hand holding Yamato. "I told you I'm not comin' here."

Shadow finally let go of Sorun's sleeve, though he did it just to cross his arms. "I'm not attempting to force you into anything. And he was the one that wished to speak with you."

"Why? Because he wants to thank me for coming here to help with the robots?"

"Partly." Shadow glanced to the side at the Overlander as he grew closer to the pair, and then looked back to Sorun. "I... told him about you beforehand when I came back here."

Sorun's mouth dropped open a bit. "You did what? Egh, Shadow ..." he groaned out in irritation, running his free hand through his hair. "Why'd you go and tell the G.U.N. overlords about me?"

"Sorun, I had to," he said. "It's my obligation as a G.U.N. agent. Your powers make you a person of interest, so they wanted a profile of you. They have files on all the Freedom Fighters and the Chaotix."

A strangled sound left Sorun as he gestured towards Shadow. "Every single thing you've told me is a red flag."

Sighing, Shadow ran a hand over his face. "They're precautionary measures, Sorun. They even have files on me. They have files on everyone. It's to ensure the safety of the planet in a worst-case scenario, nothing more." He sent Sorun a sharp glare. "And do not go spouting off nonsense like calling them overlords in front of the Commander."

It was a rational and practical explanation, one that any other day Sorun probably would have accepted, but right now he wasn't in a mood to do so. "Ugh, for the..." His arms went limp to his side when he saw the Overlander was nearly at their position. "Fine, he's already here so I'll say hey." Shadow opened his mouth to speak, though Sorun held a hand up to silence him. "And only say hey. I'm not interested in anything outside that."

If Shadow had any complaints, they died in his throat when the Overlander came to a stop right in front of them. Sorun himself had to bite back a sigh at the taller, older male in front of him, and found his grip on Yamato tightening a bit as he looked up at the man's face.

Out of all the Overlanders he'd seen thus far, this man was about the most "normal", Earthling-looking one Sorun had seen. Aged face, strong, broad jaw, light features and white hair. Sorun himself probably would have mistaken him for an Earthling if it weren't for the fact he had a green eye and a brown eye. Heterochromia wasn't exactly unheard of where he was from, but in these circumstances, among Overlanders and what he'd seen, something like that was practically normal.

He had an air about him, too. An authoritative air that, given if what Shadow was said was true and he was the Commander of G.U.N., was to be expected. It went along with the stern look he had on his features. Even the way he was standing: posture completely straight, hands rigid and at his sides, feet straight. Mismatched eyes focused right on Sorun. Sorun wasn't too sure if he liked that piercing gaze of his.

"I assume you must be the one Agent Shadow told me about." A strong and no-nonsense type of voice. The kind of voice Sorun would expect out of somebody like this. The kind of voice that made him a bit uncomfortable, along with the height difference. "He's told me much."

"Yeah, maybe too much." Sorun's eyes flicked towards Shadow, who was standing silently off to the side while observing the two. Making no reaction, Sorun looked back up at the Overlander. "Only good things, right?"

His face didn't so much as twitch at the joke. "I am Commander Abraham Tower, the commander of G.U.N. as Shadow has likely informed you."

"Hey, I'm Sorun."

That made his face twitch, just a bit. That little bit of flippant attitude from Sorun. Shadow had twitched, too, and shot Sorun an unapproving look. Sorun didn't find himself caring, and continued speaking to Commander Tower.

"So. G.U.N." Slipping his free hand into his pocket, Sorun took a quick glance around the hangar. "You guys seem well off. Fight against Eggman going well on your end?"

"It's never 'well' against him," The Overlander crisply stated. "It's fighting to make sure he never rolls over on Overlander territory. An uphill fight at that."

"Mm." Eyes still looking to the side, Sorun looked towards a piece of a cut-apart Badnik lying on the ground. "I wanted to call him out on G.U.N. never helping out the Mobians with Eggman, but I guess I can't really say anything without knowing the situation on this side of the world. For all I know they've been having to deal with his shit for over a decade, too. The state of things here and what he says leans towards that." He sighed. "Tch. Yeah, that worked out real well for them."

Opinions aside, Sorun didn't feel it was his place to judge a military organization he had little information on. If anything he should have been leaning towards a positive side with the benefit of the doubt and the fact that Shadow was working with them and vouched for their credibility. From all appearances they seemed on the up-and-up.

But he couldn't find it in himself to care all that much. His mind was still too focused on Overlanders, and at the end of the day, G.U.N. had nothing to do with him other than his own association with Shadow and Rouge. He just wanted to get this over with and leave.

"Why are we talking?" Sorun asked the taller male, wanting to get right to the point.

"I'm made aware you played a part in clearing out Dr. Robotnik's machines from our headquarters," Tower said. "I wished to extend G.U.N.'s thanks for your assistance, and-"

"Appreciated, bye." His patience having run out, Sorun nodded to the Commander and turned around. He only made it a few steps before an irritated Shadow called his name out.

"Sorun-"

"I said I'd stick around to say hey. We said hey," Sorun said, stopping to glare towards Shadow. "That's it, we're done. I didn't come here to hear anything else."

"Then why did you come here?" This question came from Tower, who was still sternly looking towards the teen. And yet underneath that steely gaze there was a hint of curiosity Sorun chose to ignore.

Quietly exhaling from his nose, Sorun picked his eyes up to the Overlander's. "Came here looking for something, found it, didn't like it." He turned his head back forwards and away from them. "And now I'm leaving. So I repeat: bye."

He Tricked away before another word could be said.

Something possessed him to go back to the metal landing platform jutting out of the mountain he'd originally landed on. Maybe because he wanted some time to himself to think. Or that he was stalling for as long as he could before he went back to Knothole and Sally yelled at him. Possibly a combination of these two things.

And that took him here. At the edge of the metal platform, looking down the mountain range. All the way down towards ground level, far off the distance, he saw it. An Overlander city, Central City Rotor had said. It was hard to make out at this distance, but it reminded him a lot of Station Square, though a bit different in its constructed. And both of those reminded him of his home city back on Earth. Did, and at the same time didn't due to the differences between them. Just like the people that inhabited both.

He heard footsteps behind him. He already knew it was Shadow- the metal bottoms of his rocket shoes clanked loudly against the metal ground. He didn't react in the slightest when Shadow stepped right besides him, nor did he react when he felt crimson eyes rest on him. He just continued to stare out at the city below.

"You could have been a little more tactful with the commander," Shadow said, his tone chastising.

"It's amazing how little I care." Sorun's blue eyes flicked to Shadow, who sighed at Sorun's statement. "I want to ask you a question."

"A question," Shadow repeated. "What is it?"

"If you were to meet me for the first time, and you didn't know I was an Earthling from a different zone, would you think I was a human or a Overlander?"

It was a question that gave Shadow pause, and made him furrow his eye ridges at Sorun. The teen just silently and expectantly stared at him, however, and after a few moments of quiet contemplation Shadow decided on his answer.

"I've had precious contact with the humans in Station Square, Sorun, although I have seen them before. That said, I would have said you're an Overlander."

Sorun hadn't really known what he would have thought of either answer. He wasn't too surprised to not be satisfied with the one he got. "Why them?" he asked.

"Because I've never known a human to ever leave Station Square for any reason."

A low sigh left the teen. "Don't know what I was expecting there," he mumbled out. "You know, when I went to Station Square and saw all those humans I was expecting to feel, I don't know, some sense of familiarity with them. I knew they weren't my kind, not technically, but I knew they were still human and figured even with the cultural difference it'd be enough." He shook his head. "It wasn't. They don't... they look different, Shadow."

"Different?"

"The Overlanders look more like humans from my zone than the humans here. Except they don't, because I don't know a single human back home that was born with natural blue hair. I blame gene bombs on that, but... ugh." He shook his head. "I just don't feel any connection with them at all. I thought I would, but I don't. And I went in knowing I probably wouldn't, but I guess I just hoped I was wrong." He flipped his arm up and let it flop back to his side. "I don't know."

Shadow remained silent at hearing Sorun's words. He continued to look at him, blinked slowly, and then turned his head out to Central City down below. Sorun did the same, with the two of them continuing to look down at the city for what felt like minutes until Shadow spoke again.

"The age of the human race here is thousands of years ahead of your species in your world," the hedgehog said, breaking the silence. "The humans in Station Square alone were relegated to their own city for thousands of years when that plane crash trapped them in that mountain. Furthermore, this is an entirely different zone. You can't have expected them to look exactly like the humans of your zone with all these factors in play."

He had a point, Sorun would admit that. Whether it was due to evolution and time or just because it was a race of humans from a different zone, there was no feasible way for them to be the same as the humans from his zone. Any chance of the Overlanders being the same were wiped out with whatever meddling the gene bombs did to their DNA. And even ignoring all that, none of them could gain powers from Chaos Emeralds like he could. Because he was from an abnormal zone absent of Chaos energy. For all he knew that played a part in humans' development here, too. Quite plainly even looking past surface appearances there were too many differences among them for Sorun to call these people his people, culture aside.

"Yeah. I guess not," Sorun said in agreement after a long, contemplative moment. "I suppose that makes me the only member of my kind on this planet. I get to be all alone." He glanced back at Shadow. "Kinda like you, I guess."

"Hmph." All Shadow gave was a small, noncommittal grunt. "So what are you going to do?"

"Go back to Knothole. Help settle things with Eggman." Sorun reached up and scratched at his hair. "I feel more comfortable with them than here or in Station Square. The non-Earthling humans and Overlanders just keep reminding me of people back on Earth and how they're not them. I can't stand them. At least with Mobians I can look them in the eye and not think of home. Plus... I got people I care about there." He stopped scratching and lowered his hand back to his side. "Don't tell anybody I said that, though."

"I won't," Shadow promised him. "I don't think I can especially blame you. Not with my own issues integrating with Mobians. My own supposed kind, even if I'm not a full Mobian. So I understand where you're coming from in some sense." He looked back towards Sorun. "When this is all over, though, there's still a place here for you should you ever change your mind."

Sorun scoffed. "Don't count on it, Shadow."

"As you will." Shadow shrugged and looked back down to Central City, Sorun doing the same. A few more minutes of silence passed before Shadow broke it again. "I'm afraid you'll be returning to Knothole City alone. I'm staying here."

"Oh, yeah?" Sorun muttered, eyes still on the city.

"With G.U.N. free and back at operational capacity, Rouge and I are officially agents of theirs once more. The Commander wants me to stay and spearhead operations to take back Overlander territory from the Doctor. With how thin his forces are spread, and with how easy Station Square was reclaimed, I suspect this won't pose much of a challenge."

"But that means you'll be staying on this side of the world."

"For the time being. Yes." They turned back towards each other. "When the time comes, perhaps we'll be able to tackle the Doctor together and keep that promise we made. But neither of us know where the future will take us, so should that task fall solely to one of us-"

"He's dead, yeah. You don't gotta worry about that," Sorun assured him.

Shadow nodded, looking slightly relieved as his frown relaxed into a neutral expression. That was about as close to a genuine smile that Sorun assumed Shadow could form. "Then for now it appears this is goodbye." He extended his hand out to Sorun, which surprised the Earthling a bit as he looked down at the hand. "What is it you like to say? It's been an experience working with you?"

"Something like that. I'm not sure I'm the most quotable guy." Sorun reached his hand out and grasped Shadow's gloved hand. They shook, something that made Sorun feel a bit honored and glad for that Shadow had done such a thing with him. Then all he felt was pain when Shadow squeezed down a bit harder than he ought to have. "Alright, alright, ease up!"

A small huff left Shadow, and for a single second the ghost of a smirk formed on his lips. It disappeared when Sorun lifted his head back up to his face, though his eyes seemed just a bit brighter as Sorun stepped away from him and unsheathed his sword.

"So that's it?"

Shadow nodded. "That's it. You should know that Rouge will be going back to Knothole, as an official liaison from G.U.N. Just to keep an eye on things for the time being."

"Ah-huh. She need a ride?" Sorun asked as he cut open a portal.

"She has her own means of travel."

"If you say so." With the portal opened, Sorun turned back towards Shadow. "I'll be going now. Take care, Shadow. Adios."

He kept looking at Shadow even as he stepped into the portal. It could have been the way space around the edges of the portal warped, or it could have been a trick of the eye from all the sunlight reflecting off of the snow on the mountain. Whatever it was, Sorun could have sworn he saw the corners of Shadow's mouth upturn just the slightest amount as he finally walked through the portal.

It must have just been the warped space.

Pushing what was surely an illusion from his mind, Sorun stepped all the way through the portal and closed it behind him. Sighing out in exhaustion as he dispelled Yamato, he turned around flopped right onto the couch in Freedom HQ, closing his eyes in an effort to finally get some rest.

He was only able to close his eyes for about three seconds before he heard someone clear their throat.

"Mm?" Sorun cracked an eye open to look at who it was standing in front of him. He immediately caught Sally's visage, arms crossed and eyes glaring right down onto Sorun. She didn't look very happy. "Oh, you guys are already back, huh?"

"Yeah. We just came back a few minutes ago," she dryly stated. "Would you care to tell me where you went?"

Sorun's half-open eye maintained its contact with Sally for all of two seconds before it re-closed. "Shadow says hi."

And thus, the scolding began.

A/N- Having these back-to-back big chapters take a lot, and I didn't really intend for it to get this big. The Station Square chapter was another one of those chapters I wasn't really looking that forwards to like the Angel Island one that got scrapped, but hey, it's out of the way now. The next five-ish chapters are gonna be on the short side, that's what I plan, at least, and after that we get to the fun stuff I've been waiting to get to.

Chapter 38

Recursion Error

Episode 38- The sunk cost fallacy of Chaos powers

Spagonia.

Sorun had absolutely no idea where the hell the name came from. It was an Overlander city, he knew that much. It sounded vaguely Italian, so he assumed it took its roots from there. It also sounded like somebody just named it after spaghetti, and Sorun's biggest fear was that the only surviving remnant of Italian culture in this strange post-apocalyptic world was spaghetti.

Place wasn't even a whole country like Italy was. It was just a city. A city that used to be under Eggman's control until G.U.N. had done their thing and started taking territory back. Not all of the Overlander cities were free, not just yet, but from what Sorun heard a good majority of them were already secured at this point. And seeing as how close Spagonia was to the G.U.N. HQ, it wasn't that hard to see why it had been one of the first cities G.U.N. liberated and put back in Overlander control.

Well, whatever the case for the ridiculous name, he was here for one reason and one reason only: a sweet, sweet Chaos Emerald.

"Thank you for spotting me for the ice cream, Rouge," Sorun thanked. He licked on the white ice cream scoop sitting upon the cone in his hand, his eyes glancing towards the side at the white bat standing next to him. "I would have bought it on my own but I'm poor."

The white bat, her arms crossed, regarded Sorun with a lazy look. "You never considered that mobiums wouldn't be recognized as a valid currency in Overlander territory?"

"No, even if it was, I still wouldn't have been able to afford this."

"It's sad stories like this that make me glad that I chose a job that actually pays." She sighed and shook her head. "Can't say I've ever had a guy take me out and make me pay for the food."

"Don't flatter yourself that much. You only got me the basic vanilla." He took a bite from his ice cream and turned away from Rouge, facing forwards to the large building in front of them. "Spagonia University, huh..."

It looked like a large, standard campus to him. Large main buildings connected to small side buildings, all surrounding a central courtyard. A classic university if he ever saw one. For some reason there was a Chaos Emerald here, and they only knew about it thanks to the Overlanders. Specifically, the Commander of G.U.N. had been the one to contact Sally and tell her about the Emerald being held here, who had relayed it to Sorun. And Rouge, under orders from her employers, had been the one to show Sorun the way to the university after he teleported here.

"So how exactly did a Chaos Emerald wind up here?" Sorun asked, taking the final bite out of his ice cream. "Would have figured that Eggman would have detected an Emerald sitting in one of the cities he used to occupy with how much Chaos energy these things radiate."

"Some G.U.N. operatives that were hiding in a makeshift outpost in the outlands between here and the HQ under orders from the Commander. They were avoiding the occupation and keeping in close contact with other operatives to build up to the operation that took place back at HQ. When the Emeralds scattered after we brought you to this zone, one of the Emeralds just happened to land near them. One of the operatives, an engineer, thought fast and managed to jury rig a sort of containment device that helped mask the Emerald's signature. The university was a safe place we had people in during the occupation, so it was discretely transported here for study and to keep it out of Eggman's hands."

Sorun hummed in acknowledgment. "Must have been a smart engineer to make something that quickly."

"Ah, I wasn't that surprised when I heard. It was Hope that did it."

"... That really young girl I saw when I was over there?" Sorun asked, tone a bit surprised.

She nodded. "Yeah, that's the one. Girl's real gifted, I'll give her that much."

"Didn't know G.U.N. was into recruiting children."

"Just in the same way the Freedom Fighters let child prodigies like Tails fight with them."

He scoffed. She had a point there, one he couldn't refute.

Rouge stepped in front of Sorun's view, with Sorun's eyes lazily following her as he munched on the waffle cone. "Hey, you should know that Shadow's the one that pushed for them to tell you all that the Emerald was here for you. Commander Tower was really hesitant in going through with it, but he relented and agreed on the reasoning that you were owed something for helping out over at the HQ the other week."

"Is that so?" So the good Commander was hesitant in letting him have more Emeralds. He had to wonder if it was because G.U.N. wanted them for their own uses or if it was because they didn't like the idea of some random teenager running around and getting powers off of them. Especially a teenager that already expressed no interest in joining them.

Maybe he was being a bit too critical of them, though. They were still giving it to him, and they were still a good organization from the impression he got. Working against Eggman for the sake of the planet. So he'd trust them, even if the cautious part of his brained exposed to countless media examples cautioned him against it and made him wonder if they were only letting him take it since they all had a common enemy in Eggman. "Well, I appreciate you guys doing me this solid and giving me the Emerald," he said. "It would have been a real shame to have taken it from you."

"Thank G.U.N., not me. Not every day I'm going out and giving gems away..." Rouge muttered under her breath. "Anyway, they radioed ahead. Just go up there and ask for Professor Pickle. He was the one in charge of studying it."

"... Professor Pickle," Sorun repeated in disbelief.

Rouge gave him a shrug. "I don't know, that's just the name they gave me."

"Okay... You want me to make you a portal back somewhere, or-?"

"Thanks for the offer, Sorun, but I've got my own ride." She gave him a short nod before her bat wings lightly began flapping to lift her off the ground. "See you around."

Sorun wordlessly watched Rouge take off. His eyes trailed after her form, and then fell down to the university sitting before him. He tossed the last piece of the waffle cone in his mouth, brushed his hands off, and began walking forwards.

"I fucking swear, if he's an actual pickle..."

Ding!

The first thing Sorun encountered when he'd entered the front door to the university was a massive foyer that branched off into multiple hallways. There was a small office right next to the entrance fortunately enough, though, and there was even a man in a white coat manning what looked like a kind of greeter's desk in front of that office. Seeing no reason not to, Sorun went up to the desk and rang the bell on the front to gain the Overlander's attention.

"Hm? Huh?" The man jumped up a bit when the sound of the bell being run reached his ears. He looked around the front of the desk, and then looked downwards towards Sorun. He'd blinked in surprise at the sight of him. "Er, hello little boy. Is there something I can help you with?"

"Don't hurt him." He felt anger spike in himself when Sorun heard the man refer to him as a boy. He took a calming breath to even out his mood, and then calmly looked up at the man behind the desk. "Do you know where I can find Professor Pickle? I'm suppose to meet with him, so if you could please direct me to him, I would be most appreciative." Calm and respectful. He'd hoped it was enough that he could just get his directions and be on his way.

The man behind the desk scratched at his head. "Professor Pickle? Is he you're grandfather? Didn't even know he had kids," he muttered. "Did your mom and dad send you here, 'cause-"

A spectral blue hand grabbing the collar of his suit and pulling him halfway across the desk shut him right up. He froze entirely when he met the eyes of a very angry teenager in front of him.

"Listen you moronic fuck, I'm the dude G.U.N. said was taking the Emerald you all have here, so if you don't stop calling me a goddamn kid and tell me where the hell this Pickle guy is in the next five seconds-!"

"Er, um, hey, guy? You doing okay there? Kid?"

The voice of the greeter shook Sorun from his daydream. He grimaced a bit when he recalled the images he thought up, and then did his best to put the image out of his mind as he cleared his throat and looked back up at the Overlander.

"Sir, could you please just direct me to Professor Pickle?" he requested.

"Um, yeah. Upstairs, room 2-A."

"Thank you." Sorun walked away from the desk, turning around but keeping his head craned in the direction of the Overlander. "Don't go around mistaking teenagers for kids. We don't like that."

Not bothering to look back, Sorun turned away from the desk and stormed towards the stairs. Stomping up them managed to alleviate some of his anger, and by the time he made it to the top half of it had simmered away. He still wore a cross expression on his face though as he began walking down a hall labeled "A", muttering under his breath as he followed signs until he came upon a door with a "2-A" plaque hanging next to it. When he reached forwards and felt that the door was unlocked, Sorun hummed in approval and opened it up.

He'd never been in a university lab before. Upon first glance, it looked less like a lab and more like a library. There was still actual equipment lying around - tables filled with all sorts of doodads and science things beyond Sorun - and what seemed to be science notes scattered around everywhere, but there were also a large amount of bookshelves everywhere that were filled to the brim with books. Some were even out and laying on some of the tables, the books all opened up to random pages with even more notebook paper filled in with writing resting on them.

"Wow, this place is a mess," Sorun muttered to himself as he looked around the room. He saw plenty of books and equipment, but, much to his confusion, no Pickle. "Er, Professor Pickle? You here? Hello?"

There was no voice that called back to him. The only sounds he heard was the low hum of the various pieces of science equipment haphazardly strewn around him.

"Is he not in at this hour? No, the guy at the desk woulda said something. So where the hell...?" Sorun trailed off when he walked next to one of the tables. He saw something on it from the corner of his eye, something that made him immediately freeze and snap his head towards it.

A pickle. There was a single pickle lying on the table, in a clean spot between a mess of notes spread around it. Sorun stared unblinking down at the pickle, various, unbelievable thoughts running through his head as he regarded the otherwise innocuous pickle with skepticism and trepidation.

"No way. It's impossible. It can't be." Slowly, ever so slowly, Sorun began to reach out towards the pickle. "There's no way this can actually be happening..."

Gingerly, he took hold of the pickle. Nothing happened. He swallowed, and with a beating heart, he turned the pickle the other way around.

... It was just an ordinary pickle.

"Well that was a letdown," Sorun gasped out, his shoulders going a bit slack. "... Wait a second here." Sorun lifted the pickle up a bit for the light to catch it better, and then squinted his eyes at it. "Hold on, this ain't even a pickle. It's a cucumber."

"Oh, thank you for that."

Sorun felt himself freeze and go completely rigid when a wrinkled hand came into his view and gently took the cucumber out from his hand. He was so perturbed by the action that Sorun was just left there, staring blankly at his now-empty hand that had once been holding the cucumber. He slowly blinked and, not knowing what to think of this, turned around towards whoever just took the cucumber from him.

There was a man behind him. An aged man in a brown suit, who... had put the cucumber he'd taken from Sorun, put it between two slices of bread, and was currently consuming it in a really slow and almost uncomfortable fashion. He didn't even seem to be acknowledging Sorun's existence right next to him, though Sorun wasn't too sure if that was true or Not. Considering the old Overlander's bushy, white eyebrows were completely obscuring his eyes, Sorun didn't even know if he could see.

No, on a second look, it was true. The old Overlander was eating his sandwich while facing towards a wall.

"... Why me?" Sorun forlornly thought to himself before loudly clearing his throat. "Um, hi? Hello?" He stepped closer to the old man and attempted to wave his hand in front of his face to gain his attention, but he didn't even seem to react to his presence. "Yoo-hoo? Old timer? Come on, man, I ain't got all day."

"H-hm? Oh!" It was only when he was halfway through his sandwich did the old man finally acknowledge Sorun. "My apologies, lad, I didn't see you there."

A forced smile found its way on Sorun's face. "Hiiii... are you Professor Pickle?"

The old man took another bite from his sandwich. An agonizingly slow bite that made Sorun more uncomfortable by the moment. "Yes, that is I," he said after swallowing his bite. "Did you need something from me?"

"Yeah, I- come on, man, don't- he did." Sorun's hand slapped into his face when the professor took another bite of his sandwich. He waited for him to finish, and then, suppressing a heavy sigh, looked back at the brown-suited Overlander. "Look, I really need something from you."

"... Oh, hello. I didn't notice you there."

"Christ..." Inhaling deeply, Sorun couldn't help but to run his hands through his hair as he watched the professor walk off, mumbling something under his breath all the while as he finished off his sandwich. Ignoring Sorun like he'd forgotten the teen had been standing there, which, from the looks of things, he probably did. It caused a strange sensation of frustration and sadness to well in the teen. "They didn't tell me I had to deal with a senile geriatric. How do I even do this?"

He didn't think he could shake him like he'd fantasized doing with the guy out in the front desk. He was so old and brittle-looking that Sorun was worried he'd accidentally break something, or worse, outright kill the guy. Then again, talking seemed to be getting Sorun even less than nowhere, if such a thing was even possible. He didn't know at all what he was supposed to do here.

"Oh, wait! I know you!" In a sudden turn that startled Sorun, the professor turned right around towards Sorun and regarded him with a knowing smile. "You must be the one who's here for the Chaos Emerald, yes?"

"Yes, yes I am!" Sorun confirmed, nodding fervently towards Professor Pickle and his newly-found clarity. "G.U.N. said I could have it so if you could please give it to me that'd be just great!"

"Of course, of course. I-I have it around here somewhere, just give me a minute here."

Sorun nodded towards the older man, and then stepped back to lean against a nearby table. He watched as the aged professor stepped towards a nearby shelf full of mechanical... somethings, his hands reaching forwards towards the handle keeping the shelf shut. He opened it and began shuffling his hands around in the interior, and he began removing bits of equipment from inside only to then place it on a nearby table.

"You know, as fascinating as studying this artifact has been, this kind of research was never my forte, you see," the professor mumbled out in a voice that was almost too quiet for Sorun to hear. He continued to set aside more pieces of equipment while he rambled on. "I got my doctorate in history, you see, but they were understaffed what with all that nonsense about robots going on outside, so those kind uniformed men had asked me and my lab assistant to look into the matter until they got their own labs back into shape. Are you a delivery person for them, young man?"

"No, uh... I'm Sorun. G.U.N. said I could have it since I need it for something. It's a long story."

"Oh, alright, alright. Ah, here it is."

Sorun started when the aged Overlander pulled something out from inside of the cabinet: a small, cylindrical glass container, the top and bottom of which seemed to be metal lids with all sorts of electronic diodes attached to them and with wires haphazardly spilling out. Sorun was less concerned with those, however, and more with what was on the inside of the container: a brightly-glowing, green gem.

"Oh, hey, look at that. An Emerald that actually looks like an Emerald," Sorun thought as he watched the professor place the container down on a table. "So that container is what hid its energy signature from Eggman. According to Rouge that little girl at G.U.N. built it. Hm. Looks... kinda thrown-together. Guess they were desperate at the time."

"Now let me just see here..." the professor hummed as he stared towards the container, hand stroking his chin. "There was a code for opening this, though I don't quite recall... hm..." He reached forwards and began tapping at a small numerical pad on the top of the container's lid. "Was it two-zero-eight-three...? Oh, no, that wasn't it," he muttered when there was a quiet beep accompanying a small red flash from a light next to the pad. "Two-two-zero-five? No, not it, either. Hrm..."

"Er, professor?" Sorun called out. "You, um... you doing okay?"

"No, I seem to have forgotten the code for unlocking this contraption. Forgive me, Sormur, I'm usually quite good at remembering these types of things."

Sorun ignored the mispronunciation of his name for more pressing issues. "Did you write it down somewhere?" he asked.

To his dismay, Professor Pickle shook his head. "No, I don't think so. Well, there's nothing to it, I suppose. We'll just have to work our way through all the numbers."

"What?" He found himself not believing what he just heard, but then he felt a shock go through him when he saw the professor's finger hover over the button marked with a zero. "Hey wait, man, come on-!"

"Zero-zero-zero-zero... no, that's not it. Zero-zero-zero-one... no? Mm, unfortunate."

Sorun slapped himself in the face to help muffle the frustrated cry he instinctually made. When he lowered his hand, twitching with its fingers slowly curling inwards, he asked, "You want me to just break it, 'cause I can-"

"No, no, that is quite alright, Summer, that won't be necessary."

"Seriously it'll only take like two seconds and I got places to be-"

"Have some patience, young Sonder, this won't take but a mere few minutes."

Sorun sputtered out in disbelief. "'A mere few-' you're trying to brute-force your way through ten-thousand codes!"

Whether Professor Pickle even heard his objections or not wasn't clear. He simply continued plucking away at the numerical pad, murmuring under his breath in what was surely unintelligible gibberish.

There was a flash of blue as Yamato was summoned in his left hand. Sorun's right hand, still twitching, slowly inched closer and closer towards the handle, though it stopped just shy of actually wrapping around it. His hand was stuck in that position for a few moments, after which Sorun made a loud sound that was halfway between a sigh and a groan as the sword disappeared from his grasp. He shook his head, found a nearby chair, and plopped down in it. Afterwards he splayed his legs out, crossed his arms, and looked towards the professor as he continued guessing away at the numerical pad.

"Well, on the upside, this is the least most labor-intensive way of getting a Chaos Emerald yet," Sorun thought. "Just gotta wait about a billion years for him to finally get that thing open. Piece a... cake..."

Yawning, Sorun began to sleepily blink his eyes. Tiredness began to overtake him as his head nodded downwards, and before he knew it he'd fallen asleep completely.

BING!

"AH AH WHAT- HUH-!" He'd been in a deep sleep before that loud binging sound roused Sorun from his slumber. It'd been so jarring that he'd fallen right out of the chair and onto the floor, disoriented and confused from the unfamiliar surroundings. There he stayed for a solid five seconds, wondering why he was laying on the cold floor of some lab before the memories of his day caught up to him and he realized what he was currently suffering through.

Groaning, he stood up to his feet, the popping sounds of his stiff joints accompanying him. He let out a low, dejected sigh, which was immediately wiped off his face when he looked towards the table where he remembered Professor Pickle was at. The container from earlier was empty, the lid opened and the light next to the numerical pad glowing green. Besides it stood the professor himself, holding the Chaos Emerald in his hands.

"Oh, you finally got it open?" Sorun groaned out, rolling his neck around and forcing the joints to elicit a few more pops before stopping in front of the old Overlander. "How long was I- you know what, I don't even want to know."

"Hmm? Oh, Sorghum, you're awake," Professor Pickle stated, not seeming to register the way Sorun's face subtly wrinkled when he stopped right in front of the older male. "No, actually I eventually remembered what the correct combination was. Sorry for making you wait so long, young man."

"It's... fine." It's not what he wanted to say, but he didn't have the heart in him to scream at an old man. Even though he really wanted to. So instead he exhaled a slow breath to calm himself, and then extended his right hand. "May I please have that now?" he requested.

He nodded. "Of course. Here you are."

The green, glowing gem was held outwards towards the teen. Sorun stared down at it, almost mesmerized by the green glow of the gem. Part of him found it a bit funny at how easy this was turning out, but he wasn't going to complain about his life being made a bit simpler. And so, depriving the world of any opportunity to take this moment from him, Sorun placed his hand down on the Emerald, his face flinching when he felt it affix itself to his palm.

"Well, that was easy," Sorun mumbled as he pulled his hand back, Emerald still attached to him. "Alright, that's all I needed. Sorry to have disturbed you over this, old- er, professor. It's been... it's been an experience and a half. I'll let you get back to it."

"But of course, young man, think nothing of it. Though I must confess I do feel compelled to ask you just what exactly you plan on doing with that," the aged Overlander said, wrinkled hands folder in front of him as he stared towards Sorun's face.

Sorun clicked his tongue. He thought about telling him, but then decided against it. "It's, um... it's not something you should worry about, man."

"Alright, then." The professor nodded at Sorun, which brought the teen some small relief that he wouldn't be pressing the issue. "Would you perhaps be willing to stay behind for a sandwich or two with me? I rarely ever get guests here besides from my assistant, though he's been out for quite a bit now. Something to do with that silly occupation nonsense everyone kept whispering about, I'm sure, but now that that's over with he should be coming back soon."

Blinking, Sorun looked down at the Emerald stuck to his hand, and then back up at the professor. "I'd love to, but I really don't want to. Professor?" When he saw he wasn't standing in front of him anymore, Sorun swiveled his head around to look for the old man. He found him slowly shuffling away, muttering under his breath again as he made his way to some random corner of the lab. "... Well that happened," Sorun sighed out, looking down once more at the Emerald in his hand. He sighed, and then placed his other hand on it. "Alright, let's just get this over with and go home," he said to himself as green sparks began arcing out of the gem.

The first thing that had happened when he exited his portal was that he was assaulted. Granted it was by a small dog that barely even come up to his knees, so assault may have been a strong word, but with how he was feeling it certainly felt like it.

He didn't know what the matter was with himself. Some time after Sorun absorbed that Emerald he just felt a bit off. Sick-off. He always felt a little bad after absorbing an Emerald, and admittedly it had been getting steadily worse with each Emerald, but there was something especially bad with this one, and right now he just felt sick to his stomach. So when he'd teleported into the Hedgehog household's kitchen and gotten rammed in the legs by Sonic's dog, Muttski, Sorun about doubled-over right there. But he managed to maintain a brave face, close the portal behind him, and then dispelled the katana as he bent down to pet the dog on his head.

"Hey there, pal," Sorun whispered, stroking the tan dog on the top of his head. He tried to lick at the hand, causing Sorun to recoil his hand away from the dog and stand up. The dog whined at tried pawning at Sorun's leg, but when he stepped away he simply huffed and turned away.

Sorun watched the dog leave him, breathed out, and looked up. He felt his breath hitch in his throat when he saw two individuals already in the kitchen with him. Jules, sitting at the kitchen table with a mug of oil and with his mechanical eyes affixed onto Sorun, and his wife, who was over at the sink with her hands inside of soapy water holding dishes, currently frozen and staring towards the teen. Sorun let out an awkward laugh and waved at the two, not entirely sure on what to say.

"Uh, hey guys," Sorun greeted, a small, incredibly forced smile on his face. "Sorry for, er, startling you. I meant to go to the front door but getting an exact location is tricky sometimes so-so- I didn't mean to just barge into the kitchen like that."

"Oh no, dear, you're alright," Bernadette assured him, after which she turned back to her dishes. "How did everything go on your trip to... oh my, what was the place called? Spagornio?"

"Spagonia," Sorun corrected her, "and it went fine, thanks for asking." He moved past the kitchen table while nodding towards the blue, roboticized hedgehog sitting in it. "Jules."

"Sorun," Jules greeted with another nod. He then lifted up his cup of oil and began drinking from it, Sorun already having moved into the living room.

A low groan left Sorun as he found the couch in the living room, proceeded by him sitting down in it. He slumped forwards, his head falling into his hands. Fingers curled into his scalp, dark hair spilling out between the gaps in his fingers as he made a sigh.

"I feel sick. It wasn't so bad after I got the Emerald, but it's been getting worse since I left the university." He felt something in his abdomen, like his very organs had shuddered inside of him, and he had to hold back a gag from the sensation. "I don't know what's going on..."

"Hey, Sorun!" The sound of Sonic's voice hadn't even reached Sorun's ears before he felt the couch seat right besides him compress. He steeled himself to not look as unwell as possible, and then sat straight up as he turned to the blue, teenage hedgehog sitting right besides him. "You just get back from your mission?"

Sometimes Sorun really wished he could feel good enough at all times of the day to have that same big, optimistic grin Sonic always wore. He hadn't felt that good in months, though. He especially didn't feel like it right now from all the pains he was feeling.

Sorun forced himself to nod, the very motion making him regret doing so. "It was less a mission and more a chore for how easy it was, but yeah."

"They had an Emerald?"

"They had an Emerald," Sorun confirmed, refraining from nodding again. "They left it to some professor guy to look after and study it. He was..."

"Interesting?" Sonic finished for him.

"... I wouldn't go that far," Sorun denied. "But yeah, it was a simple grab-and-go. No robots or anything like that. Don't really have anything to say about it."

"Ah, alright. Cool, cool."

Sorun remained silent after that, not wishing to respond. In truth, talking was a bit of a struggle for him at the moment. Saying words only exacerbated the intense nausea he was feeling, and even then it was a sensation that was slowly becoming worse in him. Keeping a straight face was becoming harder and harder. He was tempted to get up right now and just go to bed so he could try and sleep this off, and it was an idea that grew more tempting by the second the longer this went on.

"So..." Sonic leaned back in the couch, slinging one leg over the other while interlacing his hands behind his head. "You get a cool new power from the Chaos Emerald?" he asked, still looking at Sorun from the corner of his eye.

It took much more effort than he was comfortable with to not grit his teeth when he answered. "Yes, of course."

"Neat. What'd you get?"

"Nothing too special," Sorun answered, voice calm and even.

"Aw, come on!" Sonic exclaimed, turning towards and leaning closer to Sorun. "You always get something cool from the Emeralds! I wanna see it!"

Softly groaning, Sorun flicked his eyes over at Sonic and said, "And ruin the surprise? No way." He tried playing it off as him just being a tease, but the reality was he didn't think he'd be able to show that off without something bad happening. He was already struggling to hold it together with how he was feeling. He didn't want to imagine what activating that would do to him.

"Come on, don't be like that! Show me!"

"I'll use it if I have to, but I'm not gonna-" Sorun cut himself off, clamping his mouth shut as another painful spasm rocked his insides. He just, just managed to keep his composure throughout it, but he could feel that he was losing the ability to keep it together.

He couldn't lose it in front of anybody, especially Sonic. Couldn't let him see him sick. There'd be questions he couldn't answer.

"I need to use the bathroom," Sorun suddenly announced, standing up just a bit too quickly from the couch. So quickly that it seemed to have startled Sonic, though this was something Sorun barely paid any mind to.

"Uh... okay?" Sonic quirked an eye towards Sorun as he began walking away. "You feeling alright?"

"Ate something bad in Spagonia." That was the only explanation Sorun offered before turning a corner, which he hoped would prove more than sufficient to get any worries of Sonic's off of him. It better have, because the instant he'd turned a corner and made it out of Sonic's sight, he'd lost his composure and collapsed against the wall.

The spasms on his insides were becoming more and more frequent. There was a pain that accompanied it, too. A deep, stabbing pain that was intense enough that he was barely standing on his feet, needing to use the wall he was crawling across for support. He almost didn't make it to the bathroom at all, every single step being another agonizing moment, but he'd just managed to make it to the door. And he'd probably slammed it behind him harder than he ought to have, but at this juncture he didn't even have the capacity to care.

He'd flung himself onto the toilet without even thinking about it. He hadn't been a moment too soon before he started throwing up into it, which only intensified the pain he was feeling throughout his entire torso. He violently coughed through the bouts of vomiting, and ended up collapsing on the ground with his arms instinctually wrapped around his stomach.

Something was very wrong.

Sorun had thrown up before in his life. They were rare occurrences, when he'd been sick or ate something exceptionally bad, but he knew what vomit tasted like. That acrid, stinging sensation that would assault his senses and the unpleasant taste that would be left in his mouth. And he'd always felt slightly better whenever something made him throw up.

This wasn't that. He felt worse. And he didn't smell and taste an acrid sensation in his mouth. There wasn't a stinging sensation from having his stomach contents ejected from his mouth. This felt... stickier. And there was a pungent smell of iron assaulting his nose, and a similar taste in his mouth. That wasn't vomit. That was something much worse. And Sorun was very afraid of what that was.

Shaking, he slowly unwound his arms and gripped the edges of the toilet. With great effort he lifted his head up to look into the bowl, and when he stared down it, he nearly found himself collapsing back on the floor.

Dark red. The water inside the bowl was stained in dark red.

"Wait... wait, hold on..." Sorun's very vision had begun to shake when he saw the dark contents of the toilet bowl. When he realized what the smell and taste in his mouth was. He felt his breaths become heavier. "Th-that can't be-"

He began to uncontrollably cough again. Every cough was joined by a splash of blood leaving his mouth and splattering against the toilet, staining it further and further. It was enough that he'd bolted up to his feet, almost in fright from seeing all the blood being expunged from his mouth, the feeling of it dripping down from both of his nostrils, but due to the state of his body the sudden rise had caused an intense sensation of vertigo to assault him. He spun on his feet, dizzy and vision spinning, when he'd suddenly felt his foot catch on some of the blood that had been dripped onto the ground.

There was a loud squeak noise, and Sorun found himself slipping over entirely. He thoughtlessly reached his hands out to grab at something, but unfortunately he wasn't able to find anything to grab onto before he felt his head slam into the side of the nearby bathtub. He collapsed right onto the ground after, his body under assault from all sorts of pain. The pain in his abdomen, the throbbing sensation he felt from where his head had been hit, all the fright from seeing all the blood leaving him. It was too much. He couldn't find himself to do anything but remain on the floor, frozen and shaking from it all.

And then, all of a sudden, it stopped.

He didn't know what had happened. One second he'd been paralyzed on the floor in agony from it all. And then, like a switch had been flipped, it had all just stopped. The pain in his abdomen and head had vanished, just like that. Now he felt absolutely nothing. He took a shuddering breath at the sensation, or lack thereof, and slowly placed his hands on the ground and began to pick himself up.

"What... I... what happened...?" He held a hand to his head, noticing the small bump that was beginning to form from where he'd been hit, and then glanced over to the side. There was a red smear from where he'd slipped on his blood previously, and the toilet was still a blood-spattered mess. "Wasn't a dream... what happened?"

Confused, Sorun looked down at his hands. Slightly stained in blood, but otherwise alright. He tightly clenched his hands, but then found his brows creasing after the action.

There was... something wrong. The way his hands felt when he clenched them. He'd still felt it, felt the pressure of the tips of his fingers pressing into his palms, but that had been all he felt. He felt the tendons in his hand constricting to move the fingers. But that was all he felt. He pushed down harder, hard enough that small, red crescents were beginning to form in his palms from the nails digging into them, but while he felt the pressure of it, he didn't feel the stinging sensation he should have felt from his own fingernails stabbing into him.

"What is this? Why don't I feel this?" His heavy breathing returning, Sorun willed a Summoned Sword to appear. Hesitantly, he held his right forearm towards the floating sword after rolling up the sleeve on his shirt and coat. His eyes flicked from the spectral sword to his arm, and then, gritting his teeth, he willed the sword to jab forwards just a bit to dig its tip through his skin.

Nothing. He felt nothing.

Even as the sword shattered and disappeared, and even as he watched blood drip down from the new wound he made in himself, he felt not a single thing other than the pressure of the sword entering him. He did other things, like pinch random places on his body and even hit some areas with his own fists, but no matter what he did, all he felt were the dull sensations of something landing against him each time. He didn't actually feel any physical pain from it.

"Oh..." He found himself collapsing into a sitting position, leaning against the bathtub he'd slammed his head into prior. He couldn't help but laugh at it. A low, bitter chuckle that held absolutely no joy in it whatsoever. "My body's so fucked up from whatever these Emeralds are doing to me that I can't even feel pain anymore..."

A lack of pain. A side effect from the Chaos Emeralds damaging his body, it must have been. Nerve damage, probably, or at least something similar. He didn't know. His medical knowledge was nonexistent, only bits and pieces he'd picked up from his mother. He didn't know nearly enough about the human nervous system to make any kind of guess as to what had been damaged to cause this effect.

Knock, knock!

"Sorun, dear?" That was Bernadette's voice. Concerned, from the sound of it. "Are you alright in there?"

"Shit." He took another glance around at the room, at all the blood splattered everywhere. He couldn't let them see this. Forget them thinking he was sick, what were they going to think if they saw him losing all this blood everywhere? He wouldn't put it past Sonic physically dragging him to the doctor against his will if he saw all this. "Can't let her see this. Need to get rid of it." He grimaced and began standing up, Bringer Claws forming over his back. "Just gotta flush the blood away, mop up the rest with the paper towels they keep by the sink. Make a portal and dump it in the ocean somewhere. Need to hurry..."

"Sorun?"

"Y-yeah, I'm fine!" Sorun called out. He'd already scrambled to the toiled and practically slammed down on the handle, causing it to flush. At the same time his Bringer Claws were frantically grabbing at paper towels, wetting them slightly with water from the sink and proceeding to clean up the blood all over the toilet and floor. "I-I just- I'm just a bit sick, that's all," he answered through the door, grabbing some paper towels of his own to wipe any excess blood off his face.

The door handle began to jiggle. Sorun thanked himself for having had the foresight to blindly hit the locking button on the handle after he'd thrown it closed when he'd burst in here.

"Do you need any help?" Bernadette asked from the other side of the door.

"No, I'm fine!" Most of the blood was mopped up by now from his blue claws. A portal had already been opened with Yamato.

"Are you sur-?"

"I only need a second, ma'am!" The spectral claws were shoving the bloodied paper towels through the portal by the handful. Once done he dispelled them, the portal, and Yamato, the panicking teen then taking a quick and careful look around the bathroom. Floors were clean. Toilet was without a speck of red. Nothing on the bathtub or sink. All seemed good. He took a second glance around the whole room just to be sure. Then a third.

After the fourth one, he breathed out a small sigh. The blood was gone. Evidence gone, washed away in the ocean. It was fine. He just had to keep up the lie and say he had something bad on his trip, that was all.

Rolling the sleeves on his right arm back up, Sorun finally unlocked the door for Mrs. Hedgehog. He found himself stumbling a bit after, but tried playing it off as best he could by making it appear he was just casually leaning against the door frame.

The blue, female hedgehog he was currently looking at in the eye looked very concerned. An uncomfortable amount of concern, all directed at him. There was a deep, worry frown on Bernadette's face, and he saw her eyes repeatedly look past his shoulder and into the bathroom, and then look back towards Sorun's face.

"Sorun, are you alright?" she asked him. "You sounded dreadful just now."

"Yeah. That." Sorun's cheeks tinged red in embarrassment, and he glanced back towards the toilet. "I... there was this professor guy I met on my trip in Spagonia, and he offered me a sandwich. There must have been something in it that didn't agree with me," he explained, turning his head back to the hedgehog. "Humans don't really deal with food poisoning all that well. Or I don't, at least," he continued. "But it was just something I ate. There's no need to worry."

She visibly relaxed a little bit, which Sorun was thankful for. She seemed to believe him. "We could help you to the doctor if-"

He practically heard his mind screaming "no" over and over. "It's fine," he assured her. "I don't need a doctor."

"You're sure? You... is your skin supposed to look so light, Sorun?"

He glanced down at his hands. They were a bit paler than normal. He guessed that wasn't too surprising, given all the blood he'd just lost.

Sorun shook his head. "It's alright, ma'am." He lightly pushed himself off the door frame. "I... actually think I'm going to try and sleep this off, if it's not too much trouble. I'm sorry to have been a bother, ma'am."

"Oh, hush now, Sorun. It's no issue at all. I was just worried." She sent him a warm smile that proved to be too much for him, causing him to turn away from her face. Then he felt the pressure of her hand compressing against the back of his shoulder. "Some rest will do you some good. Please don't strain yourself too much and hopefully you'll feel better when you wake up."

His face still turned away from her, Sorun smiled. An empty, broken smile. "I don't think you'll have to worry too much about me," he assured her, reaching back to softly brush her hand off of him. The smile dropped from his face, and he continued walking forwards without another word.

Eventually he made it back to Sonic's room, on his spare bed. Sonic's racecar bed remained unoccupied by its owner. It was still dusk out, so it wasn't too surprising to him. Either he didn't want to retire this early or his mother explained what had happened to him and he wanted to give Sorun some peace and quiet. He was thankful for it anyways, whatever the case was. He needed some time to himself.

"I don't know how much longer I can keep doing this," Sorun thought, laying in his bead and staring upwards, his own hand hovering above his face. "At what point does absorbing Chaos Emeralds turn into a detrimental process? My powers are compensating less and less for my body failing. I used to be able to fire off hundreds and hundreds of Summoned Swords without batting an eye, back when I first got them. Now I can't so much as shoot off more than a handful or a few of the techniques without getting winded. My stamina keeps getting lowered further and further with each Emerald. And now I have this shit to deal with."

A large part of him, the sensible part, wondered if he would even be in any kind of fighting shape if he absorbed any more Emeralds. That if he went and absorbed the sixth one he'd even be left standing. He was already left with a deadened sense of pain, and he didn't even know how far that truly extended. What if it was brain damage? What if his brain was being damaged from all this Chaos energy coursing through him? What about his organs? For all he knew they were still convulsing and failing inside of his torso, and he just didn't feel it anymore. He didn't even feel nauseous from it.

He could probably keep his symptoms under wraps, especially if he didn't have to worry about pain anymore. That would probably actually work in his favor, but he didn't know if that would do anything for his lessening stamina. He'd felt it the most during his fight with Eggman, when he'd been overtaxing his powers so much he hadn't even lasted a few minutes against him. Fighting weak enemies and taking quick rests between fights kept him going. It was a strategy he'd been relying on this entire time. Extended fights became less and less viable the further this went on. They plain weren't viable anymore for him.

But what if the opposite was true? What if the powers from the final two Emeralds made it worth his body failing? He doubted it, but the possibility was there considering he didn't even know what they were. There was truly no knowing at the end of the day what the final two Emeralds would give him, if he even made it that far.

Five out of seven. So few left, and so little life to give for them anymore.

"... Agh. I guess it doesn't really matter. If we get any more I'll have to absorb them anyway to avoid suspicion from the others." His hand flopped onto the bed besides him, and Sorun found that his eyelids were growing heavier. "I'll deal with it all later. I'm just... really tired now..."

Sorun drifted off to sleep before he even registered his eyelids closing all the way.

Chapter 39

Recursion Error

Episode 39- The man in red

"Yep. There they are alright."

Even in the dead of night it was hard to miss them due to all the lights they were shining around in that little makeshift camp of theirs. Headlights from the APCs parked around, small portable floodlamps that had been set up, the G.U.N. soldiers running around with the flashlights attached to their guns. It was almost impossible to miss them all.

But there they were, in a forest clearing he was staring at from his position up in a tree branch, his eyes searching for the one and only thing that would get a group of G.U.N. soldiers all the way out here in the middle of nowhere. And he saw it plain as day when he spotted a solider walking towards one of the APCs at the back of the makeshift camp, an object clenched in their hands and their sides flanked by more soldiers. A brightly-glowing, gray Chaos Emerald.

"Huh, it was here." Rubrum hummed, looked down at the paper in his hand, and shoved it back into his pocket. He made another hum as he looked down at his feet, towards the duffel bag that was at the end of the branch and nestled against the tree itself. He stared down at the cyan light that was bleeding out of the opening of the bag, and then turned back towards the G.U.N. camp. "Alright, let's get this over with."

He jumped. It was at a height and distance that was impossible for any normal human or Overlander, and at the height he'd been falling any normal man would have had their legs shattered when they finally touched down. But when Rubrum landed on his feet right at the edge of the Overlanders' camp, he didn't seem any worse for wear. In fact, he'd even made a show of slowly and lazily winding his shoulders as he stretched his neck out.

The twenty-odd G.U.N. soldiers he'd landed in front of didn't seem all that impressed by his performance based on the way they were all aiming their weapons and shouting orders at him.

Rubrum sighed, and reached his finger past his hood to dig into his ear when he heard all sorts of orders like "freeze!" and "down on your knees!" being barked at him. All the flashlights from the guns being pointed at him and illuminating his red-dressed visage did little for his mood, too. He felt more annoyed at it all than anything else. At all the guns being pointed at him, the shouting, and the fact he had to go through with this in the first place.

"Gentlemen, gentlemen, I can explain." He gave them the courtesy to at least raise his hands up for them, and spoke loudly enough that he was sure they all heard him. "You see, uh... well, I guess there's really no easy way to say this, is there?" With his right hand still rose up, he pointed towards the APC at the back of the makeshift camp. "Yeah, that Chaos Emerald you guys have stashed back there? I super need it."

The soldiers aiming their guns at him cast unsure glances at each other, the barrels of their weapons still pointed at him. One soldier had called out to him, "You're asking us to give you the gem?"

Rubrum shook his head. "No, I'm telling you I'm taking it. That's what you would call an unequivocal fact." They must not have liked that answer from the way he heard their guns click. The sound of safeties being switched off. This caused him to sigh and lower his arms back down. "What does G.U.N. even want with that thing, anyways?" he asked them. "Was good ol' Tower gonna hand it over to the Freedom Fighters like he did with the green one? Or was he gonna keep it for G.U.N. to have?"

Not a word was said by any of the soldiers. All they gave him were unblinking stares, their rifles fully affixed at Rubrum's body.

"I'm not naïve enough to think the Commander has the best interest of Mobians at heart," Rubrum continued, his voice lowering to an icy tone. "Doesn't really matter what he intended for it. I lost all respect for G.U.N. a long time ago after what you tried to pull."

"Are you with the Freedom Fighters?" This question was asked by the soldier who spoke to Rubrum before, causing the hooded man to shake his head.

"Well, no." Rubrum took a step forwards. "I'd be a pretty terrible Freedom Fighter if-"

The sound of gunfire cut off his words.

Rubrum's body began jerking from the dozens and dozens of high caliber rounds that tore through his body. Wound after gaping wound was opened at various points on his body, and small clouds of blood burst out of his body in time with the staccato beats of the rifles firing into him. After a few seconds of continuous bullets tearing through him, the soldiers stopped firing all at once, leaving Rubrum and his hole-riddled body to slowly teeter back and forth on his feet, and then fall backwards onto his back.

The soldiers who had all fired upon him all looked down at the man's body, their rifles still aimed at his still form. Their forms began to relax when they saw his body remained motionless, after which they began to lower their guns and reach for the radios strapped to their uniforms.

"Aaaand I'm back..."

Rifles were snapped back forwards and stances became rigid when the soldiers all saw, with shaking eyes, Rubrum's body lift back upwards onto his feet, as if pulled up by an invisible force. They watched with bated breath as the wounds and holes in his body began to seal and heal up, with the man himself letting off a small, disappointed sigh as he shook his head.

"I had a feeling you'd do that." Rubrum reached his right arm out to the side. Red energy coiled around his hand, and when he clenched it, an object materialized in his grasp in a fiery burst of red energy. A long, metal claymore sword with a guard stylized as a skull on either side. "Well, it's not like you're the first group of innocent people I had to cut through to get to a Chaos Emerald." Rubrum spun the sword in his hand around once. "'Least you'll be the last."

The soldiers began firing their rifles again. Unlike the first time, though, not a single round ever made it to Rubrum. In a feat of blinding speed his hand began to spin the sword in front of him like a fan blade. Yellow sparks began flying in front of him as bullet after bullet pinged off of the sword, which completely blocked all of the gunfire from ever reaching Rubrum. Despite the futility, though, the soldiers continued to fire at him, and it was only when the last magazine went empty did Rubrum act.

The blade continued to be spun around until Rubrum stopped it in a position that it was pointed at the soldiers. His entire body lunged forwards in a single movement, his form a blur as he and the sword flew towards the group. He stopped right in the middle of the soldiers, and then swung the blade outwards in a wide arc, causing all of the soldiers to dive out of the way and scatter from him.

"You had to push it." Rubrum stabbed his sword forwards. A G.U.N. soldier let out a deathly cry of pain when half of the sword pierced right through his abdomen. "You couldn't have just given it to me." With a single hand holding the sword's handle, Rubrum swung it upwards, causing the soldier's body to fly up in the air. He turned his hooded head at a nearby soldier desperately attempting to load another magazine into his weapon, and then swung his blade outwards and cut him in half right through his midsection. "What the hell did I expect?"

The solider whose body he'd tossed in the air earlier fell back down to his level. Rubrum kicked the body, causing it to fly forwards and crash against another soldier. The body had just bounced off of the Overlander before Rubrum was in front of them, stabbing his sword forwards and piercing through both of their bodies. He whirled around, swinging the sword like it was a weightless thing in front of him and flinging the dead bodies off of it towards more of the G.U.N. soldiers.

He continued killing in this fashion. Dashing around, jumping, and twirling his body with monstrous speed and agility while swinging his sword around as if it weighed nothing. He cut through each soldier quickly and methodically, every life being ended instantly with a single slash or thrust and every swing coating the grass beneath his feet in more and more red. The soldiers left alive, their numbers quickly dwindling by the second, had tried retaliating by firing back on Rubrum, but due to his movements bullets either whizzed by him entirely, or very rarely made contact only for the wound to then instantly regenerate.

Rubrum slid to the side, moving his head slightly away to avoid the gunfire of the soldier in front of him before flicking his claymore outwards, swiftly decapitating him. He then looked forwards, noticing a few of the remaining soldiers standing all the way on the other side of the camp with their weapons aimed at him. He then quickly grabbed his sword with both hands, bringing the handle upwards while pointing the tip of the sword at the soldiers. Red energy began to gather around the upper half of the sword's blade.

And then, Rubrum threw the sword.

Like a helicopter blade, the thrown sword whirled through the air while trailing red lines of raw power behind it. Some of the more quick-thinking soldiers had tried to fire upon the sword, though this proved to be an effort in futility as the bullets impacting the sword did nothing to halt its momentum. The spinning sword cleaved cleanly through the torso of one soldier, and then changed direction entirely. The sword was guided through the air, seemingly under some invisible control, and as much as the soldiers tried, they could do nothing to save themselves from the spinning sword. Some continued to try and fire at the sword while some had tried running, but no matter what they did the sword followed them and cut right through them.

After cleaving through the last soldier, the spinning sword flew back towards Rubrum. He snapped his hand out, effortlessly catching the claymore by the handle and deftly spinning it into a normal grip. He looked around at the camp full of dead bodies, and then turned his concealed eyes towards the APC sitting at the back of the camp.

There was only one soldier left alive. His gun was long dropped at his feet, and he'd pressed his back straight against the APC. His entire body was shaking, eyes fearful and mouth panting heavily as he stared towards Rubrum. His quavering hand was holding a radio, which the panicked soldier was now shouting into.

"Mayday, mayday we need immediate assistance! I repea-!"

Rubrum's body shot forwards, sword pointed out in front of him with a red cone of energy surrounding his entire form. The soldier could only continue to scream at the sight, as Rubrum's approach had been too fast for him to make any sort of movement to avoid him. The sword plunged right through the soldier's body all the way to the skull-shaped hilt, piercing all the way to the inside of the APC. The soldier pinned to the APC by the sword could only look down at the sword piercing through him in mute surprise, and then quickly went limp, the radio dropping from his hand. Rubrum then tore the blade out from the APC and soldier, blood splashing onto him as the soldier's body was unceremoniously flung onto the ground behind him.

Pausing momentarily, Rubrum's hidden eyes looked down at the blood that had been splattered onto his red cloak. His hooded face lingered on the sight, and then turned towards the camp of soldiers he'd just slaughtered. Bodies of G.U.N. soldiers littered the ground, some cut in half, and nearly the entire patch of grass that the camp rested on was dyed in red blood. Rubrum found himself sighing at the sight.

"What a goddamned waste..." A sudden loud, beating sound reaching his ears caused his head to perk up. "Oh, what the fuck is it now?"

His head turned upwards towards the beating sound, and he found himself immediately slumping his shoulders when he saw what it was. There was a helicopter hovering up in the air, having lifted off from some part deeper into the forest, and currently it was hovering just outside of the camp, and pointed right at Rubrum. He couldn't help but notice the long-barreled weapons that were on the underside of the helicopter, and how they began to aim towards Rubrum's body.

Rubrum himself said nothing in response to this. Instead, he flipped his sword around into a reversed grip. Red energy began to gather down the entire length of the blade at the same time that the barrels of the weapons on the helicopter began to spin. Before even a single round could be fired off, though, Rubrum swung his sword.

Upon swinging the sword coursing with red energy, a large, crescent-shaped wave of energy shot out from the blade and flew towards the helicopter. The speed of the red wave proved to be too much for the helicopter to avoid, and as such, it was directly hit by it. The red energy wave cleaved clean through the middle of the helicopter, leaving a red line that ran right through its whole center. Red electricity began arcing out from the red line bisecting the helicopter, and just as the two halves of the flying vehicle began to fall away, they exploded completely, obliterating the helicopter itself and the pilots that had been inside of it. In the end, all that was left was a handful of ashes and small pieces of metallic debris that fell to the ground below.

Silently, Rubrum flipped his sword back around into a normal grip, and then lightly swung the blade to remove the excess red power still clinging to the blade. Satisfied, he took one last glance at the helicopter wreckage, and then a final look at the blood-soaked camp, and finally turned around towards the APC.

He found himself maneuvering towards the back of the APC. One quick cut with his sword found its back being cleaved right off, which Rubrum then proceeded to grab and throw away. He then turned to the interior of the APC, carefully walking in as he observed what was in front of him.

There wasn't much to say about the inside of the APC. White lights dotting the small roof made the small room well-lit. It was mostly empty, too, save for rows of seats lining each side and a small, metal pedestal sitting in the center. A pedestal upon which sat the gray Chaos Emerald he'd seen from earlier. Rubrum tilted his head a bit when he saw it splattered with blood, and then looked to the left, where he saw a blood-splattered hole pierced into the wall. He let out a small hum when he realized that had been where he'd pierced that final soldier through.

"All this blood for a fuckin' rock," he mumbled under his breath as he turned back to the Emerald. "Why is it that the gray one always gives me so much trouble?" He sighed, and then released his grip on the claymore sword. It disappeared in a flash of fiery, red energy. "Well, whatever the case, it's finished. Now all's left is to drop this thing off to him..."

New Megaopolis

"And here we go again..."

Coming into this place had been about as easy as any other place Rubrum went to these days. Physically entering was never an issue for him. It was the emotional aspect and the fact that just walking into this place, being near those men, made his skin itch and hand twitch for his sword. But, as always, he held back. It took nearly all his willpower each and every time, but he'd managed to hold back.

He was currently up on the ceiling of a large control room. Computers everywhere, walkways leading to doors, a typical sight. And right below the cross beam he was sitting on was a short Overlander in a green coat working on a computer. The second man below him, Rubrum's main focus, was in a floating chair that was hovering in the middle of the room, his fingers dancing over the keyboard of a computer monitor he was currently scowling at.

Eggman and Snively. Two people Rubrum hated above all others. And he had to give them a Chaos Emerald. Again.

"Ugh... Feels like I'm getting stabbed in the gut again every time I do this," Rubrum thought to himself. "Well, at least I get to punch Snively in the face again. That'll cheer me up a little bit."

Adjusting the strap keeping the duffle bag secure against his body, Rubrum dropped down from the cross beam and landed in a crouch right on top of the computer Snively was working on.

Naturally, a figure dropping down right in front of him out of the blue had startled Snively. But then his eyes scanned over Rubrum's form, and they widened dramatically when he seemed to recognize who he was. He even made a small "eep" noise, which brought Rubrum some small amount of satisfaction.

"Hey," Rubrum greeted, still crouched down.

"... Hi," Snively greeted back, swallowing heavily as his body began to lightly quiver.

"Looks like somebody messed your face up." Rubrum leaned in a bit closer, taking note of the bandage wrapped around Snively's long nose and the faded wounds dotting his face. "Guess what, I'm gonna mess it up even more."

"No, no wait-!"

Rubrum's hand snapped forwards and gripped Snively's throat, silencing him from speaking further. The short Overlander gagged out and began flailing his limbs as Rubrum lifted him up off his feet, and then curled his other hand into a fist as he prepared to assault Snively's face.

"Stop."

Rubrum paused when he heard Eggman's voice. He quirked his hooded head to the side, looking upwards at the man in his floating chair with the Doctor's struggling nephew still in his grasp. The chair had spun around so that it was facing Rubrum's direction, with Eggman himself leaning to the side of it with a bored expression on his face.

"... 'Stop'?" Rubrum repeated. "You remember there's a little something that starts with 'Metal' and ends with 'Sonic' that says there's nothing you can do to stop me, right? Case in point." He punched Snively in the face, his body jerking as a pained cry left him. "See? Look at this." He punched him again. "This is free. It's free, baby."

He wondered if Eggman even believed Rubrum when he said there was nothing Eggman could do to stop him beating his nephew like this. It wasn't like he was even bluffing, there really was nothing he could do, but he expected at least one single twitch of his mustache at the sight of him abusing his nephew. Some sign of frustration that Rubrum could see and take to heart so he could tell himself it was at least a little worth it.

But no. Eggman just passively looked on with that same bored, unimpressed expression he wore on his face. And it made Rubrum feel like the frustrated one.

Eventually Snively's form went limp in Rubrum's grasp. He stopped punching him, drank in the sight of his bruised face with just a fraction of the satisfaction he'd hoped to feel, and then looked down to confirm that, yes, he was unconscious. So it was with a whiny sigh that Rubrum tossed the unconscious body away and then looked up at Eggman. "You're taking all the fun out of this," he said.

"You honestly think I care you keep beating my nephew to a pulp? It's a mild annoyance at best for how much he keeps whining about it around me," Eggman said.

"And yet, you keep him around."

"He has his uses. And what's family for?" Eggman asked, giving a half-shrug. "I do find myself asking why you're so insistent on assaulting him at every opportunity you find, though."

Rubrum looked back towards Snively's motionless form. His hidden eyes glared heatedly at the body, after which he turned back to Eggman. "He's the second person I hate most in the world. You're first."

"Really? Snively? Snively ?" The incredulity in Eggman's voice was so apparent it almost seemed overexaggerated. "I understand hating me, it's a given seeing everything I've strived for, but him? I'm almost insulted you hold him in such high regard next to me. My lackey of a nephew. What could he have possibly done to earn your ire?"

"He did something unforgiveable." Rubrum's response had been so immediate and quickly given that it made Eggman quiet down from surprise. "That's all."

After he finished talking, Rubrum jumped up. Eggman's chair slowly swiveled around, the Doctor's spectacled eyes following him as Rubrum landed in a sitting position on one of the high monitors located next to Eggman. He crossed one leg over the other, propped his head on one fist, and used the other hand to point at Eggman.

"Enough about your nephew, though. Let's talk about you," Rubrum said. "Your empire's seen better days, huh?"

"... Feh. I don't know what you're talking about," Eggman claimed, waving a hand in Rubrum's direction and turning around to a different computer monitor. "The Eggman Empire's stronger than ever."

"Is it, though?" Rubrum asked. "Is it really?"

"Of course it is!" Eggman spread his arms out wide, gesturing to all the computer monitors scattered around them. "Look around at my city. My city. An unconquerable fortress from which I can build my empire up at my leisure."

"Sure, yeah, you got one city. And yeah, you have so much power congregated here that there's not really anything anybody could do if you decided to just dig yourself in here and stay indefinitely. I mean, that's pretty much what you did," Rubrum conceded. "Your empire's lookin' a bit small these days, though. You used to have factories all over the place, and pretty much every single important settlement worth mentioning was under your name. Now, though?" With a small laugh, Rubrum shrugged his shoulders. "All your factories got trashed by the Freedom Fighters. The Overlanders and G.U.N. are taking back more of their territory on the daily. Meanwhile on the Mobian side of things your forces got reduced to such a pathetic number that they managed to push all your robots back and take their land back." He scoffed. "Face it, man. You went from having all the territory to almost none of it." Rubrum held his hand up and began counting off his fingers. "All 'cause of a ragtag group of Freedom Fighters, a displaced government agent and science experiment, a princess, a hedgehog... and some guy with a katana."

To his credit, Eggman didn't so much as bristle at any of Rubrum's observations. He did, however, become somewhat straighter in his seated position. "I still have an entire Egg Fleet at my beck and call that I can use at any moment," he reminded him. "Knothole's very destruction is but a press of a button away."

"And I have no doubt your finger is just itching to press that button with how current events have been treating you." Rubrum reached behind him, unslung the duffel bag, and then opened the top. "Before you resort to that, though, I got another gift for you."

He flicked his wrist in such a way that something inside of the duffel bag flew out of it towards Eggman. The Doctor deftly caught the object before it impacted with his face, and let out a interested hum afterwards as he examined the object. Rubrum, meanwhile, re-slung the duffel bag over his torso.

"... And here I thought you said you were done giving me gifts," Eggman said, looking up from the gray, bloodstained Chaos Emerald in his hand. "What ever happened to that?"

Rubrum shrugged. "I lied. I do that a lot."

"Hmph..." He looked back down at the Emerald. "Do you always have to bring me these things when they're so filthy? Honestly, it's beyond me what you do to them to get them bloodied like this."

"Boo-hoo, surprised you even care about something like that considering how much blood you already have on your hands."

"I have high standards, thank you very much." Holding out the bloodied Emerald out in front of him, Eggman made a gagging sound and attempted to use the sleeve of his red coat to try and wipe the blood off. All this proved to do was smear the blood further along the gray gem's surface, though, causing him to grumble and place it down at the control console of his chair. "Why are you doing this?"

Rubrum waved a hand. "Because it's all in accordance with His will. I thought I already explained this to you. It's His bright idea, not mine."

The answer caused Eggman to groan. "Yes, yes, it's vaguery after vaguery with you, isn't it?" He pinched the bridge of his nose with one hand and gestured towards Rubrum with another. "If there's nothing else then just leave me be. I have better things to do than be listening to you." He turned to look back down the Emerald, and began leering at it. "Much, much better things."

"You do that." Rubrum pushed himself forwards and slid off the ceiling beams, dropping down and landing on the metal floor. "Give the cretin my regards when he wakes up," he added, nodding towards Snively's form as he turned to leave.

The only thing he received in response was a huff from Eggman, who was more focused on the Chaos Emerald in his hands than Rubrum himself. This went largely ignored by Rubrum, who walked away towards one of the nearby doors, pressed a nearby button, and waited for the door to slide open. He immediately walked through and hit the button behind him to close the door back up, after which he stopped, grabbed the duffel bag strapped to him, and removed it from his body.

"It's almost too easy," he mumbled to himself, staring down the opening and into the bag. The bright glow of a cyan-colored Chaos Emerald met his gaze, causing him to scoff, close the bag back up, and re-strap it to himself. "So," he mumbled out, digging into his pocket to bring out the piece of notebook paper he carried, "what's next?"

Chapter 40

Recursion Error

Episode 40- Love. It's crazy.

"Oh, he ain't even trying at this point."

It'd been a normal morning for Sorun. Wake up, fall back asleep, and then wake back up to begin his day. And that's what he'd been doing, right up until he'd gotten to the open doorway to Sonic's room. He stopped when he noticed there was something down there, near the bottom of the doorway. A small glint of light gleaming off a string that was tied down in a line near the floor. A tripwire.

"Another one of his pranks." Internally scoffing, Sorun carefully stepped over the barely-visible string and looked up to confirm his suspicions. He wasn't at all surprised to see that there was a bucket of what he assumed to be water resting on top of the door frame, propped up from the open door it was sitting under. "Not your most creative one, Sonic."

It was always small, harmless jokes that Sonic played on him, but usually they were leagues more creative than this. Like that time he'd hollowed out a bar of soap and but a bath bomb inside of it, and then waited for Sorun to take a shower with it. Somehow Sorun didn't feel that a tripwire quite compared to that.

He changed his mind when he stepped over the tripwire, only to feel something compress under his foot when he stepped around it.

"Huh- oh." He deeply frowned when he looked closer at where he stepped, and noticed there was a smaller, even more thin tripwire he hadn't seen beforehand behind the one he'd tried stepping around. "Sonic, you sly-"

The bucket flung forwards, and Sorun found himself drenched in water from the bucket. He sighed and let his arms limply fall against his side when he heard two things: the bucket clattering against the ground, and laughter. He made a deep sigh as he looked up, where he saw the source of the laughter.

He rarely ever saw a grin that smug on Sonic's face as he watched him step from around the corner. He knew the grin irritated him, but as much as he wanted to, Sorun couldn't be too mad at the hedgehog. He was more mad at himself for having fallen for such a prank. And in a way he could respect Sonic for getting him like that.

"You're that upset about the peanut butter I put in your gloves while you were sleeping?" Sorun asked, flicking his arms to try and throw off as much moisture as he could.

"Well, you don't wear gloves, so you don't know what it's like washing those things out," Sonic said back to him. "I thought I'd return the favor and save you a morning shower."

Sorun made a "tch" sound and rolled his eyes, while Sonic continued to silently snicker at him while holding his stomach in amusement. He began walking forwards, his wet, bare feet making a squishing sound against the floor as he moved.

"Fine, you got me. Good one," Sorun said. "Have fun cleaning this up before your parents find out you made the whole hallway wet."

"Ah-ha-ha... what?"

Clicking his tongue, Sorun clapped the now-frozen hedgehog on the shoulder and flashed him a small grin. "The price of victory is sometimes steep, Sonic."

"Oh, man..."

It was with a small, perturbed frown that Sorun looked at it. The seemingly harmless carton of orange juice that was just sitting there in the fridge. Innocent on the surface, and indeed, by all means harmless. But every time he looked at the drink he was reminded of the reason why he was on Mobius in the first place, and that him dying was partially the fault of the fact he'd had a craving for the stuff that night.

Nevertheless, he still liked the taste of the stuff, so he grabbed it, poured himself a glass, put the carton back, and closed the fridge.

"You seen Virgil anywhere?" Sorun asked, turning back towards the dinner table. Sonic was sitting at one end, arms crossed with an untouched bowl of cereal in front of him. Sorun had maneuvered to the other end of the table, where his own bowl of cereal was waiting for him. "He kinda wanders around sometimes."

Sonic shook his head as Sorun sat down in the opposite seat. "No, I haven't seen your little terror around anywhere," he said. "Sorun, why does your Chao hate me so much?"

"He doesn't hate you," Sorun denied after taking a sip of his juice. "He just has a specific way of showing affection."

"By trying to cut me?"

"What are you complaining about? Him trying to cut you is like somebody trying to cut a block of steel with safety scissors. You're super tough."

"Yeah, but it still hurts, man."

Sorun scoffed through his teeth, a small, almost nonexistent smirk on his face. "I don't know, Sonic. He likes and dislikes people." He sent the hedgehog an inquisitive look. "Can't you just ask him? You have that alien translator implant, don't you?"

Shaking his head, Sonic said, "It doesn't work on Chao."

"... The universal translator made by aliens that works on literally any species doesn't work on Chao," Sorun deadpanned.

"Look, I don't know how it works," Sonic told him. "Aliens, sure, dogs, apparently, but Chao?" He shrugged. "All I get whenever I try are just chao's. Chao are weird like that."

"That they are," Sorun agreed, some small amount of disappointment in his tone. He'd always been somewhat curious on what Virgil could say if he could talk, and he'd been hoping Sonic could provide him some answers with his translator. But Chao just had to be the special exception to that, for some reason or another. Chaos reasons, most likely.

Putting it out of his mind, Sorun reached towards his spoon, grabbed it, and frowned. It was something he'd been having to get used to, not being able to feel cold. The ability to feel temperature was lost with his ability to feel pain. It was somewhat convenient, he supposed, as he never got too hot or too cold anymore, but at the same time it was somewhat maddening as he couldn't feel the small things he was finding he'd taken for granted. Like wind brushing against his face. He still felt the wind, but he didn't feel the chilling touch that came with it anymore. Better than not feeling it at all, he supposed, which was probably the only reason he hadn't gone crazy from it.

Or the spoon he was holding for another instance. He still felt it, the object in his hand, the weight of it. The shape. Its smooth texture. He couldn't feel the cold from the metal, though.

If he didn't know he was dying pretty soon, he would have been more concerned over it. But knowing the end was near had a way of numbing it for him, so he'd adapted to it relatively well so far. It wasn't like the inability to feel pain wasn't that inconvenient in the first place. And as long as he read the dials on handles alright and watched himself he didn't think he'd be accidentally burning himself on hot water or something like that anytime soon. And if he did, well, it wasn't like it mattered all that much.

"I still don't see why you eat cereal dry," Sonic commented as he watched Sorun eat a spoonful of cereal. "What's wrong with milk in your cereal?"

"Only maniacs eat cereal with milk, or any solid mixed with liquid," Sorun said as he swallowed the cereal. "Same reason I hate soup and refuse to partake in it."

Sonic gave him a sideways look. "So... everybody's a maniac, then?"

"Feels like it sometimes," Sorun said as he ate another spoonful of cereal.

Sonic rolled his eyes at that. "Yeah, right," he remarked. "So what's your plan for today?"

"Tails is repairing some stuff on the Special. Asked me for help," he answered. "And by 'help' he means 'use your Bringer Claws to carry the big, heavy stuff so I can do it faster', but he worded it really nicely, so I said yes. I'm gonna go find Sally later to make sure she doesn't need me for anything, and after that I'm swinging by the hangar."

"You've been helping him out a lot recently, huh?"

Sorun shrugged. "He's a nice kid. Hard to say no to."

"Ah-huh." Sonic began tapping his finger against the table. A small grin was forming on his mouth. "Same kid that made the portal that brought you here. You seem really chummy with him now."

The spoon stopped halfway to the bowl. Sorun held it there, his body frozen, and as his eyes glanced up to meet Sonic's he sighed and dropped the spoon altogether. "You're bringing this up again?" Sorun asked him. When Sonic opened his mouth to talk back, Sorun beat him to the punch and said, "I will talk about any other topic than this one, Sonic. I'm not in the mood."

"Alright," Sonic agreed, sitting back in his seat to fully face Sorun. "You ever liked a girl before?"

Sorun was somewhat glad he chose that point to stop eating cereal, as he was fairly certain he would have choked on his food if he'd heard that while eating. "What...?" Sorun asked, his voice barely above a choked whisper.

"Y'know, a girl," Sonic repeated. "Like, was there anybody back in your zone you ever liked?"

"Oh." Sorun felt his shoulders sag a bit in relief. He'd tensed up pretty hard thinking Sonic had meant something else. "Nah, not really," he said, shaking his head.

Sonic looked a bit surprised at that. "Seriously? Nobody ever?"

"Nah, nobody wanted to date the short guy in class, Sonic."

"Ooh." Sonic winced at that and gave Sorun a sympathetic look. "Well, uh... there's nobody like that here," he added, and Sorun felt himself tensing back up. "You ever think about-?"

"How 'bout you, Sonic?" Sorun interrupted, pointing his spoon at the suddenly-flustered hedgehog. "Is there a girl you like?"

Sorun found himself taking great pleasure in how uncomfortable Sonic suddenly looked. "Hey, come on, I was asking you-!"

"And I said no. So no we're on to you," Sorun reasoned, giving Sonic an innocent smirk. "You're the one that changed the topic to this, and I already answered you. Now you have to answer me. It's only fair."

The blue Mobian looked like he wanted to fight the logic from the way his face scrunched up in concentration. He seemed to fail at finding an answer from the sudden look of defeat that grew on his face, though, and it was with a small groan he went a bit limp in his seat. Sorun celebrated the small victory with more cereal.

"Yeah, fine..." Sonic mumbled out, making Sorun raise his eyebrows in surprise. "There was... someone."

"Was it Amy?" Sorun asked between mouthfuls of cereal. "I know she has a thing for you."

Sonic looked about ready to gag when he heard that. "No, it's not her," he denied with a shake of his head. "I get she likes me, and she's a great friend, but I don't... really feel that way towards her, you know?"

He supposed he did. "Yeah, sure," he agreed with a nod. "So who is it?"

"Was," Sonic corrected, "and it was... it was Sally, alright?"

This time Sorun did choke on his cereal. He roughly coughed a few times to loosen the food particles stuck in his throat, and then affixed Sonic with a look of disbelief. He felt his eyes widen when he saw Sonic giving him a truthful, somewhat embarrassed look. "Wow, seriously? You went for the princess?" Sorun gasped out. "You really aim high, don'tcha?"

That was probably the last answer he'd been expecting. Granted he didn't know what to expect, and he supposed there was no reason it couldn't happen, but her ? Sally had a sense of humor and was always up to lighthearted fun, he knew that, but compared to somebody like Sonic she may as well have been a no-nonsense commander. It was practically night and day.

Apparently opposites did attract.

"Would you not say it like that?" The amount of embarrassment Sonic was displaying would have Sorun rolling on the floor laughing if he wasn't so stupefied at the moment. "We've known each other since we were kids and have been Freedom Fighters together for that long. So, you know, over time it... just kinda happened."

Plausible enough, Sorun supposed. Years fighting a tyrannical dictator with a close group of friends had to develop some relationships. Antoine and Bunnie were living proof of that. "But you're not together anymore?" Sorun asked. When Sonic shook his head, he asked, "Why not?"

"It was after the whole space thing," Sonic muttered. "I get thrown halfway across the universe, and then take weeks to get back here only to find out I was gone for almost a whole year." He threw his hand up after saying that. "How does that even make sense? How can time move faster here than how it was moving out there?"

"Probably something with the Theory of Relativity." When Sonic gave him a questioning look, Sorun explained with, "It says light is equal to time or something like that, so the farther away you are, uh... you know what, I don't really know, ask Tails."

Sonic rolled his eyes. "Some good reading that book did you, huh?"

"Gimme a break. I stopped reading after I figured portals out," Sorun mumbled. "So you get back from space. Then what happens?"

"Ah, it was during one of Mina's concert. There was this big celebration going on. Sally got... I don't even know what to call it, she just..." After struggling to find the words, Sonic sighed and shook his head. "Me being lost in space for so long did something to her. She didn't want to lose me again, so she flat-out said she didn't want me going out there fighting Eggman."

Sorun silently scoffed. He already knew what answer Sonic would have said. "And naturally you said no."

"Of course I did!" Sonic exclaimed, standing up. "It's not like there's any other super-fast hedgehogs out there to fight him! There's Shadow, but he's with G.U.N. doing his thing," he said. "I fight Eggman because I can do it and make it back okay, and because if I'm the one doing it then people who can't who'd come back way messed up or worse trying don't have to. I fight him to protect everybody." He sighed and flopped back in his seat. "But yeah, she didn't see it like that."

"How bad did it go?"

"She slapped me in front of everybody at the concert and ran off."

Sorun winced and hissed through his teeth. "Oooh, that's... yeah, that's bad." He felt like he'd been slapped himself just hearing that.

"You're tellin' me," Sonic mumbled in agreement. "She even called me selfish. Can you believe that?"

He couldn't, actually. Sonic, selfish? Sonic was the most selfless person Sorun knew. His reasons for fighting, the very reasons he'd just explained, was so selfless Sorun found a hard time seeing what part of it was selfish.

He almost heard whispers of Dante when he heard Sonic speak. About one fighting to protect what one loved.

"No, none of your reasoning is selfish. Sally's wrong." He almost felt a bit angry hearing what she did. Her saying that? He really wouldn't have believed it if it came from anybody other than Sonic. She seemed so level-headed that she was one of the last people Sorun would expect to do something like that. In front of a crowd of people, no less.

Love made people do strange things, apparently. He guessed he could see where she came from in doing that if he looked at it from that angle. Even then he could still scarcely believe it.

"Don't gotta lay it on that thick," Sonic said, scratching at one of his ears. "I... kinda get why Sally did what she did, I don't really blame her, but I just couldn't do something like that, you know? So we broke it off." He sighed, crossed his arms, and looked down. "We were kinda apart for a while after that, but we were still friends. Bunch of stuff happened afterwards, but otherwise everything was still good. Then Eggman and the Emeralds happened and, well... I guess it took our minds off the break up, because we kinda got back to normal after that. Too much going on, I guess."

"You still miss being with her?"

"... I don't know. We've both moved on, Sorun, and I don't really wanna go digging the past up like that, but... I just don't know."

"Mm." Sorun nodded at Sonic, and then took a last bite of cereal. He removed the spoon from his mouth, and then scowled a bit when he saw a bit of red straining the metal. "That's really rough, man," Sorun told him as he sat up from his seat, empty dishes in hand.

As Sorun stopped in front of the sink, Sonic nodded. "Yeah, tell me about it." He craned his head backwards just as Sorun finished rinsing his spoon off. "Would you have done the same thing if someone you really liked asked you to do that?" he asked.

Sorun, halfway through washing his bowl, paused in thought. He only needed a few seconds before resuming with washing the bowl. "I don't really think me sitting around with all my powers would be a good use of them," Sorun answered. He set aside the cleaned bowl and reached for the empty glass he brought over before continuing to speak. "Of course I don't want to fight, but I want to see people hurt even less. And like it or not I have the powers and know how to use them. If somebody asked me to stop just so I wouldn't get hurt..." He paused to let out a rueful chuckle. "Well, I guess I'd hope that they'd see my position and understand. And if they wanted to break up, that's as much their choice as it is my choice to continue to fight. A really big shame, but not much to do about it. That's the way it is, I guess."

"Yeah, I figured pretty much the same. That's why I never pushed it with Sally after we broke up," Sonic agreed. A single, small laugh escaped him. "It's really funny hearin' ya say all that, though. Kinda reminds me of that talk we had the first night you were here. You remember that?"

"I have no recollection of this night you speak of." Finished washing his dishes, and turning the faucet off a bit rougher than he ought to have, Sorun spun around to face Sonic while leaning against the sink. He roughly tapped on the kitchen counter when he saw that knowing smirk on Sonic's face. "I still think she made a wrong call," he said in an effort to steer back towards the previous topic, "but... I guess I can't really talk, never having been in the same position. That and all the princess stuff she has to deal with, leading the Freedom Fighters..." He shrugged and pushed off the sink. "Yeah, I don't know. She's got a lot of stuff to deal with. No telling what goes on in her head with all that."

Sonic gave him an agreeing nod. "Yeah, she's... she's real strong like that," he said. "Really amazes me sometimes."

Sorun said nothing in response to this. Instead, his eyes drifted over to a nearby clock, and then back to Sonic. "I gotta go," he said.

"Alright. Seeya," Sonic said, waving at Sorun as he made it to the front door. Sorun briefly waved back at Sonic, quickly slipped on the pair of black boots by the door, and then departed without another word.

Sorun was fairly certain that he was in the clear for any Freedom Fighter stuff for today. Most of the time he was told in advance if something he was needed for was coming up, and if he was needed immediately somebody was usually sent for him if he wasn't already at the HQ, which most days he was. But ever since Eggman's forces had been pushed all the way back to his city, freeing up everywhere else, his role as a Freedom Fighter had been... diminished, somewhat. Everybody's had, really, as there wasn't nearly as much fighting that needed to be done as there used to be.

A blessing for Sorun, he supposed, as it meant less opportunities to risk his neck, and the same went for everybody else. It was also a sign that they were actually winning this thing, and it made him feel a bit more at ease. Above that, though, it gave him more excuses to laze about, which he would have used this day to exploit to the fullest if it wasn't for the fact he made prior obligations to Tails. But that could come later. First was to find Sally and make sure he was actually free for the day.

Which brought him here, to Castle Acorn. He'd only ever been here three time, once when he'd been escorted by Sally, once when he'd been invited, and another time when he'd basically broken in. Ignoring that latter event, Sorun was never actually sure if he was allowed to just waltz into the place unannounced. With an escort, maybe, but on his own? He was pretty confident it was okay, being a Freedom Fighter had to have some perks and seeing as he was technically a foreigner he could make an argument for not being familiar with the customs involved in this, but he'd rather just avoid all that hassle entirely. Which usually meant he'd avoid the castle entirely, but he'd already teleported to Freedom HQ, and Sally hadn't been there. So if she wasn't here, that meant she was likely in the castle somewhere. The castle Sorun wasn't too sure he was allowed free entrance into.

The solution he came up with was that he was just going to sneak in. Usually this wouldn't be a feat he'd be able to accomplish; The surrounding area and the castle itself may have been big, but they also had plenty of guards keeping watch at all times to ensure nobody could sneak past them. And usually that remained true. But Sorun had the ability to Trick, so the plan was for him to just teleport to a nearby window and then search around until he found Sally.

Of course, that plan fell apart when he just happened to catch Sally on a nearby hill overlooking the castle. He counted himself lucky for the encounter that saved him having to snoop around the castle, and then a mischievous idea came to him. Nothing too harmful; he just wanted to give her a bit of a scare. So he Tricked right behind her, tapped her shoulder, and whispered, "Boo."

"Eek!" She immediately whirled around, hands reflexively forming into a defensive posture. She relaxed when she saw it was just Sorun, though her expression did turn a bit sour when she saw the Earthling snickering at her. "Ugh, Sorun!"

"In my defense it's really hard not to abuse that," Sorun said in defense of himself. "Anyways, hey. I just came to ask if there was anything I needed to do today, because I promised to help Tails with something later on so I was, y'know, just making sure."

She crossed her arms. "You came to make sure of that after promising to help him?"

"... Admittedly it probably wasn't my smartest move."

With a roll of her eyes, Sally said, "No, Sorun, I didn't have anything for you to do. Ever since Eggman got forced all the way to New Megaopolis, there... well, there hasn't really been much for the Freedom Fighters to do. All's been really quiet." She sighed quietly and turned around, back towards the direction of the castle. "I'd be concerned that all the quiet means he's preparing something big in retaliation for everything we've done, but without any safe way into New Megaopolis, there's not really anything we can do but prepare in the meantime."

Sorun hummed in agreement. She was right; there wasn't anything to do but wait for him to make a move. For him now it was just waiting to get the last of the Emeralds. He enjoyed the reprieve, but he couldn't help but also note the uneasiness that came with it. It seemed that Sally suffered from the same worries as him.

"So... what are you doing all the way up here, staring so forlornly out at the castle like that?" Sorun asked, attempting to steer the conversation away.

She shook her head. "I'm not forlorn." She looked to the side at a nearby rock, and then walked over to it. She then proceeded to sit down on the rock, her eyes still cast on the castle in the distance. "I'm just thinking. Now that Eggman isn't such an overbearing threat on us, I can focus my attention on other things."

"Oh, yeah? Like what?"

"Just the future, I guess," she airily answered. "You ever think about the future?"

"... I try not to," Sorun said as he sat down on the ground besides the rock Sally sat on.

"Really?" She turned her head to him and gave him an inquisitive look. "Why not?"

"Because what's there for me when this is all done with? The whole Freedom Fighter thing?" Nothing but oblivion, he supposed, but he asked in part to direct the conversation and in part to avoid delving into that subject matter. He scoffed and briefly flipped a hand up. "It's practically all I got goin' for me, Sally, but that can't last forever. So what's left for me after that?" He sighed and shook his head. "I don't know, so I try not to look too hard into it. I'll just deal with it when it gets here."

"That's a pragmatic way of looking at it, I suppose," Sally said. "But it's not like you won't have your life to look forwards to living once this war is over, right?"

Sorun had to resist making a withering sigh. "Ah-huh." He began tapping at the ground. "So you were saying about the future you were thinking of?"

Nodding, Sally turned back towards the direction of the castle. "Just what you would expect. The future of my family, friends, my kingdom and people... Mostly, though, I've been thinking about my future. What life for me will be like once the war is over. It's not like we haven't been able to balance living normal lives in-between being Freedom Fighters, so it won't be that big a shift, but... I just wonder about things." She sighed. "Hey, Sorun? Have you ever... liked somebody? Romantically speaking?"

"... Are we seriously doing this again?" Sorun sighed through his nose, just barely grinning as he shook his head in slight disbelief. "Not really, no," he answered. "What about you?"

"Well, you might find this hard to believe, but, well..." She began to nervously rub at her arm. "There was a time where Sonic and I were... together."

"Oh my god, we are doing this again." Sorun shook his head again. He could have just said he knew the story already from Sonic, but he refrained from doing so. He was too curious at hearing her side of the story, so he decided to just pretend he didn't know anything in the hopes he could figure out what made her act the way she did. "So what happened?" he asked, feigning ignorance.

"It was after when the Xorda invaded us, when they deployed this giant weapon. I told you about it once, right?"

"Sometime way back, sure."

"Right, well, Sonic sacrificed himself to save us all from it, because of course he would, but instead of dying he... somehow got lost in space," she said. "He says it only took him weeks to make his way back to Mobius, but for us here it was almost a whole year." Her voice suddenly grew quiet. "It... hurt for so long, thinking he was gone. Like there was a hole in my chest that just wouldn't heal itself, and until he just suddenly showed up completely fine one day it wouldn't stop hurting." A light smile found its way onto her face. "But then he did show up one day. He finally made it back, and I... I honestly thought I was looking at a ghost until I held him in my arms and he explained to me what happened.

"For a while after that everything was fine, but then... but then that night had to happen." Sally suddenly began scowling. "It was during one of Mina's concerts. We got into an argument." She made a frustrated sigh. "He actually wanted to go straight back to fighting Eggman, and I told him I didn't want him doing that. He wouldn't budge, so I gave him an ultimatum, right then and there: it was either staying with me or fighting Eggman."

"So what'd you do when he chose Eggman over you?"

Her eyes drifted down at Sorun, almost looking annoyed that he'd said that with so much certainty and had been right. She then turned back to the castle. "I slapped him and called him selfish in front of everybody."

"What a shocker." Sorun turned his head up at Sally. "Don't you think that was a bit much?" he asked her. "Slapping the guy?"

Sally looked back down at Sorun, her eyes locking with his. "What do you mean by that?"

"I mean that I think you were the selfish one for doing that," he said with a straight face.

There was a myriad of emotions that flickered across Sally's face in a short amount of time. So much that Sorun couldn't quite figure out what she was thinking when he said that until the very end, when she levelled at him with an unusually calm look. "Why do you think that?" she asked, and Sorun couldn't help but note how her voice lost a bit of its normal tone.

Slightly worried on the inside and remaining completely calm on the outside, Sorun turned his head towards the castle. "Sonic is the most selfless person I've ever met in my entire life. On an emotional level I can't comprehend the guy," Sorun admitted, making Sally's eyes widen slightly. "What I do understand is that he deeply loves everybody. Not just his friends and family, not even just his neighbors, but just people in general. It's... startling to me, how one person like him can care so much. So I'm not surprised at all that Sonic chose fighting Eggman over you."

Reaching down by his side, Sorun grabbed a small pebble and chucked it down the hill. "Sonic," Sorun continued, "fights him because he loves everybody. He can't stand the idea that there's somebody like Eggman out there hurting people at his whim, destroying families and whole villages. And he gets to be special in that he's one of the very few people in the world with the power to do something about it." He threw another stone. "He fights because he's one of the only people that actually can fight. He does it because, above all else, he wants to use his power to protect everybody he loves, which just happens to be everybody. You included."

He threw a third stone and waited for Sally to respond. It took her quite a few seconds, but eventually she quietly asked him, "Isn't that the same reason you came back here after you ran? Because you wanted to use your powers to protect?"

"... Something like that." A fourth stone. "The desire to protect isn't exactly unique; what makes him unique is that it's a desire to protect everyone. Sonic's just special in that he can make it a reality with his abilities. And your leadership. And with help from all his friends with their own skills. And very recently some idiot who eats Chaos Emeralds like he eats chili dogs." A fifth stone. "You... must have been somebody really special to him if he chose to give you that kind of love when he gives so much love to everybody else. That's why I think it was selfish of you for forcing that kind of choice on him. He wasn't going to choose his own love over everybody else, because he's just too selfless to do something like that. You may as well have just said you were breaking up with him and saved everybody the drama."

As he was tossing a sixth stone, he heard Sally sigh out loud. "I know," she said. "That stubbornly selfless nature of his is one of the reasons I fell in love with him in the first place. It's also why I just couldn't do it anymore," she mumbled out. "I was there mourning at his grave every single day while he was in space. My heart was in pieces , Sorun, and when he came back and suddenly everything was better but he wanted to go back to risking his life, I just..." She closed her eyes and shook her head. "I couldn't go through with that again. That heartache. I don't know if I'd be able to bear it."

Sorun didn't say anything at first. He simply just rolled a seventh pebble in the palm of his hand, staring down at it as he silently thought. "I've never had my heart broken, so I can't sympathize. But I think I can understand why you did what you did." He threw the pebble. "You don't think abandoning the guy over a what-if was a bit hasty, though? Especially seeing as the war is going in our favor? That what-if won't even be a reality once Eggman is gone."

Sally opened her eyes back up and stared out at the castle. "Maybe," she hesitantly agreed, "but it's all in the past now. We've moved on, we're friends again, and I don't want to risk making things awkward by trying for romance again. It's not what I want."

"Then what do you want?"

"Well, number one I want you to stop throwing rocks before you hit somebody with one."

With the eighth stone in his hand, Sorun looked back towards Sally. She was looking at him from the side of her eyes with a small grin on her face, causing Sorun to make an amused scoff and drop the rock back onto the ground next to him.

"Alright, fine," he said with a roll of his eyes. "Was there anything else the princess wanted?"

"An end to the war and peace for the Kingdom of Acorn would be nice."

"We're working on it."

"Pfft." She held a hand to her mouth to stifle the laughter that threatened to escape. "Then in that case, I think that I'm good for now." She breathed out, smile growing a bit bigger. After that Sally turned her body around and slid off the rock she'd been sitting on. "You know what, Sorun? I really think I needed this," she said. "Thanks. For talking with me about this. It's really helped make things clear for me."

"I should be the one thanking you," Sorun said as he rose up to his feet. "You've taught me an important lesson."

"Oh, yeah?" she said, placing a hand on her hip as Sorun turned to face her. "And what's that?"

"Romance is too complicated, I'm never dealing with it to preserve my sanity."

She laughed out loud at that, trying and failing to stifle it yet again. Even Sorun managed to grin at the sight, the pale teen breathing out a chuckle while looking out to the side.

Inhaling from the laughter, Sally looked back at Sorun. "Oh, don't say that," she said with a smile. "I'm sure you'd be fine."

"I doubt it," he said.

"No, really, I am," Sally reaffirmed. "You can be really insightful and thoughtful when you want to. I know there's someone that appreciates that."

"You're givin' me too much credit." Sorun paused, and looked up at the sun. "You know what, I gotta go hit Tails up. Guy's probably already at the hangar wondering where I am." Yamato manifested in Sorun's grasp. He moved to pull it from the sheath, and then glanced back at Sally. "You want a portal to somewhere?"

She shook her head. "I actually like to walk around, unlike some people," she said, giving him a smirk.

Rolling his eyes, Sorun removed Yamato from the sheath. "I'm not ashamed of my laziness." He cut a portal in the space in front of them. "Have a nice day, Sally."

"Same to you." Sally waved to Sorun as he began stepping into the portal. The Earthling waved back at the Mobian chipmunk right before disappearing through the hole in space.

"Can you please hand me the socket wrench, Sorun?"

"Socket wrench. Right." From the stool he stood on, Sorun looked at the small workbench besides him and at the various tools scattered around. He found himself blanching at the seemingly dozens of wrench-looking devices that seemed to be staring back at him. Gulping, he turned back forwards, towards the fox Mobian laying his back on the floor and under the Freedom Fighter Special with his hands up inside of the large ship's electronic guts. "Which one was that again?" Sorun asked.

"The one with the circular head."

"That tells me nothing," Sorun thought as he looked back at the tools. Almost half of the wrenches he was looking at had circular heads. Biting his lower lip, he had his Bringer Claw choose one at random and extend out to the fox. Tails reached up, took the tool, and went back to work, making Sorun breath out in relief when he seemed to have chosen the right one. Then his breath hitched when Tails paused and held the tool back out.

"Sorun," he said, "this is a sprocket wrench."

"That's what you asked for."

"No, I need a socket wrench. This is a sprocket wrench."

"... There's a difference?"

"Ugh..." Tails pulled himself out from the underside of the giant ship, and then hovered up into the air. He flew towards the workbench Sorun sat next to, tossed the sprocket wrench into the nearby toolbox, and then picked up a different wrench that, to Sorun's eyes, may as well have been identical to the one he tried giving the fox. "This is a socket wrench," he said.

Sorun squinted at the wrench. "... I'm pretty sure that's the same wrench I gave you."

The flat look that Tails gave Sorun shattered all of the teen's confidence. "Why did I ask you to come and help me again?" Tails asked.

"Because you need me to carry stuff like that so you don't have to set up the chain-pulley thing." Sorun nodded his head to the left, towards the back end of the FF Special where one of its large thrusters was detached and lying on the ground besides it. A thruster that was bigger than ones Sorun had seen on commercial planes back on Earth.

Tails nodded. "Ohhh, right... Speaking of which, help me with that."

"Ah-huh." Blue, feathered arms appeared behind Sorun, and then extended forwards. They grabbed onto the thruster and rose it up towards the back end of the ship, where it had been connected previously before Tails had taken it off. Sorun pressed it up against the spot and asked, "Just hold it here, right?"

"Yeah, that's good!" After quickly grabbing an assortment of tools from the workbench, Tails flew up and towards the back section of the ship. Sorun had grabbed the stool he was sitting on meanwhile and followed him, and then after setting the stool down right under the thruster sat down and watched Tails work.

"So," Sorun began, "how have you been?"

"Pretty great, actually," Tails answered, his voice carrying over the clanking and whirring sounds of... whatever he was doing up there that Sorun couldn't quite make out. "Things have been really quiet now, so I've had a lot of time to myself to catch up on some things."

"Cool." Sorun took a glance around. "You know," he said, "this hangar is... kinda big, even with the ship and your plane. What's up with that?"

"Well, this place is technically an air base for the kingdom's aerial vehicles. We... kind of lost most of those after Eggman got the seven Emeralds," Tails answered. "My plane and the Special were pretty much the only things that survived during those days, and during a really bad attack the air base actually got hit. We used to have a proper runway, you know, and not the giant patch of dirt out there we have now." He made a loud sigh. "But, with everything that had been going on, I guess nobody had the time to repair the thing. Maybe now that everything's way quiet they'll have time now."

Sorun quietly nodded, not all that interested. "Neat. So otherwise you're all good?"

"I guess." Tails flew over to the other side of the turbine and began working again. "With all this extra time I've been thinking. 'Bout stuff and... other things that I haven't had time to think of for a while." He cut himself off when he began to loudly drill at something. "Hey, Sorun? Can I ask you something?"

"Sure."

"Have you, um... have you ever had a crush on anybody?"

"What is up with today?" Sorun went as far as to slap his own palm against his face, the sound of which was drowned out when Tails continued to drill. He could hardly believe he was being asked this again, and by Tails of all people. If anything he would have thought somebody as young as him wouldn't even ask something like that. "No, not at all."

The drilling ceased. "Oh." Another short series of drillings. "I did, once."

The hand remained on Sorun's face, and he found himself sighing into it. "Yeah?"

"Yeah." When Sorun removed his hand and looked up, he saw Tails hovering next to the thruster and looking down at him. "You can let go, by the way. It's secured."

The Bringer Claws disappeared, and with them left Sorun's desire to remain here for much longer. But before he could even try and think up an excuse to leave, Tails had flown down, grabbed a second stool, and set it up next to Sorun before sitting down in it. Sorun, meanwhile, was visibly deflating in his own stool.

"It was something that happened a while ago, and now that we don't have to worry about Eggman all that much and I'm not worrying all the time I keep coming back to it," Tails continued while settling in his stool. "I don't know who else to go to for this. My parents would be too embarrassing, and everybody else, well..." He shook his head. "It's just too awkward."

"Can't you talk to Sonic about this?" Sorun asked. "Don't you look up to him?"

"Yeah. I do. He's... he's like a big brother to me." Tails hesitantly looked to the side. "But this isn't something I can talk to him about."

"But you can with me?"

"Well... you never met the person I'm talking about like everybody else did," he explained. "And you... don't treat me like a kid like some of the others do sometimes."

"Yeah, because I don't know a single kid that can do whatever you did to a ship turbine like that," Sorun said, gesturing towards the ship. "Jeez, I can't even do that. I can't even fly a plan like you, either."

"Ain't that the truth..." Tails muttered out, causing Sorun to give him a dirty glare. "Anyway," he continued, looking back at Sorun just as his expression turned back to normal, "her name was Fiona."

A low sigh left Sorun. He didn't want to do this. In reality there was nothing stopping him from just getting up and leaving right this instant, but Tails had already started getting into whatever he wanted to talk about. Leaving by now would be incredibly rude. So he resigned to his fate and slumped forwards in his stool a bit as he listened to the fox talk.

"She was a fox, like me. She... also had a really rough past and came at odds with the Freedom Fighters some times, but eventually she came around and started living in Knothole with us. Even helped us out a few times." A small smile began growing on his face. "We hung out a bunch, and I... really started to like her. A bunch. I liked her all the way back during the whole robot-double thing, but that's a whole different story," he said, making Sorun crease his eyebrows in confusion. "But then," Tails continued, and the small smile on his face faded, "Sonic came back from space."

The confusion lacing Sorun's features increased. "Isn't... that a good thing...?"

"Well, yeah, of course it was. We all thought he was gone forever, so when he came back it was really great. But then his breakup with Sally happened, and-" He cut himself off, eyes going widened. "Oh, wait, I don't know if I should tell you-"

"Sonic already told me."

"Oh. Phew." Tails relaxed a bit, and then continued speaking. "Well, yeah, they had their breakup, and after a while... Fiona began dating Sonic."

"... Wait, how old was she again?"

Tails shrugged. "Around Sonic and Sally's age."

Sorun blinked. "Uh-"

"And it's just stupid, you know!?" Tails suddenly exclaimed, throwing his hands out in frustration. "He knew I liked her but he still dated her! What kind of big brother does that!?"

"Did I wake up in some weird alternate universe or something?" At this point Sorun wouldn't even be surprised if that was what happened, because he wasn't recognizing any of the behavior anybody around him was displaying. Sonic being so abashed while telling his story, hearing about Sally's actions, the way he was seeing Tails act right now. It seemed so radically different than what he was used to seeing out of them.

Was it all really because of love? Lined up with stories he heard back on Earth, both real-life and in fiction. He wasn't exactly an expert on the subject, but it had to be true if it made people act weird like this. Love really did make people do strange things. Or in this case a childish crush, because the longer Tails went on the more Sorun suspected that what he was listening to was far from love.

"So did... did she die...?" Sorun hesitantly asked.

Tails shook his head. "No. She betrayed us and ran off with Scourge."

"..." Sorun rolled his hand at Tails. "I don't know who that is."

"He's a Sonic from a different zone," Tails explained. "It's like a mirror zone of this one. Moebius. He's... he's a real bad guy."

"... Huh?" He needed a few seconds to process the sentence Tails just said, after which he had to hold a hand to his suddenly-throbbing forehead. "There's an evil Sonic, what...?"

"Well I wouldn't call him..." Tails paused, and then shook his head. "No, I guess that... kinda describes him pretty good. Yeah."

And now had that in the back of his mind forever. That was great. "Kind of a weird thing to drop on me so casually, but whatever," Sorun muttered under his breath. He decided he wasn't going to look too far into that little nugget of knowledge. He already had an evil mad doctor to deal with. He didn't need a evil Sonic or whatever

Scourge was on top of that. "So she ran off with Not-Sonic," Sorun said, "and then what?"

"Then nothing. We never saw her or Scourge again after that. Too busy with Eggman." Tails sighed out and rubbed at his forehead. "She even slapped me right before she disappeared with Scourge. I just wanted her to stay."

"What is it with these girls and slapping people?" Sorun loudly exhaled, leaned forwards, and steepled his hands together. This didn't sound at all like what happened between Sonic and Sally. this sounded like something way more worse, and Sorun didn't know what he was supposed to say to Tails. Because he didn't know how to deal with romance woes. Or to deal with what he strongly suspected to be a childish crush for somebody that likely didn't even care about Tails considering she was an older teenager and Tails was eleven.

He found himself wanting less and less to be involved with this the longer this went on. But, he was in it too far to back out now. So Sorun took a deep breath and tried his best with what he had.

"Tails, have you... have you ever considered that, just maybe, Fiona wasn't, you know... a good person?" he asked, hands still steepled together.

The fact that Tails looked like Sorun just punched him in the face didn't bode well for the Earthling. "Why would you say something like that?"

"Well, I mean... all you told me of her was that she was a bad person who was good for a bit, and then slapped you and ran off with a bad person," Sorun said. "That doesn't, like... it feels like you're leaving a lot of details out, and admittedly I don't know the whole picture, but the picture you did paint of her wasn't a very good one." When Tails maintained that hurt look on his face, Sorun sighed and tried again. "What I'm trying to say is... maybe she was, possibly, perhaps... taking advantage of you because you're-"

"Because I'm what?" Tails snapped. "A kid?" He scoffed and turned away from Sorun. "That's what Sonic said."

"He said that because he's right!" Sorun's mind screamed. He made a soft groan and tried rethinking his words. "Tails, in terms of intelligence an maturity-" Sorun internally winced, somewhat doubting that second aspect more and more, "- you're far above a child. But you're making it sound like you were just someone she hanged out with while her eyes were on Sonic. And then the other Sonic." He began breathing a bit easier when he saw Tails begin to relax a bit. "What I'm trying to say is... I don't see you as a child. But are you sure Fiona didn't see you as one?"

"... I don't know," Tails finally admitted after a long moment of silence. He sighed and slumped forwards, both his ears and his tails drooping. "You know what she said to me when she slapped me? That I should never trust anybody," he mumbled out.

"Well, that's just plain wrong."

"I know," he agreed, "but I... maybe you're right," he sighed out. "I mean, it's not like I've never considered what you're telling me as the truth, that... that Fiona was a bad person, or that she tried to be good but just couldn't do it. I don't know what she was thinking when she went with Scourge. Sometimes I wonder if we could have done things different and could have gotten her to stay here," he said. "I just... keep thinking back to Sonic. And how she chose him over me."

Clicking his tongue, Sorun looked ahead and gestured his hand out. "Listen, Tails. You're eleven. You got a whole life ahead of you," he said. "I mean, Sonic and Sally got over each other and moved on, right? There's no reason you can't do the same thing. Just keep living life until you find someone else. You got time." He clapped a hand on Tails' shoulder. " Believe me , you got time. Jeez, maybe even wait a few more years 'til you're older before you even start considering it. Get your own stuff in order first, know what I mean?"

"Huh. Maybe... that makes sense." Tails blinked at Sorun with wide eyes as he removed his hand, and then looked down at his two feet that he was slowly kicking in thought. "I guess... I guess waiting couldn't hurt. But with Fiona, I... I don't know. I'll have to think on it." He looked back up at Sorun as a wide smile grew on his face. "I'll save that for later. Thanks, Sorun. It felt nice talking this over with you."

"Yeah man sure don't mention it." By now Sorun was completely sagging in his stool, quietly sighing out as he wiped a hand over his forehead. "I don't know how I did it, but I think I did it. Whatever 'it' is. Man, this is exhausting..."

"Sorun? Can I ask you something?" When Sorun gave an affirmative grunt, Tails asked, "Is that what you're doing? Waiting until you have your life together before considering being with somebody?"

And now Sorun was sitting up completely straight, Tails' question having startled all sense of weariness out of him. He glanced to the side at Tails, and then breathed out while rubbing his neck and looking the other way. "Did somebody put you up to this?" he asked. "Is this why you brought this whole topic up to begin with? It was Sonic, wasn't it?"

Tails shook his head. "No, I'm just wondering," he said. "You never really talk about this kind of thing-"

"Because I'm never interested in it," Sorun quickly replied. "Tails, I'm a social outcast. What part of that screams 'I'm looking for romance' to you?"

"I mean... you're not really a social outcast," Tails denied. "Not anymore, at least. I see you out all the time now."

"Ugh, Tails..." Running a hand over his face, Sorun stood up out of the stool. "Why do you gotta go and say that?" Shaking his head, he turned back to the fox. "It's just not something I want, alright? So drop it."

"Alright, I will. Sheesh." Rolling his eyes, Tails jumped up off his own stool and stepped in front of Sorun. "Well, I really just needed help with the thruster," he said. "I can handle the rest on my own. Oh, wait, before I forget!"

Tails' tails suddenly began spinning up, causing his body to lift up into the air. Sorun watched as he flew towards the workbench. He hovered over it for a few moments, and then made a happy sound, grabbed something, and flew back to Sorun before touching back down at the ground. He then held something up to Sorun: one of the wrist communicators the other Freedom Fighters wore.

"Rotor finally finished making a wrist communicator with reinforced parts for Knuckles, so hopefully he won't break this one. Rotor said he'd slap Knuckles if he managed to bust it anyway," Tails said, a small, sheepish grin on his face. "I promised I'd give it to Knuckles later since Rotor was busy with something, but there's still a few more repairs I wanna make on the Freedom Fighter Special. Would you mind giving it to him for me?"

After regarding the wrist communicator for a few moments, Sorun shrugged and took it from Tails' hand. "Sure, I can do that real quick," he agreed. "You know where he is?"

"I'd think he'd be at the HQ. If not there then probably in one of the training zones like usual."

"Gotcha." Sorun pocketed the wrist communicator, and then manifested Yamato. "Alright, I'll go do that now. Seeya 'round."

"Bye!" Tails waved the Earthling off as he made a portal with his sword. Sorun waved back at him, and then exited through the portal.

After looking around for a bit Sorun had finally found Knuckles. Like Tails had said he'd been at one of the training grounds if not at the HQ, and in this case, it was the small field of wooden posts. Sorun had found him sitting on the ground against one of the posts, and interestingly enough Julie-Su was there with him. She was leaning against a post next to his, and the two seemed to be in deep conversation over something. Something happy, Sorun wagered, from the nice smiles they had on both of their faces.

Well, whatever it was, Sorun wasn't much interested in it. He just wanted to drop this wrist communicator off and then go do something else. Maybe go for a walk around Knothole or something. Clear his head of all this relationship stuff everybody kept feeding him.

"Yeah, and then- oh, hey. Sorun!" They both turned their heads towards the approaching Earthling, with Knuckles waving at him. "What's going on?"

"Nothing much. Rotor finally finished this reinforced wrist thing for you," Sorun said, digging into his pocket and taking the communicator out. "He said he'd slap you if you managed to break this one." Sorun craned his neck over his shoulder. "I'd take it seriously if I were you, been a lot of that going around."

"Hah! I'll be sure to." Knuckles caught the wrist communicator after Sorun tossed it to him, and then asked, "Is it only the one? Rotor said he'd make Mighty one, too."

Sorun shrugged. "Well, Tails gave it to me to give it to you, but he only had one, yeah."

"He probably still working on it, Knuckles. You know how swamped he is with his projects sometimes." Julie-Su pushed herself off of the post she leaned on and turned to Knuckles. "I'll go check up on him and see what's taking so long."

"Alright. See you later."

"See you." They both gave each other smiles, followed by Julie-Su turning around to walk away. She gave Sorun a brief nod, the teen nodding back to the other teen as she walked away.

Once out of sight, Sorun turned from the direction Julie-Su walked off back to Knuckles. He did a double-take when he saw the large smile that was still plastered on the echidna's face, his eyesl staring back to the direction Julie-Su had walked in. It was only when Sorun cleared his throat did he finally turn his attention to him.

"You, uh... doing okay there, man?" Sorun asked, quirking an eyebrow at the red Mobian.

"Oh, yeah. Totally. Just, uh... me an' Julie-Su were just talking about, y'know, stuff and..." He sighed, and then affixed his eyes upwards at Sorun's. "You ever seriously been into a girl, Sorun? Like, seriously been into one?"

"Oh, for the love of...!" Sorun had to resist slapping his own face again as an utterly exasperated feeling overtook him. "No, Knuckles. I haven't," Sorun snapped in a tone that made the echidna flinch. "So what's it gonna be, Knuckles? Huh? What's the story? What's the super-tragic love story you're gonna tell me that somehow involves Julie-Su that has you questioning everything you're doing, huh? What is it!?"

Sorun's rant had grown so heated that Knuckles had actually leaned a bit back into the post he sat against, violet eyes widened and an arm held out in front of him. It was only when Sorun finished with heavy breaths did Knuckles choose to finally lower his arm and speak. "Um... I don't know what's going on with you, but me and Julie-Su are going steady," he slowly said. "There's... not really any issues between us."

"... Oh." Sighing in frustration at his own outburst, Sorun walked over to the post Julie-Su had been leaning against previously. He less sat and more crashed into a sitting position on the ground, leaning against the post while Knuckles warily eyed him. "Sorry man, it's just- for some reason everybody's been giving me their relationship problems all day, and I'm sick of hearing it," he said. "Is there some kind of holiday or something I'm unaware of?"

Knuckles shook his head. "Not that I know of," he said. "So I guess you don't want to hear about me and Ju-"

"Noooo..." Sorun groaned out, causing Knuckles to smirk a bit. He groaned so much that he'd leaned forwards enough so that his face landed into his lap. "And it's 'Julie-Su and I', not the other way around," Sorun corrected, voice muffled by his lap.

At that, Knuckles rolled his eyes. "What are you, a grammar teacher?"

Sorun's head picked itself straight back up with enough speed that Knuckles started a bit from it. "If you're gonna speak the language, then speak it properly," he angrily grumbled out. "But," he said, expression relaxing, "I'd rather talk about anything else than anything relating to romance of any kind, Knuckles. I'm romanced out for the day. For the month. For the rest of my life."

"Rest of your life's kinda a long time to swear that off, ain't it?"

"Oh boy you'd think, anyway!" Sorun loudly clapped his hands, making Knuckles jump slightly. "You know what I want to hear about? Some echidna history," Sorun said. "I already got a bit of the lore from Espio, but he just told me the recent stuff. Not really any real echidna history, like why you guys live up on a floating island. Or why there's a floating island."

"The lore?" Knuckles repeated with a small grin. "Is that what you call it?"

"Yeah, man, the lore. You know, like... just the lore , man."

"The lore," Knuckles repeated, testing the word out. He made a small, satisfied "hmph" sound, nodding his head. "Sounds like a word dad would use," he mumbled out before turning back to Sorun. "I don't really know much, but I can tell you what I can if you really want. You sure you want to hear it, though? It's pretty complicated."

"Complicated?" Sorun had to laugh at that. "Let me tell you about complicated, Knuckles. Complicated is the position I find myself in every single day. Complicated is every single problem and adventure I hear the Freedom Fighters have or have had, but whenever somebody tells me it they play it off like completely normal because here, it is normal. I literally just learned from Tails that there's apparently an alternate universe full of evil versions of you guys and he played it off like it was nothing."

"Oh, Moebius? Yeah, they've been trouble a couple of times."

"See, see!? This is what I mean!" Sorun exclaimed, gesturing wildly out in front of him. "Every single complicated thing in this world is normalized to an everyday affair because everybody is desensitized to the sheer ridiculousness of it all, so when you , Knuckles, tells me that 'it's complicated', you really worry me."

There was a certain look on Knuckles face following his rant; one that Sorun couldn't quite place. Somber, perhaps. That was the closest word Sorun could think of. He supposed he understood why- if Espio was to be believed his kind was decimated, and a large majority of what was left were cyborg nuts fighting a civil war somewhere on Angel Island. He couldn't begin to imagine what sort of history would have lead to that happening, let alone why the echidna were living on a floating island in the first place.

But, he was curious. And desperate to get away from the topic of romance. Seeing as Knuckles himself was an echidna and a native to the island, it made sense to ask him.

"I'll try and keep it simple," Knuckles assured him. "You still up for it?"

"Yeah, man." Sorun nodded at the echidna. "Go for it."

"Alright, then." Knuckles took a deep, steadying breath, and then focused his eyes on Sorun. "Well, I guess to start with..."

What followed was a deluge of information that may as well have been incomprehensible nonsense to Sorun's ears. He'd tried to listen to and understand Knuckles, really, he had, but the only important details Sorun managed to glean out from the long-winded explanation was that he truly didn't know if the echidna species as a whole was alright in the head. Because he sincerely doubted it listening to Knuckles.

He hadn't even needed to get the full story to come to this conclusion. He'd gotten as far as their species having lifted the island up from Downunda to avoid a meteor sometime long in the past before he started losing Knuckles. Everything from the history afterwards to the major splits and schisms in their society to the weird hangup they had with technology, it was all... nonsense. Utter, complete nonsense. And Sorun wasn't having anymore of it.

"Look, Knuckles, echidna, Dark Legion, Guardians, weird alternate dimensions, it's- it's all very fascinating, I get it, but can I just ask you why your people's history is so convoluted ?" With a ragged sigh Sorun ran a hand through his hair. "I mean, Jesus, I thought things down here were complicated, but you guys took it to a whole 'nother level up there on that island."

Knuckled breathed through his nose and flipped his hand up. "Couldn't tell ya, Sorun. My people've been through a lot."

"Apparently so," Sorun muttered out. "Did you come all the way down here just to escape this craziness, because I wouldn't blame you in the slightest."

"No, I came down here because there's this maniac called Eggman that's a bit of an existential threat to the entire world, and Angel Island happens to be a part of the world," Knuckles answered. "The Chaotix agreed and followed me. My dad... not so much."

"Ah, yeah, you're dad, who was part of this weird... contrived Guardian Illuminati thing," Sorun said. "You were seriously born into a line of weirdos bent on this whole secrecy-slash-protect-the-thing-making-the-island-float thing? Which is an Emerald by the way?"

"Master Emerald, it's a long story so don't ask, and no, you can not touch it , Sorun." Knuckles affixed Sorun with a serious look, one that made the pale teen freeze in place. "I saw your eyes light up when I told you the thing holding the island up in the air is a giant Chaos Emerald. Don't you even think about touching it."

"I wasn't gonna doom your entire island and make it fall back down to terra firma just for a power," Sorun said. He didn't tell Knuckles the part where he briefly considered it, but in the end decided against it. Destroying a whole island and its ecosystem, and everyone living on it, sounded counterintuitive to the whole reason he was doing this in the first place. And while the idea of absorbing a giant Chaos Emerald sounded nice, he was also afraid absorbing that much Chaos energy would kill him on the spot. So the Master Emerald sounded like a no-go.

Knuckle nodded at Sorun, satisfied with the answer he gave. "Well, good. Anyway, the Brotherhood weren't weirdos," Knuckles grumbled out. "They are, or were, since they're apparently all gone except my dad, just driven."

"Setting up a whole system where you make a fake wall of fire using holograms to make you think your dad walked into a wall of fire and died for a really stupid reason so he could spy on you through cameras like a weirdo to groom you to be a part of the echidna Illuminati sounds kind of weird," Sorun said. "I can say for certain I would have punched my dad if he did that to me. I would have punched him a lot. I would have knocked teeth out."

"They were very driven, alright!?"

"Yeah, you gotta be some kinda driven to fake your death in front of your kid," Sorun scoffed out. He crossed his arms, then asked, "So... dear old dad didn't approve of you comin' here?"

The question made Knuckles sigh out and shake his head. "No," he answered. "He thought that since I was a Guardian my duty was to remain on Angel Island to guard the Master Emerald, the one thing keeping the island floating. And he said I had even more reason to say since most of what's left of my people are living in a single little village after the whole Eggman thing. Not many of us left."

"And because you made the sensible decision to go deal with the root of the problem instead of continuing to treat the symptoms, you two cut contact."

"Pretty much, yeah."

"... Knuckles, I mean this with all due respect. Your dad sounds like a really terrible person."

"He's not," Knuckles denied with a shake of his head. "Geez, would you lay off him already!? You're focusing on all the bad qualities and none of the good!"

"All you're giving me are bad qualities!"

"He...!" Knuckles paused to take a calming breath. "Okay, maybe not everything he did was the best, but he only did what he thought was the best for the island and our kind. He did it for my sake, for everybody on the island's sake. We've had some disagreements, but I still love him." He made a low hum and brushed some of his dreadlocks behind his shoulder. "You sound like my mom. She separated from him and remarried to someone else because she never agreed with what he did to me."

"Sounds like a sensible woman," Sorun thought to himself. "So she's at that camp?"

Knuckles nodded. "Yeah. Her, and my step-dad... and my little half-brother," he quietly mumbled out.

Sorun's head perked up in interest. "Oh, you have one of those?" he asked. "What's his name?"

"You'll laugh if I tell you."

"Oh, come on, how bad can-"

"Kneecaps."

The name given out by Knuckles had been said so quickly that Sorun had barely caught it. Catch it he did, though, and he had to look towards Knuckles with widened eyes to confirm that what he heard was indeed correct. He didn't even know what to think when the echidna gave him a nod.

"... Kneecaps," Sorun slowly repeated in an unsure tone.

"It's a shortened version of the name, but basically, yeah. Kneecaps," Knuckles mumbled in confirmation. "Believe me, I didn't like the name, either, but mom did, so what am I gonna do?"

"..." Sorun had to take a deep breath to steady himself. "Kneecaps." He looked at one of Knuckles' hands and the twin spikes protruding from them. "Knuckles." He looked up an Knuckles' face. "Does your family in particular just have a weird thing with naming kids after body parts, or-?"

"No, no no no, that's a different thing entirely," Knuckles said with a shake of his head. "'Knuckles' was the name of some old echidna tribe my dad named me after. And echidna, well..." He rose his spiked fist up to his face. "Normal echidna don't have bone spikes sticking out of their hands like I do. They usually just wear gloves with spikes in 'em."

Sorun tilted his head to the side in confusion. "But you do? Because your connection to the Chaos Force is unusually strong?" he guessed.

"Pretty much. The only reason I even have powers is 'cause dad blasted me with some weird Chaos energy ray thing when I was an egg."

Sorun blinked once. "Your dad gave you the Bruce Banner treatment?" He blinked twice. "You were an egg!?"

It was Knuckles' turn to look confused. "Yeah, echidna females lay eggs," he slowly explained. "And... and the who treatment?"

"It's nothing, forget it." Sorun had to shake his mind clear after Knuckles' little revelation had him shuddering. He didn't know if he needed to know that particular piece of information. He regretted learning a lot of the information this conversation was providing if he was being honest with himself. "Okay, ignoring that, and ignoring everything having to do with your dad, Knuckles, I gotta say... I shoulda listened to you. Because your whole kind somehow made things up on that island more complicated than everything else going on in the rest of the world, and that, sir, is an accomplishment."

The statement hadn't gone very far towards improving Knuckles' mood. He'd waved a hand in Sorun's direction, looking displeased but at the same time understanding. Like he knew and understood that the information he was giving the Earthling was exhausting in its contents. "I warned you it'd be a lot," he stated. "Sorry if I kind of overloaded you there."

"You didn't do anything. It's fine," Sorun said in response. His eyes drifted away from Knuckles, staring forwards as he thought something over in his head. After a few minutes he slowly clicked his tongue and, with his head still pointed forwards, he looked at Knuckles from the corner of his eyes. "One last thing I was curious about," he said, voice going a bit lower. "Have you ever heard of an echidna named Aurora? Or Athair by any chance?"

He saw that the names elicited a surprised response out of Knuckles. Enough that he'd widened his eyes a bit at Sorun. "Aurora and Athair?" he asked. "Yeah, they're... they're these weird echidna that are really close to the Chaos Force, if that makes any sense. I actually met them once, but I don't really know much about them otherwise. I know that Tails did a couple of things with Athair, back when he was still alive. And Athair had his own whole thing. Was supposed to be a Guardian like me, but he went a different path."

"So they're, what, Chaos ghosts?"

"I don't know. All I know is that their connections to the Chaos Force were really strong, and that they had some weird relationship with these three ancient things, but they died," Knuckles explained. "They keep to themselves, mostly. Athair doesn't really talk with Tails anymore. Where'd you hear about them, anyways?"

Sorun shrugged. "Don't recall. Just heard their names be mentioned once, probably from Tails. I was just curious." He turned his head fully towards Knuckles. "But that's all you know?"

"'Fraid so. Sorry if that wasn't good enough for you."

"Ah, it's fine. Like I said, I was just curious about some names I heard. It's no skin off my back." It wasn't exactly a complete lie. He'd been hoping to glean some more information off of them from Knuckles, since he was an echidna and seemed to be "in the know", as it were, but it sounded like he didn't know much himself. But, even if he did have substantial information on them, Sorun wasn't too sure what he would have done with it. He wasn't exactly invested in learning their history or how they got to where they were now; just what they were in general. And most of what Knuckles said he already knew himself.

It sounded like Tails was a bit ingrained with them, though, if only by pure association. He personally knew an Neo-Walker, and his still-alive (for now) uncle was another one as well. An interesting lead, but not one Sorun was too interested in pursuing. He honestly doubted Tails would be much help, either, and even then it's not like Sorun had any plans with them or anything of the sort. The questions stemmed from pure curiosity.

Well, in the end, it didn't matter. He'd already made up his mind on what he was doing, and as far as he was concerned they were all inconsequential at this point. He had better things to worry about than some ghosts.

"Alright, I think I've heard about all I can." Without a sound, Sorun stood up to his legs, only idly noticing the lack of pins and needles in his legs from sitting for so long before turning back to Knuckles. "I'm gonna go on a walk. Clear my head. I'll see you later, alright?"

"Yeah, sure. See you later." Knuckles called out, settling back against his post as he looked up at the sky. Sorun nodded towards him, and then began walking out towards the direction of Knothole with his hands placed securely in his pockets.

"Kneecaps... There's something seriously wrong with the echidna up there on that island."

Sorun had made true on his desire to walk around Knothole and clear his head. For the most part it wasn't working, because he kept thinking back to every single conversation he'd had with people today. It was fading with time, though, and he found himself dwelling on all those words less and less the more he walked around to find more things to distract himself with. As far as clearing his head, it was a slow and steady process. Slow, but one that worked.

And then he just had to hear his voice.

"Oh, Sorun! Bonjour!" His feet practically made a grinding sound when they halted their movements. Sorun took a deep breath, and turned around to the voice he recognized as belonging to Antoine. As he suspected, the coyote was standing right behind him, and, for some reason, he was carrying two armloads of bags full of vegetables. "How nice to be seeing you here! I was just out getting ze groceries for ze very special dinner I 'ave been planning for ma cherie Bunnie zis evening." A large, dopey smile grew on his face.

"Ahhh, Sorun. Love. Eet iz such a beautiful thing, non? Tell me, have you ever felt-"

Sorun Tricked away out of sight, leaving behind a very confused Antoine.

"Man, I am so done with today..."

Not even a second after Sorun said this, the teen had flopped face-first onto the HQ's couch. He barely had the energy to do much else than just lay there, completely exhausted. Mentally exhausted from having had to endure everything he'd listened to do, and physically exhausted for about the same reasons.

He always knew there was a reason he'd unconsciously avoided prying too far into people's love lives. This was apparently why- it was too complex for him to keep track of. He couldn't even blame himself for what happened today because by some cosmic coincidence almost everyone chose to air out some of their thoughts on the matter on him of all people, on the same day of all things. It told him a couple of things. One, he could never be a counselor even if he had the time to become one, and two, love... love did indeed do weird things to people.

The sound of a pair of footsteps approaching the couch had stirred him from his thoughts, and Sorun just barely resisted groaning into the cushion out of frustration. Knowing how his day was going it was going to be somebody else that wanted to talk about the troubles their love life had. He wasn't going to have it. He was done with that. He wasn't going to go through the mental hoops of trying to piece it all together when all the echidna stuff Knuckles had told him previously was already frying his brain. So when he heard the footsteps stop right besides him, Sorun pushed his face just high enough off the cushion so he could see the pair of feet in order to ascertain just who it was and formulate an appropriate response in order to escape them without seeming rude.

But then he stopped cold when he realized that whoever was standing next to the couch wasn't wearing shoes. He didn't even need to think on who it was, his mind instinctually recognizing the brown and black fur pattern, and his suspicions were only confirmed when he looked up at the purple cloth dress wrapped around the body's torso.

"Uh... hey." It was the only response Sorun could think to say when he saw Nicole looking down at him. She had a curious look on her face, her head just slightly tilted to the side as she looked down at him, and her hands held behind her back. "I've had a day."

She blinked in confusion. "I would imagine everybody would experience 'a day' every single day, Sorun."

"You're not wrong." Sorun shuffled up into a sitting position, all his earlier exhaustion having practically disappeared. He moved to the side and rested one arm on the sofa's armrest while the other arm hung at his side. He'd had an idea of venting all the frustration he'd accrued over the course of the entire day at Nicole, but as the seconds ticked by he found those frustrations beginning to disappear at a startlingly rapid rate. In fact, by the time he looked back up at her face, he found that his mind was completely sound. It was a such a pleasant change of a mindset that he'd accidentally gone and blankly stared towards Nicole's face, though he'd quickly caught himself and looked away at the side. "So what's going on with you?" he asked in a quiet voice.

"Rotor required an extra set of hands for assistance in an experiment he was conducting," she answered. "He provided me a Power Ring to help produce my body. The experiment was completed earlier than expected, and upon exiting the lab I found you here."

"Oh, okay." Sorun clicked his tongue. "So," he said, slowly looking back towards her, "how, uh, how much longer do you have on your ring?"

"Twenty minutes, by my estimation." Nicole moved her hands to the front side of her body. Sorun found himself looking down in surprise when he saw she was grasping a wired game controller in each hand. "I had actually been hoping to get some practice in before my time ran out," she said, the corners of her mouth upturned in a small smile. "But seeing as you're here-"

"You're seriously that upset at my winning streak?" Sorun asked. As Nicole moved to sit down next to him, he flicked his eyes over to the TV and saw that it and the console were already both turned on. He quietly scoffed at the sight. "You didn't even ask before turning all that on."

She handed him the second controller, which Sorun eagerly accepted. "I saw no need to knowing the frequency you accept my offers. Was I wrong to assume such a thing?"

Sorun shook his head. "No, not at all."

"I thought as much," she said, grasping her own controller. "And I would have you know winning three games in a row can hardly classify as a winning streak."

"Gonna be four in a minute here." Sorun glanced to the side at Nicole. Their eyes briefly met, and he felt a smile mirroring the one Nicole wore grow on his face. He turned back to the TV, muttering, "Thanks, Nicole."

"No thanks are necessary, Sorun." Her fingers began flying over the controller's buttons at the same time Sorun's fingers began to move, both of their eyes locked right onto the TV's screen. "Perhaps you can briefly tell me about your day while we're at it."

"Ain't much to tell, but yeah, sure. It all started when I took a single step outside the door..."

During their small session Nicole had managed to beat Sorun and take away his streak at some point. He didn't find himself minding that at all, too lost in the moment. The only thing that had made him upset was that they'd only had twenty minutes together before the Power Ring finally ran out. Twenty minutes that somehow made up for the entire day he'd experienced.

Chapter 41

Recursion Error

Episode 41- We're planning a party

Sorun had seen a lot of pathetic sights in his life. Seeing his own reflection in glass staring forlornly down at a display full of pies was up there with the worst of them.

There he'd been. Wandering around Knothole without a care in the world when he'd come across a bakery of some sort. And now he was here, standing outside the front window and staring at all the colorful pies that were on display behind the glass. And when Sorun reached into his pocket and pulled out the contents, all he found were three mobium coins resting in his palm.

"The life of a poor man," Sorun morosely thought as he pocketed the three coins. "Never shoulda bought those expensive-ass candles..."

He was only drawn away from his money woes when he saw a peculiar sight in the reflection of the window, nearby and right behind him. Two floating forms that he recognized as the only two bee Mobians that lived in all of Knothole. He rose his eyebrows a bit in surprise at the sight, and then turned around towards the two of them.

All the way on the other side of the street was Charmy. The small Mobian was floating and meandering about, the usual smile on his face as he went from shop window to shop window while looking through them all. On Sorun's side of the street, with her back to him, was Saffron. Even with her back to him, though, Sorun could tell that the female bee was staring out towards Charmy.

"Huh, there's those two," Sorun thought to himself. He found his feet automatically carrying himself towards the closer bee, all the while silently wondering to himself, "Wonder what's going on with them?"

Even after stopping right next to Saffron, the bee didn't seem to notice his presence, her eyes continually focused on Charmy in the distance. From this position he could see that there was an almost sullen look on her face. Sorun, looking right at the floating Mobian, rocked back and forth on his feet while waiting for her to finally take notice of him. His patience eventually wore off, making him speak up.

"Hey, Saffron," Sorun coolly greeted, "what's going on?"

She straightened up in surprise at hearing his voice, and then turned around, relaxing when she made out Sorun's form. "Oh, Sorun. I'm sorry, I didn't notice you standing there," she said, voice quiet and light. "I hope I wasn't too rude by-"

"Saffron, you're fine, you're fine," Sorun assured her, his eyes drifting over to Charmy's location. The male bee was still looking around at all the shops, seemingly oblivious of the other two looking at him. "What's up with Charmy?"

"Hm? Oh!" A smile grew on her face when she turned to look at Charmy alongside Sorun. "Well, Charmy decided we were all going to have a party."

"... A party," Sorun repeated. "Really?"

Saffron nodded. "Charmy felt that since there hasn't been a single incident with Eggman in a whole week and everything's been quiet, it was time we should celebrate. You know, with us having come so far and done so much to freeing the planet from him and everything getting so peaceful as of late..." She trailed off a bit, smile growing wider as she clasped her hands in front of her. "He talked with Sally over it and she agreed to let us use the Freedom HQ. She even agreed to help us set everything up!"

"Knowing her she just agreed to it for a morale boost," Sorun jokingly stated, though he did reach a hand up to rub at the back of his head. "Though... I guess a party does sound kinda nice."

It sounded very nice, actually, and Sorun rarely ever got to do anything even remotely nice these days. So going to something like a party to wind down felt extraordinarily pleasing to him. At the very least it was something to take his mind off the near future, and he'd prefer doing that with a party as opposed to killing robots any day.

So yeah. A party sounded nice to him.

"I know. Princess Sally seemed really thrilled with the idea." For some reason, the smile on Saffron's face dropped just slightly. "I think it will do good for Charmy. I hope it does. He's... been through a lot."

The change of tone in the bee's voice was immediately noticeable to Sorun, who glanced to the side at her with a slightly questioning look. "He has, huh?" he mumbled out.

She gave him a sad nod. "We used to have a home of our own, in the Golden Hive Colony. It was a kingdom our kind inhabited, a place all bees called their own. And Charmy... Charmy was next in line to become king."

"Wait, seriously?" Sorun fully turned his head to Saffron in shock. "Charmy? Royalty? Like, Sally-level of royalty?" He turned back to the male bee in the distance, confusion marring his features. None of the interactions he'd ever had with the bee ever painted him as someone even remotely royal in any way. Not from the childish way he always acted, or his total lack of an authoritative aura, for lack of a better term. Qualities that he saw in Sally that Sorun saw none of in Charmy.

He hardly believed it, but if it came from Saffron, it had to be true. She was much too timid and polite to lie, especially about something like this.

"Yes, it's true. He was a prince to our people," Saffron confirmed. "But... it's gone now. The entire colony, our people and families... they're all gone..."

A slow, deep sigh left Sorun. "Robotnik?" he guessed.

"Yes," she said, features having turned saddened. "As far as we can tell, we were some of the only survivors of the attack. Even before that Charmy had lost a dear friend of his named Mello due to the actions of criminals on Angel Island." Her face fell into an extremely dour expression. "He tries to keep a strong face in front of me and the others, but sometimes I really worry about him, especially after everything... after everything..."

By now she'd grown so sad that her sentences were beginning to be interrupted by hiccups. It was a situation that made Sorun increasingly more uncomfortable the longer he stood there, and when he saw the edges of Saffron's eyes begin to moisten he decided to speak up out of concern. "U-uh, Saffron, are you okay?"

She sniffed, and then wiped the tears out of her eyes as she turned to Sorun, a small, wavering smile on her face. "Oh, I'm sorry, Sorun. I'm fine. Thank you for the concern." The smile grew more steady, though it did drop a bit when she glanced back at Charmy's direction. "I just hope that this party will do him some good and help take his mind off things. I always try to be there for him, but, well..."

"Yeah..." Sorun replied, tone listless as he glanced off in the same direction.

Saffron continued looking at Charmy's way until her head suddenly picked up. "Oh my, I just remembered! Charmy wanted me to gather things for the party." Saffron's wings began to buzz at a higher intensity as her body turned away. "I hope I'll see you at the party, Sorun!"

"Um, sure..." Sorun waved the bee off as she flew away, eyes trailing after her form until she disappeared around a house's corner. He sighed, and then turned back towards Charmy, who was still wandering around across the street.

"The people that live here are always so cheery that sometimes I forget that they have pretty terrible lives like I do," Sorun thought to himself, eyes still on Charmy. "How the hell does someone like Charmy go through all that and stay the same cheerful guy I see around all the time?"

It was an aspect of the usually-cheery bee that completely baffled Sorun. The revelation of him being royalty was all but forgotten now, his mind too focused on this development. Never, not even once, during any time he'd interacted with Charmy had he ever expected the Mobian had ever gone through that kind of loss. Losing a friend was one thing, but a whole kingdom, family, and possibly almost his entire species? That sounded absolutely devastating, which was why Sorun was so confused when he looked at that childlike Mobian floating off across the street.

If he was being honest with himself it made him feel a bit ashamed of himself, and of the way he'd acted during his first month here on Mobius. Especially from the way his attitude had been after the incident with the first Emerald. Even then his current attitude wasn't much better now that he really thought on it.

"Well, this is frustratingly humbling. And here I thought I was the only guy that got to be depressed around here." A deep sigh left Sorun, his brows creasing as he came to a decision. "Charmy and the rest of these Mobians, I swear... they really amaze me sometimes."

He saw that there was a box nearby that Charmy was blindly flying towards as he continued to look around. Making a split-second decision, Sorun decided to Trick onto the box and settle into a sitting position as to appear he'd been sitting there for a while. It'd taken about twenty seconds, after which Charmy had floated so close to Sorun that he almost bumped into the sitting Earthing. He let out a startled gasp and hovered back a bit to put some space between them.

"Gah! Eh-heh, sorry, Sorun, didn't see ya there." Charmy made a light chuckle and closed his eyes while grinning at Sorun, going as far as to rub the back of his head and grin so widely that his teeth shone. "Whatcha doin' here?"

Sorun didn't respond at first, too mesmerized by that wide smile the bee was giving him. A smile that didn't line up at all with all the trauma Saffron had described to Sorun that Charmy had suffered. None of the floating Mobian's demeanor fit it at all. Beneath the surface of confusion in his mind he felt different kinds of admiration, and he could even feel bits of envy well in him at the sight of Charmy. All he could do was stare as he thought about him.

"How does he do it? How?" Sorun silently wondered. "How does he continue going about smiling like that after losing almost everything? Is it because he has friends? A significant other like Saffron? Is it just because he's just that much better of a person compared to me? Him ? What could it possibly be?"

"Er, Sorun?" Charmy voiced, a bit nervously. "You're, er, kinda staring."

Sorun blinked, and then clicked his tongue in irritation when he realized how lost in his thoughts he'd been. "My apologies, Charmy. I was thinking of something," he said.

"Okay?" Tilting his head in a curious manner, Charmy floated a bit closer to him. "What're ya doin' out here?"

"Lamenting my current status as being amidst the destitute. Anyway," he said, turning back to Charmy, "I heard you were planning a bash?"

"A ba- oh, you mean the party! Yeah!" Charmy brightened up immediately, and a smile was sent Sorun's way. "It's gonna be a really neat thing! Sally and Saffron are helping me set everything up, and I decided that while they're doing that I was gonna make a cake!"

Sorun's head sharply tilted at an odd angle. "A cake?"

"Mm-hm!" Charmy's smile turned a bit sheepish. "Though I, eh-heh... can't really find the bakery..."

"Is that why he was wandering around like that?" Sorun regarded the bee for a moment, and then turned around to the shop he'd seen the pies in briefly, going as far as to point at it. "The bakery over there should have most of everything you need. And there's a grocer down the way that sells things like eggs or other things you might need for it." He turned back to Charmy. "I can lend you a pair of hands should you require them. Or four. Or even more since-"

"You'd really do something like that for me!?" The wide smiled turned beaming, enough that Sorun found himself wincing. There must have been sunlight reflecting off his teeth, because there was no other way he could be smiling so brightly that he was practically shining. "That'd be such a big help!"

His face remaining in a neutral expression, which, compared to Charmy, may as well have been the exact opposite of the bee's demeanor, Sorun stood up off the crate. "You seem like you need the help. And you're a nice guy," Sorun said. "It'd be a bit too cruel leaving you hanging."

"Heh-heh. Aw, come on, Sorun, you don't gotta say stuff like that." He flashed Sorun a thumbs-up. "But thank you so much for helping me with this! I really appreciate it!"

"... It's not an issue, Charmy." Sorun's eyes flicked towards the direction of the bakery. "You'll have to pay for everything, though. I wasn't exaggerating about that destitute bit I said earlier. I really am flat broke."

"Ah, you really sound like Vector when you say stuff like that..." Charmy sighed out, floating in front of Sorun's view. "Anyway, don't sweat it. Princess Sally gave me some money so we're all good on that front!"

"Then in that case, let's go."

"Thanks again for helping out with all this, Sorun!" This voice came came from Charmy, who had just now floated out from the blue portal that had appeared in the Freedom HQ's kitchen. He had a bag in his hands filled to the brim with baking supplies, and after setting it down on the kitchen's counter he turned towards the portal. "And thanks for giving us a ride here, too! I was really worried about carrying this all back!"

A second form, Sorun, calmly walked through the portal. His Bringer Claws were manifested, both carrying more bags of supplies, while Yamato and its scabbard rested in his hands. He quickly closed the portal, and then dispelled the sword as the blue, feathered arms put the two bags down alongside the one Charmy had set down. "Well, it's not like I was gonna make us walk all the way back here. Or fly, in your case."

Charmy made a light giggle, and then turned towards the bags to unload them, but paused when one of Sorun's Bringer Claws beat him to it. The blue hand deftly reached into the bags and began to rapidly carry out the items, from bags of flour to eggs, and then began placing it all along the counter quickly while at the same time ensuring no damage was done to the items. At the same time the other hand was reaching into cabinets to bring out various bowls and measuring cups for use later.

Whistling at the sight of the arms blurring around, Charmy turned towards Sorun. "Wow, Sorun. Those arms of yours sure are... handy , huh?"

The pun was enough to have Sorun make a facial twitch, after which he faced Charmy. The bee was grinning cheekily at him, causing the teen to roll his eyes and pocket his normal hands. "Six outta ten," he blandly stated, walking towards the counter.

"W-wha-!?" Charmy sputtered, following closely by Sorun's side. "Aw, come on! I had to think really hard for that one!" he complained. "It's a seven, at least!"

They both stopped by the counter, with Sorun giving a shrug. "Six-and-a-half."

"Nuh-uh, you can't go halfsies!"

"This isn't the context you use halfsies in," Sorun corrected, glancing at Charmy from the side of his eyes. "Halfsies is when you split something with someone. This is meeting in the middle."

All that had accomplished was to make Charmy groan out and shake his head. "Agh, whatever. It was still a good pun."

Sorun said nothing in response, though the corners of his mouth did upturn into the smallest of grins. He made sure to wipe it off when he saw Charmy look his way to avoid being seen with it. Afterwards he looked down at the countertop they were both directly in front of.

As he did this the Bringer Claws disappeared, their work completely done. All the supplies they'd need, from the bowls to the cups to the pans taken from the cabinet, to all the ingredients and miscellaneous baking items like the frosting they'd bought, was on full display and neatly resting right in front of them. With all the preparation complete, all that was left was to make the actual cake.

The both of them stood there for multiple moments, silently staring at the spread of items in front of them. At one point Charmy had made a single cough and began to awkwardly rub at his arm, while Sorun had made an unsettled hum at the sight of it all. The dark-haired teen had eventually reached out and grabbed a purple bowl, though all he'd done with it was set it in front of them and gently rock it with his hand.

"... Hey, Charmy?"

"Yeah?"

"Do you actually know how to make a cake?"

The Mobian shook his head. "No. Do you?"

"I've never baked a day in my life."

"Oh..."

It quickly dawned on the two just how ill-prepared for this task they truly were. Charmy had blanched from the mere thought of it, while Sorun had released his grip on the bowl, only to reach over and grab one of the eggs.

Perhaps going forwards knowing this wasn't something they were equipped to handle wasn't the best way to go about this, but he didn't find himself caring all that much. Ever since his talk with Saffron he'd been too curious over Charmy, and all it took was for Charmy's sunny disposition to win Sorun over for becoming fond of him. Sorun himself wasn't so sure how it'd happened. The bee's attitude, maybe, or his small size, or the fact he admired Charmy's integrity to maintain that personality of his despite how much adversity he'd apparently faced. He was honestly amazed he'd grown so attached to him in such a short amount of time, even if he still couldn't figure out how Charmy maintained that integrity of his.

He hadn't exactly intended to let what was supposed to be an educational outing for himself turn into a bonding session with Charmy, but it'd happened while he wasn't looking, so he wasn't willing to let this go here. Especially after he'd promised Charmy he'd help with the cake.

They were making this cake, dammit.

"How hard can it be? It's just mixing things together and throwing it in an oven," Sorun reasoned, bringing the egg he'd grabbed in front of his face. "We'll just start with the eggs... eggs with a very questionable origin now that I think about it." He tapped the egg. "Wasn't the lady we bought this from a chicken...?"

"Er, Sorun?" Charmy continued to look towards Sorun's face as he stared at the egg he held in his hand with a contemplative look. Eventually he ran out of patience, prompting Charmy to shout out, "Sorun!"

The egg was thrown into the bowl by a startled Sorun, shell and all.

After hearing the egg crack against the bowl, both of the would-be bakers looked down into it. Sorun impassively blinked at the sight of the broken egg leaking yolk and whites into the bowl, whereas Charmy made a disgusted face while sticking his tongue out.

"Looks like progress to me," Sorun confidently said.

Charmy's response was to look up at the human with a flat face. "I'm pretty sure we're not supposed to add the shell part in."

Slowly nodding, Sorun reached a hand into the bowl and grabbed the shell, lifted it from the bowl, shook any gelatinous remains off from it, and set it aside on the counter. "Progress," he reaffirmed, turning back to Charmy.

The floating Mobian didn't at all look convinced. "I don't know about this, Sorun..."

Undeterred, Sorun reached to the side and grabbed a bag of flower. "Look, Charmy, baking is like science. It's a whole lot of trial and error. It's chemistry. Chemistry that you get to eat later." He tore open the top of the bag and began tilting flour into the bowl. "I say we just go at it and see what turns up. If we do something wrong we'll just adjust, and if we keep doing that eventually we'll get a cake."

Charmy slowly reached towards a whisk as Sorun spoke, an unsure look on his face. "Are you sure about this?" he asked. "Maybe we should go get somebody that actually knows what they're doing."

"I don't want to bother anybody with this, and besides, it's fine." After he felt like he dumped enough flower into the bowl, Sorun reached for another egg. "We'll get it done in no time, huh? All we need is a little perseverance."

---

30 minutes later

"I think it's time to call it quits, Charmy."

As it turned out, raw perseverance didn't quite cut it as opposed to having the actual knowledge needed to know how to bake. They'd tried. It'd been a valiant effort on both their parts, but despite their best efforts, they hadn't been able to cobble together a cake. They hadn't even made anything closely resembling a cake.

What they did manage to accomplish was making a mess of the kitchen. Bowls were upturned, raw ingredients laid strewn about everywhere, and Charmy was left sitting on the kitchen counter looking about at the mess with a dejected look on his face. Sorun was sitting on the ground, his back pressed against the counter and a bowl over his head and concealing his face.

"We should have gotten somebody to help us," Charmy said.

"Probably, yeah," Sorun agreed. "I think it's important to look at the bright side of these types of things, though."

"There's a bright side to all of this?"

"Dunno, but if you find one, do me a favor and let me know what it is."

A small sigh left Charmy upon hearing this. He opened his mouth to say something, but was stopped cold when he heard somebody enter the kitchen. Sorun, with his head covered by the bowl, wasn't able to make out who it was, though he did hear the pair of footsteps approach them before abruptly stopping, as if in shock.

"Uh-oh..." Charmy mumbled, voice turning meek and shameful.

Sorun's bowl-covered head lifted upwards. "What? What, who is it?"

"Mon dieu! What have you two done!?"

"Oh, that's who it is..."

After heaving a deep breath through his nose, Sorun reached up and lifted the bowl up off of his head far enough that he could see. The first thing he did was wince upon seeing the kitchen was even more of a mess than he remembered it being in before he'd been blinded by the bowl. And then he saw Antoine, standing at the edge of the kitchen completely frozen with a look of horror on his face like his own mother had just been shot in front of him.

"..." Sorun let go of the bowl and let it fall back over his eyes. "I can explain," he said, voice muffled by the bowl.

"Explain? Explain!?" Angry footsteps approached Sorun, the Earthling not moving so much as a muscle when the bowl was practically ripped off his head to reveal a practically fuming Antoine. Sorun found himself less focused on how angry Antoine was and more on how he could be so red past all the light-brown fur covering his face.

"How? How could zis have happened?" Antoine demanded. "What were you even trying to make to cause such a mess!?"

"A cake."

One of Antoine's eyes began to violently twitch. "A cake ...!?" he all but hissed. "You 'ave nearly destroyed ze Freedom HQ's kitchen trying to bake a cake!?"

Sorun made a resigned sigh. "Look, baking's hard, man."

"No eet izn't!" Somehow Antoine seemed even more offended by Sorun's notion than the actual mess that was lying around them. "Look at zis! What iz zis? What even iz zis?" Antoine looked up from Sorun, at a glob of an off-white substance that had been Sorun and Charmy's best attempt at making cake batter. "What have..." Poking the substance, Antoine made a disgusted face. "Zis consistency, ze color, eet iz all wrong! Did you even separate ze eggs, Sorun!?"

"... Define separate." When Antoine's gaze snapped down at Sorun, he asked, "seriously, what does that mean? There's more to eggs than just dumping them in the bowl?"

He didn't get an answer to his question. What he got was Antoine breathing in deeply through his nose, and then slowly exhaling through his mouth. His shoulder relaxed just the smallest bit, followed by the coyote pressing his hands together while mumbling under his breath.

"Happy thoughts, Antoine, happy thoughts, you must be thinking ze happy thoughts..." He sighed after whispering the last word, and then looked to the side, over at Charmy who had been shuffling uncomfortably on the kitchen counter the entire time. "I am assuming zis cake was for ze party later, non?"

Hesitantly, Charmy nodded. "Yeah, that's right..."

"Oui, oui, alright, eet iz ze obvious fact zat you two are ze hopelessness when it comes to ze finer points of ze culinary arts." Antoine reached down, grabbed a very confused Sorun's arm, and hefted him up to his feet. "Charmy, you will be staying weeth me to clean zis mess you two 'ave made." Maneuvering behind Sorun, Antoine began to physically push the Earthling out of the kitchen. "And you , Sorun, are going far away from here!"

"Huh?" Rapidly blinking, Sorun turned his head back far enough to look at Antoine as he continued to be pushed from the kitchen. "B-but the cake-"

"I will handle the cake, Charmy will help, you will not!"

"But I can-"

"Non!" His protest falling on unwilling ears, Sorun was pushed out from the kitchen with a final shove. He turned around towards Antoine, and found himself shying back a bit when he saw Antoine glaring at him with arms crossed. "Really, Sorun, you have done quite enough. I would thought someone like you of all someones would behave better zan to let zis befall ze kitchen!" After speaking, Antoine gestured back to the kitchen, making Sorun wince a bit in shame. Now that he had a wide view of the place it did look awful, all things considered. He didn't even know how it had gone that bad. He and Charmy had just gotten carried away during their experimenting.

It wasn't like he'd meant for it to go this far out of hand, really, he hadn't. He'd just been really determined to help make that cake- perhaps a bit too determined. But he hadn't wanted to let Charmy down.

He should have listened to him and got somebody that actually knew what they were doing before they wrecked the kitchen.

Antoine's features softened slightly. "Sorun, do not be making zat face."

"I'm not makin' a face." That was probably a lie. Sorun couldn't see his own face, but he could feel the sad pout on his mouth was making. Apparently it was very noticeable to Antoine, who just looked uncomfortable now.

"Agh... Sorun, eef you really want to help, le princess iz just behinded me weeth things for ze party. I am being sure she would appreciate ze help."

Sorun immediately brightened up. "Oh, yeah. I'll go do that."

"Bon, bon, now I need to salvage zis travesty..."

It was no sooner that Antoine walked back into the kitchen that Sorun heard a pair of footsteps descending the stairs into the HQ. He could immediately tell from the blue boots he saw that it was Sally. And that was all he saw, as the rest of her body was obscured by the large amount of boxes she was carrying.

She didn't seem to have a very stable hold on the boxes, as they were stacked far above her head and were swaying from side-to-side. The wobbling only increased the further down the stairs she went, and when she finally set her foot down on ground floor, the boxes came to a tipping point. Literally. They began to fall over, with Sally gasping out in shock as she attempted to stabilize the boxes.

Fortunately for her Sorun had been standing on the other side of the room, so when he saw Sally drop the boxes two spectral hands had extended from his shoulders, reached across the room, and caught the boxes. Sally, still holding an armload of boxes in her hands, stared at the blue, feathered arms next to her in surprise, and then followed them to the awkwardly-grinning teen across from her.

"Hi," Sorun greeted, giving a small wave. "Need some help?"

"Thanks again for helping me set all this up, Sorun."

"It's not a problem at all, Sally," Sorun said, though currently his focus wasn't on the princess. It was on a paper cup he was holding in his hand, his eyes scrutinizing the details of the cup. When he decided there wasn't anything interesting to be had with it, the cup just being an ordinary paper cup, he set it down on the long table in front of him lined with dozens of other identical cups. He then turned around to face the rest of the HQ's living room.

All in all, there wasn't that much to be set up for the party that was to come. It was just to be a small affair for the Freedom Fighters, after all. A few tables and some chairs, mostly, and some other small items like the numerous cups that were set behind him. "Cozy" is a word Sorun would use to describe how the place looked. Small.

Simple. With how complicated his life was he often yearned for the simpler things, so seeing that the party being planned was going to be a small, simple thing like this was a bit comforting to him.

He turned to the side just as Sally finished setting down one of the folding chairs she'd brought in. With a satisfied sigh, she nodded at the chair and then turned to Sorun. Sorun in turn found himself asking as the princess approached, "So what made you decide to go through with Charmy's party idea in the first place?"

"With how little has been going on I figured that it couldn't have hurt. That and the fact I figured we were all due something for all the work it took us to get this far," Sally answered as she stopped in front of him. "I think it'll do us all a bit of good to relax a bit for once."

"Mh." Sorun glanced to the side at the kitchen. "They're having fun."

Sally's eyes followed his gaze to the kitchen, and the small smile that had been on her face became strained. The kitchen had been cleaned for the most part while she and Sorun had prepared everything else, though there were still a noticeable few misplaced items scattered about along with some stains. Her attention was less on that and more on the pair that were currently in there. Charmy and Antoine were in a heated argument, the former of which was holding a bowl full of batter and flying around to avoid the latter that was trying to to grab at the bowl.

"You really had to leave those two in the kitchen with each other?" Sally asked as she turned back to Sorun.

"I didn't leave anybody with anything," Sorun denied. "What are they even arguing about, anyways?"

"From what I picked up Charmy wants to add honey into the cake and Antoine doesn't want to because it messes up his recipe," she answered with a roll of her eyes. "Saffron said that she was going to be adding honey into the punch she volunteered to make for the party. It makes me wonder why they're so partial to that stuff."

"I mean... they are bees," Sorun pointed out. He found his gaze maintained on Charmy's face, his own turning into a contemplative frown. "Charmy's been through a bunch, huh?" he asked.

From the corner of his eye he noticed that Sally's face dimmed down into a dour look. "Yes, he has. Did he tell you what became of the Golden Hive Colony?"

"Saffron did." A pause. "How does he do it, Sally?"

"Do what?"

"Be him," Sorun sighed out. "I can't figure it out. How a guy like that can lose so much and stay so carefree like that. It doesn't make sense." He shook his head and turned back to Sally. "I know he still has her, Saffron, but that can't be all, can it?"

His questions seemed to have caught Sally a bit off guard from how she'd widened her eyes a bit in surprise. A small breath soon left her, after which she closed her eyes in quiet contemplation for a few moments. She then opened them and focused back on Sorun. "Does this have anything to do with you?" she asked.

The question had been a bit unexpected for Sorun, who stilled a bit as he thought. It was true that he'd lost everything like Charmy had, albeit on a larger scale. What the bee hadn't lost compared to Sorun was his own life, which for Sorun was practically on a painfully short countdown timer at this point. A life that had little more value than fulfilling some contrived prophecy. The only comfort Sorun found in it was that it was a life spent saving everybody's lives, though he had to wonder if Charmy would be so cheery if he was in the same position Sorun was in.

Knowing him, Sorun somewhat suspected little would have changed with Charmy even if he had the same looming threat hovering over his head like Sorun did. That's what confused Sorun so.

"... Partially," Sorun eventually said in answer to the princess's question. "He doesn't act like somebody who lost their entire colony and family. There's no way he's a callous enough person that he just got over losing them all."

"You're right, he isn't," Sally agreed. "It's not like he was the way he usually is when it happened. He was devastated, Sorun. Both him and Saffron." She paused and looked in the kitchen towards Charmy himself. "I think it'd be safer to say he got past it," she continued, turning back to Sorun. "Having Saffron nearby certainly helped, as well as the support of his friends and everybody else around him. But in the end, well... he's Charmy. I think that's just the way he is."

Sorun's response was to let out a single, low chuckle that sounded a bit too sad to even be called a laugh. "It's just a bit upsetting is all," he told her. "You people always seem to bounce back from the worst tragedies. I'm just a bit jealous seeing Charmy cope so well with everything he lost. Because I see that, and then I look at myself and wonder what I am compared to that." He looked towards the ceiling and began rubbing at the back of his head. "I guess I'm a pretty depressing guy to hang around, huh?"

"Oh, Sorun, don't say that." When he looked down, Sorun saw that Sally had taken a few steps closer to him. "We can't all be Charmy. Some of us just take a bit longer to get past these things than others. I can... personally attest to that." That last sentence had been spoken a bit quieter, and she'd moved her head a bit away when she said it. She quickly re-faced Sorun before speaking again. "But I'd say you're doing better than you think." Her features brightened up considerably. "I think the fact you went out of your way to try and help Charmy with this says enough. Just go at your own pace, Sorun. We're here if you need us."

Shifting his eyes away from embarrassment, Sorun mumbled out, "Yeah, I know." His eyes went back to Sally when he heard her make a small laugh, and then turn towards a small box that was sitting near the wall.

"Anyways," Sally said, bending down to pick the box up, "moving away from all that, there's one last thing to take care of."

Sorun hummed as he watched Sally place the box on the nearby table. "Oh, yeah? What's- oh."

He knew what it was the moment she'd opened the box. He didn't even need to wait for her to open it all the way, as he'd seen the golden light shine through the crack of the box's lid as she began opening it. When the box was fully opened, he'd leaned forwards in order to peek into its interior to confirm what he thought was inside of it.

Power Rings. A lot of them, as least ten. Sorun had gawked slightly at the sight of the rings, and then looked to the side at Sally who was grinning at him.

"They're for Nicole," she explained. "I figured that since everybody was going to this thing that she should be a part of it, too, so I got a bunch of these together so she could stay in her body through the whole night."

"You really did that for her?" Sorun asked, almost in disbelief as he looked back towards the rings.

"Well, of course I did. She's one of my closest friends and it wouldn't have felt right excluding her from this."

"I see. That's... that's really nice of you, Sally." There was an air of appreciation and awe in his voice as he reached out towards the box. "Hey, Sally. Is she with you right now?"

He saw Sally shake her head. "No, she's in the lab doing something. Why?"

Sorun's hands grabbed the edges of the box. "You, um... would you mind if I gave her these?"

As he began dragging the box off the table and towards him, he saw Sally tilt her head back a bit in surprise at his question. "I... suppose that's fine," she said after a moment. "Can I ask why?"

"Ah, I just felt like doing a spontaneous act of random kindness. They can change the world, you know," Sorun said as he walked over to the entrance of the HQ lab, box of Power Rings in hand. "I'll make sure to get these to her. See ya in a bit."

The first thing he'd done when Sorun had entered the lab was make sure it was empty of anybody else aside from the person he was looking for. He breathed out a sigh of relief when he saw that the lab for the most part was empty: no sign of Tails or Rotor at all. What was there was the small handheld computer plugged into the lab's computer at the other end of the lab.

Sorun stared ahead at the computer, and then down at the box in his hands. He heard his heart begin to beat in his ears, took a breath to steady himself, and then began walking forwards.

"Heyyyy, Nicole," Sorun greeted, setting the box down on the ground as he sat down in the nearest swivel chair in front of the lab's computer. "You busy right now?"

As soon as he finished speaking, the Nicole-shaped icon he'd grown accustomed to seeing appeared on the screen in front of him. "As it happens, yes, I am," she informed him. "I appreciate the visit, Sorun, but I'm afraid I am too preoccupied to do much more than chat for a short time."

"That's fine, I just needed to tell you something." Sorun bent down towards the box at his feet. "Did you know... that there's gonna be a party tomorrow night?"

"A party? No, I was not aware."

Sorun opened the box. "It was Charmy's idea, and Sally went for it. It's not really that big a thing, just gonna be all of us hanging out for a night pretty much, but, y'know, it'll still be nice." Sorun grabbed one of the rings and held it up for the computer's camera to see. "And as it happens you're part of 'all of us', so Sally got you a whole box of these things so you could spend the whole night with us."

There was a noticeable pause before Nicole spoke again. "She... acquired a box of Power Rings specifically for me?"

Sorun glanced down into the box. "I mean if you want a hard number it's, like, ten or so, but yeah."

"I..." The voice being projected through the computer's speaker almost sounded unsure before Nicole began speaking again. "I do not think allocating so many Power Rings for my own personal use just to participate in a gathering is the best use of-"

"Nah, nonsense, nonsense." Sorun tossed the Power Ring back into the box and slid it to the side of the computer with his foot. "They're yours. Besides, the things literally spawn infinitely out of a lake, and the princess already gave the okay. Ten's enough to get you through a whole night, right?"

"It's more than enough, which is why I don't think I should-"

"Nicole. They're yours." Sorun pushed himself away from the computer, stood up, and pushed the chair back in. "If you really have to just consider it a gift for your due diligence or whatever, but the truth is she just didn't want you missing out on the party." He sighed and looked away from the computer. "And... I feel the same as her. To be honest with you I was kind of planning on stealing a bunch of rings for you in the back of my head until Sally showed me the box." He made a nervous chuckle. "I'm, uh, really glad I didn't have to do that."

"As am I. I do not think that you committing larceny against the kingdom would have gone well with Sally." Nicole's icon closed its eyes, after which a small smiled appeared. "Thank you for this, Sorun. This means much more to me than you know. If it is not too much trouble, could you please relay my thanks to-"

"You can just tell her yourself. Tomorrow night," Sorun reminded her. "She'll be there along with everybody else."

Another pause. "... This is true. Very well," she conceded. "Then... I will see you tomorrow night, then."

Sorun nodded. "Yeah. Totally." His eyes flicked back to the door. "I-I'll let you get back to whatever you were doing. Seeya."

That was as far as he could go before his nerves overtook him and he found himself walking back towards the doors. He didn't hear Nicole say anything to him after he departed, and he couldn't make up his mind on whether or not he was relieved or upset at that. He pushed it out of his mind and focused on trying to regain his normal composure before he exited the lab and went back to everybody else so they didn't notice anything off with him.

"I really would have stolen those rings, too... ack, good on Sally for looking out for Nicole, I guess. Though I kinda wish I woulda been the one to come up with all those rings. Now Sally gets all the credit." He reached the door, held his hand on the handle, and let out a small breath. "Forget it. I should just be happy for her. She doesn't really get to do this kind of thing. Didn't think I'd ever be going to something like a party with all these people, too..." He sighed out and opened the door.

"But... I guess it's fine," he continued thinking as he stepped out of the lab and made his way to the main room where everyone else was. "After everything we've been through we deserve it, and seeing as I'm not gonna be around much longer... yeah. Screw it. We'll have one last night of fun with everybody. And then... then I guess I'll go end this and die."

Chapter 42

Recursion Error

Episode 42- The actual party

Sorun had seldom been to any parties during the duration of his life, both here on Mobius and back on Earth. He'd been to a birthday party once. David's, and he'd been ten at the time. He didn't have any particularly good or bad memories from the experience, either. It'd just been a unique day for him that day.

With that in mind, he didn't really know what to expect coming into this party they were hosting in the HQ. Being in the middle of it, he couldn't help but recall back to the day prior when Nicole had referred to it as a "gathering". Because sitting down on the couch and seeing it with his own eyes, for Sorun, it was less a party and more of just that: a gathering. It was much too calm to be called a party. Cramped- the entirety of the Freedom Fighters and Chaotix, along with Rouge, were there. But the overall atmosphere was calm.

Sorun liked it. The peacefulness of it. No running around doing crazy things, no fighting robots or anything of the sort like that, no drama, nothing exciting. Just him and everybody else chilling out together. It was nice.

Of course Sonic ruined the moment by practically crashing right into the couch right next to Sorun, causing a rumble strong enough that the red drink inside of Sorun's cup almost spilled out.

"Yo! Sorun!" Why Sonic had chosen to raise his voice so much was beyond Sorun's reasoning. It wasn't like the idle chatter of everybody in the background was so loud that they needed to speak above normal volume. "What're you doin' all over here on your lonesome, huh?"

"I can't enjoy the moment on my own?" Sorun asked, raising an eyebrow in Sonic's direction as he took a drink from his cup.

Sonic vehemently shook his head, causing Sorun to unconsciously squeeze his cup just the slightest amount. "Nuh-uh! Not while I'm around!"

"Oh, leave him alone, Sonic," a chastising voice said from besides the two. Both teens looked over to the left side, where they saw Sally sit down on the free left spot next to Sorun on the couch. "He's just trying to enjoy the party," the princess continued.

"Yeah, but he's not even acting like he's a part of it!" Sonic argued, gesturing his arm past Sorun and towards Sally, the former sinking his back into the couch as he continued sipping at his punch. "I'm glad he came here and everything, but he's just sitting around! Look, he didn't even dress for it!"

At that, Sorun rose both his eyebrows and looked down at himself. He wore the exact same blue coat and black undershirt he always wore, and the same pants and boots. And when he looked around, nobody else was wearing anything out of the ordinary. In fact everybody, including Sonic, was wearing the same thing they always wore.

"... I always wear this," Sorun said, looking back to Sonic. "If anything you're the one that didn't dress up."

For some reason that statement made Sonic confused. "Huh? How is this not dressin' up?" he asked, gesturing at his body and the fact all he had on were his red sneakers and white gloves. "This is casual wear, and this party's a casual party. But YOU-" he said, pointing to Sorun, "- always have to dress all fancy. Since day one you've been covered head to toe in clothes and you never let loose in front of anybody!"

"..." It took Sorun a bit to even wrap his head around what he just heard before he could begin formulating a response. "Is this a culture thing I'm missing?"

He heard a sigh from besides him, causing Sorun to turn to Sally. "No, Sorun, Sonic just personally doesn't like clothes because he thinks they're too 'stuffy' and make people uptight," she explained.

Sonic scoffed from besides Sorun. "'Course they do, you guys seen Antoine?" He turned his eyes to Sally. "And think about it, Sal. Think about it. Sorun's the most sour guy in all of Knothole. And who's one of the only people in Knothole that wears pants?" He nodded his head towards Sorun, causing the Earthling to roll his eyes. "Is it really a coincidence?"

Hearing enough of this ridiculousness, Sorun palmed Sonic's face and pushed him back to his side of the couch. The blue hedgehog sputtered and tried to resist, but eventually relented and made a pout at Sorun when he was successfully pushed back. Sorun, however, had paused and was looking between his own hand and Sonic's eyes.

"... You know I never really noticed, but your eyes are huge, Sonic," Sorun said, staring at his own hand in wonder. He couldn't even figure out which was bigger- his own hand or one of Sonic's eyes. Or... was it both? "Actually, that's something I wanna ask you," Sorun said, turning to meet Sonic fully. "Dude, I gotta ask. How many eyes do you have?"

"Huh?" He'd been so caught off guard by the question that Sonic's mouth had dropped open in confusion. "What is that supposed to mean?"

"I mean that you have this weird thing going on where, like, the middle part of your face isn't... like there's nothing separating your eyes, they're just kind of connected there," Sorun said. "Amy and Shadow and your family have the same thing going on and nobody else does so I assume it's a hedgehog-only thing, but, like, is it two eyes but they're connected, or just, uh... one really weird eye...?"

Every single word said by Sorun only seemed to make Sonic grow more and more confused. By the end he was looking at the pale teen like he was an alien, completely dumbstruck and seemingly at a loss for words. Sorun was almost afraid he'd said something offensive.

And then he burst out laughing and clapped Sorun on the shoulder, now making the Earthling the confused one.

"Ah-ha-ha-ha! Oh, man... how many eyes do I have? Priceless," Sonic gasped out, wiping away an invisible tear from his laughter. "Good joke, Sorun, but come on, it's obvious how many eyes I have."

It really wasn't. "Okay, but can I get a number or something 'cause-"

Sonic burst out in another fit of laughter. "Ah, come on, Sorun, you can't play the same joke twice. It gets old too fast." He shook his head and leaned back into the couch, obliviously ignoring the gawking human next to him. "Is there any other 'weird things' you've noticed about me or somebody else?" he asked, making finger quotes.

After thinking for a second, Sorun decided to answer in earnest. "Well, there's Tails. I'm pretty sure his fur is yellow, but sometimes I'll see him in really weird lighting and he'll look almost orange."

Sonic shrugged. "He's just colored like that."

"The stripes along Shadow's eyes makes it look like he's wearing red eyeliner."

Again, Sonic laughed. "Ha! I'm gonna use that the next time I see him." He rolled his head towards Sorun. "Alright, well let me ask you something: how come you humans and Overlanders always wear so much clothing?" he asked him. "I mean, seriously, every single time I've been to Station Square all the humans I saw were completely decked out in clothes. Everyone! You people have some weird obsession with clothes, I swear."

Sorun creased his brows in mild offense. "We don't have an obsession. Honey has as obsession with clothes," Sorun objected. "We just, well..." He glanced towards Sonic's fur-covered crotch, turned around and briefly glanced at Sally's body, and then looked back at Sonic. "We don't really have anything to... y'know..." He became too flustered with what he was saying, and with a small grunt he sunk back against the couch. "Man, whatever, at least I don't walk around naked like all you guys."

To his immense surprise, not only did Sonic looked surprised at what Sorun said, but also Sally. "Huh? Naked?" the princess echoed. "What do you mean naked? Nobody here is naked."

He almost believed he'd misheard her. Indeed, Sorun wished that he had been mistaken in what he heard, but in his heart of hearts he knew he wasn't mistaken. In an almost languid manner, he rolled his head over to Sally, who was giving him a questioning look. Sorun, eyes half-lidded from the absolute absurdity of it all, glanced at Sally's chest exposed from her opened vest, down to her lower body that only had a pair of boots on the feet, and then, slowly, he looked back up at Sally's face.

"... Seriously, Sally?"

All the chipmunk did in response was shake her head, not understanding Sorun's point. "Sorun, I have a vest and boots on. Sonic has gloves and his sneakers. That's the complete opposite of being naked."

"Okay, you know what, I'm not dealing with this." Taking one last gulp of his punch, Sorun crushed the now-empty cup and stood up from the couch. "I'll go mingle about if it means getting out of this cursed conversation."

He walked off towards the nearest crowd of people, leaving behind Sonic and Sally on the couch. They both stared after him in confusion, gave each other questioning looks, and then finally shrugged the whole experience off before they began chatting amongst themselves.

"I'm not really much of a dart guy, Ray."

In Sorun's hand was a regular throwing dart, which he was rolling around back and forth in his palm. And in front of Sorun, pinned to the HQ's wall, was a picture of Eggman. A picture that, to his slight displeasure, he realized was a printout of one of the innumerable selfies he and Nicole had acquired during that one disastrous outing of theirs. He didn't know whether to be happy they were getting use out of those or upset that he had to be reminded of that day.

He looked to the side of him. Two Mobians, Ray and Mighty, were there, with the former glancing back and forth between a dart of his own and the poster set in front of him while Mighty was glancing at him with a smirk.

"Ah, come on. Don't tell me you're afraid of losing to Ray in a little game of darts here," Mighty said, that ever-present smirk still on his face.

"I'm not afraid. I know I'm gonna lose. I've never tossed a dart in my entire life," Sorun said.

The smirk Mighty wore dropped off. "Huh? But you toss those swords of yours around all the time!"

"Yeah, that's way different than darts, man."

"How would you even know that if you've never tried it?"

Sorun opened his mouth to answer, but no sound came out when he realized Mighty was right. He had doubts mentally commanding magically-conjured swords wasn't all that different than actually physically throwing a dart, but he supposed he wouldn't know unless he tried.

"Aw, d-don't be like that, Sorun. It's easy." Ray held up the dart he held in his hand and held it up to his eye, the other one closed. "You just line it up and throw, like this!"

The golden squirrel tossed the dart. It briefly whistled through the air, and hit the picture of Eggman right between the eyes.

"Just like that, huh?" Nodding to himself, Sorun adopted a similar stance Ray had made and held the dart up to his eye while squinting. "Line it up, and then..."

He threw the dart.

It hadn't even hit the poster. It'd just bounced off the wall.

Ray and Mighty both winced, while Sorun just slumped his shoulders. They all jumped upwards when an object whizzed past them and indented itself into Eggman's forehead, right above the dart Ray had thrown previously. When Sorun tilted his head forwards to look closer, he realized the thrown object had been a shuriken.

"You require more practice, Sorun." A purple body materialized on the opposite side of Sorun. Crossing his arms, Espio gave Sorun a sideways look. "Your accuracy is all over the place with that footwork."

"Tch." Clacking his teeth together, Sorun willed a Summoned Sword to appear at his side. "I'll show you accuracy..." he muttered out, the point of the floating sword making small adjustments as it aimed at the poster. With a single mental command, the sword was sent flying towards the poster.

Of course, the sword wad dead-on with hitting its mark. Due to the sheer size of the blade, though, the entire poster had been impaled and cut completely in half from the sword. Sorun cast another glance towards Espio who, to his credit, was staring towards the cut poster with an unfazed expression.

"Mine's bigger," was all that Sorun said to him.

Espio's initial response was to scoff. "Size isn't everything, but I'll concede to the fact that you can at least aim well." He turned his head towards Sorun and gave him a smile. "I heard what you did for Charmy. You have my thanks."

Sorun blinked in the direction of the chameleon, and then looked away. "It wasn't anything special, I just- egh!"

A sudden weight clamping around his neck and weighing his back down cut Sorun off from his words. He gasped out in panic and scrambled his hands up towards his neck, but he'd paused halfway when he recognized the giggling voice behind him.

"Sorun, come on! You gotta try the cake me and Antoine made!" It was Charmy's voice, and based on the force Sorun was feeling, the bee was trying to drag him away by flying backwards while holding onto him.

He became less panicked, though he still felt embarrassment burn through him as Sorun tried to unbind the arms around his neck. "Charmy, let go of me," he demanded, feeling his face burn when he saw the three Mobians he'd just been playing darts with grinning at the display.

"Mh-mh, you have to hurry!" To Sorun's shock Charmy was actually becoming successful in dragging him backwards. "Vector's trying to eat it all!"

"I'm gonna go, just get your hands off me!"

It was with an unsure look that Sorun glanced at the small machine that had been placed on the long table where the punch and paper cups were located. If he didn't know any better he would have thought it was some strange sort of coffee maker with a strange metal tube sticking out of the top at an odd angle. But he knew very well what it was, and he couldn't help but be somewhat skeptical over it.

"Are you sure this is gonna work?" Sorun asked the purple walrus working on an exposed panel on the small machine. "I mean, I like carbonated drinks as much as the next guy, probably more so, but... carbonated punch? I dunno, man, sounds like a pretty forbidden combo."

"The forbidden combo? Really?" Rotor turned his head away from the machine to give Sorun a flat look. "Yes, Sorun, I'm sure it's gonna work. Come on, can you even blame me? No insult to Saffron or her punch, but I wanted to liven the party up and I just happened to have this lying around in the lab."

"And you had a carbonation machine why ?"

"I had a spark of inspiration one night and a lot of free time."

Sorun rolled his eyes at that, but otherwise said nothing. Admittedly the prospect of carbonated punch was a bit enticing to him. It'd been a while since he had any of that cola stuff they stocked in the fridge. And the more he thought on it the more he realized he could really go for some carbonated punch, especially as he'd never had any before.

"How much longer is this gonna take?" Sorun asked, a bit impatiently.

Rotor scrunched up his face and flipped a small switch. "I gotta get the pressure here right or something catastrophic could happen."

"Catastrophic. Right." Sorun glanced off to the side. "Pretty sure something catastrophic's already happenin'..."

A short distance away from them he saw Knuckles. That wasn't the strange part. The strange part was that he had Julie-Su was tugging at one arm while Rouge was tucking on the other. Even stranger was that Knuckles had an incredibly confused and flustered look on his face.

"He's dancing with me, you bat ," Julie-Su growled out, tugging Knuckles towards her while shooting Rouge a dirty look.

Rough pulled Knuckles towards her. "Now way! You've been hogging him the entire night so far! Let him dance with someone else!"

Sorun was pretty sure he saw nervous sweat beading down Knuckles' face. "H-hey, guys, can we talk this out...?"

Humming at the sight of the struggling trio, Sorun turned back to Rotor and his carbonation machine. He found himself raising an eyebrow when the silver tube connected to the top of the machine began to violently wiggle around, with puffs of concentrated carbon gas seeping out from the bottom. He looked to the right at Rotor, who had backed up a couple of steps away from the sputtering machine.

"Er, Rotor?" Sorun called out. "What's going on with the thing?"

He heard Rotor gulp. "Something catastrophic."

"Oh, goody."

Before any more words could be said the silver tube was blasted off the top of the machine. Like a small rocket it flew around the room, occasionally hitting a surface and bouncing off only to then fly away at a completely different angle. Both Rotor and Sorun watched the tube with their eyes as it bounced around the room, their irises darting left and right as they tracked the small missile flying around. It ended when the small tube impacted straight onto Knuckles' forehead, causing both to wince and hiss as the echidna tilted backwards and landed on the floor.

The two girls that had been at his side stared down at the fallen echidna with looks of shock on their faces. Their expressions quickly turned into ones of pure anger as they rose their heads towards the table, where both Rotor and Sorun were standing at.

"Hey!" Rouge shouted, both her and Julie-Su storming over to their location. "Just what do you think you're doing!?"

Sorun heard another gulp from Rotor. He glanced at him and, thinking fast, grabbed the cup of punch he'd brought over and turned away. "All yours, buddy," Sorun remarked, sending Rotor a sympathetic look before walking off. All he managed to catch from the walrus was a hurt look of betrayal before the two other Mobians were upon him.

"I'll pour one out for you, big guy," Sorun thought to himself, drinking the cup empty to the sound of heavy arguing behind him.

"Who the hell do these goddamned degenerate savages think they are son of a bitch goddamn it what the f-"

"Uh, Sorun? What are you doing?"

The speed at which Sorun whipped his neck around at the voice behind him had been fast enough that he'd heard bones in his neck pop. For all he knew he had actually broken vertebrae and just didn't feel it, but he didn't find himself caring all that much. What he did care about was why Amy was interrupting him during the middle of a very important task.

Amy herself stood just behind Sorun, looking with one eye squinting at Sorun, and then at the pair of normal arms and pair of blue spectral arms reaching into a sink full of suds-filled water and dishes. Sorun himself had a strained, wide-eyed look on his face, which only seemed to make the pink hedgehog even more uncomfortable.

"Well someone has to clean all the plates you guys were eating the cake and the rest of the food Antoine and Bunnie brought over off of. Why Sally didn't just bring paper plates like the cups is beyond me..."

he grumbled out, blue arms furiously scrubbing at the plates in a blur. "Makes me mad, seeing all that stuff just left out."

This statement only caused greater confusion in Amy. "Couldn't you just wait until after the party? We could have all done it together."

"No, Amy, you don't understand, the mess is here now and I need to deal with it now . It's gonna bug me all night if I don't make it disappear." Why couldn't she see it? He couldn't just leave it there for him to see whenever he just happened to glance in the direction of the kitchen sink. He couldn't do that. He refused to. It needed to go away.

He really hated dirty dishes.

"Ugh, Sorun, come on, you can't do this in the middle of the party." Shaking her head, Amy stepped forwards and reached out to Sorun's hands, which were still in the sink. "Come on, just leave all this stuff for tomorrow morning when we clean- aiiee!"

She'd only dipped her gloved-covered fingers in the water for half a second before she made a small shriek and tore her hand away from the sink, startling Sorun. The pink Mobian shook the hand off, blowing on it before worryingly looking at the sink. "Sorun, why do you have the water on so hot!?"

"Hot?" Blinking in confusion, Sorun removed his hands from the sink's water. He'd been so focused on cleaning dishes that he only now noticed that his hands were completely beet-red, causing him to grimace a bit in realization. "Oh. Whoops," he mumbled out. "Musta put the water on too hot without feeling it. I got so caught up in cleaning this stuff I didn't even realize... man..."

"Eh-heh, I, uh... like it hot," Sorun lied, chuckling nervously as he shook the moisture off from his hands. The Bringer Claws also disappeared, the dishes they were holding clattering into the sink's water as he fully turned towards Amy. "You know what, maybe you're right. I'll just let it sit overnight and we can deal with it later."

Amy smiled in agreement and nodded at him. "That's more like it. Now come on!"

Without even waiting for his consent Amy had reached forwards and grabbed at one of Sorun's now-red wrists. The Earthling sputtered out in slight protest, but in the end did nothing as he was dragged outside of the kitchen and into the main room of the HQ. It was only once they were outside of the kitchen proper that Sorun had gently wrenched his wrist free of Amy's grasp.

Amy, however, didn't seem to notice her sudden loss of Sorun's hand in the slightest. In fact she seemed more focused on something across the room. Sorun had quirked an eye at the sight, but when he followed her line of sight he found himself scoffing when he understood what it was the pink Mobian was focusing on.

On the other side of the room was the long table with all the paper cups set up. Over there was Sonic and Tails, who were both stacking empty cups up on a high pyramid that almost reached the ceiling. Sorun looked back towards Amy, not at all being surprised to see how she currently looked. Eyes half-lidded and her entire face set in a lovesick expression as she stared over at the blue hedgehog. Sorun didn't really know how to feel seeing that look, especially after having heard Sonic's feelings over the Amy. Pitying, he supposed, as Sonic had made it very clear to Sorun that he had no intention of reciprocating Amy's feelings.

"Oh, Sorun. This party has been wonderful, but Sonic's been hanging around with everybody around him. He hasn't set any time aside for me yet." Amy hadn't even turned towards Sorun as she spoke. Her light green eyes were perpetually locked onto Sonic. "Haven't you ever cared for somebody enough that your heart just aches not being around them?"

Instead of answering, Sorun looked off to the side towards the other end of the room. His eyes were drawn towards a pair standing near the back: Sally and Nicole. They seemed to be in deep conversation about something, with Sally saying something that caused Nicole to hold her hand to her mouth and make a small laugh. Sorun sighed at the sight, and then proceeded to place his hands in his pockets.

"Can't say I have, Amy," he mumbled out before walking away. He wasn't even sure she noticed him leaving with all her attention focused on Sonic.

"Why do you want something like that?"

Sorun shrugged. "I dunno, I just... figured the sooner I get this over with and get the rest of them, the better, you know? Less chance of something bad happening." He took a drink of the punch he held in his hand, eyes continually affixed to the yellow fox standing in front of him. Tails, for his part, looked a bit hesitant, but at the same time he had a look on his face that suggested he was mulling Sorun's request over.

Admittedly, a small part of Sorun did feel a bit bad asking something so big from Tails, especially now of all times during a social gathering, but he wanted to get a jump on this as soon as possible after the party. It's what he'd endeavored to do, after all, but if Tails couldn't fulfill his request, then he had nothing to work off of. Not ideal, hence him asking for the fox's help right at this moment. His options were rather limited otherwise.

"Listen, I know this is a bit sudden, and I apologize for that, Tails, but I wouldn't be asking if I didn't really need it," Sorun continued. "I just need this one thing, alright? And besides, the sooner we get them the less risk there is of Eggman getting one or both of them and hurting somebody with 'em."

"Well... I guess you make a good point when you say it like that," Tails agreed. He made a small hum as he closed his eyes to think the request over, and then opened them while nodding up at Sorun. "Alright. I'll talk it over with Rotor and see what we can do. I think we have some spare Chaos energy sensors lying around, so if we cannibalize some of the parts I could more than likely slap something together for you."

The news was enough to make it feel like a weight was lifted off from Sorun's shoulders, making him breath out from the ephemeral sensation. "Thanks, Tails. It means a lot to me."

Anything further that was to be said between the two was interrupted when the loud sound of cheering drew both their attentions. A large crowd had formed near then end of the room, with everybody clapping at something. Upon observing further, Sorun realized just what it was they were clapping at- Antoine and Bunnie were both in front of the crowd, facing towards it and holding hands while both wore wide, happy smiles. Sorun was left wondering what it was that was happening until a voice had answered it for him.

"You two missed it!" Sorun and Tails turned their heads to the side, seeing Saffron fly over and stop right next to them. She had on a happy smile that was almost as wide as the couple's smile at the other side of the room. "Antoine and Bunnie are finally getting married!"

The reactions between Sorun and Tails varied greatly. Sorun had just merely widened his eyes in surprise, which in itself was a tame reaction compared to Tails'. The fox Mobian had grown so excited at the news that both of his tails began to excitedly wag through the air, while his ears had stood straight up and a wide, happy smile had broke out across his whole face.

"Really!? They're not just engaged anymore!? They're making it official!?" The mere prospect of it seemed to make Tails so excited that he was practically shaking.

Saffron gave him an enthusiastic nod. Her body was shaking from excitement. "Mm-hm! They just announced their plan for the wedding! Come on!"

Sorun silently watched as Saffron and Tails made their way to the crowd where everybody else was. From where he was Sorun couldn't even make out any words from all the elated chatter buzzing in from the large gathering, but he gathered the mood was exceptionally positive as he could have sworn he felt all the happiness wafting off from them all. He saw that Bunnie was having a very animated talk with Sally, both of them looking like they were bouncing up and down off the floor they were so energetic, while Antoine was being swarmed. It was with some amusement Sorun saw the wide and incredibly nervous smile Antoine held, with Vector having slinked behind him and wrapped an arm around his shoulder while Sonic was grinning widely at him while giving him two thumbs-ups.

"So they finally decided to tie it together, huh? I guess now'd be the time with how quiet everything is," Sorun thought to himself. He looked down into the cup he held and swirled around the contents. "Good for them. It's about time they finally got married."

He truly was happy for them. To the point that he felt himself smiling on the inside, even if on the outside he kept up a blank expression. It was enough that he wanted to walk over and join everybody else in congratulating the couple on their decision to finally get married. In fact he wanted to be the one in Vector's position, an arm wrapped around the coyote's shoulders as he teased him for the fact that Antoine was no doubt a nervous wreck on the inside right about now, especially as it looked like he was about to pass out from everybody crowding around him right now.

But he didn't. Sorun just kept his distance away from them as he continued to think.

"Well, I guess that's just more reason to go through with this so soon," he continued to think as he drunk from his cup. "Congratulations, Antoine, Bunnie. You both deserve it. I'll try to make it so you both get to live happy lives along with everybody else."

Sorun ran on what he and his circle of gamer friends back on Earth liked to call 'Gamer Time'.

Gamer Time was a simple concept. Sorun played video games, and his room had been set up in a way that absolutely no sunlight ever bled into his room. That meant that, unless he bothered to look at a clock, he never knew what time of day it was on the outside. This combined with long gaming sessions with his online friends meant that his gaming sessions often carried in through the night, oftentimes all the way to morning of the next day. His internal clock shifted over time due to this behavior, eventually getting to the point where he became a nocturnal creature who thrived at night and slept during the day.

Now, of course, this wasn't behavior he could afford to keep up all the time. He'd had to balance a school life during the day, after all, so this kind of schedule was usually regulated to weekends, days off, holidays and vacations. That still left a lot of time for Sorun to shift from living on normal time to living on Gamer Time, though, to the point that his body adjusted to doing both. So what did this mean in essence?

Basically if he wanted to he could stay up all night while at the same time sleep through a whole day and vice versa.

It wasn't exactly a perfect system; it sometimes lead to him being unusually tired at unreasonable hours during the day, and admittedly living somewhat normal hours on Mobius for months on end now had been slowly shifting his internal clock from working on both normal time and Gamer Time to just strictly normal time, but vestiges of his time spent living in Gamer Time was still evident on him, such as him sleeping an inordinately long time through the mornings usually. He remembered trying to explain this concept to Sonic once, though the hedgehog had been completely lost at Sorun's explanations and chalked him sleeping in all the time being a 'weird human thing'.

Well, he hadn't exactly been wrong , per se, but Sorun had still felt insulted enough to not pursue the matter any further and let Sonic think what he wanted.

On the flipside, he still had enough experience living in Gamer Time that he could stay up through the night if he wanted, even if his experience living in Gamer Time had atrophied some. That didn't even account for the fact his failing body sapped more and more of his energy the longer he went on, though tonight he found himself able to go for a fair bit. He partially blamed the punch, because it was so sweet that he doubted it was just honey that Saffron had put into this stuff.

He was pretty sure soda had less sugar than the amount of stuff she'd put in this punch.

It didn't seem to effect the other Freedom Fighters, though. He would have thought that seasoned guerilla fighters like them used to missions that stretched on through the night would have been able to keep themselves awake longer, and that wasn't even considering the fact they were all teenagers like him. But after Antoine and Bunnie had announced their wedding plans, the party had gone a bit... hectic. And all that excitement seemed to have drained everybody of energy, because it was hours later and now Sorun was here, sitting on the HQ's couch all by his lonesome. All around him were the passed-out forms of everybody that had attended the party, all sleeping soundly in various awkward positions on the floor and in some chairs. And a table in Knuckles' case.

A funny enough sight for Sorun, who, left all alone now, only had his own thoughts to occupy himself. He was happy that everybody had a good time and even happier for the soon-to-be bride and groom, really, he was, but thinking of the young couple in love also got Sorun thinking about himself and these concepts. Love, his pending death, his relationships with everybody, his future plans. Dire stuff, really.

"~Dame da ne, dame yo, dame da no yo...~" Sorun downed the rest of his drink in the final cup of punch that he held. Once the paper cup was empty, he tossed it away, watching with some amusement as the paper cup bounced off of the sleeping Sonic's head. The hedgehog quietly mumbled something in his sleep, and then rolled over on the floor so he was facing the other way.

"Man, I can't believe everybody passed out like this." Sorun spoke when he saw movement in his peripheral vision. He turned towards the source already knowing it was Nicole. "I guess they all got a little too excited with the wedding announcement, huh?"

Nicole glanced to the side at some of the sleeping Mobians around them, an amused smile on her face. "It would appear so." She looked back at Sorun. "I am surprised you are not sleeping along with them."

"Well, you know... one of those nights," Sorun said. "Not surprised you're still up since you don't get tired like us."

"That's... not entirely accurate," Nicole corrected, causing Sorun to tilt his head in interest. "I can feel the power drain from my body used to maintain this form. I found exhaustion to be a rather unpleasant experience, and even so the amount of time I was able to project my body on my own power alone made it impractical. Thankfully the use of Power Rings negated this sensation." Her smile grew a bit wider. "And I would have you know that I do, in fact, possess a sleep mode," she informed him.

"Oh. Huh." He hadn't actually known that. It made enough sense in a roundabout way- draining energy from an artificial being was the closest equivalent Sorun could think of to somebody getting tired, and according to Nicole's words for her it was practically the exact same sensation. He found it interesting. He found the idea of her having a sleep mode even more interesting. "Do you actually use that sleep mode of yours?"

"Of course. More often than not I utilize it whenever my handheld body needs to be shut down for recharging purposes," Nicole explained. "Beyond that, remaining active for extended periods of time can often lead to junk data and other bits of non-important data to accrue in my memory and processors. Too much of this buildup can lead to my mental faculties being slowed down." She grew a slightly uncomfortable look on her face. "I suppose the closest comparison would be an organic body suffering from sleep deprivation. It's not a sensation I find myself enjoying. I utilize my sleep mode to clear out this useless data so that I can remain running at peak capacity."

"So it's... like rebooting a computer to clear out the RAM?"

Nicole nodded, seemingly pleased at Sorun's understanding. "Yes, that's precisely it. Though, due to the sophisticated nature of my unique construction, it takes more than a simple reboot to restore me to full operational capacity. I usually require hours of sleep, particularly after long nights spent in the lab on my projects."

Sorun tilted his head back a bit, blinking once at Nicole. "Maybe you shouldn't be doing that so much, then," he said. "It's not healthy for people to pull consecutive all-nighters like that, you know."

She'd actually made a single, small giggle upon hearing that. "I thank you for the concern, Sorun, but I believe I am doing well. That project of mine has neared completion anyways."

He wanted to argue the point, but decided not to and just sat back on the couch with a sigh. If she said she was doing fine and knew what she was doing, then he'd believe her. It wasn't like he'd know any better anyways, especially considering he wasn't an AI like her. And with how he'd been treating his body with these Chaos Emeralds, it wasn't like he had a place to talk.

When he looked back up at Nicole, he paused. She was looking at him with a strange, almost contemplative look in her eyes. Her hands were at her sides, occasionally reaching up a few inches before falling back to her side, like she was unsure of something or couldn't make up her mind. Sorun watched the display in confusion, getting ready to ask what it was she was doing before Nicole evidently had made up her mind, as she'd bended forwards to reach for Sorun.

"Erm, Nicole? What are you doing?" Sorun asked, body growing tense when Nicole grabbed at his wrists.

"I want to try something," was the only explanation she gave to him before fully pulling Sorun up to his feet. She'd begun taking steps back towards the center of the room, Sorun being forced to follow her with her hands still gripped around his wrists. They'd stopped in the middle of the HQ's living room and then Nicole, face pointed straight at Sorun with a straight expression, said, "I want to try dancing."

It was very possible that in that moment Sorun had suffered a heart attack and hadn't felt it. "Uh-uh-uh-what?" he stuttered out, his wrists unconsciously attempting to weakly wriggle out of Nicole's grasp. "What made you come up with this idea?"

"I saw some of the others doing it earlier, and they seemed to be enjoying themselves." She looked down at their hands. "It's something I've never experienced before. Now seemed like a good time to ask for your help."

"We can't do this some other time?" Sorun nervously asked, his hands still trying to pull out of Nicole's grasp.

To his dismay, Nicole shook her head. "Some of what I heard from the others suggested this is an act only socially acceptable at gatherings such as this. I don't know when another opportunity to try this will arise."

"That doesn't make it an explicit rule or anyth-" Sorun cut himself off and shook his head. "Nicole, I don't even know how to da- I don't even wanna do this."

He didn't. He really, really didn't want to. Too embarrassing, too much to handle, it was too much everything. He was barely standing up on his feet as it was the mere prospect made him so nervous.

Nicole seemed to pick up on his nervousness. "Sorun, nobody will see us if that's what you're uncomfortable with. They're all asleep." She took a couple of steps closer to him. "You're usually the one to help me with these types of matters. I just want to see what it's like before tonight ends."

A low whine sounded out the back of Sorun's throat. He looked down at his currently-gripped wrists, and then looked back up at Nicole's face. The pleading look she had on her face was impossible to miss, and if he looked hard enough, he could almost see that the small smile she had looked nervous as well. It was such a small detail though that Sorun was certain that he was mistaken and just imagined it to make himself feel better.

He could have said no to her. He realized it was in his power, but then a thought had come to him. The whole reason he'd even bothered coming to this party to begin with was because it was very likely to be his last night of fun before finally dying. Mingling about with everybody over all these hours had been... satisfactory, somewhat, in that regard, but he wanted to close the night off with something special. He didn't know what that special something would be, but he supposed a small dance would be good enough. Doubly so if it was with Nicole.

For all he knew this might be one of the last times he ever saw her, after all. And it wasn't like he could ever bring himself to say no to her.

"Ergh... fine," he mumbled out in a voice that was barely above a whisper, his head turning slightly so he didn't have to look her in the eyes. "Just because nobody is watching. If somebody wakes up, though, we're stopping immediately and I'll deny this ever happened."

His demand made Nicole make a single, unsurprised laugh. "That is acceptable. Now..." She began maneuvering Sorun's hands behind her. "I believe this was the position I saw the others performing earlier."

Nicole had moved Sorun's hands so that they rested on the small of her back. She, in turn, had placed her hands on his shoulders. After that they continued to stand there, Nicole continually staring at Sorun's face with an almost curious expression while Sorun himself was trying his best to keep his composure. As if their close proximity hadn't been bad enough, the actual physical contact was making his heart race. At least, he thought it was. The actual feeling of his heart thumping in his chest was present but a bit dulled these days due to the damage of his body.

"S-s-so, um... what-what now?" Sorun asked.

In response, Nicole looked down at their feet. "From what I observed, we simply just... walk."

"Walk? Yeah, we can- that's easy, yeah." Swallowing the lump in his throat, Sorun carefully took a microstep to the right. "Like this?"

Nicole moved in a way that mimicked Sorun's small movement. "I... believe so..." she said, though her tone sounded wholly unsure.

He hadn't been kidding when Sorun had said he had precisely zero experience in dancing. Quite simply, he'd never done it. Never even expressed an interest in it. And it was immediately evident that Nicole had never done any research into the topic either, as, despite the fact she was the one leading them, their movements were hardly something Sorun could even call slow dancing. It was more them just slowly stepping around, hands locked on each other as they continually went from looking at each others' faces to their feet to make sure they wouldn't accidentally step on the other's feet.

Awkward movements from two people that had no idea how to dance in a living room full of passed out people and absolutely no music, and meanwhile Sorun was internally dying from embarrassment. He didn't think anything could make this experience more awkward.

"Well, this is... certainly new," Nicole had commented. She paused for a few moments as they both continued to awkwardly step around, as if she was searching for an appropriate response. "This is nice," she finally settled on.

"It is?" Sorun muttered, disbelief heavy in his tone. That wasn't the impression he was receiving. Between their clunky movements and the fact he felt like he was halfway to passing out, he felt anything but nice.

Nicole nodded. "It's... difficult to put into words. I'm not so sure myself why it's nice." She glanced down at their feet and made a chuckle. "It definitely cannot be attributed to our dancing skills. I somewhat regret not having researched this prior. I'd thought watching it in practice briefly would have been sufficient." She looked back up at Sorun's face. "My apologies, Sorun."

"She thought it would have been sufficient- I thought she got this idea halfway through the party- oh whatever, I don't care enough to think about it." He made a slight hum that cracked repeatedly in its pitch as he looked Nicole in the eyes. "No, it's fine, Nicole. I'm just... glad you're happy with this. Whatever this is."

It was a statement more aimed at himself than towards Nicole, if only to try and calm him down so he could look at the positives to all this. The positives of helping appease Nicole's curiosity, and allowing Sorun to see a smiling Nicole. It'd settled him down somewhat, enough at least that he'd stopped shaking slightly. He was still tensed up enough that virtually every muscle in his body was rigid, though, making most of his movements more jerky than they needed to. It was something Nicole seemed to pick up on.

"You're unusually tense, Sorun," she noted.

"I'm... I'm just thinkin'. Worried, I guess," he said. "Y'know, 'bout... future stuff and all that."

"Am I truly that bad of company that you cannot even bear to focus on me for a minute?"

Sorun began to heavily stutter. "Th-that ain't what I meant-!" he tried to explain, though he stopped when he saw Nicole grinning.

"Merely teasing, Sorun," she said, still grinning at him in that straight and completely innocent face that was anything but.

Sorun pouted and turned away. "You do that too much," he mumbled. "Sorry if I'm kind of being a downer bringing that up, though. I can't... I can't really get it out of my head, you know? Things to come. It's..." He sighed out and shook his head. "I know I'm sounding really stupid right now, but... I don't know." What was he supposed to say, after all? It's not like he could tell her all his fears and beg her to help him find some answer out of this mess, even if he really wanted to.

Fortunately, Nicole didn't seem to mind all that much. "It's fine, Sorun. Admittedly I find myself wandering towards the same subject sometimes. I can't help but notice the toll this war we're all in keeps taking on everyone." She glanced off to the side, towards where Sally was, her sleeping body slumped up against the wall. "It won't last forever, though, and we're closer now more than ever before. But we're not quite yet there, so until then... I suppose we'll just have to enjoy these small moments while we can." She looked back at Sorun. "Thank you for this, Sorun. For making me feel more like one of them, if only for a few brief moments."

He could tell she was genuinely happy. He tried feeling happy for her. He failed miserably with the existential dread of his approaching death weighing down on him. But he didn't want her to perceive any of his negativity, and even though it felt like he was breaking up inside doing it, he gave her a smile. Not a particularly big or impressive one, a smile that barely even moved his lips, but it was all he could manage. "You're welcome, Nicole. What are friends for?"

"Yes, of course. Friends." She looked down a bit, away from Sorun. "Friends," she repeated, quietly and under her breath.

Sorun simply just nodded along. A small, stiff nod that looked anything but relaxed, but it was the best he could do under the circumstances. His composure was nervous enough that he'd felt the hands resting against her back accidentally slip down a bit. He'd felt the sensation of the short tail Nicole had brush over his fingers, and his knee-jerk reaction was to straighten his arms out and take his hands off her entirely. He almost went as far as to push her away out of panic before the sight of her entire body beginning to flicker made him pause.

"Um... your power...?" he'd guessed upon seeing her continually-disappearing form.

"It would seem so." He could hear the displeasure in her voice, which, while not exactly surprising to Sorun, still came as a bit unexpected to him. Her hands were still grabbing onto his shoulders, and she'd even went as far as to squeeze down on them, almost out of frustration. "These limitations of mine..."

"You still have some rings left, right? Couldn't we just...?" Sorun had tried suggesting, though Nicole had cut him off by shaking her head in denial.

"No. It's not necessary." She gave Sorun a half-smile. "I think I would rather save what few Power Rings are left for future occasions."

He wanted to argue that was unwise. That for him there may not be any future moments, especially with what he had planned. But on the other hand, he wasn't sure he could do this any longer himself. His nerves were frayed, and even he was beginning to grow tired from this night. So he relented and gave her a nod.

"Sure, Nicole. Do what you want," he said. "To be honest, I... think I want to go and just pass out along with everyone else, if that's okay with you."

She smiled, and then laughed a bit at him. "Perhaps I will be joining you all," Nicole said. "Please do me the favor of putting me in a place where nobody will accidentally roll over on me in their sleep."

"Not a problem."

There'd been no further words between them. The last Sorun saw of Nicole was the grateful smile she'd given him before her form disappeared entirely. His hand snapped forwards immediately afterwards to catch the small handheld computer before it hit the ground, which he carefully cradled in his hands as he walked towards the couch.

"What a night," he tiredly thought to himself. He'd practically crashed onto the couch when he'd arrived to it, and then proceeded to hold Nicole's handheld up for him to see. The green screen had gone dark, indicating she wasn't active at the moment. He chuckled once, closed the handheld, and then carefully set it down on the nearby armrest.

He sunk right into the couch afterwards, eyes beginning to grow heavy. He couldn't help but take a final glance around at all the passed-out forms of the Freedom Fighters around him, making a breathy sigh in the process.

"Man..." Sorun thought to himself as his eyes finally closed. "I'm really gonna miss this..."

Chapter 43

Recursion Error

Episode 43- The wedding

The door closed behind Sorun with a small click noise. He stepped back away from it, and with a deep sigh he looked up at the home he just exited.

For four odd months he'd lived inside this house with the family of hedgehogs that'd been generous enough to give him a place to stay. He'd never admitted it to them, nor did he plan on doing so, but he'd enjoyed his time living in this home. Living among so many people had been... unexpectedly nice. Sonic's family had been nice. Sonic himself had been nice, even if he had been a bit obnoxious at times.

But, he had a job to do. Sorun didn't know if this would be the last time he would see this house, but the possibility of that being true existed. So he decided to take in the sight one last time before finally turning around. He started to walk away from the home, and then began fishing in his pocket until he found what he was looking for. He brought it out of his pocket, staring down at the small device in his hand with a blank expression.

"So this is it, huh...?"

The device given to him by Tails was a curious thing. A small, little metal box with a screen near the top that looked a bit like a radar. It was light, too, though strangely Sorun felt it was almost heavier than it ought to have been. He wasn't too surprised at the sensation, seeing as what this thing he was holding in his hand represented. The crux to his plan- and also the thing that would accelerate his death if it worked.

He looked up from the device and at Tails. "So what's the range on it?"

"Around... a thousand-ish miles? I wasn't able to test it out to get an exact number, but if you're around that range of one it should be able to pick up a Chaos Emerald," Tails explained to him. "It was actually pretty easy to figure out once I- Sorun, your hand!"

The older teen flinched a bit at Tails' sudden increase in volume, and then turned his right hand holding the device around so he could see the back of his appendage. He hummed a bit in acknowledgement, realizing that Tails had only just now seen the large amount of deep gashes cutting through his entire hand. Wounds he'd obtained yesterday, when he'd been practicing with Yamato. Wounds that made it look like he'd stuck his hand into a blender.

Considering what he'd been trying to do, that wasn't an entirely inaccurate statement. At least he still had all his fingers.

"Oh, yeah. I was practicing something," Sorun nonchalantly explained, looking up at Tails' incredibly worried face. "Sonic told you about my Judgement Cuts, right? Well, it's... like that. I finally managed to figure it out." And not a moment too soon, either. Especially with what he was going out to do.

"But-but your hand, it's..." Tails had stepped forwards a bit and reached out towards Sorun's hand. Sorun had been a bit too surprised at the act to move his hand away, and could only stare as Tails took his wrist, carefully cradling it in his own hands as he inspected Sorun's wounded hand with a saddened expression. "Sorun, you should go see a doctor about this."

"... It doesn't hurt. It's fine," Sorun denied, gently pulling his hand from Tails' grip. "I cleaned the wounds. They're not deep enough that they need stitches or bandages. I'm fine."

"Y-yeah, but..."

Sorun's eyes had widened a bit. Tails looked like he was on the verge of tears just from looking at Sorun's wounded hand. From the way he was acting it almost looked like it was his hand that had been wounded. But, Sorun wasn't all that surprised at the reaction Tails was showing. Most Mobians were just caring like that, and Tails wasn't an exception there. It was a very charming attribute Sorun found in them. But Sorun didn't like that face Tails was making.

He reached out with his open left hand and placed it on top of Tails' head. The fox froze a bit in surprise at the contact, and Sorun's expression remained blank as he continued to stare at his face.

"You're a good person, Tails. Maybe a bit too good," he told him. "Hey, I... I forgive you for the... the portal thing. You know that, right?"

If he was being completely honest with himself, Sorun didn't even know if that was entirely true or not. He didn't know what to feel anymore, but he wanted to leave Tails with at least that much. So he didn't have so much guilt in his heart. He felt it was the best he could do.

Tails has opened his eyes wide enough that they may as well have been dinner plates. He didn't even react when Sorun began to lightly ruffle the fur on top of his head. "U-um, Sorun, that's... that's great to hear, but where-where is this coming from?"

"... The wedding coming up, I guess," Sorun blandly answered as he removed his hand. "It's making me irrationally emotional." He pocketed the device given to him by Tails and turned around. "Thanks for making what I asked for, Tails. I'll see you around."

And that was that. He didn't wait to hear what else Tails had to say to him. Sorun had just turned around and walked out of the lab, making sure to softly close the door behind him. He'd gotten what he came for, after all, and had left a bit more than he'd planned on leaving. All that was left was to finish it.

"So this is it..." Sorun ran a thumb over the small, metal box, breathing out another sigh at the sight of it. He wasn't given too much time to think on it, however, as an approaching sound tore his attention away from it. Rapid footfalls accompanied by a loud zipping sound that he associated with Sonic's running. He looked up just in time to see a blurring figure stop right in front of him.

"Hey, Sorun! There you are!" Sonic brightly exclaimed, giving him a wide smile. "What are you doing standing outside the house? We gotta get going!"

Sorun had blinked at the blue hedgehog. He'd done something Sorun had never seen Sonic do before- he wore clothes. A tuxedo, in preparation for the upcoming wedding. At least that's what Sorun thought until he looked down, and then proceeded to perform a mental facepalm when he saw the hedgehog's bare blue legs.

"... You're the only person I know that will wear a tuxedo but go out of his way to not wear pants," Sorun said as he looked back up at Sonic's face. "You really dressed up for Antoine and Bunnie's wedding?"

"Of course I did. Why wouldn't I dress up for the happiest day of their lives? They only get one of those," Sonic said, making it sound like the most obvious thing in the world. "Now come on," he continued, turning around so his back was to Sorun. "We're running a bit behind but I talked with Honey since she has your measurements, and she said she could whip you up a suit before-"

"I'm not going to the wedding."

Sonic completely froze when he heard that.

"... Don't think I heard you right." Sonic slowly turned around to face Sorun yet again. His eyes were a bit narrowed, and the smile on his face became extremely strained. "What did you just say, Sorun?"

"I said I'm not going to the wedding," he repeated, completely straight-faced.

The forced smile Sonic wore dropped into a heavy frown. "Can I ask why?"

Sorun answered him by holding up the device Tails had made for him. "Tails made me this. It's a radar that can detect Chaos Emeralds," he explained. "Since I can use Yamato to make portals to any location on the planet, I plan on teleporting around the whole world using this to locate the last two Emeralds. The range is a bit short, but with the portals, it shouldn't matter that much." He held the radar closer to himself and looked down on it. "Best case scenario is that I find them within a few hours. At worst it'll take me a few days, maybe a week. Two at max. But not matter what it'll end with me getting the last of the Emeralds."

"Okay..." Taking a deep breath, Sonic clapped his hands together and pointed his fingers at Sorun. "Then why don't you just save that until after the wedding is done with?"

Why, indeed? It wasn't as if Sorun couldn't, and in fact he truly did want to go to that wedding. He was fond enough of Antoine and Bunnie that he actually regretted planning on missing their wedding just so he could amass more power. But that was precisely the reason why he was choosing to miss the wedding. He was too fond of them.

He was already dying as-is. He didn't want to die leaving happy memories like that with them, with anybody. He was already pushing it with that party he'd went to with everyone. He didn't want to leave too many moments for them to look back on him with. Memories that would just hurt them. And beyond that, Sorun wanted to get this over with as soon as possible. He didn't want to stall anymore, and he didn't want the wedding distracting him, to erode his willpower down even further and make this that much harder for him. He didn't want to be bogged down by any more happy memories than was necessary. He just wanted to get this over with already.

"I don't want to waste time going to a useless wedding," was the only answer Sorun had provided Sonic to his question. He wasn't sure that had been the right thing to say, as Sonic didn't look pleased at all by it.

"Waste ti- what do you mean waste time!?" Sonic shouted at him. "It's their wedding ! They're expecting you! For crying out loud, Antoine even reserved a seat in the front row for you!"

Sorun flinched. He didn't want to hear that. "That's their problem," he said, voice cold as he began walking forwards. "I have better things to do. So get lost."

"Are you being serious right now?" Even as Sorun passed him, Sonic had turned around to stare towards Sorun's back. The angry, hurt tone in the Mobian's voice had made Sorun stop in his tracks. "You actually think a couple of Chaos Emeralds are more important than going to their wedding?"

Sorun sharply exhaled. This was hurting more than he'd expected it to. "Evidently." Yamato materialized in his grasp after he'd pocketed the radar. "Why do you even care? Weddings are for friends and family. And I'm neither of those." He grabbed Yamato's handle and unsheathed it. "I explained all of this to you. Get it through your thick skull already."

"That's not what they think. It's not what I think, either." Sorun had just risen the blade up in preparation to cut a portal in front of him when Sonic's voice had stayed his hand. "How can you even say that? After everything you've done with us, all that time, the whole party, now is when you decide to pull this again? You know better than this!"

He'd hesitated for a few seconds after Sonic asked him the question. Afterwards, Sorun answered by slashing downwards, and then sideways, making a portal appear in front of him. "You don't know a thing about me," he said as he lowered the sword. "Just go to the stupid wedding and try to forget about me, would you?"

Sorun began moving towards the portal. He only got one foot in before he heard Sonic speak again, stopping him once more.

"Fine. Be that way," Sonic said. The bitter tone in his voice made Sorun grimace, and he was thankful he was turned away so Sonic didn't have to see his face. "If you seriously care more about getting powers than showing your feelings in front of everybody, then go. Run away."

Sorun didn't deign to give Sonic another word. He stepped fully through the portal, the environment around him warping into an endless void of blacks and blues. He exited through the other side of the portal, swiftly slashing behind him to close it before then sheathing the sword. With the katana held in his left hand, Sorun then reached into his right pocket to pull out the radar.

"Shouldn't have waited so long before leaving," Sorun thought to himself. He'd hoped to have left without encountering anybody like that, knowing full-well how it would have turned out, but there wasn't anything to do about it now.

He briefly glanced up to look at his surroundings. Some random part of the forest on the other side of the continent. He figured he'd use the radar here, and if it didn't pick anything up he'd keep using portals to go further and further out until he finally picked up a reading. Of course, when he looked down at the radar in his hands, he didn't see so much as a blip on it.

Nowhere nearby here, then.

"Okay." The radar was pocketed, and the Yamato was unsheathed yet again. "This is gonna take a while..."

He couldn't remember the last time he felt this upset. Really, he couldn't.

Sonic knew that this wasn't a time to feel this way, but no matter hard he tried he just couldn't get his mind off of it. What made him even more upset was that all around him were his friends and family, all celebrating the fact that two of his best friends were finally getting married. He should have been as jubilant as they all were and laughing and smiling along with them.

But he wasn't. He was over here sitting in a chair like a sad sack. All because of him.

"You know, I've never known you to sulk like this. Especially at something as important as a wedding."

A listless chuckle left Sonic as he looked up at Sally. She'd donned a long, maroon dress for the occasion. Like everybody else she'd dressed up.

Everybody but him. He hadn't even shown up.

"Even his Chao showed up to the wedding," Sonic mumbled, looking off to the side. He saw Virgil sitting off on the side of the confectionary table, eating a strawberry he'd plucked off the wedding cake. "I can't believe Sorun flaked on their wedding, Sally," Sonic continued, looking back at the chipmunk. "I really thought he changed after all this time, but he... he just left like that."

Sally's face formed into a frown. "I know. I haven't had the heart to tell either Antoine or Bunnie yet that he's not showing up. I know Antoine was really looking forwards to him being there," she said. The frown deepened as she looked off to the side. "We're having words when he comes back..."

Sonic found himself wincing at that. He didn't envy whatever the princess had planned for Sorun. He'd been on the other end of her verbal lashings more than enough times to know he didn't wanna be anywhere nearby when that happened.

He didn't know whether to pity Sorun or be mad at him for creating this situation in the first place.

"I just don't know what's going on in his head," Sonic mumbled out, his head rolling upwards as he gazed up at the early afternoon sky. "It's like Sorun acts one way and then does a totally opposite... huh?"

There was something in the sky. Multiple somethings, actually. Dark shapes so far up in the sky Sonic couldn't rightly make them out. The sun shining in his eyes wasn't helping matters, either, and he was forced to shield his eyes with his hand just so he could have a better view at whatever was up there that he was looking at. Even then he could barely make them all out.

"What the... what the heck is that...?"

"Where the hell are these fucking things?"

Sorun realized going into this that he wasn't going to be finding these Emerald immediately. He was essentially looking for two needles in a world-sized haystack, and his only advantage was that he had a way of instantly eliminating search areas while at the same instantaneously transporting to new search locations with the Yamato. The radar Tails had built for him was less for actually finding the things and more for narrowing down where in the world they could possible be at.

But that was still a world's worth of land, and narrowing it down by roughly a thousand miles every time he teleported somewhere wasn't exactly that significant. It was progress - for sure it was progress - but it was slow going. Slow going to the point that he was wondering if he hadn't actually highballed it when he told Sonic this could take a couple of weeks. Because he was hours into this and he had come up with zilch.

"Ugh, this is going nowhere..." Sorun grumbled to himself. He didn't even know where he was. At the edge of some lake in Soumerca by his estimate, but he didn't know the exact location. It wasn't like he brought a map with him. Something he realized probably hadn't been his best idea.

With a frustrated grunt, Sorun kicked at some of the low grass he was standing on as he gazed out into the lake. At the very least, it was a nice lake. Wide, nestled right in the middle of a large glade, crystal clear water and- who was that?

Sorun blinked heavily in surprise when he realized he wasn't alone. There was another sitting at a small wooden dock near the edge of the lake. A... cat Mobian, from the looks of it. A purple and white one. And probably the hugest one Sorun had ever seen, too- the guy looked so big that the teen was surprised the dock he was sitting on wasn't collapsing in under his weight. Sorun couldn't help but wonder what he was doing until he looked closer, upon which he recognized the long item being held in the giant cat's hands.

A fishing rod.

The Mobian was fishing.

"... Curious." Sorun's shoulders relaxed a bit. It was just some strange-looking Mobian out here fishing. He'd probably accidentally wandered into his fishing spot or something like that while searching for the Chaos Emeralds. He scoffed at the sight, turned around to leave, and then stopped.

He didn't think it was a good idea to talk to him. But, after hours of searching around for these Emeralds, Sorun's patience was already beginning to wane on this endeavor. He wanted a break, and he couldn't just go on back to Knothole or the HQ to get some sleep in. Not when likely literally everybody there would be disgruntled about him intentionally missing out on Antoine and Bunnie's wedding. He wasn't even sure he wanted to show his face there ever again if getting these Emeralds took so long. He just wanted to get them, go kill Eggman, and die in peace.

But he needed to rest a bit to mentally recuperate, and he figured he might as well do it with some company. And it wasn't like this Mobian would know who he was or ever see him again once he left. So, while making a small sigh at his decision, Sorun performed a Trick and teleported right behind the purple Mobian.

To Sorun's surprise, he wasn't even sure the cat had noticed he'd Tricked right behind him. He just kept on fishing, not having even moved an inch. Furrowing his eyebrows a bit, Sorun decided to slowly step towards the end of the dock to where he was sitting.

The large, triangular ears on top of the cat's head flicked, likely from hearing his footsteps. So Sorun knew that he knew that he was there. But he didn't make any action in response to this. He just reeled in his fishing line and recast it back out into the lake, almost like he was ignoring Sorun's presence entirely.

"Very curious..." Sorun had finally made it to the edge of the dock, and stood right besides the large cat. He noticed the large Mobian's yellow eyes had briefly flicked down to Sorun before looking back up at the lake, but even after physically seeing him the cat still seemed to ignore Sorun's presence. He seemed more focused on fishing than anything else.

"Er... hi," Sorun awkwardly greeted, not entirely sure how he was supposed to go about this.

"Hello," the cat greeted back. Sorun was a bit off-put by the overly-friendly, almost goofy voice he heard from the Mobian, but at the same time relaxed a bit when he didn't perceive any ill intentions from him.

"..." Sorun looked off to the side, towards the lake. "So what are you doing?"

"Fishing."

Such a simple answer for what was probably a stupid question. "I see." Sorun looked back to the Mobian. "I'm Sorun."

"Hello, Sorun. Nice to meet you. I'm Big."

"... Sometimes I really wonder about these names." Sorun sighed as he sat down on the dock next to Big. "So how's the fishing life treating you, Big?"

"It's great," he answered, eyes continually locked onto the lake. "Do you like fishing, Sorun?"

Sorun shook his head. "No, I... I don't really fish."

"If you didn't come here to fish, then how come you came to this fishing spot?"

"Ahh... I don't know," Sorun admitted. "I just kind of wandered over here." He looked up at the Mobian. "How about you, Big? How come you're out here fishing?"

Big shrugged. "Because I like fishing. Fishing's fun," he answered simply. "Me and Froggy like to fish all the time."

"Froggy? Oh, I see." He saw the small, green head of a frog peek over from Big's head. It must have been sitting on the other side of the cat on his shoulder. "So you and your pet like to fish, huh?"

"Mmhm. Fishing's fun. Me and Froggy like to fish all the time."

"... Oh boy." Sorun repressed a sigh and rubbed at the bridge of his nose. "I think he specced too many points into his strength stat from the looks of him. Then again, for some reason the simplest people are always the wisest. Somehow. For all I know this dude's probably the wisest guy on the planet. Screw it. Let's go for it."

"I got a pet, you know," Sorun said, turning to face the lake along with Big. "He's a Chao named Virgil."

The tip of Big's fishing line began to jerk. "That's a pretty name," he commented as he began reeling in the line.

"Yeah, I named him after somebody I know. Well, not know know, just, uh... it's complicated," Sorun explained. "He's not with me, though. I left him behind in a place called Knothole."

"Knothole? Hey, I've been there before!" Big happily stated as he reeled in a fish. "All my friends the Freedom Fighters live there!"

Sorun's ears perked up, and he turned back to Big. "Oh, you know them?" he asked.

"Mmhm!" Big nodded as he removed the caught fish from the hook and tossed it back into the lake. "Everybody there is really nice. I even helped them with a play for the children once when I visited." He cast his line back out into the lake. "Are they your friends, Sorun?"

A small sigh left Sorun. "They aren't... yeah, I guess they are," he admitted. "But I don't really act like it."

"You don't?"

"No, I... not really, no." Sorun looked back to the lake and slumped forwards a bit. "I never act happy around them. I've been overly antagonistic at times. I've been a jerk," he bluntly stated. "I even skipped out on one of my best friend's wedding."

"How come?" Sorun was a bit amazed at how Big's friendly, carefree voice hadn't changed in the slightest throughout the entire duration of the conversation.

"'Cause... well..." Sorun's head dipped downwards, enough that he could see his own reflection in the water. "Because pretty soon I'm gonna... I'm gonna have to go somewhere far away. I'll never be able to see any of my friends once I leave, and they'll never be able to visit me. We'll all be separated forever." He sighed. "It's not that I don't like them. I do. I really do. I... really like one in particular. But I always pretended I didn't like any of them because I didn't want to leave them with good memories of me," he admitted. "I figured if I acted like some antisocial jerk that none of them liked then when I finally left they'd be glad and could move on with their lives without ever looking back at me. I didn't want to be somebody they liked, because that would mean they'd feel sad whenever they remembered me. I didn't go to the wedding because... because I didn't want that to be their last memory of me. Of me being there at their happiest moment before I finally left. Or maybe I just couldn't bear having to see the sight, since that'd be the last I'd ever see of them." He looked back upwards. "So I lied. I lied to them at every opportunity. Kept saying we weren't friends. Hurt them. Distanced myself. All so I could try to spare them as much pain as possible for when I finally left. And what I just pulled with the wedding was probably the worst thing I've done yet. A once-in-a-lifetime event that the best friend I mentioned earlier was expecting me to show up to, because we grew really close. I've probably tarnished the image he had of me forever with what I did. Which, I suppose... is what I wanted all along. But it doesn't feel like I did the right thing." He looked back up at Big. "Tell me... was this fool before you right?"

"Mmmm... nope."

"Geh!" He hadn't been expecting such a blunt answer from Big. It'd been so unexpected that Sorun had visibly recoiled, as if he'd been struck from Big's words alone. Amazing, really, especially as they'd been said with such a friendly voice. "You... think I was wrong?" Sorun asked.

"Yup."

"... Can you tell me why ?"

"You lied to your friends," Big said, as friendly and carefree as the moment they met. "Lying isn't good."

Sorun heavily blinked at the cat. "I... realize this," he said, "but I only did it so they wouldn't be hurt."

"But wouldn't lying to them hurt them, too?"

The world felt like it paused for Sorun.

Such a simple sentence that made Sorun realize so much. He kept flashing back to Sonic, to that face he made, to all the different occasions where'd been disappointed when Sorun had turned down his hand of friendship at every single turn. He couldn't even imagine the disappointment that would be on Antoine's face for what he'd done. Or Bunnie's. Everybody's, really, for missing out on that wedding.

What was the point of lying to them all the time to save from hurting them if the process of him lying just hurt them in the end anyways?

"But... I still have to go," Sorun weakly argued. "That's not going to change no matter what. People'll be upset. I wanted to avoid that."

"They'll still remember you, won't they?" The tip of Big's fishing pole twitched, but then stilled. "Sure people are sad when people they know leave, but as long as they remember them they're not really gone."

Sorun shook his head. "Don't give me that cheesy nonsense-"

"And don't they already like you lots if they invited you to a wedding?"

"They..." Sorun couldn't refute that. It wasn't like he'd tried very hard to keep his distance from everyone. If anything, he went into it knowing he probably wouldn't have the resolve to see it through to the end. He hadn't saw it through to the end. The fact of the matter was, despite what he thought and what he did, he couldn't change what people thought about him. And his actions had done too many things to earn everybody's favor and make them call him a friend, even if he actively refused to acknowledge it.

There was no getting out of them being affected by his death. The best he could hope for was that they would mourn and move on to live happy lives. At this point it was unavoidable.

"Tch. Heh." Sorun let out something between a sigh and a laugh as he leaned back on the dock, flattening his palms against the wood as he looked up into the sky. "You know, I've seen a lot of stories where the main bad guy always had their own reasons for doing all the bad stuff they did," he said. "It was always this ends-justify-the-means thing like that, or they'd admit that they knew what they were doing was bad but that the long-term payoffs made it worth it, whatever it was. But they always seemed to make the same mistake. They got so focused on reaching the end that they never noticed all the people they were hurting along the way. Some self-invalidating thing like that. I tried not to be like them, but... I guess, in the end, I wasn't so different. I've been an idiot." He made a long sigh, and then hopped up to his feet. "Well, then again... a man oughta be a little stupid. A blonde guy with a cool tattoo said that.

"I know what I gotta do now," Sorun said as he turned towards the cat, so fired up he hadn't even noticed that Big was just blankly staring out onto the lake. "Thanks a lot for everything you've done, Big. You know, I didn't think it at first, but you're the smartest guy I've ever met." Yamato appeared in Sorun's hands. "I got a wedding to go catch. Seeya... mm, well, never again, I guess, but nice meeting ya anyways!"

After he was finished speaking, Sorun turned around and ran down the dock. The sound of a portal opening was briefly heard, though Big didn't react to this in the slightest, his focus solely on the lake in front of him. It was only after the portal was long-since closed did the cat blink and begin to look around.

"Huh? Where'd he go?"

"Alright, so by now I've probably missed the ceremony, but if I hurry I can probably catch the end of the wedding," Sorun thought to himself as he travelled through the black and blue space towards the other end of the portal. "Probably gonna have to get down on my hands and knees just to apologize to Antoine and Bunnie for missing most of their wedding. Maaaan... that's gonna be super embarrassing."

He'd do it, of course, if only because he felt so bad about what he'd done. He imagined that it'd probably turn into an awkward mess, where they'd grow all flustered and ask him to stop going so hard into the apology. He didn't know where it'd go from there. Sorun supposed he'd just play it by ear.

"Did I waste all this time trying to be all distant only for it to end like this? Probably. Kinda wish Sonic woulda been a pal and smacked some sense into me before it carried on long enough that I had to get some wisdom from the mystic cat back there, but I guess he's too nice a guy to do something like that. Oh, wait, Sonic... I'm gonna have to apologize to him too for everything I did. Don't even know how I'm supposed to go about doing that without revealing too much." Sorun walked through the other end of the portal leading into Knothole and closed it behind him. "Eh, well, I guess I'll just get into it and see what- Jesus FUCK."

What Sorun expected to come back to was Knothole. And, indeed, he arrived in the approximate location Knothole was situated in. He'd lived here for so long that it was virtually impossible for him to mistakenly have Yamato cut a portal leading to somewhere else. Not when he was so familiar with this location, more familiar here than anywhere else on the planet aside from the HQ. So he'd walked through the portal expecting to see all of Knothole around him.

What he walked out into was a Knothole that was completely burned to the ground.

Chapter 44

Recursion Error

Episode 44- Air cancel the fat man

He'd done it.

The madman had done it.

He blew it all up.

"I WAS ONLY GONE FOR A FEW HOURS, WHAT THE HELL HAPPENED!?"

Sorun knew that the possibility of Eggman using his fleet of ships to bomb out Knothole existed; the man outright flaunted the fact that option was at his disposal to Sorun's face. And Sorun had always felt dread knowing that at any moment an armada of flying ships would just appear over Knothole and carpet-bomb the whole place. He knew it, but he'd been operating under the assumption that as long as he was quick enough and killed the Doctor that this fate could be avoided entirely and become a moot point.

Well, apparently, he hadn't been fast enough.

Eggman destroyed Knothole.

Everything was gone. Homes and other structures were completely leveled into unrecognizable, burning heaps. He couldn't even see the castle anymore- that was just gone , debris and all. The entire city was in this state. Destroyed beyond all recognition. Reduced to an uninhabitable wasteland.

Sorun stumbled through the burning streets in a daze, his mind swirling in an incomprehensible turmoil as he looked around at all the devastation around him. Feelings of shock, confusion, and devastation assaulting him to such a high degree he could barely even see straight as he kept moving through Knothole's ruins.

There was one silver lining, though. One that was probably the only reason he wasn't breaking down from the sight of all this. It was a detail Sorun himself was surprised he'd noticed, but once he had he'd begun examining the burning surroundings further to confirm that small detail.

There were no bodies.

It was the one thing he'd been dreading to see above everything else. Corpses as a result of the bombing. Mangled, burning cadavers that wouldn't even look like the people they used to be. Or, even worse, bodies that he would recognize. Bodies of his friends. The Freedom Fighters' bodies. All mangled and torn apart into twisted messes that Sorun would have to go find to confirm if they'd survived or not. And Sorun wasn't very confident he'd be able to go through with such a gruesome task like that. He didn't think he'd be able to handle seeing Sonic's or Sally's or Antoine's or anybody else's dead bodies, torn apart and mutilated from the explosions of the bombs, their faces eternally set into expressions of pain and horror from seeing their home being bombed to oblivion right before they died.

Except... he saw none of that. There wasn't a single body to be found. Not of the Freedom Fighters, or any of the citizens, the royal forces, nobody. Not a single one. He'd say that the place was a ghost town, but due to the state of things, Sorun didn't think he could call Knothole a town anymore. At first he'd been horrified and assumed the bombing had been so bad that there weren't even any intact bodies, but when he'd looked around some more, using his Bringer Claws to sift through some of the wreckage, he saw that he was mistaken. There weren't even pieces of anybody lying around. No bodies, no parts, not even any scorch marks resembling the shape of somebody being incinerated from the bombs.

The only conclusion Sorun could come to was that nobody had died in the bombing. They were all taken.

It made sense, the more Sorun thought on it. Robotnik was the kind of guy that'd want to gloat about his victory over everybody. What he'd do with them afterwards... well, frankly, Sorun didn't want to think about how horrible that prospect was. But the point was everybody was alive- at least it seemed like they were alive. Captured, most likely, but alive.

Probably the only thing keeping Sorun going by now was that one single hope.

"This... must be where they held the wedding..." That's what Sorun thought when he stumbled into... whatever this could even be called. Some large venue covered in ashes. There were a few scraps of burnt, white cloth clinging onto tables that were half-burnt to oblivion, a few chairs standing amidst giant piles of dark ash, and a small stage - what used to be a small stage, anyways - and the remains of an altar in front. Really, with how little remained, he could have been completely wrong.

Clack!

Sorun froze when he felt the tip of his foot hit something mid-step. He looked down to see what he'd made contact with, but he couldn't make it out from all the ash and debris covering it. He lifted his foot up to brush aside some of the fine debris, and then shook it off a bit to help reveal the item. His breathing cut out in a choked gasp when he saw what was under all the ash.

"Oh shit." It was hard not to recognize Nicole's handheld body, even when it was buried under all of that darkened ash. He was less worried about how dirty it was, however, and more with what the state of the AI living in it was, so he'd bent down immediately and began to dig through the ash to get to it. "Oh no no no wait wait hold on..."

Frantically, he'd dug out the handheld from the ashes and held it up to inspect it. The handheld was already opened and, thankfully, all the buttons seemed intact and the screen remained uncracked. Aside from all the ash staining it, the handheld seemed completely okay. It was off, though. The screen was dark. Nicole wasn't there, and Sorun didn't know how to force her on or if she was even okay-

The screen turned on.

"... Uh..." Sorun couldn't even utter words. He could barely even think straight, let alone articulate words. The relief he felt seeing the screen turn on was overshadowed by the sheer devastation all around him.

"... Hello, Sorun." The voice that came from the handheld, Nicole's voice, was unusually calm. Calm, but at the same time she sounded despondent. "I am in need of your assistance."

"N-Nicole, I, I don't, what..." Sorun shook his own head to try and think clearer. "What happened?" he asked, wanting to at least start with that.

She didn't answer him. Instead, a small lens on the handheld's screen began emitting a large, rectangular beam of light upwards. Sorun looked up at the light, widening his eyes when he saw what it was: a holographic projection, floating right there in the air above them. Being displayed on the projection was an otherwise relatively un-exploded Knothole. That was, until bombs and munition shells began to rain down on the town.

"Dr. Robotnik's Egg Fleet had suddenly appeared without warning. They... simply unloaded their ordinance upon all of Knothole," Nicole explained. "It was too fast for anybody to do anything. Nothing was spared."

Sorun grimaced at the sight of all the bombs raining down on the homes in the recording, and with a shuddering breath, asked, "And... the people...?"

The holographic projection changed. It was a different angle, in a different location. And what was being displayed in the image had Sorun pause in absolute disbelief at what he saw.

He thought he was looking at a robot at first. One of Robotnik's Badniks, one that stood about five or six times taller than Sorun himself. It looked similar to an Egg Pawn: same red and black coloring, same round main body, same large hands and feet connected by spindly, metal limbs, complete with spikes. The weapons were odd, with the left hand having some strange, circular red and silver shield with a star connected to the back of it and the right one, to Sorun's disdain, was wielding that brown, checkered wrecking ball and chain he'd had the misfortune of encountering once like it was some kind of flail.

But then he got to the head, and the head was most certainly nothing like an Egg Pawn's. It wasn't the head of a robot- it was a helmet. A helmet that for some godforsaken reason had a orange, metal mustache bolted to the front of it, but Sorun knew it was a helmet. He knew it was a helmet because its face was a transparent, blue-tinted visor. And inside of that visor he saw Dr. Robotnik himself, wearing that demented smile of his.

It wasn't a robot. It was a... mechanized suit of some sorts. A mech suit.

There were people on the projection fighting Eggman and his mech suit. Freedom Fighters. It was... going exceptionally poorly. Every so often Eggman's mech suit would simply point at somebody, and a yellow beam of energy would fire out, envelop the poor victim, and, to Sorun's shock, they'd completely disappear. Just like that.

He saw Bunnie flying in through the air towards the mech suit, wearing a torn and tarnished wedding gown. She'd been vaporized by one of the yellow beams before she'd even come close. Mighty and Knuckles were there, trying to grab at and physically strike at the suit. They did absolutely no damage. They were vaporized, too.

Sonic was there, too, but not even he could do anything. He didn't get to see the full fight, there were moments where the recording would fizzle out and cut to a new angle, but Sorun got the gist. He also saw that in addition to the laser and the weapons the mech had on hand, the thing even had missile pods on the back of each shoulder. Between all the missiles, lasers, the weapons, and the fact that mech moved deceptively fast and was apparently horrifically strong and ludicrously durable if Knuckles and Mighty not being able to even scratch the thing said anything, Sonic couldn't beat it. The most he'd managed to do was damage the shield by making a dent in the center of it after flying in from out of the camera's view moving at absurd speeds.

But he'd still been beaten. Bashed around by the shield. Smacked around by that flail. Grazed by yellow laser beams fired out from openings at the back of the mech's hands and blown up by missiles. He didn't seem too badly hurt, and Sorun attributed that solely to the billion-ring durability thing Sonic possessed, but apparently even that couldn't hold up to that kind of assault. That suit of Eggman's beat him down like it was nothing.

He felt anger seeing it. Anger that he'd never felt before, that Sorun himself was surprised at feeling. An emotion that was so intense that it was completely foreign to him. His face seemed calm, though he was lightly quavering, and his irises and pupils had constricted to pinpricks at the sight and were rapidly shaking along with his eyes. Every single time he saw Sonic get hurt by the mech made another spurt of pure rage go through Sorun, and his mind began to unravel into a jumbled mess of furious mutterings as he watched on.

"Sorun," Nicole's voice had called out, soft but still gloomy, "please do not grip the handheld so tightly. You'll hurt yourself."

Nicole's voice brought Sorun back. The shaking ceased, his thoughts returned to normal, and his eyes dilated back to their normal size. He looked down at Nicole's handheld, blinking once when he saw that his fingers were gripping on tightly enough that the knuckles were white. "Sorry, Nicole," he muttered to her before looking back up at the hologram.

Predictably, Sonic had lost. His defeated form had been picked up by one of the mech's hands. Sonic struggled, and based on how long it was going on Sorun assumed Eggman was giving some hammed-up victory speech to the defeated hedgehog, but without the projection having any volume, it was hard to tell. It hardly mattered, though, as the end result was the same. Sonic was vaporized by a yellow beam of energy like everybody else had been, and meanwhile all around Knothole continued to be relentlessly pounded by the fleet of floating ships above until all that was left were smoldering ruins.

The projection cut out right there. Sorun took a deep inhale, something that failed to calm him down even the slightest amount, and looked down towards the handheld he held in his hands. "S-so that... that suit or whatever Robotnik was in, it... it vaporized everyone?" He gulped. "Did-did they-?"

"They remain alive, if that is what you are wondering," Nicole interrupted. Sorun felt himself breath out in relief, though he still looked to Nicole for answers. "I am familiar with that technology he was using. It was not a weapon. It was teleportation. He simply used that device to transport anybody struck by it. I was dropped and lost in all the fighting."

"Transport?" Sorun repeated. "So everyone-"

"The entire population of Knothole was captured by Dr. Robotnik using that teleportation beam, yes," Nicole confirmed. "I believe it would be reasonable to assume they were all taken to New Megaopolis."

"Of course they were," Sorun sighed out. It was a weight off his shoulders. The complete annihilation of Knothole was still crushing him, but knowing everybody was alive was a small comfort. Small, as he wasn't sure how good alive was if they were all captured and being held there of all places.

A silent beat passed of Sorun continuing to silently stand there, in the ashen ruins of what had once been a wedding ceremony inside of what used to be a small city, holding his AI friend in his hands. Eventually Nicole chose to speak up. "Sorun, we must rescue them."

"Oh, rescue them? From the most dangerous city in the entire world run by the same guy that just bombed out Knothole? That place? We're gonna rescue everybody from that place? The two of us?" A disbelieving, broken chuckle left Sorun. "You gotta be kidding me. You just showed me a video of him personally beating everybody including Sonic and you're saying we're gonna march right up to that and go save everybody?"

"Sorun-"

"Argh, I know, I know he have to!" he yelled out. The Earthling began pacing around, nervously and erratically, as he began to rapidly mutter out his thoughts. "I-I mean we have to, there's nobody else, there's literally nobody else that can go and save them, and who knows what's gonna happen to them if we do nothing, we-we just have to, there's no other way."

"Sorun-"

"But you're asking us to walk into impossible odds here, and we-what are we supposed to do, Nicole, I can't just walk up into New Megaopolis and fight off everything in that city, and, and-" he began to hyperventilate from sheer panic, "- oh my god, Nicole, I can't, this isn't, I can't-"

"Sorun!"

There was a flash of light, cubes swirled in front of Sorun, and before he knew it Nicole's holo-lynx body was gripping him by the shoulders and staring the panicking human straight in the eyes. He didn't know what got him to stop: her sudden appearance, the physical contact, or the grim expression she wore, but regardless, she had gotten Sorun to pause and focus on her.

"I know this is bad, but I need you right now," she said, firmly squeezing down on Sorun's shoulders to get the point across. "I realize the odds are massively against us, and I realize that us two being the only able-bodied Freedom Fighters available to rescue all of Knothole from Dr. Robotnik is far from ideal and that we are severely under-equipped to carry out such an undertaking, but we have. No. Choice. I have a plan, but I cannot do this without you. So please calm down."

Another shuddering breath left Sorun. He looked down away from Nicole's eyes. "I'm so scared, Nicole," he whispered out.

"I know. I am, too," she said, hands still on his shoulders. "But I'm more scared of what's going to happen to our friends and everybody that lived in Knothole. So we need to do this."

"Our?" Sorun repeated, before then slowly shaking his head. "Yeah. Our."

The hands on his shoulders and the body connected to them disappeared. Sorun looked up at the empty space, looked down at the small lit-up computer in his hands, and sighed. He then found the closest, most intact-looking chair, approached and sat down in it, and then finally addressed Nicole after setting her down in his lap.

"Alright. Alright... so what is this plan of yours and what do you need me to do?"

"Ladies, gentlemen, and Mobians of all ages!"

Once upon a time this storage space used to be little more than a larger-than-average silo connected to the city's power grid via all the devices hanging off of the ceiling. That was a product of a bygone-idea, though, and by now the building had expanded. "Expansion" may have been a generous word, though, as the building itself was still a silo. But bigger, wider. More spacious.

The main purpose remained the same, though, and that was to house the aforementioned devices from earlier: pods. Perfectly spherical, transparent pods with a blue tinge hanging off of metal stalks suspended from the ceiling, like giant, artificial grape vines. And inside of each of these pods was a Mobian.

All of them were in varying states of grief and despair. It wasn't hard to imagine why, seeing as they'd all just seen their home be completely annihilated before they were all abducted by the same man that was currently leering at them from the end of a small walkway jutting out of the wall of the silo, high enough towards the ceiling that it was near the pods. Some of the captured Mobians were harshly glaring towards the round man, others were pressing themselves against the glass-esque walls of the pods to try and reach out towards family members and friends near them, while others were breaking down entirely. Mostly the children.

"I'd apologize for the cramped accommodations, but if you can see it past all the tears I've made some expansions since I first planned this all out," Eggman continued, walking towards near the end of the walkway before stopping and leaning on the side railings. "I've had so much free time on my hands, you see, that I've busied myself renovating all sorts of locations around my city. I saw you all were doing the same thing in Knothole! Eh, you know, before I blew it up, anyways."

A muffled banging drew Eggman's attention to two particular bunches of the grape-like pods. There was one section that contained the entirety of the Chaotix, all of which were glaring at him with the exception of Mighty and Knuckles, who were attempting to punch through the material trapping them. On the other side of them, on a different bunch of pods, was the Freedom Fighters, who were mostly all also glaring at him, except for Amy, who was trying to pound her way out of the pod with her hammer. Nobody was able to do any damage and free themselves, though. Not even a crack was made.

"Don't even bother. I triple-reinforced those Egg Grapes in preparation for all of this. There's very little in this entire world that could break those things," Eggman commented, his eyes staying on the pods containing the Chaotix for a bit before he focused on the bunch containing the Freedom Fighters. He looked up, making a low chortle when he saw Sally standing in her pod and staring down at him in utter contempt. "Oh, don't give me that look, princess. You all knew this was a long time coming." He looked a bit to the side. His smile grew wider when he saw Antoine and Bunnie, both facing each other and pressing their palms against the glass with distraught looks on their faces. "And my, my, my, to think I carried this out during a wedding of all days. I couldn't have had better timing."

"Don't talk about them like that!"

Robotnik's head snapped down towards a pod that was a bit lower than theirs. In that pod was a lone hedgehog Mobian, sitting down with his arms crossed as he glowered towards the Doctor with a deep frown on his face. Failing to contain some of his laughter, Eggman leaned off the railing and walked to the other side of the walkway only to them lean over the other railing while addressing Sonic.

"Oh-ho-ho, Sonic, come now. I'm just having a bit of fun. How are you doing, by the way? I know that enhanced durability of yours gained from all those Power Rings you absorbed in the past took the brunt of the beating, but you're still looking a bit sore over there," he said.

Sonic's scowl deepened. "I'm sore over a lot more things than that, Eggman."

"Is it because of the wedding? I'm being completely serious, I didn't even plan for that. It was a happy accident."

"You call ruining their wedding a happy-" Sonic cut himself off and shook his head. "No! I'm sore because you destroyed Knothole!"

"Huh. Yes, I suppose that would put a damper on your mood, wouldn't it?" Eggman completely ignored the angered snarl Sonic made at him, instead choosing to look around at the grape-like pods all around him. "Huh. You know, I'm not seeing that human lad Sorun in any of these Egg Grapes." He turned around to look at the end of the walkway, towards the short Overlander in a green jacket manning a small console at the end. "Snively, did you happen to see him while you were going around zapping Mobians in that battle suit you wound up wrecking?"

"No, sir, I didn't," Snively answered, a displeased look on his face. "Believe me, I would have taken my time with him if I had."

"You would have had the rug pulled out from under you if a bunch of little furry resistance fighters is all it took to destroy that battle suit I lent you," Robotnik muttered under his breath before turning back to Sonic. "Let me guess. He didn't go to your friends' wedding?"

Eyes still narrowed in anger, Sonic turned his head away from him. "I'm not sayin' anything to you."

"I think I know what happened," Eggman said. "Dear old Sorun wanted to go round up the last remaining Chaos Emeralds to amass more powers for his arsenal, and didn't want to waste time going to a meaningless little shindig, which just so happened to be when I attacked Knothole? Am I about right?" Utter silence on Sonic's part, though he did flinch, causing Eggman to hum. "Your silence says it all," he said. "Can't say I'm too surprised. The boy does seem unusually pragmatic like that, especially for his age. And I can't say I blame him for not wanting to attend a wedding by people he hates."

Sonic angrily stirred. "He doesn't hate-"

"Did you know," Eggman interrupted, "that way back when, around when he acquired his first Emerald, I reached out to him?" That got Sonic's attention, along with the rest of the Freedom Fighters and Chaotix who were now staring at him with widened eyes. "So he never told you, then. Strange. I knew of his circumstances through special means and thought to win him over to my side. I really thought it was a sure thing, too. A human taken from another zone by, from his perspective, strange animal monsters? I would have thought he'd leap at the first opportunity to jump ship and join somebody whose kind was related to his. I even tried spicing the deal up by lying and saying I'd find him a way home."

By now Sonic was shaking in rage at the news. Some of the Freedom Fighter and Chaotix had paused, too, mixtures of surprise, shock, and disbelief flowing into their features as they continued listening to the Doctor. Sonic, through all the anger and shock, looked sad under it all. Saddened to hear that the false possibility of going back to his zone had been dangled in front of Sorun, knowing full-well how much something like that meant to the Earthling.

"But, to my complete bafflement, he refused my offer," Eggman said, causing everybody who cared enough to listen to freeze. "Went on and on about for as much as he hated you all, he hated me even more and refused to work with me and went into all other sorts of tripe. I never could figure out what goes through the boy's head that he refused me. Why he'd choose to suffer alongside all of you when he could have joined me at the drop of a hat. Why he chose to stay with people he utterly detested..." Eggman shook his head. "I just don't understand why he made that choice."

Sonic's arms went limp by his side as his entire form seemed to deflate. "Sorun..."

"I'll give him one thing, though. He's got something none of you animals possess. Something few Overlanders and humans possess that almost no Mobian can ever have. A drive to see things through to the end," he said. "I saw some real potential in him. More than my good-for-nothing and failure of a schemer nephew over there, at least." The dirty glare briefly sent to him by Snively completely unaffected Robotnik. "He's not very high in the brains department, sure, but he has some real grit. But oh well. If he wants to waste his life allying himself with your lot, that's his foolish choice. Ah, well. He can serve another purpose at least."

"What...? What are you talking about?" Sonic demanded, looking back up towards the Doctor.

Eggman, in response, rolled his hand around while sighing. "You know, this whole thing happening right now? Me destroying Knothole and trapping you all in these Egg Grapes? It was supposed to happen months ago," he explained. "In fact, I was getting ready to commit to the whole thing, but then, but then! I acquired the Chaos Emeralds."

"You mean you stole the Emeralds." Eggman lazily looked upwards when he heard Sally address him. "You took the gray Chaos Emerald that was being held in Castle Acorn at the time! You had whatever you sent to retrieve it murder Hershey and a handful of guardsmen just to get it!"

"Yeah, and how did you even get all the other ones, anyways?" Sonic asked. "Last we checked the other six Emeralds were supposed to be locked away in the Special Zone with that Feist guy. Now that zone doesn't even exist anymore. What'd you do?"

"Hmph!" Eggman made a loud huff and turned his head to the side. "I'm Dr. Robotnik, you nimrods. Nothing's above me when it come to getting what I want. And I wouldn't want to bore you with the details." He faced back towards Sonic. "With the Emeralds, I concluded that a... change of strategy, as it were, was in order. So the plan was put on halt, and you all know the rest. I'd used my Emeralds to power up production of my forces, you all slowly took them back, summoned the brat, yadda yadda. And admittedly it was fun, taking over the whole world, bending the Kingdom of Acorn and the Overlanders to their knees only to then see them crawl their way back up to power and push me back to my city. It was a blast, really. But the fun's dried up." Eggman slumped over the railing, still looking towards Sonic as he ran a hand over his mustached face. "We've done this time and time again, Sonic. Gone through the same hoops, run through the same loops, the whole shebang. We've come back and forth again and again, and it's just gone droll. Especially after what we went through, because that? The two near-ultimates of both spectrums?

That was the peak of our game, Sonic. It doesn't get any better than that." He sighed deeply, and then used his arms to push off the railing. "So we're done. It's game over. I'm ending things. I'm ending you, your resistance, and the entire kingdom right here before I build my forces back up to take over the world. Again. Originally I was going to spare you from this so I could see you flounder around trying to uselessly overthrow me after I finally pulled the curtain on all your friends and family, but now that the act's grown stale, Sonic, I've decided to just leave that spot to Sorun. He'll give me a bit more entertainment at least before I put him through the same thing I'm about to do to all of you." His leering smile returned, wide enough to show teeth. "Oh, but don't worry, Sonic. You'll still always be my favorite nemesis. So just for that, you get to watch as I drain the life out of every single Mobian here before I finally get to you."

"Are you serious? That's your plan? That's what you've been working on this entire time!?"

It seemed ludicrous even by this world's standards. It had to be true, though- it was coming from Nicole of all people, and he didn't know anybody that would make a lie like this in the situation they were in. It didn't make it sound any less insane, though.

"Yes, that is indeed the plan," Nicole plainly stated, the handheld still resting in Sorun's lap.

The Earthling made a small groan and rubbed at his forehead. "Why does he even have something like that just lying around...?" he mumbled. "So this whole time you've been making programs and adjustments and all that, this whole time, just for something like this?"

"Do you doubt me, Sorun?"

He shook his head. "No, of course not, it's you and you're amazing, so of course it'll work, it's just..." He cut himself off, sighed, and then continued speaking. "Okay, it at least solves the problem of where to send everyone after we rescue 'em. There's still the actual problem of actually rescuing them, though," he said. "We don't know where in the city they are, what kind of resistance we're gonna be fighting, if that big mech suit's gonna be there or not, and you need- you need, what, a connection to the network, you said?"

"Yes, any stable accessway so that I can make my way through the Egg Network should suffice."

"Okay, so adding that on top of everything else... what do you suppose we do?"

"We'll have to improvise."

Sorun's mind went completely silent for a few moments after he'd heard that. He'd gone as far as to look forwards with a blank look on his face, after which he looked back down at Nicole once his thoughts resumed. "That's not a plan," he said.

"We have no time to formulate anything past that with everyone's lives on the line, nor do we have any available data as to what we'll be encountering," she reasoned. "Ergo, we will have to work with what we have."

As much as he didn't like what he was hearing, she was right. It really was do or die, and the longer they waited, the worse off they were. There wasn't any time to plan. "... Guess we got no other option. Let's do it," Sorun finally said in agreement. He reached into his pocket, felt around for a bit, and then held out the Chaos energy radar gifted to him by Tails. He stared down at it briefly, and then sighed as he reared his arm back.

"Sorry for wasting your time again, Tails," Sorun thought as he threw the radar away. Nicole then took the radar's place in his pocket, after which he stood up off the chair. One manifestation of Yamato later and a portal was cut in the space in front of him.

And then, not wasting a moment longer, Sorun jumped through.

"Well, I think that's enough words said between enemies. It's been a good game, all, but it's time we ended things." Eggman walked away from the railing and began walking towards the end of the walkway, where Snively and the terminal was. "I think a little demonstration of things to come is in order, to get you all good and terrified." He nodded towards Snively. "Do it."

Wordlessly, Snively began to tap away at the console. A long, robotic arm reached down from the ceiling and grabbed at one of the pods. Cries of protest and outrage were heard as the pod was disconnected from the main branch and brought right in front of Eggman, who did little else but smile at the occupant of the pod as he leaned against the railing.

"Charmy Bee!" Eggman exclaimed as he pointed at the pod. "Haven't I already..."

If there was an upside, it was that Sorun had the foresight to stick to the rooftops in New Megaopolis. Surprisingly, most of the robot patrols were relegated down to the streets and alleyways. And he supposed that traversing by rooftop may have been a challenge for some, especially from how spread out some of these buildings were, but he could teleport. And fly. Traveling via rooftop was trivial to him.

He knew this city used to be New York in the old world, but traversing through it now he saw almost no architecture that was familiar to him. Granted he'd only ever seen the city through screens from movies and games, but even then nothing here screamed "New York" at him. A result of all the buildings having been replaced by these tall, metal ones, he supposed.

The Statue of Liberty was still there, though. Somehow. Half-sunk into the river at the edge of the city and eroded to hell, but it was there. So there was that.

"Ugh, this is getting us nowhere," Sorun grumbled under his breath as he stopped on a rooftop. All around him were nothing but metal buildings. A whole city full of nearly identical-looking metal buildings. "They could all be in any one of these places and we don't have time to search 'em all."

"Are there any buildings with any identifiable features?" Nicole's voice asked from inside his pocket.

"No, nothing. There's-" Sorun stopped when he turned around, his eyes focusing in on one structure in particular. It was a large silo-like building out in the distance, connected to another building by what looked like a small, enclosed walkway. What really caught Sorun's interest was the words "Egg Vineyard" stenciled on the side of the silo in red, along with a red drawing of Eggman's face right below it.

"Egg Vineyard?" Sorun thought. "Why does that sound so familiar? Wait..."

"This was all just because I found a shell-like artifact while raiding and destroying some lost, ancient civilization I found in a hidden valley in down the way in the lower continent. Inhabitants seemed like a cheerful bunch. I put them all in Egg Grapes and harvested their life energy for fuel before destroying their home and putting an oil refinery there."

"Eggman said he destroyed some lost civilization for this thing. Mentioned grapes or something."

Sorun's eyes narrowed in the direction of the silo. "I have a sneaking suspicion..."

White energy began to race down the robotic arm holding the Egg Grape that Charmy was trapped inside of. The Doctor and his nephew watched on in sadistic glee as the energy came closer and closer to the pod, while the bee inside looked on in a mixture of defiance and slight fear. Those in the other pods were mainly just looking on in horror as the white energy came closer, with members of the Chaotix and Freedom Fighters calling out his name while uselessly banging on the surface of their pods.

Before the energy had reached the pod, though, something had happened that drew everybody's attention. A thin, blue line instantly appeared on the wall of the silo, opposite of the walkway both Eggman and Snively stood on. Line upon blue line was cut into the wall, a few at first, and then ten.

A blue form crashed through the wall that had been cut by the blue lines. It streaked through the air, propelled by two spectral wings as it shot straight towards the arm holding Charmy's pod. Right before the white energy had reached the pod, the winged form flew by the pod, after which a blue line appeared on the mechanical hand holding the pod.

The hand fell away, having been separated by the cut made into it. Charmy's pod had been spared from the energy that had been threateningly close to it, though now the bee was screaming as his pod began to fall down towards the ground. It had only dropped a few feet, though, as a blue, clawed hand had reached out and grabbed the pod before it dropped too far.

The pod's sudden stop had made Charmy slam into the rounded wall of the pod, causing him to elicit a small grunt. He recovered quickly, a hand reaching up to rub at his sore head as he looked up at what had caught him. His hand fell limply to his side, and his eyes widened along with everybody else's when he saw what was holding him.

The arm holding Charmy and the Egg Grape he was in was a long, feathered, spectral arm attached to the back of the Earthling that was currently dangling above Charmy's position. A second blue, feathered arm was holding onto a stalk of Egg Grapes to keep himself aloft, while his left hand held an empty black scabbard and his right a katana. Sorun's eyes, however, were focused out in front of him, where he was level with Eggman and Snively who were both still standing on the walkway and staring wide-eyed at him.

"Haven't you done enough to him already?" Sorun asked the both of them in a quiet, hollow voice. He didn't give them the time to answer, as dozens of blue, spectral swords instantly appeared all around them.

To Sorun's surprise, though, Eggman was quick on his feet. Quicker than any man his size had a right to be. Probably from all the adrenaline that began pumping through his system when he realized he was about to get skewered by swords. He hadn't even said a word; he'd simply grabbed Snively and began sprinting down the walkway towards the silo's wall. Sorun had tried hitting him with the Summoned Swords, but to his frustration, Eggman had been too quick. The door on the silo's wall was closed behind Eggman, with the spectral swords sticking right into it.

Making an annoyed "tsk" sound, Sorun willed the Bringer Claw to lift up Charmy and the pod. It was set down on the vine of Egg Grapes containing the Chaotix, in a position so that it was wedged between the other pods and wouldn't fall away. Sorun's Bringer Claws then pulled him up against the pod, the teen landing in a small crouch as the arms disappeared.

"All this for orange juice..." Sorun sighed to himself. "... Hey, Charmy," Sorun softly greeted. He sheathed Yamato and looked to the side at the bee Mobian who was pressing himself against the pod's surface as he looked at Sorun. "I really panicked when I went back to Knothole and saw the place, you know? I thought you all got turned into Mobian jerky. Don't scare me like that."

"S-Sorun...!" Charmy's voice began to waver. Some tears began to fall down his face, happy, relieved tears, though his mouth kept changing from a smile to a worried expression. "Eggman, he... he almost...!"

"I know, Charmy, I know." Sorun reached his free hand out and placed it on the pod, over where one of Charmy's hands was. "I'm not gonna let him hurt you or anybody else, alright? It's gonna be fine. Don't worry."

"I'm reading a port access nearby, Sorun." Sorun removed his hand from the pod and reached into his pocket, bringing out Nicole's handheld. "Plug me in there. Hurry!"

Blinking, Sorun squinted at the walkway Eggman and Snively had been on prior, towards the end where the console was. "You mean that dinky little middle-of-nowhere co-"

"I already told you I just need a stable accessway!"

"Alright, I'm on it!" Straightening up a bit at Nicole's raised voice, Sorun Tricked to the console he'd been looking at. A Bringer Claw briefly appeared to rip the front plate off to reveal the electronics within, where he saw a cable with a port that matched the slot on the handheld's underside. He set the handheld down and plugged the port in. "So how long are you gonna need?" Sorun asked.

"As long as I need to do what is necessary."

"That... tells me nothing, but alright, I'll do what I can." Sorun turned around, and then looked back towards Nicole. "I'll come get the handheld before we all leave."

He left Nicole behind after teleporting away once more, this time towards the bunch of Egg Grapes that held the Freedom Fighters. He appeared kneeling down on one knee in the middle of the grouping of pods, with him kneeling down on the one Sonic was kept in specifically. The teen immediately felt all eyes on him, making him lower his head a bit.

"... Hi, guys," he said. "So... this is lookin' pretty bad, huh?"

"Sorun!" Looking to the side, Sorun spotted Tails trapped in an Egg Grape next to him. "You're here! How'd you find us!?"

"... Dumb luck and a halfway decent memory, mostly." He took a quick glance around. It didn't take him much looking to confirm that every single person that had been inside of Knothole was here, something that twisted at something in his gut. From all the civilians that lived there, to a few familiar faces he recognized at a second glance, to even the entirety of Sally's royal family all being bunched together on a single bunch of Egg Grapes nearby.

And then there were the Chaotix and Freedom Fighters. For some reason the intense looks they were giving him affected him more than everybody looking at him. He would have figured having the entire city's population focused solely on him would have done something to his nerves, but given the situation... he felt oddly calm. But the looks the Freedom Fighters and Chaotix were giving him disrupted that. He wasn't sure why.

Sorun took another glance to his side, spotting Antoine and Bunnie. He winced slightly and turned away, and then looked up. Sally was above him, staring down at him like everybody else. The same was said for Sonic, who was below Sorun's feet.

"So, uh... Sorun," Sonic started. He seemed like one of the most relieved-looking persons in there, but there was something else behind his tone of voice and the way he was looking at Sorun. From all the mixed emotions showing on Sonic's face, though, Sorun couldn't tell what was on his mind. "Er... glad you're here and everything, but what now?"

"Mm." Sorun looked forwards. "Don't worry too much about it, Sonic. I have a plan." He paused. "Well... Nicole has a plan. I'm just the guy following it."

"A plan?" Sorun looked up at Sally. "She has a plan?" she asked him.

The Earthling nodded. "Yeah. It's a pretty crazy plan, but it's better than anything I have. Which is nothing."

"Does that plan involve getting us all out of these grape things?"

"Erm... yeah. Eventually." He shook the sheathed sword held in his left hand. "Yamato should be able to cut everybody out of those easy enough."

Sally blinked in confusion. "Sorun, what do you mean 'eventually'? We need to get out of these things now!"

"Yeah... about that..." Sorun slowly inhaled and looked back forwards. "So here's the thing. Nicole's... she's handling it."

"Handing it?" Sonic parroted. "Handling it how?"

Slowly, Sorun reached up and scratched at his cheek. "I think she'll be mad if I spoil the surprise. Nicole's been planning it for a while now. But don't worry. She's doing something that'll fix this, but she needs time to finish it. And I really doubt Robotnik's gonna just sit around for us while we wait. Case in point..."

A loud, hydraulic hissing noise drew all eyes in the room downwards. A circular aperture down on the ground began to open up, and flying out from the aperture was something that made Sorun give out a low sigh. The mech suit from the video Nicole had shown him. The one that beat everyone. He'd already managed to get into it and pilot it here.

As the opening on the floor closed back up as the mech flew up via jet rockets on the underside of its feet, Sonic let out a loud gasp and began banging on the pod he was in. "Sorun! Sorun, that thing's bad news! You gotta get us all out so we can leave!"

"It's too late for that, Sonic, and Nicole still needs more time," Sorun denied with a shake of his head. "Besides, he'll just use that teleporter beam he has on you all again if I try that. Don't have a choice. Gotta beat it here and now."

"Then at least let us out so we can help you fight it!"

Sorun frowned at the mech suit that was slowly flying up to his position. "Nicole showed me what happened when you all tried fighting it, Sonic. None of you can even hurt it."

"What, and you can!?"

"Yes, because I'm the one with the magic sword that cuts through everything!" Sorun exclaimed, looking back down at Sonic. "Look, I get this is a bad idea, alright, I get it! But there's nothing else I can do! He's just gonna teleport you all again if you try helping me, and I don't want to risk losing you somewhere I can't find you!"

"You can't just fight that thing by yourself!" Sonic yelled at him.

"It's... not ideal, no." Breathing in a deep sigh, Sorun stood up to his feet. "Listen, everyone. I'm going to get you all out of here. If something bad happens to me, though, well... I got a backup plan. No matter what happens, you're all getting out of here." He wrapped the fingers of his right hand around the katana's handle and slid it out of the sheath. "Just hold on, alright? It's gonna be fine. I promise."

He heard everybody begin to call his name out. For the most part he ignored them, choosing instead to look up. He Tricked up to the highest point he could see, at the top of one of the metal grapevines near the ceiling. Once appearing there, Sorun turned around just in time to see the round mech suit floating right across from him, Eggman's own face just barely visible past the visor on the mech's head.

Sorun spun his sword around once, and then pointed it at the mech.

"I've come to retrieve my friends. You can't have them." He took a quick glance around the large room before focusing back on Robotnik. "I'm taking the rest of Knothole back, too, while I'm at it."

"Oh, is that right? Just you and your special sword there?" Eggman asked, voice projected out from the suit he was inside of. "I'll applaud your temerity, Sorun. It's up there with some of the best. It really is. But I think-"

Sorun slowly sheathed his sword, and blue arcs of electricity began to dance along the black scabbard.

"- you've gone a bit far with this one. You are aware I defeated the entirety of the Freedom Fighter with this wonderful machine of mine, correct? Sonic included? With nary a scratch save for the dent on my shield, I might add! And you think that you , with all your powers and your little sword pulled from a storybook, have any chance of-"

A sphere of warped space enveloping the mech suit shut Eggman right up. A myriad of blue slashes assaulted the mech before the warped space dispersed, leaving it floating in the air. Sorun frowned at the sight, slowly pulling Yamato back out of its sheath as he gazed at the mech. He'd done damage- he saw multiple deep scratches over the front of the mech's round body. But that's all he saw.

"Judgement Cut should've cut that thing to pieces," Sorun thought to himself. "The hell's going on here? It shouldn't matter what that suit is made of; Yamato's ability to separate is absolute. It can cut space-time. So how is that thing still in one piece?"

Eggman, or rather, the mech he was inside of, looked down at its frontal half where it had been wounded with the scratches made from Sorun's Judgement Cut. He stared for a few seconds, huffed, and then looked back at Sorun. "Okay. So the sword can cut me. I'll give you that much."

"... What exactly did you do to make that mech resistant to the Yamato?" Sorun questioned him. "That shouldn't be possible."

"Oh-ho-ho! Surprised, are you? Well, Sorun, I'll confess one thing to you: this battle suit I'm using has seen some design improvements since when I first planned this scheme of mine out." The mech suit fanned its arms out to the side. "Formally introducing to everybody present: the Egg Beater!" The arms lowered to the suit's sides. "Mark Two."

"Mark Two?" Sorun repeated.

"Admittedly most of the improvements were some software patches to improve performance and a few new features here and there, though there was one single addition I think you'll specifically appreciate, Sorun." A small seam in the chest of the mech suit appeared. The chest opened up like a pair of cabinet doors, folding outwards to reveal what was inside of the chest cavity.

Sorun felt his grip on his katana tighten when he saw what was inside of the mech.

It was a Chaos Emerald. A gray one. It was locked right into the chest of the mech, with multiple cables attaching the Emerald to the robot it was embedded inside of. The teen was only allowed a single glance, though, as the chest cavity closed right back up and the seam disappeared, leaving behind the floating, slightly-scratched mech that was right in front of Sorun.

"That's right. It's a Chaos Emerald," Eggman confirmed, voice smug. "This puppy can practically run forever with this bad boy powering it. Why, with all of this Chaos energy running through the Egg Beater Mark Two, it's practically invincible, too! Not even that freakishly strong armadillo over there could harm this battle suit with the added durability afforded to me by the energy provided by the Chaos Emerald."

"So he's powering the suit with a Chaos Emerald... and the energy provided by it gave it a huge defense buff. Kind of like what Sonic got with all those Power Rings..." Sorun thought. "If all that Chaos energy powering the mech is the reason why it's resistant to Yamato..." His eyes widened in realization. "Oh, that's why I couldn't cut them out of me... was wondering about that..."

Well, that was incredibly bad if that was the case. He hadn't had any illusions that it'd be as easy as him performing a Judgement Cut or two and that would be the end of it. He didn't think it was going to be this bad, though. He was going to have to fight Eggman and his mech suit for real here if he was going to save everybody. The only saving grace he saw was that it wasn't entirely resistant to Yamato. He could perform damage on it; that was more than anybody else who fought the mech could say they could do. He'd have to chip away at it, but Sorun saw that it was possible.

He just didn't know what would give out first: the mech, or Sorun's own body.

"This isn't good at all..." His hands tightly gripped around the empty scabbard he held in one hand and the katana in the other. He felt slight trembles in his body as he realized that there was a very high chance he'd die right here fighting this thing. He felt more afraid for all the others, though, and what would happen to them if he were to die right here fighting this thing. "Alright... this is the real deal. You're not gonna get any help for this one, Sorun. This isn't like every other time you fought something where it was so weak it was easy or where it was so strong you needed help from others to take it down. You gotta kill this thing on your own. Everybody's depending on it. They'll all die if you lose here, so don't fuck it up. Kinda nerve-wracking, though... knowing everybody in Knothole and all my friends are gonna have to watch this..."

Sorun took a deep breath to help steady himself as best as he could. Do or die time, then.

"... You know, sometimes I think about how unlucky these guys were to get a useless nobody like me when they opened that portal to Earth up all those months ago," Sorun said. The Bringer Claws appeared, folded over his shoulders. "Don't get me wrong. I'm glad they didn't get some psychopath that would of have used the powers they got out of the Emeralds to kill everybody. Because there's people back where I'm from that would have done that. Out of spite for trapping them in this world or 'cause of the power trip or whatever the reason. I guess that's why I can't be too surprised at all the things you do, Eggman. Humans, we're... kinda weird like that, aren't we? Though I can't say there's many people back home whose standards are as bad as yours. Then again, you're not really passing the bar by a very high margin, and in other areas you fall way below it." The Bringer Claws rose up off of Sorun's shoulders. "I'm glad they didn't get somebody like that. I'm not so happy they got somebody as bad as me. Some useless idiot that's never made a good decision in his entire life. Some worthless guy who shafted all his friends for stupid reasons. It just keeps going over in my head again and again. Like a circle." One of the Bringer Claws clenched into a fist, and was then grabbed by the other. "I guess, in the end... we're both pretty terrible people, Robotnik. I'd like to say I'm a bit better, though, since I never enslaved anybody."

The Bringer Claw cracked the other's knuckles. The sound reverberated throughout the entire room, making everybody, even Eggman to an extent, flinch from the sound.

"I don't really know. I'm just rambling at this point." The other Bringer Claw clenched and had its knuckles cracked by the other one, making everybody flinch again. "Useless or not, though, I'm taking everybody here back if it's the last thing I do."

"Oh, is that right?" Eggman asked. "And where exactly do you plan on bringing all these Mobians once you've rescued them from me? In case you've forgotten, I destroyed their only home in this world."

"Who knows? Guess we'll have to see what happens."

"Hmph." The arms and legs on the mech suit slowly shifted into a more battle-ready stance. "It's a nice fantasy, Sorun, but that's all it is: a fantasy," Eggman claimed. "Here's the reality of the situation: you're outmatched and outclassed. Now, I can't just go and teleport you into an Egg Grape as you are since you'll just cut your way out with the katana. So I'm going to use this battle suit to beat you within an inch of your life in front of all your friends here so you're too battered to even lift a finger. Then I'll teleport you into an Egg Grape and suck the very life out of you. Why, with all that Chaos energy running in you from the Emeralds, you alone could probably power my empire for decades! And after that I'll activate the rest of the Egg Grapes, and harvest the lifeforce of every single Mobian here to fuel my empire even further. And it is only after I've drained the life out of every single person here and see the hope drain from his eyes will I finally end that meddlesome hedgehog down there once and for all."

"..." Sorun's eyes narrowed in the direction of the mech suit. The Bringer Claws fanned out to his sides, spectral claws slowly flexing and at the ready. "Try it."

And then, without waiting a moment longer, Sorun Tricked right in front of the mech midair and sliced his katana downwards on the dented shield that had been moved to protect the mech's body.

Dr. Ivo "Eggman" Robotnik

The Nefarious Mastermind

White sparks flew out from the point the katana's blade made contact with the round, dented shield, the sword's power of separation struggling to cut through the shield. It proved unable to do so, as before any real damage could be applied the robotic arm holding the shield had pushed Sorun away. His body had flown through the air for a brief period before he Tricked and appeared on top of a grouping of the spherical pods. He looked up at the flying mech in front of him, staring intently as he saw the wrecking ball in its right hand be swung towards him.

Right before the wrecking ball swung into Sorun, he'd Tricked to the left by a few meters on a different pod to avoid it. The ball swung right past him, after which one of his Bringer Claws extended outwards and clamped down on the chain the ball was attached to. The ball snapped to a stop, its momentum swinging it around back towards Sorun, who willed the second Bringer Claw to reach out and catch it in its claws before it could hit him. And then, with the chain being held right in front of him, Sorun swung his sword down on one of the links.

Just like the shield, the sword didn't cut through. It just emitted white sparks as its edge struggled against cutting the link.

"The chain too, huh...?" Sorun mumbled out. He glanced to the side at the mech the chain was attached to, focusing in on the shield and the deep gash in it his sword had made. "Tch... what absolute hax."

The teen released his hold on the chain, and then willed the Bringer Claw holding onto the wrecking ball to throw it back towards the mech. The throw was successful, as the ball had hit the suit head-on, though, of course, it had done absolutely no damage. It had knocked it back a bit though and seemed to disorient Eggman for just a second, which is when Sorun Tricked.

And then Tricked again.

And again.

Over and over Sorun would teleport all around the mech, so many times that it appeared like he was in multiple places at once. He'd only stop briefly to slash at a random part of the mech suit, and then he would resume repeatedly and rapidly Tricking all around the mech in order to confuse and disorient the pilot. Deep cuts began to form all around its body as Sorun continued doing this, and even though Eggman had gone as far as to try and swing the mech's arms at him, they caught nothing but air as Sorun continued to teleport all around it and Robotnik.

"Well, it's resistant, but not outright immune to Yamato's separation power. I just gotta keep chipping away at it." Sorun performed a final Trick, this time going back on top of one of the grape-like pods surrounding the room they were in. He briefly tasted a coppery taste in his mouth, frowning a bit at the sensation. "Problem is my body's falling to pieces here and I can't keep up a prolonged fight. I can't even feel pain anymore, so that'll actually work with me here, but... I don't know how long it can go before it fails completely. Especially if I keep spamming my powers like this."

A loud whirring sound drew Sorun's attention towards the mech. He saw the two gray missile pods on the back of the mech's shoulders move slightly. Two silver tubes that Sorun recognized as missiles slid out of each pod, four in total, jets of fire spraying out behind them as they launched towards Sorun, who quickly panicked at the sight of them. Fearing that the shockwave from the missiles' explosion would harm those in the pods near him if he simply dodged, the teen willed Summoned Swords to appear next to the missiles and impale them. A set of four swords impaled each missile before they'd even come close to Sorun, causing the jets of flame at the end of each missile to fizzle out. They each harmlessly impacted the pods around Sorun, none of them detonating as the inert weapons fell down to ground floor.

Sighing a bit in relief at the disabled missiles, Sorun glanced back up at the floating mech. He narrowed his eyes a bit, and then began to Trick again, going lower and lower towards the ground floor of the massive room they were it, away from the pods. The teen managed to teleport onto the ground floor just as the mech reached his position, still hovering just above Sorun with the thrusters under its feet. The round, robotic suit lifted both of its arms up, fists both pointed towards Sorun. He saw small, yellow lights in openings on top of both of the wrists and, upon seeing them, Tricked away by a few meters, with two yellow beams firing out from the wrists right after he'd teleported. They struck the position Sorun had been previously standing on, while the human himself was far away from the impact zone, hands around his sheathed katana. He slid Yamato out and back into the scabbard in one motion, and Eggman let out a loud grunt through the mech's speakers when the suit was caught in the middle of another Judgement Cut, adding in dozens of more scratches along the machine's surface.

"Erghh...! Quit moving around like that!" Robotnik growled out. He continued to furiously mash down on multiple buttons in the control seat of the mech, forcing it to continually aim and fire its wrist lasers at Sorun, but every time he'd do so Sorun would just Trick to a different area on the floor to avoid it entirely. He was rocked around in his seat after the mech suffered through another Judgement Cut, causing him to practically smash his fist down on a second button. "Snively! This nuisance is proving more problematic than I anticipated. Send over Metal Sonic to help smooth things over."

In a building nearby to the storage silo both Sorun and Dr. Robotnik were fighting in, a blue, metallic form flew through dark, dimly-lit hallways towards that very destination. The Badnik modeled after Sonic's very visage flew closer and closer towards the battle with but one objective programmed into it: to assist in the fight and detainment of the sword-wielding combatant currently in conflict with its creator. And it had every intention of fulfilling that order.

At least it did until it'd rounded a corner, saw something red blur into its visual sensors, and then heard a loud screech of metal assault its audio sensors as critical damage indicators began flashing in its vision.

Completely stopped in place, Metal Sonic looked down at its chest. The straight blade of a long sword was piercing right through its torso and out its back, through the thruster that propelled it forwards. When it looked up, it saw the end of the sword being held by a figure concealed by a red, hooded cloak, who held both the sword and the robot impaled to it aloft with a single hand.

"No interfering," Rubrum said, swinging his sword to the side. Metal Sonic's body slid right off the blade, crashing to the ground in a roll before stopping on its back. The damage to its body had been catastrophic enough that it could barely move its head enough to see Rubrum walk up to it, sword resting on his shoulder.

He kept walking past the Badnik's body, though right before that he'd kicked Metal's head hard enough that it was whipped to the side, with the sound of multiple gears and sprockets snapping resulting from the kick.

"Tch. Worthless scrap," Rubrum mumbled out as he continued moving away. It was the last thing Metal Sonic's audio receptors were able to pick up before its body went offline completely.

"What do you mean Metal Sonic isn't responding!?" Eggman roared out. When the suit he was in was shaken around due to being assaulted by another Judgement Cut, he continued with, "Then just send me whatever reinforcements we do have! Hurry!"

Light pants began to exit from Sorun's mouth as he stared up at the mech suit floating above him, its surface marred in multiple scratches and cuts suffered from the Yamato. The teen himself didn't know if he was faring any better. On the outside he was without a wound, but he didn't know what the state of his body on the inside was like. Impossible to know without a sense of pain to tell him, but pain or no, the fight was starting to become exhausting for him. Not overly so, for now at least, but enough that he was getting worried.

That worry was multiplied tenfold when Sorun saw multiple hidden panels in the walls nearby begin to open up. Green shapes began to fly out from the panels. Flying robots that Sorun instantly recognized as the Egg Flappers he'd fought on occasion. He stared unblinking as around a hundred of the machines began to surround him, floating in the formation of a long pillar all around him. He was completely closed into the formation of flying Badniks, all hundred of them aiming the laser cannons on their undersides right at him.

"Well, Sorun, I'll give you this much. You did better than anybody else did against my Egg Beater. It's over now, though," Robotnik called out. His flying mech suit continued to hover far above the ground floor of the room, far enough that he saw Sorun and the squadron of a hundred Egg Flappers surrounding him on all sides. "You're through. Completely surrounded and outnumbered. So be a good boy, put down the sword, and go inside of an Egg Grape to save yourself any further embarrassment."

Ignoring Eggman completely, he slowly spun around while looking around at all the flying, plane-shaped Badniks surrounding him. He made a small hum, blinking in acknowledgement to all the robots before stopping in the direction that Eggman's mech suit was in. "Hm... they're kind of close. Aren't they?" He slid the tip of Yamato into its sheath. "Eggman?"

"Hm...?" The head barely visible past the mech's head visor leaned in closer as Sorun fully sheathed the katana. "Just what are you doing?"

Sorun didn't answer. He instead took his right hand off of Yamato's handle, holding the sword completely with his left by the scabbard. He spread his feet out slightly, bringing the sheathed sword down to his waist as he closed his eyes and took a deep, calming breath. He slowly exhaled, the hundred robots continuing to surround him with charged weapons as Eggman and all the captured Mobians of Knothole looked on.

And then he'd opened his eyes, and at the same time a ring of raw power began to emanate out from his body.

The more Chaos-sensitive Mobians watching the fight, such as Sonic and Knuckles, were immediately sent reeling to the back of their pods from the sheer weight of the power that they sensed building up from the bottom of the room, all pouring out from the katana held in Sorun's hand. Surrounding him was a perfectly circular ring of blue energy, almost invisible save for the glowing blue border on the ground and the swirling, shifting blue clouds of energy on the ring's walls. Sorun stood at the center of the ring, while the ring itself was wide enough that it encapsulated all hundred of the Egg Flappers that were surrounding him.

Sorun took another deep breath as his right hand slowly reached for the Yamato's handle. "You're going down..."

"What is this? What are you doing!?" Eggman's mech suit was just outside of the range of the barely-visible, blue circle surrounding Sorun, though he'd piloted the suit to fly back a bit further just to be sure. "Don't just float there gawking!" he yelled down at the robots surrounding Sorun. "Open fire!"

It was too late, though. Before even the first Egg Flapper managed to discharge its laser, Sorun's hand gripped around Yamato's handle. The entire sword briefly flashed a solid blue the instant the teen firmly gripped it.

And then he disappeared.

To most outside observers, time itself came to a standstill. Inside the circle of power there was a slash. A slash that appeared so quickly it seemed to just materialize in the air, as if by nothing. A slash that was so intense the air it cut through was warped, as if space itself had been cut apart. Dozens and dozens more of these slashes appeared in the span of milliseconds inside the frozen time, with multiple blue, phantom outlines of Sorun's body appearing and disappearing within the ring. By the end the phantom images converged back to the center of the ring, forming into Sorun, who was kneeling down on the ground with one knee while holding Yamato and its scabbard at a vertical angle. All around him was a world frozen in time, surrounded by a ring of power and the hundreds of lines segmenting space all around him completely localized in the ring.

Slowly, Sorun began to insert Yamato into its sheath. As he did so the lines of cut space began to slowly converge in on themselves, as if the cut space was knitting back together. It was only when he fully sheathed the sword with a loud clink did three things happen simultaneously: time resumed at its normal pace, and all the cut segments of space completely disappeared, with a few pieces of cut space resembling shattered glass falling down and disappearing. And then the hundred Egg Flappers that had been surrounding him were instantly cut apart to pieces.

Judgement Cut End was what Sorun considered to be the final, ultimate move of the Yamato's, one he'd been striving to figure out ever since he'd acquired the sword. In the games the sword originated from it was known as a "screen clearer" move- as in, any enemy that was visible on the screen when the move was performed was outright killed, if not heavily wounded in the case of the stronger ones. Even on bosses the move would remove entire chunks of the health bar. It was a potent offensive ability indeed.

Recreating the move in reality had been tricky for Sorun, but after some practice in secret away from the others he'd figured it out. The move involved using Yamato's power of absolute separation to separate time itself from it and its user for a brief time, and then cut away space itself inside a predetermined area whose range was dictated by how much Chaos energy Sorun's body would allow to output from the sword. Anything within that circle would be cut apart completely. Not from being cut by the sword, but from the space they occupied being cut by Yamato. It was a cutting ability so absolute there was no defense against it, done at a speed only possible due to time being cut away that hundreds of slashes could be performed before one could even blink.

Really the only limits were that Sorun's body, incompatible with Chaos energy as it was, made it so that Judgement Cut End's absolute range was around ten meters in diameter, and that the ability itself needed some few seconds to fully charge. Sorun considered that the cutting ability of Judgement Cut End more than outweighed the downsides.

Sorun fully stood up to his feet, the blue power that had been radiating around him dispersing completely after his sword had been sheathed. Vestiges of the energy in the form of blue electricity sparking around his body had briefly appeared before vanishing entirely. All around him the cut-apart Egg Flappers fell down to the ground in cut-apart heaps, every single one having been completely sliced apart into unrecognizable bits. A veritable rain of scrap metal fell all around him as Sorun glanced around, searching for where Eggman and the mech suit was.

And then a missile had cut right through the curtain of raining scrap metal, causing Sorun to dramatically widen his eyes and Trick straight upwards. Even so he'd seen the missile too late, and hadn't teleported upwards quite far enough. The missile directly impacted the ground he'd been standing on, the shockwave from the missile blasting outwards and pushing Sorun out, the teen grunting in the process. Even worse was that the shockwave had flung an exorbitant amount of metal shards towards Sorun as a result of the missile's explosion as he was tossed backwards.

Due to his sense of pain being completely dulled, Sorun wasn't entirely sure what happened. He was tumbling over and over through the air and towards the ceiling, though there were multiple points he felt muffled 'thuds' impact his body. Where those points were, though, he couldn't tell, nor could he tell how serious the impacts were. He'd been hit with something- that's all he knew. That was all he could process before he'd made it to near the ceiling, where his body impacted with one of the Egg Grapes. He bounced off of it, fell down, and rolled across the spherical surface of multiple pods before finally sliding to a stop. Sorun coughed once, and then shakily got up to his feet as he glanced upwards at where he hit.

The first thing he'd noticed was that there were streaks of blood along the surface of the pods. He looked down, noticing that there were multiple bits of metal shrapnel that had been blown into him sticking out of his torso. The undershirt he wore under his blue coat was too dark for him too see how bad the bleeding was, but when he touched his hand near where some of the shards were poking out of his body, it had been stained completely red when he brought it out.

The second thing he noticed was that the vision in his right eye was completely blind for some reason.

Confused, Sorun held up his right hand towards his right eye. He felt that there was a stream of blood leaking down his face, a heavy amount. And when he felt around his eye, he felt, to his shock, what seemed to be a long shard of jagged metal. When he looked towards the side, at his own reflection that he could barely make out on the surface of one of the Egg Grapes, he immediately understood what happened and felt a pit drop in his stomach.

"Oh. That ain't good."

One of the pieces of shrapnel that'd been blasted at him had gone straight through his right eye. He couldn't even see if there was any of it left, as the metal shard had gone through the whole socket. He even heard some of the captive Mobians around him gasp out in shock at the sight, though Sorun was less concerned about those and more on his lost eye. Even when Dr. Robotnik and his mech suit floated up to the center of the room, the jets propelling the suit around Sorun's level, the teen continued to hold his hand up to his obliterated eye as he stared at his reflection.

"Oh-ho-ho! Whoops! I didn't mean to hurt you that badly, Sorun," Eggman called out. "It's your own fault for not submitting when I'm the clear winner here, though. And I suppose, in the end, a lost appendage or two isn't going to matter much when I'm just going to convert you into fuel by the end of the day. So hurry up and concede so I can get this show on the road. You've dinged my battle suit up enough as it is."

Sorun never turned towards Eggman, or even made any motion that said he was acknowledging him. He was still staring towards his reflection.

"Really? Oh, for the..." The missile pod on the mech's right shoulder whirred to life. "Here. Maybe another one of these will wake you up."

A missile fired out from a pod and streaked towards Sorun, who continued standing still at his reflection. Not even the sound of the missile screaming towards him, or the sound of some of the Mobians and Freedom Fighters shouting his name, roused him from this state.

And then, just before the missile hit him, his left Bringer Claw snapped upwards and grabbed the shaft of the missile, stopping it in place.

"... Whatever. It's just an eye." Finally, Sorun turned towards Eggman as the Bringer Claw holding the missile crushed it, rendering it inert. Despite the bloodied shard sticking out of his face, his overall expression was overly calm and blank. "I only need the one."

"Theeere we are." The crushed missile was roughly tossed towards the mech, who simply batted it away harmlessly with its shield. "Still got a bit of fight in you, eh? You would have went far if you'd just joined me, Sorun."

Instead of responding to Eggman, the teen Tricked right in front of the mech and slashed at it with Yamato.

Predictably, he'd defended himself with the mech's shield, with Sorun adding another deep gash into the dish's surface. Sorun Tricked around the backside of the mech to try and cut behind it, though, to his surprise, Eggman seemed to have anticipated this and whirled the round mech around. Fast. Startling fast. Fast enough that, in the time it took for Sorun to swing the katana while the mech's back was turned, it whirled completely around in a one-eighty and defended itself with the shield once again. He'd tried Tricking under it, though his Bringer Claws were forced to fly him backwards when Eggman had responded by having the mech kick at him.

He'd tried again and again to get a hit in on Eggman's suit with his katana. To his credit, once in a while Sorun would manage to get one single cut in. They were seldom delivered, though, especially compared to the rate he'd been damaging the robotic armor at the beginning of the fight. He wasn't able to Trick as often, wanting to conserve his strength to try and prolong the fight. His swings were getting incrementally slower and slower. The loss of half of his sight and depth perception was throwing Sorun off, too, making him outright miss some sword strikes.

Eggman, on the other hand, only seemed to be moving faster somehow. That mech suit of his was moving faster than Sorun himself despite its size, and the fact they were fighting in the air seemed to only benefit it further while hindering Sorun. It'd defend itself with the shield too fast for Sorun to counter, or it'd kick and punch at him and he'd be forced to either Trick away or have his Bringer Claws fly him to a safer location. There'd been a few times where he'd had to Trick away just to avoid getting shot at by one of the built-in laser guns on the mech's wrists, and doing that repeatedly was beginning to become taxing to Sorun.

Judgement Cuts weren't working anymore, either. Eggman seemed to have begun to recognize when Sorun was about to perform them, and then adjust accordingly by flying away before getting enveloped in the bubble of warped space. No matter how hard Sorun tried, he kept dodging the Judgement Cuts.

"Getting slower!" Eggman mockingly called out. "I think it's time we brought this to a close!"

The flail with the wrecking ball on its end was extended out from the mech's right hand. It started swinging that around along with the shield and kicking with its legs. It was one more thing for Sorun to keep track of, who was already reaching his limit with how much the robotic suit was pressuring him. At this point Sorun could barely get any hits in, either because the shield kept blocking him, or he had to dodge a kick or the wrecking ball being swung at him. He was too afraid of trying to grab at the ball, too, with his previous experience from the factory. When it'd struck with such force that it'd destroyed his Bringer Claw completely. And he needed them to stay in the air to save on Tricking so much.

He thought of grabbing the chain like he'd done during the beginning of the fight, especially after the wings narrowly pushed him away from the ball hitting him, but he was too worried about Eggman using the mech to resist him if he tried doing that again. He didn't know how much strength its arms had compared to the Bringer Claws, but he wouldn't be surprised to learn it was greater. And he still needed them to fly around with the mech just to keep up.

"None of this is working," Sorun thought after Tricking to the other side of the mech. This proved to help him very little, as Eggman had turned around and resumed his attacks so much that Sorun didn't even get a second's break. "The sword's the only thing that can even hurt it, but he's throwing so much at me that I'm not getting opportunities to cut the suit. The Bringer Claws and Trickster is only good for mobility and dodging at this point, and Summoned Swords are practically worthless except for taking out the missiles. He learned Judgement Cut's timing and is dodging it. Judgement Cut End has too long of a windup, and he already saw it, so that won't work... I'm gonna have to pull that out at this rate." The Bringer Claws harshly flapped and dragged Sorun's body to the side to avoid the wrecking ball being flung at him. "I'm already juggling too many powers as it is, though... don't know how long I could handle adding it on top of everything else... but with how this is going, don't think it's gonna matter if-"

Sorun's own thoughts were cut off when he was forced to Trick to the side when the ball and chain was swung at him again. What happened next, though, was that Eggman had the mech position it's shield in front of the chain it held. The chain bended around the edge of the shield, changing its trajectory and causing the ball to veer around and sail right back towards Sorun.

Unfortunately for Sorun, the wrecking ball approaching him was on a bad angle. His right side, which was completely blind at the loss of his eye. And so, with his focus solely squared on the floating mech in front of him, he was unable to perceive the wrecking ball approaching him from the right side until it was visible in the peripheral of his left eye. By then it was too late.

He'd tried avoiding it. The Bringer Claws attempting to fly him away, and he'd avoided getting hit directly because of it, but he'd still been tagged by the checkered wrecking ball. There was a loud, wet squelch! sound as a result of the hit, and Sorun felt a dull impact somewhere on his body. The force of the hit was strong enough that he was thrown completely backwards, near towards the ceiling where all the bunches of Egg Grapes were.

Once again he found himself bouncing across the rounded surfaces of the pods. The hit had broken his concentration and caused the Bringer Claws to disappear, so they couldn't help reorient himself. He'd at least managed to catch himself with his left hand, both it and the bottom of his feet sliding along the pods until he'd slid to a halt. It was only when he stopped moving completely did Sorun breath out a single sigh, lightly panting from the exhaustion of the fight. He stood up to his feet, rather easily after he noticed his body felt a bit lighter than usual, and then reached his right hand out.

Only... nothing happened.

Blinking his one eye in confusion, Sorun tried reaching his hand out once more. Again, nothing happened. He turned his head out to the right side so he could see what the problem was, and then froze immediately when he saw what it was.

His right arm all the way up to the shoulder was completely gone. Not even the sleeve from the coat was there anymore, having been torn completely off when the wrecking ball had hit him. All that remained was an empty shoulder socket that was gushing a stream of blood.

"Oh. That... really ain't good..." Sorun thought, still staring towards the missing arm in surprise.

He couldn't hear much besides his own shallow breathing and the sound of the blood from his wound splashing onto the pod he was standing on. He faintly made out people calling out his name, forcing his eye to glance out to the side. He caught the shocked and horrified faces on all the Freedom Fighters and Chaotix staring at him, and seeing those faces caused a twinge of guilt to flash in Sorun as he looked at the wound. "Well, could be worse. 'Least I can't even feel this. I don't wanna think about how it'd look for them if that wasn't the case..."

Eggman and the robotic suit he was in had flown right in front of the grouping of pods Sorun stood on top of, though the teen was more focused on the missing arm than the mech. Even after he began speaking Sorun didn't bother to turn towards him.

"Er, Sorun... this is going kind of far. Wouldn't want to prematurely end this by accidentally having you bleed out in the middle of the fight," Eggman said. "How about we end it right here, huh? I think we all get the point, but you've lost."

"You know... Honey put a lot of effort into this coat." It was only then did Sorun turn his face back towards the mech, his expression still mainly impassive and his voice calm and even. It seemed to unnerve Eggman by the way his mustache, visible from beyond the mech's visor, seemed to straighten out in shock. "She's gonna kill me for wrecking this thing. Guess I can't blame her. She's got a real screw loose, but the stuff she makes is premium. I'll never tell this to her face, but I really appreciate the effort she goes through for me." He blinked his eye and began to glance around. "Oh, wait, I guess she'd be here somewhere, wouldn't she? Man, she better not have heard that..."

"How are you doing this?"

"... Hm?" Sorun focused back on Robotnik. "Doing what?"

"This! Acting so... nonchalant!" he exclaimed, forcing the mech to wildly gesture towards Sorun. "You lost an arm and an eye! You should be rolling around screaming in agony, not worrying about the stupid coat! Nobody has the kind of mental fortitude needed to just completely ignore wounds like that the way you're doing, so how are you doing it!?"

"I dunno." Sorun shrugged. "Maybe I'm more scared of what you're gonna do to all these people than the wounds. You ever think about that?" That wasn't the real reason, of course, but it brought Sorun a bit of satisfaction seeing Eggman flounder like this. And he needed the breather.

"Hrrgh... fine, don't tell me. It doesn't matter," Eggman claimed. "You can't fight me after losing your sword arm, Sorun. It's over."

"Lost an arm? What do you mean?" The right Bringer Claw appeared over Sorun's back. "I have spares."

After speaking, something odd began to happen to the Bringer Claw. It began to shrink down and reform slightly, while at the same time the base of the blue, spectral arm began to move forwards. By the time it was done slightly shifting its shape and position, the Bringer Claw had perfectly fit itself over where Sorun's arm used to be. In its place was a blue, transparent arm, one with claws for fingers and spectral feather sticking out of the forearm. Sorun held the spectral arm up to his face, experimentally flexing the arm's clawed fingers before nodding in satisfaction and lowering it.

"There, see? Good as new. Sorta." The Yamato was re-summoned in Sorun's left hand, after which he grabbed the handle with his spectral hand an unsheathed it. He rose an eyebrow in surprise when he willed the arm to experimentally lift the sword up and down, and then had it spin the sword around a few times in a wheel too fast for his eye to perceive before he caught it. "Huh. Can't actually feel anything with this thing, but... it's way more dexterous than my regular arm. Maybe I can run with this after all.

"Still... this isn't good at all. I already have to worry about my body giving out from overusing my powers. Now I gotta worry about bleeding to death from all these wounds I have," Sorun continued to think. "My flight ability's gonna be completely crippled now, too, since I need to use the right Bringer Claw to compensate for the missing arm. Shit... I'm really running out of time here. Don't know how much longer I can keep going..."

"You're seriously still dead-set on fighting me? Really?" Eggman sounded exasperated at the prospect, even the mech slumping over in weariness. Beyond that, though, he sounded almost confused at Sorun's actions. "I don't understand it, Sorun. Why? Why them? Why are you fighting so hard for them? It doesn't make sense."

"Ohhhh, Eggman. All this time and you still don't get it?" Sorun began to slowly walk closer to the floating mech, leaving behind bloodied footprints in his wake. "All that intelligence and no wisdom to spend it on. See where it gets you? Shoulda balanced your stats."

"Quit talking nonsense and answer the question!" Eggman yelled out.

"You'd be able to see it for yourself if you didn't have the wisdom of a brick, Robotnik. How you can simultaneously be the smartest and most moronic person in the world is beyond me," Sorun said. "It took me months of living with all these people to finally see it. They have something somebody like you will never have." He pointed his spectral hand at Robotnik. "What you lack... is this!"

He stuck both of his thumbs behind his back after de-summoning Yamato. At the same time a number of Summoned Swords appeared behind Sorun, all positioned in a way so that they made a distinct shape: a heart. A large, blue heart that was floating behind Sorun's back. It quickly dissipated, after which Sorun lowered his real and spectral arms back to his sides.

"... Heart?" Eggman said, tone disbelieving. "You must be joking."

"'Fraid not, Robotnik. It honestly scared me seeing how strong all these guys are, especially compared to me, but after a while I finally saw why. They all have more heart in them than I've ever seen in anybody else." Yamato was re-summoned in his hands. Sorun held Yamato's blade up at a horizontal angle after unsheathing it, gazing into his warped reflection in the blade. "Strength, true strength... is all about fighting to protect what's important. That's what it means. But you... a heartless guy like you would never get something like that. You threw away any chance you ever had of making bonds of your own and understanding what heart really means when you fell to hedonism and tried to take over the world!" Sorun pointed the tip of the katana at Eggman. "No wonder you have no true power of your own and have to rely on machines for everything!"

The jets on the bottom of the Egg Beater's feet roared to life. It flew straight towards Sorun, who remained rooted to the spot as he watched the mech approach. The left Bringer Claw flashed to life and extended forwards, grabbing the mech's right shoulder to help slow its advancement. The right one mimicking Sorun's lost arm and holding the Yamato flashed out at the same time, clashing with the edge of the shield held in the mech's hand. It was set in a deadlock, the mech floating just above the pods while Sorun stared deeply into Eggman's spectacles past the visor on the large helmet he was staring at.

"I won't allow you to harm a single one," Sorun intoned in a deadly-serious tone. "Not one."

"All for a bunch of animals that ruined your life!?"

"They only did it because you ruined theirs!"

A metallic grinding sound was heard as the spectral arm holding the katana, in conjunction with the larger, winged arm holding the robot suit at bay, began to push it back. It was with a final burst of effort that Sorun pushed the mech back far enough that it tumbled backwards through the air. He even went through the trouble of firing off a few Summoned Swords to push it back even further, even if they wouldn't do any damage.

But then something strange had happened.

Eggman's mech suit bounced in the air a little bit when it was hit by the Summoned Swords.

"... What?" Sorun blinked in confusion as he stared out at the mech. It reoriented itself in the air quickly enough, and past the helmet's visor Sorun could see that even Eggman looked a bit confused at what just happened. "There's no way the Summoned Swords hit hard enough to bounce it in the air like that. It's way too heavy. That's not even factoring in the Emerald protecting it. So why did-" His single eye widened as memories began to surface. "Hold on just a second here...!"

Curiously, however, each and every single sword that had struck the robot propelled it high enough that it made up from the amount it dropped down before the swords hit it. Even as the eight swords hit Metal, it was still the same place in the air as it had been before the swords hit it due to the small amount of lift afforded by being struck by the swords.

"... Huh?" Sorun scrunched his brows in confusion. "The swords, they..."

With a mechanical growl, the wolf tore its face out of the ground, its red eye flashing as it noticed movement to the side. Sorun was still approaching with his katana held out to his side, and in anticipation, the wolf opened its mouth to try and howl at him. Right before it could, though, twenty Summoned Swords appeared over it and began raining down and impaling themselves into the robot's backside.

While this was happening, Sorun kept up his approach, noticing with some interest the wolf was jittering in place and struggling to open its mouth to try and howl at him as it was pelted with swords.

"Huh."

"Have I been using them wrong the entire time?" Sorun wondered to himself. A single Summoned Sword appeared next to him, causing Sorun to cast a contemplative look at it. "If these really mimic Vergil's Summoned Swords... in the games, they had functions outside of just pelting enemies with minimal damage at a long range. Their primary function was to manipulate enemy positions to open them up to combos. Continually firing swords at enemies knocked into the air would juggle them and keep them stalled in the air for aerial combos. Back then, with Metal Sonic... that's what they did. I didn't get it back then, but the same thing happened when I shot the mech just now..." He looked back towards the floating mech suit. "Is it possible... that the Summoned Swords don't follow normal logic, but follow the games' logic...? I guess it wouldn't be the most 'out there' thing Chaos energy has done for me, but... I need to see."

The Summoned Sword next to Sorun shattered. At the same time, eight Summoned Swords began spinning around Eggman's mech suit in a ring, all eight swords pointed towards him.

"An enemy struck by Storm Swords was automatically lifted into the air in the games. If I'm really right about this, then something similar should happen here."

"What is this? Your paltry little phantom blades or whatever you call them?" Eggman asked, chuckling at the end of his sentence as he glanced around at the swords surrounding him. "Oh, come on, Sorun, these aren't going to do anything to me!" he continued as the swords stopped spinning. "If that oh-so-powerful katana of yours is having a hard time wounding my suit, then what do you think- huh!?"

The eight swords flew forwards and simultaneously struck the round mech. Of course, they'd all shattered on impact and left no lasting damage on the mech. What happened next, however, was that the mech was flipped on its back and lifted a few feet above its position by a seemingly invisible force, as if something had pulled on its chest and lifted it.

"Well, whaddya know?" Capitalizing on the moment, Sorun Tricked right above the mech, sword held up above his head. "How'd I not see this sooner?"

He sliced downwards. With the strength of the spectral arm behind the strike, the mech was sent shooting downwards towards the ground. The jets on its feet caught it, though, halting its momentum and maintaining its position in the air. By then Sorun had already Tricked onto its back.

"Blistering Swords deal exorbitant damage compared to normally firing off Summoned Swords." Four swords appeared at each of Sorun's sides, all aimed towards a small joint connecting the mech's left missile pod to its shoulder. They rapidly fired off in pairs, all striking the joint in the same spot. He tilted his head in approval when he noticed the joint dent horribly from the swords' assault. "Now that's some damage."

His left Bringer Claw extended out and grabbed the missile pod. To his satisfaction the pod was easily torn off, and, with it disconnected from the Emerald inside of the mech, Sorun was able to easily crush the pod and toss the remains away onto the ground below.

When Sorun noticed the mech's hands reaching up to its back to try and grab at him, Sorun Tricked back up to the pods near the ceiling. He'd barely appeared there before he saw the mech flying directly towards him, Eggman wasting no time. Sorun responded by impassively staring at the approaching mech as twenty spectral swords appeared up in the air right in front of him, pointing downwards.

It was right when the mech entered the range of the swords did Sorun will them to fall down. As such, they'd all fallen down on the mech and, of course, had all shattered. However, from the moment the first sword made contact with the mech, the swords' effect had activated. The mech seemed to freeze right there in the air, still slowly moving and jittering in place, as if struggling against something, but still going slowly enough that Sorun was able to calmly step to its side as it remained frozen to the spot.

"Enemies hit by Heavy Rain Swords get stunlocked."

"What is this? Why won't the controls respond to me!?" Eggman roared out. "What have you done, Sorun!?"

"Couldn't tell ya." His spectral right arm swung the katana out, the cutting power of the sword behind the strength of the arm proving sufficient at removing the right missile pod. "You feeling accepting of your loss yet?"

"Not... happening...!"

"Hey, your choice." Sorun sheathed Yamato. "Now stay right where you are..."

The wide, blue circle from earlier reappeared and spread out from Sorun. He slowly exhaled again as he prepared to initiate another Judgement Cut End, with Eggman's mech frozen in the air and right next to him. He slowly reached his hand out to the sword's handle-

Movement suddenly returned to the mech's body, causing Sorun to widen his eye in surprise. Its shield struck out towards him too fast to counter, forcing his left Bringer Claw to guard him as best it could. He was still sent flying away after the hit, right towards the nearest wall. He was spinning around too harshly for him to get an accurate reading of where to Trick to to avoid hitting the wall, so he'd instinctually done the next best thing: Sorun had his left Bringer Claw hit the wall as hard as it could to halt his momentum as much as possible.

It mostly worked. The spectral fist had punched a deep crater into the metal wall, and the force of the hit had lowered the teen's speed enough that he didn't outright splatter against the crater when he hit it. He'd still hit it, though, and although he couldn't feel anything, he was fairly certain he'd heard some things in him crack.

"Right... getting stalled in place by Heavy Rain Swords doesn't last that long... I forgot..." Sorun felt himself tumble out of the freshly-made crater in the wall. He would have fallen down entirely if the cuff of his left boot didn't catch on a random piece of jagged metal jutting out of the wall, making it so that Sorun's back hit the wall and he was left hanging there, upside-down. "Why the hell does this gotta be so hard? It's such bullshit..."

His spectral arm still managed to hold onto Yamato, even if it was slowly slipping from his grasp with his arms hanging downwards. He didn't know where he'd dropped the scabbard, but seeing as it could be re-summoned, Sorun didn't care that much. He did care about the copious amounts of blood dripping down his body and over his face. About the fact his body was feeling weaker and weaker, and he was beginning to feel his senses grow duller over time. Tired, too. He was getting tired to the point he felt his one working eye fluttering open and shut repeatedly.

But then something reached Sorun's ears that caused him to open the eye widely. His own name. He heard his own name being shouted by a myriad of different of voices. It was hard to see from his vision being halved and now slightly blurred from the damage he'd sustained, but he could make it out good enough. People in the pods were shouting out his name. Everybody in the bunches of pods containing the Freedom Fighters and Chaotix. He saw some people in the bunch containing the royal family calling his name out, too, Elias among them. Others Mobians he knew spread out among the pods, and even some he didn't know, were calling out to him, too. It made Sorun groan out in an exhausted fashion.

"Gah... this is really fuckin' embarrassing. I didn't ask for a damn pep rally." He looked up at his boot and the piece of metal it was hooked on. "Doubt I'm gonna make it through this. If by some miracle I do I'm gonna deny I ever heard them doing this. I'll say I went deaf or something." His arms twitched. "Gotta save 'em all before I do that, though. Alright. Guess I better use it."

Before Sorun managed to even attempt to free himself, a loud whirring sound drowned out the names of all the Mobians calling his name. He couldn't do anything when a giant, mechanical hand grabbed him, tore him off of the wall, and then slammed him back into it while keeping a firm grip on his torso. He coughed out once, blood splashing onto the chrome hand holding him in place as he looked upwards.

"Hah... hah... it's all over now, Sorun." The Doctor certainly looked like he'd seen better days. His mustache was a frazzled mess at this point, and though the visor made it hard to see, Sorun could see massive beads of sweat beading down the sides of Eggman's face. The round, blue-tinted glasses hid his eyes, but Sorun didn't even need to see them to see how worn-out he was. "No magic sword's gonna get you out of this one. Concede. Concede right now and I won't squeeze down and leave you a crippled, agonized mess before I put you in an Egg Grape."

"... As tempting as that sounds," Sorun said, "I'm going to have to deny that request. I don't really want to."

The hand holding him squeezed down slightly. He heard bones creak.

"I'm serious, Sorun. You're done. Beaten. Look at yourself- you already look like you have one foot in the grave. Don't make this any harder than it needs to be and just give up already."

Eggman sounded desperate. It wasn't wholly clear, but it was there. In his voice. In the slightly panicky tone he had and the way his voice wavered ever-so-slightly. It was enough to give Sorun a bit more confidence.

"Yeah. I guess you did beat me." Small sparks of blue electricity began arcing over Sorun's body. "But what about the second one?"

"Huh? The second one...?"

As Eggman repeated Sorun's question in a confused manner, something appeared behind the mech suit. The Doctor had only noticed its presence by the shadow it cast on the wall, but by then it had been too late for him to properly react. Two Bringer Claws, a completely separate set from the one Sorun had, extended outwards from behind the mech suit and clamped down on the hand holding Sorun in place. It pried the hand open, freeing Sorun and allowing him to Trick forwards, right in front of the mech's helmet-head. A helmet-head Sorun proceeded to punch with his left Bringer Claw.

The mech was sent spiraling away, Eggman screaming in confusion and rage alongside with it. Sorun, instead of pursing it, teleported onto the surface of a nearby Egg Grape just as the mech managed to reorient itself in front of him.

Something else teleported alongside Sorun.

By all appearances, the thing that had Tricked right next to Sorun seemed to be... Sorun himself. Something that looked exactly like Sorun, clothes and all, save for the fact it was blue and completely transparent in the same way as the Summoned Swords and Bringer Claws were. A spectral Sorun, which even featured its own set of Bringer Claws and a spectral Yamato held in its two normal arms.

"Doppelganger. It's the power I got from the fifth Chaos Emerald," Sorun muttered out. A few more arcs of blue electricity sparked around his body, the same happening to the spectral double standing right besides him. "It can do everything I can do. Have fun with that."

Both Sorun and the Doppelganger began Tricking from pod-to-pod in different directions, both heading right towards Eggman. The mech was aiming its wrists in two directions at once, continually shifting its aim as if its pilot couldn't decide on who to fire on. It was too late to make a decision, though, as by then both of its opponents had appeared in front of it.

Eggman's first attempt was to raise his wrecking ball flail up. Twenty spectral swords falling from above and freezing him in place stopped the round, robotic suit in its tracks, opening up for Sorun and the Doppelganger to attack it. The Doppelganger began to madly slash at the mech's chest with its spectral Yamato, preoccupying it. Sorun himself had gone to the left side of the mech's body, where the shield was. He began cutting at the joint connecting the shield to the mech's left hand with his Yamato, while both his left Bringer Claw and both of the Doppelganger's Bringer Claws began pulling away at it. This proved successful, as the combination of Sorun cutting away at it and the efforts of the three Bringer Claws managed to pry the shield completely off. Sorun immediately tossed the shield down to ground level, and then Tricked away to the top of a nearby pod.

Sorun whirled towards the direction of the mech after teleporting, panting harshly as he watched it and his Doppelganger fight. Blood was now continually streaming out of his mouth and nose, his wounds were still leaking blood, and even his functioning eye was leaking blood out of it. The blood vessels had burst, too, causing Sorun's white sclera to dye completely red. By now his vision was a red, blurry mess, but he was still able to see well enough to see the fight happening in front of him.

"Well, I talk a big game, but... in actuality, Doppelganger isn't that great a power." Sorun Tricked to another pod to avoid a stray laser that had been fired out from the mech in an attempt to blast the spectral Sorun fighting it. "It's true that Doppelganger possesses all of my abilities, but it doesn't possess my durability. One or two good hits and it disappears completely, and it takes a lot for me to make that thing. It doesn't even have any autonomous movement of its own. I have to consciously control its movements just like I do with the Bringer Claws, and it's hard enough focusing on the fight here without splitting my attention completely in half between two bodies."

He coughed uncontrollably a couple of times, blood splashing out of his mouth each time. He sighed out in frustration, his grip on Yamato's handle tightening as he watched the fight.

"It's really draining to keep the Doppelganger up, too... so I need to end this quickly." His head perked up slightly. "I got an idea. C'mon, you fat bastard... swing it already..."

The Doppelganger floated back from Eggman and the mech suit, held aloft by the Bringer Claws acting as wings on its back. Summoned Swords continued to appear at its sides and fire towards the mech, shattering against its surface to no effect, but seemingly making Eggman more and more angry by the second. The mech began to swing its right arm around, the chained wrecking ball spinning 'round and 'round faster and faster. The Doppelganger, however, remained hovering in place, simply continuing to fire swords at the mech.

Eventually, the mech tossed the ball straight at the Doppelganger. The Doppelganger, on the other hand, made no move to Trick out of the way, or even dodge in any way. It only continued to float in place and fire out Summoned Swords, so when the wrecking ball came, it impacted the spectral clone directly, killing it and dispersing it into a cloud of blue energy.

Right behind the Doppelganger, hiding behind its body and wings, however, had been a portal cut open by the true Sorun and Yamato.

The wrecking ball flew right through the portal, appearing through a second one that was right next to Sorun. His left Bringer Claw instantly snapped forwards, grabbing at the chain of the wrecking ball while he himself turned towards the portal.

"Alright..." Sorun gripped Yamato's handle with his flesh and spectral hands and lifted it up. "Let's see if this works."

He sliced downwards, closing both portals simultaneously. The chain connecting the wrecking ball to the mech, due to having been crossing through the portals at the time, had been severed completely upon the two holes in space closing back together. The chain Sorun's left Bringer Claw held went slack, the ball at the end drooping downwards. He willed the spectral hand to to begin spinning it around by rotating its wrist as he turned back towards the mech, which was currently holding its severed chain up to the helmet's visor for Robotnik to see.

Without a single word, Sorun's Bringer Claw threw the severed wrecking ball towards the mech. Eggman didn't seem to have been too distracted by his lost weapon, as the jets on the mech's feet brightened in intensity and lifted the robotic suit high enough for the thrown wrecking ball to miss it entirely and embed itself in the wall it had impacted.

Moving upwards to avoid the wrecking ball Sorun had thrown also made it so that the mech couldn't dodge the new cloud of floating swords that had spawned just above it and rained down in the same breath.

Eggman released another frustrated shout when the mech was frozen mid-air again from the swords impacting it. Another set of eight swords began rotating around it at the same time, and they'd converged just as the freezing effect of the Heavy Rain Swords wore off. The mech was flipped onto its back again and lifted up into the air, and at the same time blue sparks arced over Sorun's body as another Doppelganger was summoned.

A spurt of blood splashed out from Sorun's wounds, mouth, nose, and eye upon the Doppelganger being summoned, and for a split second he'd blacked out. He managed to keep himself awake, widening his eye in effort while biting down on his own teeth. He willed the Doppelganger to Trick under the mech, where it proceeded to fire a continuous stream of Summoned Swords at the mech. Each sword that impacted the mech kept it aloft in the air, prompting the real Sorun to Trick up to to mech, just above it. Yamato was sheathed and held at his side.

"If the Summoned Swords follow the logic of the games... then this should, too..."

"Air canceling? What's that?"

"You don't know what air canceling is? The fuck kinda third-rate gamer are you?" A loud scoff exited Sorun as he leaned back on his bed, game controller lazily held in his hand as he glanced at the other human teen sitting down next to him.

"Eh, fuck off, I'm first-rate just like you," David exclaimed, turning his head to meet Sorun's glare. "Besides," he continued with a small grin, "wouldn't it be two-bit? Y'know, like those classic 8-bit and 6-bit games?"

Sorun's expression turned flat. "... Never make that joke around me again."

"Pssh, you're no fun." Waving his hand at Sorun, David turned back towards the TV monitor sitting in front of them. "Anyways, oh mighty wizard, what's this hip air canceling tech you're talking about?"

Rolling his eyes, Sorun gripped his controller with both hands and turned back towards the TV and the video game it was displaying. The game in question? Devil May Cry Four. And currently displayed on the screen was a white-haired player character donning a tri-tailed blue coat and a katana.

"Canceling is when you interrupted a character's attacks and animations. The most common way to do something like this is usually by jumping, so it's mostly referred to as jump canceling or air canceling," Sorun began. "Vergil has this thing where some of his abilities can cancel. It's useful for prematurely ending attacks mid-combo so you can set yourself up for something else. So, for example, if you're doing a multi-hit combo you can interrupt it halfway using canceling to do something else, or do the first half of that same combo over again. There's also some repositioning stuff you can pull off to zip around mid-combo without having to chase the enemies that get knocked away by the combos."

David made a confused groan as he rubbed tiredly at the side of his face. "Ain't he got the teleport for that, though?"

"Looks more fluid and stylish using canceling instead of spamming the teleport, plus this helps to extend your combos. But that's the thing with Vergil: his Tricking power can cancel."

Sorun's fingers pressed down on the controller. The game character on the screen slid backwards, hands on the katana with the screen locked onto a nearby enemy. A shambling, scarecrow-looking monster nearby Vergil. He slid the sword out and back inside of the scabbard in one quick motion as the enemy scarecrow was consumed by a Judgement Cut.

More buttons were pressed. Vergil performed a Trick and teleported a few inches into the air, his hands still on the sword. Once again a Judgement Cut was performed, not even a second after the first one. Again and again he would repeat the cycle of making a Judgement Cut, Tricking up by a few inches, and then doing it again and again. Sorun watched on with a focused look. David just looked one part amazed and one part puzzled.

"Uh... I ain't getting it, m'man..." David mumbled out, his eyes practically glued to the screen.

"Usually Vergil can only do a limited number of consecutive Judgement Cuts, but if you Trick like this it cancels it out," Sorun explained. "It also makes use of Just-Frame Judgement Cut- which is, if you release the button to charge Judgement Cut at just the right frame Vergil'll do the Judgement Cut instantly without the big animation, which shaves some time off. Does a bit more damage, too. So you use Trick to air cancel his Just-Frame Judgement Cut, and because he ends the Trick in the same position you can chain 'em together to bypass the Judgement Cut limit and pretty much just do it forever until you mess the timing up. Which I never do, so hey."

"Whoa... so it's, like... the Infinite-Frame Judgement Cut..." David said in awe, eyes widened and shining like he'd just witnessed perfection itself. It was wiped off immediately when his expression turned back to normal as his head snapped to Sorun. "Dude, how do you even figure stuff like this out?"

"It's just a mastery of the mechanics," Sorun said with a shrug, still chaining the Judgement Cuts and air cancels together on the enemy on-screen. "And it's not unique enough to give it its own name like the 'Infinite-Frame Judgement Cut'. It's... just combining air canceling with Judgement Cut. The Just-Frame version, but whatever, same difference."

"Ah-huh, yeah, sure." David nodded in an unconvinced manner, and then glanced down at his watch. "Ah, shoot, it's gettin' kinda late actually, Sor'. It's been an experience, but I gotta book it."

"Why do you always say that?" Sorun asked as he watched David hop off the bed, having paused the game. "'It's been an experience.' What does that even mean?"

Halfway through the doorway to Sorun's room already, David turned back towards him and flashed a smile. "It means a real man can only become a true man through the experiences he shares with others."

Sorun's face scrunched in confusion. "But wouldn't a real man already- that doesn't- what- that's stupid."

"Well, a man oughta be a little stupid." David ducked out of the doorway. "Gotta go, seeya later!"

"... You aped that last one from the guy in 'Yakuza Two'!" Sorun yelled after him.

"Yeah, well he was a smart guy!" David yelled back, voice trailing off due to the distance between them.

Shaking his head at the doorway, Sorun grumbled unintelligible mutterings under his breath. He turned back towards the TV, unpaused the game, and resumed playing it.

"You're finished if this actually works, Robotnik..."

Sorun was in position. The mech was vulnerable, still being juggled in the air by the Summoned Swords being shot by the Doppelganger under it. He was there, just above the mech with Yamato sheathed at his side. All that was left was to try and execute the technique he'd learned from playing those games.

He made one Judgement Cut. It hit Eggman's mech suit right in the center of its chest. At the same time it connected, he'd Tricked a few inches into the air.

There was some sensation Sorun felt doing so. Something that clicked in him, mentally. He tried performing another Judgement Cut in response to the sensation he received. Sorun was almost surprised when he saw another Judgement Cut cut deeper into the mech, but seeing him perform a second Judgement Cut after air canceling himself confirmed it.

That single confirmation was all the motivation he needed to keep going.

Sorun continued doing it. While the Doppelganger below continued to juggle the mech with Summoned Swords, Sorun would air cancel into his Judgement Cut. Over and over and over again. The result was that he would continually teleport slightly higher and higher each time, performing a Judgement Cut at each interval. It was a rapid process, rapid to the point that there was almost no conceivable break to the Judgement Cuts rending the mech's chest apart.

It was doing significant damage, too. Splinters of metal was shredded off more and more each time. At first it was enough that Sorun saw the electronics underneath the metal shell protecting it, further fueling his motivation to keep the combo going. But then, the further he went, he saw it. Rays of blinding white light that began to bleed through some of the cuts his Judgement Cuts were making on the mech's chest.

"S-stop it! Stop it this instant!" Eggman screamed out. "This isn't fair! You're just using the same move over and over!"

He'd concede to the Doctor's point. It was a really cheap strategy, and Sorun would wager that he probably looked ridiculous doing it. He didn't much care seeing as it was going to end in his win at this rate.

"Getting... harder to stay awake here..." The edges of Sorun's red, blurred vision were becoming blacker and blacker. Moving was getting to be a struggle, and Sorun's mind was beginning to swim from the exhaustion. He kept pushing on, though, going as far as to fire his own Summoned Swords into the gaps in the mech's chest made by the Judgement Cuts. "Keep concentrating... just a bit more here..."

By now the white light bleeding out of the suit's chest was overly obvious. It was almost drowned out, though, by the blue light of the dozens of swords stabbing into the mech's chest, between all the wiring and electronics. Sorun ceased the Judgement Cuts immediately after seeing this, keeping his left hand around Yamato and its scabbard while he held his spectral right hand out. "I remember that at the end of some basic combos Vergil would throw out a single Summoned Sword that would lift an enemy up in the air. Dunno if that skill translated, but... I put a bunch of them into that thing. And if I get enough of them together I can detonate them. Just like I showed Shadow once."

Sorun pressed his spectral thumb and middle finger together.

Snap!

It was a snap loud enough that it would have reverberated throughout the entire room if it weren't for the fact all the Summoned Swords sticking out of the mech's chest exploded all at once, drowning the snap out. The explosion, in addition to exposing the machine's chest ever further, lifted it straight upwards towards Sorun. The teen slammed his spectral right arm down, with the mech flying right into its path at the same time. Metal crunching and snapping was heard as the blue hand invaded the chest and rooted around towards its center.

The hand clamped around something. Sorun reacted to this by having his arm heft the giant mech suit over him, the spectral hand's fingers clamping down tightly on the item it had grabbed inside of the mech.

"JackPOT!"

The arm was swiftly swung downwards. The result of this was that the mech was thrown down towards the ground, Eggman screaming all the way. Sorun's spectral right arm had been torn out of the mech's chest in the process, a gray, shining gem held in its hand.

Sorun didn't even have the time to appreciate the prize before the arm fizzled out of existence around the same time he heard the loud THUD! of the mech hitting the ground floor. Then he fell down along with the Emerald.

Staying awake was becoming a struggle. He was momentarily blacking out more and more frequently, even as Sorun fell towards the ground. Merely breathing was becoming hard for him. He managed to recognize the approaching ground, fortunately, and scraped up enough power to perform a small Trick right before he hit. This resulted in him Tricking directly onto the ground and rolling to a stop, just faintly hearing the Chaos Emerald plink against the ground somewhere near him.

"Okay... okay, alright..." Shakily, Sorun rose up to his feet. He gazed upwards towards the fallen Egg Beater, which laid right in front of him. The jets on the bottom of its feet were off. In fact, it seemed to be completely disabled based on the fact that it wasn't even moving at all. "Tearing out the Emerald must've disabled it. Fuckin' finally." The Bringer Claw mimicking Sorun's right arm reappeared. "Alright... how's Eggman doing ...?"

He stumbled forwards. Yamato was torn free from its scabbard, which was then tossed aside. Sorun heard the wood scabbard clatter against the metal ground, but paid it no mind as he Tricked up onto the top of the mech lying flat on its back.

Sorun saw Eggman immediately. The helmet to the mech suit had been lost somewhere, revealing the Doctor all the way down to his shoulders. He was sweating intensely now. Fear and intense panic was written across his panting face, with the Doctor looking down into the mech as his hands continued to fiddle with the dead controls. Sorun briefly noted that his blue-tinted eyeglasses had been knocked away at some point, and even with his poor vision, he could make out his eyes. Beady little things. Red irises and black sclera instead of the normal white most everyone else had. They looked genuinely afraid.

Eventually, Eggman froze and looked up at the figure standing over him. He shrunk backwards, ginger mustache withering at the sight and his breath escaping him when he saw Sorun. Clothes torn, shredded, and drenched in blood to the point it was mostly dyed red. A missing right arm, replaced with a blue, spectral replica holding a katana. A paler-than-usual face streaked in blood, with black hair matted in blood sticking to it. An obliterated right eye with a metal shard sticking out from the eye socket, resembling a horn. A functioning left eye, completely bloodshot and hatefully looking down at Dr. Robotnik.

It looked like a demon was staring him down.

"You have... really freaky eyes..."

They were the only words Sorun bothered uttering before he held the Yamato up in preparation of chopping Eggman's head off.

Eggman shrieked, genuinely shrieked in fright, and hit a button. The mech underneath Sorun rumbled, enough that the exhausted teen lost his balance and fell off completely. The upper half of the mech's round torso separated completely, revealing a set of jets on its underside keeping the upper half Eggman was sitting in afloat. It floated upwards, with Eggman himself pulling upwards on a throttle stick so tightly it threatened to snap out of the control console he was using.

The floating chair he was in rattled when Sorun Tricked onto it. He maintained that baleful glare at Eggman with his one eye, the left hand holding onto the edge of the escape chair while the right one still held Yamato. He actually slashed at the Doctor in an attempt to cut him. He'd missed. It'd been by mere millimeters, the tip of the sword just missing Robotnik's neck, but it got the point across. Eggman responding by hitting another button as the chair floated higher and higher.

Beep!

It was a small noise, but just loud enough for Sorun to hear. And he had enough lucidity to understand just what it meant. He looked downwards, at what remained of the mech where he'd heard the beep originate from, and then glanced back up at Eggman. He had the gall to actually grin at the teen, even if that grin was shaky and still fear-filled, but the absolute hatred Sorun felt at seeing that smirk was overpowered by his sense of self-preservation.

So he Tricked. He teleported far away from the chair. Due to his waning power he wasn't able to go far, so when the remains of the mech suit exploded, Sorun, once again, was sent barreling upwards. He didn't make a single sound when his body hit an Egg Grape, and continued to remain silent as he slid off of it. He showed signs of consciousness when his right spectral hand flashed out and stabbed Yamato into the pod directly below the one he hit that Sorun fell past, the hand keeping a grip on the sword's handle to keep Sorun aloft above the ground. He breathed in deeply, shaking his head to keep himself awake as he craned his head backwards.

The mech suit itself was completely gone. Blown up and little more than an unrecognizable hunk of metal. Eggman was still in the floating chair that had separated from the mech's main body, flying towards a hatch in the wall nearby that had opened up. Their eyes met briefly, though Eggman didn't even say a single word. Sorun couldn't even place the expression on his face. They'd just simply looked at each other for a single second before Eggman flew the floating chair through the hatch. It closed behind him, and that was that. He was gone.

Sorun sighed. He'd wanted to kill him. Ironically, for him, at least, it was a secondary objective compared to saving everybody here and getting them out, but it still would have been nice to cross him out while he was at it. Or at least take his nephew's life as a consolation prize.

Oh, well. At least he still had enough energy to move around for a bit longer. He could still save everybody. He wasn't so sure about himself.

"What an ordeal..." Sorun muttered out, turning back to the pod and the sword stabbed into it. "Be a Freedom Fighter, they said... it'll be fun, they said..." he continued muttering as he placed his left hand on the pod. He pushed slightly, and before he knew it the sword was pulled free, and he was sent falling backwards.

Sorun gazed up at all the Egg Grapes holding every citizen of what was once Knothole as he fell down. It was with great effort he channeled Chaos energy into Yamato, the silver blade of the katana glowing blue. He slashed out with the blade as he fell, over and over. Blue lines of energy appeared over every single Egg Grape, only for the lines to then fade to reveal a clean seam running through the pods.

And then, the pods all fell apart from the lines cutting through them. Just like that, all the captive Mobians were freed and began dropping to the ground along with Sorun. Unlike them, though, he couldn't survive a fall like that, especially in his current position, so he was forced to Trick again right before he hit the floor.

He stumbled a bit as a result of the Trick. A blue light reached his peripheral once he caught his footing. Sorun looked towards it, seeing his spectral double standing right besides him. "Go and get Nicole's handheld and the Chaos Emerald, would you?" Sorun asked, voice low and exhausted. "I gotta finish up here."

The sound of the shards from the pods he cut apart clinking loudly against the ground behind him reached Sorun's ears, followed by another noise. Cheering. Sounds of happiness. He turned around to see everybody, hundreds of Mobians, all standing behind him. Most were looking around for their friends or hugging loved ones and family members. Most of them just looked happy to be out of those pods. Sorun had found himself glancing upwards to make sure he'd cut apart all the pods, and when he was satisfied at seeing them all cut apart, he glanced back down.

There was one group that didn't look to be as jubilant as the rest of the town. Sorun had the misfortune of looking down directly at them. The Freedom Fighters were all staring directly at him, and they looked anything but happy. His vision was too compromised to tell how they looked exactly, and he'd turned away too quickly to figure it out. He didn't want to see their faces. He didn't have time to think on it. He just wanted to finish this.

Something dropped down in front of him. Sorun blinked once in surprise, seeing the Doppelganger holding the gray Chaos Emerald in its left hand and Nicole's handheld body in its right. His left Bringer Claw manifested and grabbed the Emerald, while Sorun's real left hand gripped Nicole's handheld. The Doppelganger disappeared as a result, though Sorun paid this no mind as he looked down at the handheld's screen display.

A set of coordinates was being displayed on the handheld's green screen. There was no other sign of life or Nicole. Just the set of numbers staring Sorun in the face. He breathed out, and then lowered the handheld to his side.

"Guess she managed to pull it off. Good on you, Nicole. Knew you could do it." His blue fingers ran over the blood-soaked handle as the sword was risen up. "All I need to do is open a portal up here... that's all I need..."

Blue power, faint and barely even visible, gathered around the edge of the katana. Sorun attempted to cut a hole in space with it. The sword's tip in front of Sorun, seemingly struggling against an invisible force as the spectral arm holding the katana shook. Before he could do anything further an uncontrollable fit of coughs wracked Sorun's body. The sword was lowered as he bent forwards, coughing more and more blood onto the ground in front of him. His vision darkened more.

"Sorun..."

He just barely managed to feel a hand land on his left shoulder. He knew it was Sally right away from the brown fur on the hand and the voice. He turned his head to her, stopping in surprise when he saw her face. There was such a mixture of conflicting emotions on her face that he couldn't quite pick out a single one. She just looked... sad. So downcast to the point Sorun felt bad just looking at her. There was even the threat of tears showing up from the way her eyes were glistening. "Sorun, you... you need to stop moving-"

"I still have one thing I must do," Sorun denied. "I'll stop after."

She didn't seem to like his answer. The grip on his shoulder tightened, as she began shaking. "No, Sorun, you- you can't keep going. Not with those wounds..." Sally shook her head when Sorun didn't react to her. "Sorun, just please-"

"Do you... have a better alternative for getting everyone out from here...?" Sorun slowly asked, still out of breath. When Sally froze and continued looking at him, he said, "Robotnik and his robots are... they're all still out there. We've time, but... not much." He looked down at Yamato. "You all could... probably fight your way out, but there'd be casualties with the... the hundreds of non-fighters back there. Civilians. Children. I can get us all out instantly with this."

"But-!"

Sorun lifted his bloodied left index finger and held it above Sally's lips. "I don't want to hear it." He stabbed Yamato into the air in front of him after brushing Sally's hand off. "Just help me by leading everyone through the portal once I open it."

He didn't wait to hear her response. His focus was solely on the Yamato, and opening a portal wide enough for hundreds of people to get through. Tired after tired breath rattled out of him as he poured more power into the blade, power that was only making his condition even worse the further he went. He saw a blue seam appear in front of him, a hole being torn open through the sword's power, but it wasn't enough.

"Come on... just a bit more..." He couldn't even feel his extremities anymore. He heard his own heartbeat growing fainter by the second. But Sorun pressed on, putting his all into opening this one single portal as he intensely focused on the coordinates he saw written on the handheld. "Just one... more... thing..."

With a final push, Sorun tore the sword through the air in front of him. As a result, a wide portal was opened up. The biggest Sorun had ever opened- it was almost as wide as the room itself that they were all in. A portal leading to that place Nicole had described to him.

"... It's your new home." Sorun glanced back at Sally, who was staring wide-eyed at the portal. He held Yamato in front of her eyes, which somehow widened even further when she saw the silver blade crumbling and disintegrating away. "I can't keep it up forever," he said. "I'm really... counting on you here, Sally..."

"... Right." To her credit, she'd steeled herself quickly enough. She cast one last, worried glance at Sorun before she'd turned to the others and began shouting out orders to them. Sorun would have laughed if he had the energy. As it was he was barely standing on his feet.

"She can handle getting everyone through." Sorun turned towards the portal. "Guess I get to see with my own eyes what Nicole whipped up for everybody..."

If somebody told Sorun that there was an entire city's worth of nanites Eggman was just sitting on the entire time and doing nothing with... well, he probably would have believed them, because he'd seen crazier in this world. Far be it from him to think a giant pool of microscopic machines capable of mimicking any form of matter whose function was virtually limitless would be useful for anything. But it was there. He never did anything with it for some reason. But it was there.

Sorun didn't know the details. Nicole had been scarce with them due to time constraints. It was during this big adventure the Freedom Fighters had, before he showed up and before the incident with Eggman getting all the Chaos Emeralds. Something something nanite city, something something an AI called A.D.A.M. that was dead now. Whatever happened happened, and now there was an entire city of nanites in the middle of Northamer just... sitting there. Alive and fully functional, but without anything operating it. Inert, basically. And while Eggman still technically had control of it, he'd never utilized it in any fashion.

Maybe he just didn't want to mess around with nanites anymore. From what he got from Nicole that A.D.A.M. AI was a creation of his that went rogue, and things had went extraordinarily bad for both the Freedom Fighters and Eggman. Sorun couldn't say he blamed him if that was true.

Well... the prospect of a nanite city had interested Nicole for whatever reason. So she'd divulged to Sorun right before he'd went to go save everybody from Eggman that she'd been working on various software and firmware programs all this time so she could basically upload herself into the city to fully take control of all the nanites. He didn't know the exact details when it came to the technical side of it. Just that it was incredibly complex, even for somebody of her caliber. But she'd told him she was confident she could do it. She just needed time, which she'd gotten, and then a way into the Egg Network so she could cut through it via the digital world, go to the nanite city, and then cut it off from the network so she could have it to herself. Sorun couldn't really understand past that.

It was meant to be a surprise, and she'd apparently been planning on letting Sorun in on it early so he could help her get into the network without anyone knowing, though Knothole being bombed out had tossed that plan out the window. She'd told him she'd simply wanted to give all the Mobians a new home, since Knothole was kind of cramped as it was and didn't really compare to the home they all used to have. She'd told him the Kingdom of Acorn used to have a proper city called Mobotropolis, back before Robotnik - the first one - did his coup, took it over, and renamed it Robotropolis. But then that city had been destroyed entirely due to circumstances Sorun wasn't clear on. Nicole saw the nanite city nobody was using (something Sorun could still hardly believe) and saw an opportunity to give the Mobians back a proper city instead of the makeshift one in Knothole.

She was nice like that.

Unfortunately the bombing curbed her scheme, so she'd thought up a new plan on the spot: Sorun would bring them to New Megaopolis, where he'd then plug her into an accessway so she could get into the Egg Network. She'd work on the nanite city and fix things up so that everybody would have a home to go to once Sorun rescued everybody, since Knothole was a smoldering crater now and officially a no-go. Sorun, quite simply, would free everybody and then use the Yamato to make a portal to take everybody there. Everybody saved, nanite city and new home acquired, all would be well.

Of course it hadn't gone quite that simply; Sorun was fairly certain him getting maimed fighting Eggman in a mech suit wasn't part of her plan, but the plan itself called for a lot of improvisation. He didn't care much since he was dying anyways, and it wasn't like he could feel it. And the important part was that he got everybody out of there and to the city.

And what a city it was. Maybe not a "city" city in terms of size, more like a large town than anything, but still big enough to fit the hundreds and hundreds of residents in it with room to spare. Sorun couldn't see much since he hadn't gone much further than just outside the portal leading into the city. He'd transported everybody into what looked like a small park that was in the city Nicole made, near a small lake. Nearby he saw more structures: paved sidewalks, lightposts, off-white huts near the size of small houses nestled between trees in neat rows, she'd even thrown in some fancy archways. Fake, all of it. Everything from the houses to the trees were made of nanites. But it looked real and smelled real, and he wagered it probably felt real. Either way she'd actually done it. Nicole had made a whole city.

Everybody who Sorun had gotten through the portal (more he'd just made the portal while Sally and the rest of the Freedom Fighters lead everyone through) was going around and marveling at the city, everybody in various states of disbelief and wonder. Sorun was more or less standing on his lonesome, having finished looking around. Still missing body parts. Still on the verge of blacking out. Not bleeding as much, which was... probably a bad sign.

"Nicole really goes all-out on her surprises, huh? Man... never heard of anybody making a whole city as a gift before. This world's wild." He glanced downwards at the left Bringer Claw holding the gray Emerald, the gem now stained with his own blood. He'd bent down to gently lay Nicole's handheld down on the ground, and then reached up to grab the bloodied Emerald as the Bringer Claw disappeared. "Probably a bad idea to do this while I'm bleeding out here... eh, fuck it."

He gripped the gray gem with his real and spectral hands. Sparks of energy arced around his arms, the Emerald was converted to pure

Chaos energy that was absorbed into his body through his arms, and that was that. He, of course, hadn't felt a thing. He did feel magnitudes more tired, however, if that was even possible. He wasn't even able to keep up the Bringer Claw mimicking his right arm anymore, so that had disappeared. But otherwise there was no change with him.

"Well... so much for that..."

"Sorun...?"

He looked up at the voice that called his name. All the blue invading his red-tinted vision and the voice immediately identified the speaker as Sonic. He was standing right in front of Sorun and looked even worse off than Sally had when she'd approached him by a wide margin. A grief-stricken look was set on his face as he looked at the Earthling, eyes wide with tears freely falling from them. More than that, he looked scared.

It was almost enough to make Sorun laugh. He'd never seen Sonic scared before. At the same time, he wasn't too surprised it took somebody falling apart and near-death like Sorun was right now to draw that kind of expression out of him. It was just like Sonic.

"Hi, Sonic..." Sorun quietly greeted. He glanced down at his torso, at the metal shards and shrapnel still sticking into him, and looked back up at the crying hedgehog. "It seems I... overdid it a little bit..."

"S-Sorun, I don't- you- I don't know w-what I'm supposed..." Sonic took a step forwards. He seemed to be at a loss for words, tears still streaming from his eyes. "I-I-I'm so sorry I couldn't- I should've- you need a doctor-"

His distressed, sorrowful ramblings were cut off completely when Sorun poked Sonic's forehead with a bloodied finger.

"I promised everything would be okay, didn't I?" Sorun asked, voice barely above a whisper.

A small hiccup left Sonic as he attempted to choke back his tears. "Th-this isn't okay. You're not okay..."

Sorun couldn't help it. He'd actually smiled at Sonic out of sheer bemusement. "You're seriously crying... over a loser like me...?" He began to tilt backwards. His finger left Sonic's forehead, leaving behind a single string of thick blood that broke and fell against Sonic's face. "You really are lame..."

That was as far as he could go. Sorun collapsed onto his back right after finishing speaking. He faintly heard panicked voices calling after him, but by then he'd closed his eye completely. He lost consciousness the moment everything went black.

A/N- The whole "I've come to retrieve my friends" line sounds cool until you realize Sorun's just straight-ripping Vergil's lines from the games since emulating his favorite video game character is one of the only ways he can cope living in this really wacky nightmare world.

Took us like 600k words to get here, but we finally got the first boss fight in the story. So yay for that.

Chapter 45

Recursion Error

Episode 45- With friends like these

Beep.

Beep.

Beep.

"God, this is the most annoying sound to wake up to..."

That was the first thought that came to Sorun when he woke up to a white-tiled ceiling right above him. Considering where he'd been for so long in his recent life, it looked completely different from anything else he'd seen on Mobius. Like a modern piece of architecture on Earth. It was enough to make him believe maybe this whole adventure actually was a fever dream and he just woke up from a coma.

And then he discovered his right eye was blind, recent memories caught up to him, and he realized that he was probably in a hospital Nicole had made in the nanite city. And that he survived. Somehow that latter fact was more surprising to him than the former.

"Holy shit, how did I actually pull through that?" From what he remembered he'd been in rough shape. Missing arm, missing eye, body torn by shrapnel, massive blood loss, internal injuries, he didn't even want to think about what kind of hell overusing his powers like that wreaked on his body, not even mentioning absorbing the sixth Chaos Emerald... he'd expected to die right then and there. But he was still here.

"Yeah, of fucking course it wouldn't be that easy. Gotta fulfill this big ol' role of mine, right, Aurora?" Sorun rolled his remaining left eye and moved his head to the right. He got a bit of a better view of the room he was in. It really did just look like a modern hospital room, from the clean smell to the bright lights and white-tiled walls. There was even a window letting in a large amount of bright sunlight, which, in conjunction with the brightness surrounding him, had made Sorun wince in displeasure.

His moved his head a bit further, this time downwards. His upper body was covered by a white sheet, but he could see his left arm over it. His right one was... simply missing. He saw white bandages tightly wrapped around the socket where his right shoulder used to be, but, as expected, everything below that was gone.

"I'm afraid it's been... nine years... pfft, if only," Sorun thought. "Sheesh... This is gonna be annoying as hell to get used to. Gimme the fake one."

His right Bringer Claw materialized, reshaped and resized to fit over the wound to mimic the lost right arm. He held the spectral, blue hand up to his face, flexed the clawed fingers, and, after nodded in satisfaction, looked down at the sheets. "It's no Devil Bringer, but it'll do. Alright, let's see the damage..."

Sorun's spectral limb tore the blanket off of his body. They'd left him with his pants, thankfully, but that was all they left him with. The rest of his pale body was bare, with multiple white bandages wrapped around his torso. Some were around his head, too, now that he felt around. Over where his lost eye was.

And tubes, too. Tubes sticking out of his nose, some stuck to his body and others taped on. Various sensors and nodes and other such implements connecting him to various machines off to the side; a heart monitor and an IV drip were the only pieces of equipment he recognized out of the bunch. An annoyed hum left him, and he proceeded to disconnect all of the tubes from his body, and then extended his spectral arm to unplug the heart monitor when it started to let out a singular, drawn-out beep.

"Alright." He sat up, spun around, and stepped barefoot onto the floor. "Let's- oh, oh whoa..."

Sorun had only been able to stand up on his feet for a few moments before he listed off to the side, and then was forced to hold onto the metal frame of the hospital bed for support. The problem wasn't physical pain- though he didn't doubt there was probably something wrong with him that should have been causing him pain if it weren't for the fact he couldn't feel it. He just felt weak. Physically weak and exhausted, to the point he couldn't stand on his own for long without needing support.

"That's gonna be even more annoying than the missing arm and eye," Sorun thought to himself. "Guess I'm not doing so well after all. Damn. Wonder if- the hell...?"

There was something at the end of his bed. A lot of something, actually. So much something that it was all practically spilling out onto the floor. Balloons with things like "Get Well Soon!" written on them and flowers and baskets full of all sorts of odds and ends. Cards and candies and things like that. So much that it almost encompassed all of Sorun's vision.

"W-wow... did... everybody seriously leave all this for- oh shit, is that chocolate? I haven't had that in forever."

"Huh. This one's from those kids that threw that rock at me way back... go figure."

So apparently people were a little grateful he'd saved all of Knothole from getting killed off and turned into fuel. It was to be expected, he supposed- he knew that Mobians were generally and overly nice, but the amount of effort they went towards getting him all this stuff seemed... excessive. It wasn't even an exaggeration to say he had quite literally hundreds of get-well cards that had been written for him, not to mention the gifts. Which were... mostly candies, baked goods, and flowers. Actually that's all it was, in addition to the balloons and the baskets holding it all. But it was still a lot.

It was... touching, to an extreme degree. Uncomfortably touching. He'd been in a shocked stupor for quite a while when he realized what all of this was. He was still somewhat shocked, even after having gone through some of the cards that had all been hand-written for him. Most of them were the same- bunches of heartfelt thank-yous and wishes of good health. He could tell a lot of them were written by children from the awful handwriting, bad grammar, and how they'd all described him looking "super cool" fighting Eggman.

He damn well better have looked super cool seeing as he lost a limb and an eye in that fight.

There were cards written by older people, though. Adults and teenagers. Some strangers, some he knew. Acquaintances of his like Honey, Mina, Sonic's parents and uncle. Elias. Even Elias' wife and mother.

Wasn't much to say about the cards themselves. More of the same when compared to the rest. The only one that stood out to him was Mina and how she said she was going to write a song in his honor. He supposed he should have felt flattered at the prospect, and admittedly it did sound neat. He hoped it'd sound good if she actually did go through with it. He doubted he'd be around long enough to hear it.

Some cards from all his friends, of course, though they were all oddly brief when compared to all the other cards. Sorun supposed that just meant they wanted to say their words personally. It was still nice of them.

And then the door had to go and open when Sorun was in the middle of biting down on a chocolate bar.

The person that walked through the door was, by all appearances, a duck. A yellow duck Mobian man with an eyepatch. Sorun somewhat recalled seeing him once, when he'd had to go to that infirmary in Knothole once. He was fairly certain he was a doctor, which would support the white scrubs and the weird circular dish thing doctors wore on their foreheads that he had on. He'd only made it a few steps into the room before he'd looked up from the chart he was looking at and froze when he saw Sorun. Sorun himself was completely frozen as well, still holding the chocolate bar.

"... Yo."

"Just what do you think you're doing of bed?"

"..." Sorun took another bite of the chocolate bar.

The duck responded by deeply sighing and rubbing at his forehead in a frustrated manner.

"Well, at least he doesn't sound like Donald and just sounds like a normal man. Was really worried about that." Sorun put down the rest of the chocolate before speaking out to the duck doctor. "Woke up, wanted to stretch my legs."

"You..." The duck squeezed down on the chart hard enough that Sorun was fairly certain he saw cracks appear. "This is why I hate treating people like you. What, exactly what, possessed you to get out of bed and disconnect everything I had connected to you?" he demanded. "Paint me the picture, tell me what on Mobius you think you're doing."

"Ah, c'mon, Donald, I feel fine," Sorun said, turning around and leaning against the metal bed frame.

"Quack."

"... Hm?"

"Quack. It's my name. I'm Dr. Quack. And you shouldn't be feeling alright after what you went through."

"... These fucking names." Sorun rolled his eye up at the ceiling and let it fall back on Quack. He almost would have preferred Donald over that name. "So I lost an arm and an eye, big whoop, I'm feeling fine now," Sorun claimed. "Feelin' a bit weak, but otherwise good."

" No , you're not good. I had you hooked up to all that stuff because you're not good!" Quack shouted out. "I was there along with everybody else, so I know exactly what you went through. And I'm telling you right now that you shouldn't be walking around like that." He deeply sighed and leaned a hand against a nearby counter. "I really don't see how you're even moving. You're seriously not in any pain?"

Sorun shrugged. "Always had a high pain tolerance."

"Yeah, Sonic said something similar. Guess it goes to explain how you managed to keep fighting through all that damage. You're freakishly tough for a Ov- ahem, human."

The Earthling huffed a breath through his nose and looked to the side. Wasn't the most eloquent explanation, but it'd have to do. "So," he said, focusing back on the Duck, "what's my damage?"

"Other than the obvious?" Quack looked towards his chart. "Multiple fractures, lacerations, external contusions, organ contusions, severe blood loss due to hemmorhage..." He sighed and glanced back up at Sorun. "You really shouldn't be out of bed and moving around, Sorun. It's bad enough you did that thing with the Chaos Emerald right after that fight... what were you even thinking, kid?"

"I was banking on getting a regeneration power." Sorun's eye flicked down to his spectral arm. "Didn't quite pan out." What he did end up getting was still nice and all, but he would have preferred having depth perception.

"Obviously," Quack drawled. "We almost lost you, you know. I kept it vague when the Freedom Fighters kept asking so they wouldn't worry so much, but you came really close to dying on us."

"..." Sorun looked back up at Quack. "How close?"

"Blood loss is almost what got you," he answered. "Nicole managed to use her nanites to make us all the medical equipment we needed along with the hospital, but she couldn't make human blood to transplant into you." He made a light chuckle and looked to the side. "Sonic... went as far as to run all the way down to Station Square. From what I heard he raided a blood bank and grabbed as many bags as he could before coming back here. Rumor has it Sally had to smooth things over with their president and explain it was an emergency, but that's all I know about it."

Sorun stiffened up a bit and made a low sigh. First at the mention of Nicole and how he wasn't looking forwards to her reaction to his state, and secondly to what Sonic did. "He went that far just for me?" he thought. "Station Square's on a whole other continent. If I was dying and he went back and forth just like that... just how fast was he running for my sake?"

"There were still some... complications," Quack continued. "We didn't know what your blood type was, so we had to take a bit to do a test to confirm that. You're O negative, by the way," he added. "Still, even with the right blood type your body didn't take too well to the donor blood."

A small hum came from Sorun. "Well... I'm not exactly local. Can't say I'm too surprised."

"That's the conclusion I came to as well. I did some bloodwork analysis comparing your blood with the Station Square blood Sonic brought back in case there was anything extra I needed to know while treating you. You're quite a bit different from them on the inside, interestingly enough."

Not surprising to Sorun. Different zone, different era of time with a separation of thousands of years, lack of a natural link to the Chaos Force, too many variables such as those to consider. He'd already figured out on his own he may as well have been a completely different species entirely compared to Station Square humans. Hearing it was hard-confirmed by science though hit a bit harder than Sorun thought it would have.

"So what ended up happening?" he finally asked.

"Well, without being able to transfuse any blood into you, we had to do the next best thing and perform an autologous blood transfusion to keep you stable."

Sorun nodded. "Oh, that's..." he paused and snapped his fingers while he thought, then perked his head up when he remembered what he was thinking of. "It's when you recycle loss blood back into a bleeding patient so they don't bleed out, right?"

"Yes, that's correct," Dr. Quack said, looking a bit impressed. "I'm honestly quite surprised you knew what that was."

"My mom was a doctor."

"Ah. That would explain it."

Sorun didn't say anything further. He was too focused on the fact he had come close to biting it after all. He felt he should have been shocked by this news, disheartened to some extent. He didn't really feel much of anything, though. If anything, the only thing he did feel was pleasantly surprised at knowing he'd made it after all.

"Guess finally committing to this whole thing with the Emeralds really shocked the idea of dying out of me," Sorun morosely thought. "Knew I was gonna die from the start anyways no matter how this turned out. Even now I got six out of seven Chaos Emeralds. One more and that's it, I'm done. How much more time am I even looking at here? Hell's the point of saving my life when I'm gonna die later on anyways? Just so I have another shot at killing Eggman when I get that last Emerald?"

"- would really appreciate it."

"Huh?" Blinking his eye, Sorun focused back on the doctor. "S-sorry, man, I spaced out a bit. What were you saying?"

"I was saying I would really appreciate it if you got back in bed, Sorun," Dr. Quack said. "I'm not too worried about you if you're able to move around on your own, but you're not fully healed yet and if you overdo it you're just gonna exacerbate your wounds and make your recovery period that much longer."

Solid reasoning. Sorun still didn't like the idea of sitting in a hospital for an extended period. He liked angry doctors even less, though. "Ugh... I'll sit down, happy?"

"I will be once you actually do it."

Sorun scoffed, but still followed the doctor's orders and ambled back to the bed. Even he would admit he was probably more jacked up on the inside than he looked on the outside, even if he couldn't feel it. Not feeling injuries didn't mean they weren't there, and not being able to feel pain wouldn't mean much if he injured his body to a point it couldn't move period. He had that much sense with his extremely limited knowledge of medicine. So, much to his chagrin, he sat down on the bed, though refrained from lying down.

"So," Sorun said, glancing to the side as Quack walked closer to Sorun, "doctor. Out of curiosity... you saw how I lost mine, so how'd you lose yours?" he asked, pointing to the bandge covering his empty eye socket.

"Got hit by a landmine while treating patients on the battlefield."

"Jesus..." Sorun cleared his throat and glanced away. "A-ah, I... didn't mean-"

"Hah! Don't sweat it, kid. Not like it's a secret or anything to how I lost the eye," he said. "Speaking of which, concerning your own lost eye. And limb."

"Yeah?"

"There were some talks of fitting you with some cybernetic prosthetics, and especially now that we have the tools-"

"Eh, yeah, 'bout that." Sorun held up his spectral right arm for the doctor to see, and then shook it slightly. "As much as I've always wanted a cool robot arm, I think I'm just gonna stick with the cool ghost arm. I'm already kinda used to it."

"And your eye?" the duck asked.

Sorun sighed a bit. It wasn't like he didn't want to fulfill one of his lifelong dreams of being a cyborg, but he also didn't want to waste anybody's time installing that stuff into him and having to waste time getting used to new, artificial pieces of his body when he was dying soon anyways. Waste of effort. Waste of resources. He just wanted to spend what little time he had left as he was without anything like that getting in the way.

"I'll learn to live with it. Just gimme an eyepatch or something," Sorun said. "Preferably one with a snake on it."

"... Excuse me?"

"Forget it, it's a stupid thing, just get me a regular eyepatch," Sorun said with a wave of his hand. "Other than that, how long do you expect me to stay in this bed?"

Dr. Quack made a hum. "You had some pretty bad muscle sprains and tearing in addition to everything else. That along with the fractures, well... you already told me you have a hard time standing up. Sounds to me like your body's still recovering, which is good, but it's not finished yet. I'd like to give it some more weeks at the least.

I'd give it a month or two, but I know you Freedom Fighters can't stand to sit still that long, so we'll do what we can. Check up on you regularly and let you go when you seem good."

Not the news he wanted to hear. Wasn't much to do about it, he supposed. All the more reason he would have liked that regeneration ability, or some approximation of that.

"Alright..." Sorun looked to the side, away from the Mobian. "And... how is everyone else doing?"

The doctor tapped on the chart he was holding, humming again. "I don't really think I'm the best person to ask on how the general mood of the populace is doing. I'm a doctor, not a politician or something like that. Generally speaking?" He shrugged. "I think everybody was a bit shaken up by everything that happened, from losing Knothole to... everything else. Lasted for a couple days, but I think everybody's adjusting to living here."

"Couple days?" Sorun repeated. "How long have I been out?"

"About a week," Quack answered, causing Sorun to nod. "Lot of talk about you. You... well, I don't even know what to call that fight you had with Robotnik. I think you actually went and scared some folk."

Sorun rose an eyebrow. "Scared?"

"Maybe that's not the right word," he said with a shake of his head. "I don't know. Having your arm torn off and acting like it never happened, well... that's not exactly normal. In fact I'd go as far as to say that's actually a sign of some underlying problem. You're... absolutely sure there's no underlying problem or something along those lines I should be aware of?"

"What do want me to do? Lie and I say I was born with congenital analgesia or something like that?" Sorun asked. "I was focusing less on the fact I was missing an arm and more on the fact you all were gonna die if I didn't do anything. Mix that in with the pain tolerance and the adrenaline rush I was probably in during the time and, well, you get the idea."

The doctor's bill frown a bit. He tapped his clipboard once, and then made a small, accepting hum. "I didn't mean anything by it, Sorun. I was just asking. I'm sure you know us physicians like to do that." The Mobian doctor paused to think over his words. "I suppose it wouldn't be too much of a stretch to say everybody was just surprised by what you did. Everybody already knew of you, of course, word of everything you'd been doing with the Freedom Fighters got around over the months, but... I'm not sure. Everybody was touched by what you did, I guess I could say." He adjusted the circular dish on his forehead. "Ah, but I can't really speak for everybody. And, well..." He nodded his head to all the baskets and balloons at the end of the bed. "I think all that says enough. Everybody's really grateful for what you did, me and my own family included. I know all your friends in particular came here to visit you every single day you were under." He glanced over at a wall clock. "Speaking of which, your AI friend is usually due to show up sometime this hour. She checks on you regularly."

"Oh. Nicole?" An uneasy hum left Sorun. "Doc, I'm not really mentally prepared to handle her right now. Can you do me a favor and tell anybody I'm still unconscious if they ask? Just for, like, a day?"

The doctor's answer was immediate. "Yeah, no, I'm not doing that."

"... Fair enough," Sorun sighed out. "Ugh, man... was there anything else?"

"Not as far as I can see." The duck Mobian stepped even closer to Sorun, and even went as far as to lay a feathered hand on his shoulder. Sorun glanced up at his face to see a smile stretching along his bill. "Chin up, kiddo. You saved the day and all your friends are there for you. Take it easy and relax."

"Yeah, I know," Sorun said, brushing the hand off his shoulder. "How much is this hospital stay gonna cost me, anyway? I'm kind of broke on account of all my worldly possessions got blown away along with Knothole." He was pretty sure he'd left that gum wrapper from Earth he'd inadvertently brought to Mobius back at Sonic's house, too. So it was likely burned to smithereens like everything else was. Another thing to hate Eggman for. That was his favorite good luck charm.

Dr. Quack blinked in confusion. "What are you talking about?"

"... Don't I owe you something for treating me?"

"Why... why would we charge for healthcare?"

"Wow, you guys are progressive," Sorun gasped out, and then proceeded to scoot further down the bed. "Gimme a second, you might need this bed more than I do once I tell you how bad the healthcare system back in my world was."

Ironically getting horribly crippled worked out pretty well for Sorun.

As far as the doctors were concerned his physical weakness was a result of the injuries he'd sustained fighting Eggman and his mech suit. And, admittedly, a large part of that probably were those injuries. But Sorun alone knew that him absorbing the sixth Chaos Emerald likely also contributed to his weakness.

It was something he'd been afraid of happening. Growing physically weak as a result of absorbing Emeralds. He technically could move around on his own, but it wasn't without great difficulty. Whether that would remain true or if he would get most of the mobility he used to have back when his injuries healed up was something Sorun didn't know, though he chose to be optimistic on the subject. On the other hand, he'd already been suffering some kind of nervous damage from the fifth one, along with the damage all the others wreaked on his body to shorten his lifespan more and more.

But... there wasn't anything to do about it. What was done was done, and Sorun already foresaw something like this happening anyways. So he'd continue to lie, make the doctors think his weakness was from the injuries and say he'd just toughed through the nonexistent pain during the fight. If anything, it gave him a good excuse to fall back on in case he ever started bleeding or showed other negative signs as a result of the damage the Emeralds were inflicting on him.

That was probably the only good news out of all this. That and he'd successfully saved everybody's lives and gave them a new home with Nicole's help. What he wasn't looking forwards to now was actually confronting everybody over it. And Nicole.

He didn't know what the hell he was going to do with her. He was still debating on pretending on still being unconscious despite Dr. Quack saying he wouldn't lie for him just so he could avoid her entirely.

"Why the hell did I say all that embarrassing stuff during the fight with Eggman...?" Sorun wondered to himself. He was still sitting on the edge of his hospital bed, staring out towards the window at the small city beyond it. "Christ, I even did the stupid Dante EX taunt with the heart and the- man, fuck." He rubbed a hand over his face. "Ugh, Sonic'll never let me live it down. Now what am I supposed to say to Nicole when she gets here?"

"... Yeah, I got nothing."

There was a knock on the door to his room.

"Aw, damn." Sorun's head snapped towards the closed door. He bit his lower lip out of anxiety and felt his mind began to race. "Maybe if I'm quick I can get back in bed and pretend I'm still aslee-"

The door handle began to turn.

"Aw, damn."

The door opened.

"Damn, damn, damn..."

It was Nicole on the other side.

"I don't even know what I'm supposed to say here."

In his defense, he'd tried on thinking up some game plan on how he was supposed to approach this conversation so he'd be able to work his way through it with relatively little emotional duress. He'd failed in every sense of the word in that Sorun had come up with nothing, but he'd tried.

The only thing he could think to do was look over at her for a couple of seconds and then look back towards the window without a single word.

She didn't say anything either. What she did do was cross over to the other side of the hospital room and sit down on the bed next to him, still completely silent. It felt like whole minutes passed with them just sitting there, with Sorun kicking his legs back and forth out of the angst of the situation, before he finally took in a big inhale and turned towards the lynx.

"So, I see you're walking around on your own," he said, sounding completely ordinary as if it was a normal conversation he was trying to start. "Is there some kind of new development I missed while I was out, orrrr is it somethin' else?"

Nicole didn't even look towards him. In fact her head was dipped downwards a bit so that her black hair was shielding her eyes.

"..." Sorun looked back towards the window. "It's nice weather out."

"Is that truly all you have to say?"

"I mean, pretty much. Yeah." Sorun turned back towards her, sighing a bit. "You okay?"

She finally decided to look at him. She had that upset look on her face again, and Sorun couldn't decide if it was the angry kind of upset or just general sadness upset. All he could figure was that whatever she was upset about it was directed right at him from the way she was looking at him. And it gave Sorun the urge to jump out of the window so he could avoid what was about to happen entirely.

"Am I okay?" she repeated in a disbelieving tone. "I come to greet you after you manage to rescue everybody from Dr. Robotnik only to see everybody standing around your mutilated body lying in a pool of blood on the ground, and I'm supposed to be okay? I'm told by the doctors that you came uncomfortably close to dying while they were trying their best to save you, and I'm supposed to be okay?" She sounded more intense with every word she spoke despite the fact her volume remained at a neutral level, causing Sorun to shrink back further and further. "I have to worry every day that my friend is going to die in the hospital and I'm supposed to be okay ?"

"You don't sound very okay," is what Sorun wanted to say. He very wisely kept his mouth shut.

"Do you have any idea what that was like? To be so glad that I managed to refurbish the nanite city to give everybody a new home, to be so relieved seeing everyone was safe thanks to you, only to have to then see that horrible sight? I thought... I thought you had died, Sorun." Her head dropped even lowered. She went from looking upset at him to just looking plain sad, nearly devastated. "I didn't like that feeling. It happened in an instant, too fast for even me to calculate. I'd gone from being so happy to... to what I felt when I saw you. I cannot even describe what I felt when I saw you, Sorun. Only that I never want to feel it again."

Sorun slowly exhaled from his nose, thinking over his words carefully as he rubbed at the back of his head. Maybe acting so casual wasn't such a good idea. He hadn't realized he'd scared everybody that badly, but then again, seeing what shape he'd been in before going under, he probably should have seen it coming. And he himself was feeling brought down just having to listen to this. He was in part upset at himself knowing she had to go through that kind of grief, just at his expense.

No wonder she was acting like this.

"Yeah, it... didn't really go smoothly back there for me," he finally admitted after a long pause. "In my defense I lived."

She went back to looking upset as her head snapped up to him. "You always do this," she said. "You're always acting so reckless."

"Despite my best efforts to the contrary, it seems to happen a lot more than I'd like," Sorun agreed. "I'm not going to apologize for saving everybody."

"I know you're not. I don't expect you to. I..." Nicole stopped herself, pausing to think before speaking again. "I just... didn't think it would go so badly for you," she said. "I'm not upset at you. I'm upset at what happened. You... suffered so many wounds..."

"Yeah, but look, I got a cool ghost arm now." Sorun gave her a small smile and lifted up his spectral arm, waving it at Nicole. "I'm probably even gonna be even better at video games now since this thing is way faster than my normal arm."

"But you're still missing an eye," she argued, "and your body's scarred now, and I just keep thinking if we'd come up with a better plan this could have been avoided-"

"There was no better plan," Sorun interrupted, causing Nicole to focus back on him. "Said it yourself. We were working with practically nothing." He sighed and looked back out the window. "Let's be honest, Nicole, what we managed to pull off was a miracle. I'm honestly surprised I managed to get everybody out of there without losing a single person. An arm or an eye isn't anything compared to somebody's life," he said. "I mean, if anything it's my own fault for not being good enough to make it out in one piece. You did your part perfectly since you managed the whole city thing." He ran spectral claws over the bandages over his head. "And sure, yeah, losin' an eye's really irritating, not gonna lie, but hey. I'm still here, aren't I?" He turned back to her. "There's an adage back where I'm from that goes along the lines of 'you shouldn't curse back luck, because you never know if it saved you from even worse luck'. Got no idea where it comes from, completely forgot, but what I'm trying to say is don't worry about it." He interlocked his fingers behind his head in a casual manner. "You're here, I'm here, everybody's here, we got a shiny new city courtesy of you, and everything's good. Could it have gone better? Yeah, sure, but it could have went way worse, too. If anything, I... guess I should be saying I'm sorry for not being better and not getting hurt so bad so you wouldn't end up worrying so much."

"No, Sorun, you shouldn't be apologizing. You did nothing wrong. You..." She paused again. Mouth pressed firmly shut and eyes looking downwards, looking like she was in deep confliction. It eventually relaxed into a small look of acceptance as she locked eyes with him again. "Everything you say is true. I do wish you'd have taken better care of yourself, but... I cannot express just how glad I am that you managed to save all of our friends and the rest of the citizens of the kingdom. You have my thanks for that."

"So you're not mad at me?" Sorun asked in a hopeful tone.

She seemed to have to think on the question for a second, which made Sorun a bit concerned. He relaxed when she gave him a small smile. "I was, since your reckless nature ended up injuring you so... but you made valid points, and I cannot stay mad at you. So we'll say all is forgiven." She glanced at his spectral arm. "I just hope what you say about your skills not being inhibited by the arm are true."

"Oh yeah, totally. Thing's super fast," Sorun assured her. He kept looking towards her and noticed her smile had dropped off a bit as she continued to stare towards the arm, prompting him to ask, "You alright?"

"It... doesn't hurt too much, does it?" she asked. "I just... think back to what you must have gone through in that fight, and it hurts to know-"

"Hey hey hey, enough of that. I said I was okay." Sorun reached his spectral hand out and placed it on the top of Nicole's head. The action caused her face to morph into a surprised expression, as well as make her body and ears stiffen up straight. "See? I'm totally fine," he said, closing his eye and giving her a smile. "Now enough about me. Tell me about how you and the city have been."

He removed his hand after finishing speaking. Nicole remained sitting completely still with the same expression with the same face, almost frozen, until she seemed to notice Sorun staring at her oddly with his now-open eye. She blinked a couple of times and glanced towards the window, away from him.

"Yes, the city. Of course." She looked back to him. "For the most part my annexation of the nanite city went without issue. Integrating myself into the city's systems went smoothly, and I've currently relocated myself to the city's systems. Currently I am in full control of every single nanite within the city."

"Wow," Sorun commented with a raised eyebrow. "So what's that like?"

"I'm not sure how I could describe it in terms you would understand. It felt strange at first, being connected to so many machines at once, but I've adapted to the sensation. The programs I writ helped in the adjustment." She rose one of her hands up to look at it. "What you see before you is still my holographic projection. I'm able to be anywhere in the city I want now. It feels liberating, in a way, to not be limited to that handheld anymore. And since I'm able to draw upon the city's own power supply, as long as power isn't being diverted to the city's defenses, I'm able to remain this way as long as I want."

"Wait, really?" Sorun's eye embiggened. "That- that's huge! Hah... I'm really glad for you, Nicole." He truly meant it, too. He'd noticed that there'd been multiple times she'd seemed rather displeased with the limitations her handheld body provided her. Even Sorun himself often felt annoyed by the limitations and having to hunt around for Power Rings all the time so he could help her maintain her form.

If she could just make her body wherever she wanted for however long she wanted while hooked into the city, though, well... that eliminated all of those grievances of theirs.

"It's been an eye-opening experience for me," Nicole admitted to him. "I'd desired for so long to live among others and interact in the physical world in the same way they can, and now it truly feels like I have a chance at living life the same way as them." Her smile brightened a bit more as she glanced back at the window, towards the city outside. "Otherwise, the city itself is coming along well. There are no issues as far as I can see, and the Mobian populace have expressed their gratitude towards everything I've provided them. So far all is going perfectly well."

"That's great," Sorun said. "So no problems with Robotnik or anything like that?"

"Unfortunately so." Nicole turned back to Sorun. "I do not think he has been very appreciative of us stealing his nanite city. There have been skirmishes where he's sent some of his ships from his fleet to try and attack us." She smiled again. "The protective force field proves more than sufficient at deterring their attacks. They've been little more than a nuisance."

Well, he hadn't been holding out for him leaving them completely alone, but knowing that so far there was nothing he could actually do to them sounded like the next best thing. He didn't really know how Nicole managed to figure out force fields, but, well... Sorun had long since concluded technology in this world was a bit weird. The fact he was sitting in a hospital completely comprised of nanites said enough. Or the laser that turned him into a digital being from that one time.

But, he pushed those thoughts out from his mind. It seemed that everything was going fine. He was glad. Less things for him to worry about, and Nicole seemed to be doing great herself, so that was an added bonus.

"So what about everybody else?" he asked her. "How are they doing?"

"Well enough. Any Freedom Fighter operations are currently on hold to give everybody a chance to settle in." A beat passed. "And... the others have been visiting you frequently out of concern for your health. I think you should talk to them as soon as you can to ease some of their concerns."

"Ah, yeah, I was getting to it-"

"I'll take the liberty of informing them for you."

"Y-you really don't-"

"It's the least I can do to help assuage everybody's worries. I'm sure you're eager to put them to rest as well. I'm more than happy to help."

"... Yeah, of course," Sorun said, some of his facial muscles twitching as a response to Nicole's reasoning. He took a calming breath to quickly clear his head, and then said, "Guess it's gotta happen sooner or later. Send 'em over. Just..." He held a finger up to stop Nicole as she made to stand off the bed, "not all at once, yeah? Only so much of this I can handle, know what I mean?"

"I see. No need to worry, Sorun. I'll do what I can." She made to turn around after standing, but then stopped yet again to address Sorun one more time. "And Sorun... I'm really happy you're doing well. I'll come and visit when my duties of managing the city aren't preoccupying me."

"Alright. Seeya then." They both waved to each other, and before he knew it Nicole's form had disappeared entirely in a flurry of small cubes. He sighed, and then leaned back far enough that his back was resting against the hospital bed.

"Well, that didn't go terribly," he thought. "Feel bad about making her worry so much, but I guess there's no helping it." He made another sigh as he rose his spectral hand up. "But damn, she sounded like me almost dying on her really made her... actually scared. Which makes me wonder what's gonna happen to her and everyone else when I actually do die." He made a harsh click with his tongue as the arm flopped to the side, making him stare up at the ceiling. "Fuck. This is exactly why I didn't want to be friends with anybody. Nothing to do about it now, I guess."

Could have been worse. At least the situation concerning everybody else sounded relatively stable. To a point that once he and Eggman were gone Sorun could safely say he'd be leaving everybody in a good place. The whole goal of this whole thing, he supposed. At the very least, there was that. All he had to do was make it to the finish line.

Before that he had to get through this day, though, and somehow he felt like he'd rather get into another death match with a mech suit than go through everybody's reactions over him.

"Sorun!"

"No."

The yellow object that was flying through the air towards Sorun was quickly grabbed by Sorun's spectral arm and planted into the mattress right in front of him. The two Mobians by the doorway looked on in amusement, while Sorun stared at the two-tailed one being pressed onto the bed with an annoyed expression.

"Already told ya I don't do hugs, Tails," Sorun said. He released his arm's hold on the fox as he sat further back on the bed. "For cryin' out loud, man, I'm wounded here."

"Eh-heh, sorry, Sorun..." Tails gave him a sheepish chuckle as he slid off the bed, only to then approach at an uncomfortable distance while hopping up and down. "But are you okay!? You got really hurt and we were all worried so we wanted-"

"Space, man, space," Sorun mumbled out, using his blue arm to push Tails back a bit. "And yeah, I'm fine."

Tails finally got the hint and chose to step towards the end of the bed. Breathing out a bit in relief, Sorun then looked up at the other two guests, Sonic and Sally, as they entered the room. They both had extremely relieved, if not a bit apprehensive, looks on their faces. The apprehensiveness intrigued Sorun a bit, but seeing everything that had happened, he didn't find himself too surprised at seeing it.

"Hey, buddy." Sonic was the first one to speak, with the hedgehog stopping right next to Sorun while Sally chose to stand next to Tails at the foot of the bed. "How you doin'?"

Sorun shrugged. "Fine as can be. I'd be even better if the doctors would just let me out of bed already, but you know how they are."

"Heh, yeah, I hear ya," Sonic agreed with a nod. "Must totally bite, being chained down to a bed like this."

"I wouldn't call it chained exactly, but I get your meaning." Sorun nodded to the baskets at the end of the bed. "You all, uh... got me a lot of cards and stuff, huh?"

Sonic smiled and gave him a nod. "Well, yeah! 'Course we did! It wouldn't have felt right doing nothing after everything you did to save us all from those icky pods back in New Megaopolis! Did you read any of them yet?"

"Eh, I got through most of them. Read all you guys' cards," Sorun informed him. "Er, thanks, by the way. Was really touching. Y'know, even though you spelled my name wrong in your card, Sonic."

The smile on the hedgehog's face dropped off into a mortified expression. "Huh? What?"

"There's no 'a' in my name," 'Soarun' deadpanned. "It's S-o-r-u-n." To be fair it wasn't something he could hold solely against Sonic since a fair number of the townsfolk that wrote him cards made the same mistake. And in his defense the way his name sounded did make it sound like an 'a' was in there. But then again everybody else in the Freedom Fighters had gotten it right. So he felt he could tease him a bit over it.

"Uh-uh-uh- I didn't know!" Stuttering, Sonic turned to Sally in a panic. "How was I supposed to know!? He never told us how it's spelled! Why didn't any of you tell me before I wrote that card!?"

To the foot of Sorun's bed, Sally made a small groan and palmed at her face. "Sonic, how could make a mistake like that?"

"I didn't mean to- agh..." Sonic made a defeated sound and turned back to the bedridden human. "Sorun I'm so sorry. I'll make you a new card if-"

"It's fine, Sonic, really, I got enough cards as is," Sorun assured him, laughing lightly while raising a hand up. "There were actually a bunch of people that misspelled my name. Doesn't really bug me too much." Wasn't entirely true; it did disturb him the smallest bit at some level, but at the same time he didn't care enough to bother to correct anybody other than Sonic.

"Oh. Heh heh, that's a load off," Sonic sighed out.

"I'm sure." Sorun turned from looking at Sonic towards Sally. "So what brings you all here, anyways?"

"Nicole told us you woke up," she answered. "We all wanted to visit you to make sure, but she said you didn't want to see us all at once."

"Yeah, well..." Sorun took a quick look around the hospital room before focusing back on the princess. "I don't think the room could hold everybody."

Sally didn't say anything immediately. Instead, Sorun saw her looks downwards. Towards the missing arm being substituted by the spectral one. The whole room had gone silent, and Sorun didn't even need to look to see all eyes were on him. Him and the injuries.

It was gonna be a long day if he had to deal with this with everybody.

"Sorun..." Sally tentative began, "we... I'm not even sure what I'm supposed to say." She looked away from him. "We're all thankful for what you did, but... we never intended for-"

"Nah, don't worry about it. Happens."

"People don't just 'happen' to lose a limb," she argued as she turned back to him. "You never should have been hurt so badly-"

"Ugh, I'm not dealing with this." Sorun rose a hand up to stop her mid-sentence. "It's a raw deal, I get it. But what's done is done." He paused to look at his spectral hand. "Look, I'm touched that you all were so worried about me, really, I am. But I don't wanna dwell on it, and if I wanna move past it, I don't see why you all have to be so hung up on it. And I even managed to replace the arm." He looked back at Sally, who was looking at him in surprise. "I'm already over it, so can we just drop it?"

There were a few seconds where Sally just continued to stare towards him in surprise, completely silent. Eventually she sighed a bit and began to rub on one of her shoulders. "It's not so easy," she said. "We were all there and all we could do was watch as... as all that happened to you. It doesn't help that I feel partially responsible for you given you were, well... somewhat pushed into being a Freedom Fighter." She looked down a bit. "It's not like we've never lost people before, but... well, seeing somebody we care about hurt like that still doesn't sit well."

Sorun exhaled through his nose and drummed his fingers across his thigh. "I get it, Sally, but I'm still the idiot that decided to go fight the thing," he told her. "Maybe if I was a Mobian like you guys and was a bit more physically apt I could have avoided getting messed up so much, but nothing to do about it." He lifted his hand up and rubbed at his head as he turned away. "Still, I... really do appreciate you all looking out for me like that. But I'm fine and I can't exactly regret saving everybody and getting them to the city. So just call it good already. Can't handle this kind of attention."

When he looked back at the others, much to his relief, they were all glancing towards each other with light smiles on their faces. He supposed that mean he'd said something right, which would hopefully make them worry less about him. Win for him as long as it got them to drop the subject about his injuries.

"I... suppose you're right," Sally finally said with a nod. "We're just glad you're alright."

Sorun clicked his tongue. "... Yeah."

"Still, uh... Sorun? Can we talk about some things?" The human turned back to Sonic, whose smile had dropped off his face. He was looking straight at Sorun, an unreadable expression on his face. "So, before you got there, Eggman, he, uh... I'm just gonna come out and say it, how come you never told any of us he tried tricking you into going over to his side?"

Sorun started a bit at the question. He could feel Sally's and Tails' eyes on him, too, in addition to Sonic's... ocular organ that may or may not have been a pair, Sorun still wasn't sure on that. He slowly breathed out as a result, sat back against the bed, and decided to just give them the truth.

"Didn't seem relevant, so I never brought it up," he said. "He seriously told you guys that?"

Sonic nodded. "Yeah. He... even said he offered to try and find you a way home."

"What do you want me to say, Sonic?" Sorun groaned out as he rubbed a hand over his face. "What, you woulda preferred I did switch sides?"

"No!" Sonic quickly exclaimed. He froze when Sorun turned his eye on him, causing him to sigh quietly and speak again in a calmer voice. "I was... just wondering what you were thinking is all."

"..." Sorun rolled his eye and brushed some of his dark hair out from his face. "The guy was an unpredictable, maniac scientist man and I didn't have a guarantee that he could actually get me something like that. And I make it a policy not to work with genocidal maniacs."

Sonic made an empty, dry chuckle. "What, is that a common policy back on Earth?"

"Eh, genocidal maniacs are more common there than you'd think, so yeah," Sorun truthfully stated, causing the three Mobians to stiffen up. "Look, I don't know, I... even though I was pretty against you guys back then I wasn't gonna do a total turn for a guy like that . You know I got higher standards'n that, man."

The answer seemed to just barely satisfy Sonic. He still held some air of discontent about him, though, from the way he looked so uneasy standing next to Sorun. "During that fight, you... you said a bunch. A lot of stuff I never really thought I'd hear you say. And you also said some stuff I... didn't like so much," Sonic said. "Sorun, why... why do you put yourself down so much? Calling yourself a loser and someone who's never made a right choice and all that stuff you said about yourself? I don't get it."

"Of all the things for him to pick up on..." Sorun thought with a sigh. He looked up towards the ceiling, away from Sonic, before answering. "I never really had all that much self-confidence. Woulda figured that'd be obvious by now," he said. "Geez, Sonic, look at me. I'm a terrible person. I run away from weddings and push people away from me. I ran away from everything that one time because I was so focused on my own problems I never even stopped to consider everyone else's problems." He reached up and ran a hand over his face. "Even back on Earth I was nothin' but some trash kid that never made any right choices. Just some loser that whittled his time away playin' video games while grindin' away at school with no real vision of the future. Someone with a loose group of friends and only one guy he could call an actual friend, no family but a single mom, but they're all on the other side of the multiverse so... ugh, I don't even know what I'm saying." Sorun looked back down at Sonic. "So yeah. I called myself a loser. 'S what I am, especially compared to all you guys. I only made it this far 'cause I lucked out with Earth biology and ate some magic rocks for super powers. Even then I'm nothin' without 'em. So what does that make me other than some random loser?"

"Nah."

It was an immediate response from Sonic, one which made Sorun blow out in exasperation. "'Nah' he says. I pour my heart out and all he says is 'nah'." Sorun affixed Sonic, still staring directly at him, with a tired look. "I'm not even surprised, that's the thing. But I gotta ask anyways. Why would you say that, Sonic?"

The blue hedgehog took a deep breath before speaking. "Sure, Sorun, you... I gotta be honest, I think you maybe make the wrong decision every now and again, but so does everybody else! No one's perfect, and I don't know anybody who can say every choice they made in their life was the right one. You just, well... make a couple more mistakes than the average person."

Sorun rolled his eye. "Failing to see your point here."

"Lemme finish," Sonic requested. "Yeah, you made some bad choices, but you always made up for 'em. You came back when you ran away, you apologized to people, you... you stopped looking for the Chaos Emeralds to come back to the wedding, didn't you?" he asked, making Sorun freeze a bit. "You made it sound like you wouldn't come back until you found them, but during that fight you only used the five powers, so..."

Sorun clicked his tongue and looked away. "Yeah, fine, I felt bad and came back to catch the back end of the wedding if I could. Some smarty-pants purple cat guy I found in the sticks fishing gave me a reality check and pointed out how dumb I was being. Had been beeing."

Sonic's eyes lit up in realization. "Oh, I think that's Big you're talking about. We know him."

"Yeah, Big! That was his name. Smart guy."

"Well, listen, Sorun... what's important is, you came back. And then you, you..." Sonic held a hand to his head after half-laughing in disbelief. "I mean, you went from the way you were when you left to dropping everything in an instant and pulling together some big plan with Nicole to rescue all us." Sonic reached over and tapped Sorun on his left shoulder. "And that fight! I didn't even know you could do half of the stuff you were doing there! What was- what was that big thing you did!? The thing with the circle and the- the weird lines everywhere!?"

"It's, uh... just a sword thing I can do," Sorun mumbled out in surprise at seeing the hedgehog's excitement. "Sonic, you-"

"And everything else you said to Eggman was really cool, too! Especially the heart thing you did!"

By now Sorun couldn't take it completely. He was forced to turn away from Sonic, face burning from embarrassment as he covered his face with his hand. "C'mon, man, forget the heart thing..."

"Nuh-uh! Never forgettin' that one!" Sonic said to him. He even went as far as to do the exact same pose while grinning at him widely- body leaning back and two thumbs pointing behind him. Embarrassing enough that Sorun couldn't help the small groan he made.

He wasn't sure why he decided to make the heart-shaped formation of Summoned Swords behind Sonic when he made the pose. A sudden, unexplainable urge to do a nice thing for him since he was going so far for him, perhaps. Or maybe it was just a knee-jerk reaction to make it once he saw Sonic made the pose. Whatever the reason, Sorun made the heart of blue swords behind the blue hedgehog. He also regretted doing it the second he'd done it, but there was no taking it back now.

Sonic had only noticed it either because Sally and Tails flinched a bit in surprise or he noticed some of the blue light reflecting off of the floor and walls. Either way he'd turned his head around just enough to see the heart. The regret Sorun had felt at making them made him dispel them almost as soon as Sonic saw them, but by then it was too late. He'd seen the heart.

Then he had to go and break out into mirthful laughter at it.

By now Sorun was practically burying his face in his hand. Sally and Tails had even joined in on the laughter. It was enough that eventually he tore his hand away from his face and whipped his head back towards Sonic.

"One. You get one. You get one of those and that was it," Sorun exclaimed, voice in a slightly high pitch from the embarrassment. "You get one and if anybody asks I never did it, do you hear me?"

"Ha ha ha! Ahhh, sure, Sorun." The laughter from all three Mobians had thankfully died down. Sonic had breathed out one last laugh and then leaned against the bed frame on Sorun's right side. "It's stuff like that and everything else you did during that fight, Sorun. All the cool stuff you did, the cool things you said, all of that. Like the way you insulted Eggman right in his face, your whole speech thing about what you thought true strength was, that was really cool..." The enjoyment on his face dimmed a great bit as his voice went quieter. "You kept... getting hurt, kept losing body parts. I felt like I was gonna lose it every time I saw you get hurt like that. I just felt so helpless, y'know, stuck in that pod watching the whole thing going down without being able to do anything. We all were. And I was... really scared we were gonna lose you there." A humorless laugh left him. "But you kept acting like it wasn't even happening. You were more focused on making cool speeches than a lost arm."

"Yeah, well..." Sorun mumbled out, "I always said I had a high pain tolerance."

"Don't I know it," Sonic said. "You're just... way past cool doesn't even begin to describe it. You went through all that just to save us. You're just one of the coolest guys ever, period. That's what I think. But even cool guys like you make mistakes, so... can you do me a favor and not worry about it?" He gave Sorun a hopeful smile. "It's not like any of us do."

"I..." Sorun hesitated, unable to find the words. Forgiveness was one thing, but from the way Sonic was going he was making it sound like a whole other thing entirely from sheer effort alone. It was more than Sorun ever thought anybody here would go out of their way to give him. And he couldn't deny it felt nice, nor could he deny any of Sonic's words.

He also aware that the Sorun Sonic describing, at some level, was a fictional Sorun. The Sorun Sonic was describing sounded like some cool, unshakable Freedom Fighter with all the coolest moves and who was super strong. Who ignored any and all danger no matter how severe the threat if it meant saving people. An ideal hero. That's all Sorun heard when Sonic talked about him.

The real Sorun wasn't anything like that. He cared for them all and genuinely wanted to save their lives, sure. That was most of the reason he was bothering with all this. But the real Sorun was also just somebody who stole all their powers from a video game. A liar. He wasn't brave. He just didn't care anymore since his life was practically forfeit anyways. He was able to ignore the lost body parts because he couldn't even feel it and because it didn't matter in the long run. It wasn't bravery. It was cold pragmatism and a lack of value on his own life.

Even so, there was some truth to what Sonic said. He did desire to correct his mistakes, and did want them all to live, even if he couldn't. So it was with a resigned sigh Sorun admitted, "Well... not like I was gonna leave you all hangin'. I care about you all too much."

"Say, branchin' offa that subject..." Sonic leaned in closer to Sorun, even going as far as to drape an arm over him as he gave the human a knowing grin. "You said something when Egghead showed up with his dumb suit. Pretty sure I heard a word startin' with an 'f'..."

"Musta misheard," Sorun immediately said. "Those pods looked pretty thick. Who knows how much the sound was distorted."

"I dunno, Sorun, sound was pretty clear to me. I'm almost positive I heard a word sounding like 'friend' tossed around..."

A deep sigh left Sorun. "You're seriously gonna make me say it, man?" He supposed there was no getting around it at this point, as much as he hated to admit it. So he took in a deep breath, and said it. "Fine, I admit it. I forgive you all. We're friends. Happy?"

Sonic's eyes brightened up to a uncomfortable degree. "You really mean it!?"

With a groan, Sorun shoved the hedgehog off of him. "Yeah, yeah, friends forever, now get off."

"Ha ha! Sure, buddy." Sonic thankfully obliged him and stepped back after Sorun pushed him away. He still had that blinding smile on his face, though. "I'm real happy you finally went and said it, Sorun."

"I'm gonna take it back if you don't drop it already," Sorun snapped at him.

"Nope, too late. No takin' that one back." Sonic hopped back towards the end of the bed with the other two Mobians, lightly laughing all the while. "You're stuck with us forever now."

"Yeah, for however long that lasts." Sorun scooted a bit forwards on the bed and turned his body so his feet was hanging off. He hopped off the bed afterwards, though he stumbled a bit after standing up on his feet and was forced to grab at the bed frame for support. His vision had begun swimming and he'd been hit with a strong sense of vertigo the moment he'd stood up.

He saw some movement from the corner of his eye, and turned his head to see the three Mobians directly. They'd all at once almost made to move towards him, though the three stopped when they saw he'd managed to steady himself. They still had worried expressions on their faces, though, and he felt a sense of annoyance begin to bubble up in him. Touched annoyance, but still annoyance.

"Sorun," Sally spoke up, "I'm not sure you should be moving around-
"

"Ah, there's a lotta things I shouldn't do but still do," Sorun interrupted with a wave of his spectral hand. "So besides you guys is anybody else coming to visit?"

Sally, still looking a bit wary at how carefree Sorun acted, slowly nodded at him. "Knuckles and the rest of the Chaotix said they wanted to come by and check on you."

"Rotor wanted to come, but... he couldn't," Tails added, looking a bit downcast all of a sudden. "His back got hurt real bad during the fight in Knothole. The doctors say he's fine, but, well, he's not really moving around like he used to."

Sorun noticeably flinched a bit. He hadn't known somebody had been hurt that bad in the raid. Or somebody he knew, at that. The relief he felt at hearing he was doing generally well was overshadowed by the anger he felt. Another grievance to add to all the others.

"Yeah, he took a nasty hit. Doin' better, though," Sonic stated. "Besides that I know Rouge called Shadow and told him everything that happened. He said he's coming right over here the moment he gets some time off at G.U.N. to see you."

Sorun found himself blinking in surprise as he turned to Sonic. "Is that so?" he asked.

"Mhm," he confirmed with a nod. "Dunno how you got so buddy-buddy with that guy."

"I mean, he's really not that bad when you get to know him. You could try to get along with him, Sonic."

"Ha! It's not like he makes it easier for me. I'd put more effort into it if he'd just admit he's the faker already and not me."

"So it really does go both ways, huh...?"

A knock on the door cut Sorun off and drew his attention towards the door, as well as everyone else's attention. Nobody had even spoken a word before the door finally opened up and a head poked through.

"Errr, pardon moi? I was hearing voices beyond ze door and thinked-" The speaker, whom Sorun immediately identified as Antoine, stopped himself when he briefly scanned the room and saw Sorun standing there along with the other Mobians already in the room. "O-oh, Sorun," he stuttered out, "you... you are being awake."

"I'm 'being' a lot of things, Antoine." Sorun couldn't even find it in himself to look directly at the coyote; the guilt from having flaked his wedding was still too strong in him. So he'd turned his head away enough that he didn't have to look at the Mobian in the doorway and then spoke again. "Bunnie there with you?"

He didn't get a verbal answer. What he did get was the sound of the door opening up all the way, and Sorun only needed to take a quick glance up to confirm that the cyborg rabbit was, in fact, standing there behind him. He couldn't bite back the large sigh that left him from just being in their presence.

"I never even thought about how I'm supposed to apologize to them for what I did. I mean, fuck, the wedding got ruined anyway but..." But he'd still chosen to not go to their wedding when everybody else had. Sorun couldn't even say for certain if the results of that had been good or not; what he did resulted in saving everybody but him getting hurt. Maybe if he'd stayed things would have went differently. Possibly better. Or worse. Sorun tried not to dwell on what-ifs like that and instead focused on appreciating how well it'd gone at the end of the day, but to him, none of that erased what he'd done. He wanted to think that him changing his mind at the last second and trying to come back or him saving everyone the way he did made up for it, but he didn't know if they'd see it that way.

"... Eh, I'm already kinda going all-out here anyways." It was with a low whine in the back of Sorun's throat that he straightened up and rolled his head towards Antoine and Bunnie, who by now had both stepped into the room. "Screw it. I got it comin' anyways."

And so, with his mind made up, Sorun Tricked into a position so that he was sitting on his knees right in front of the married couple with his head bowed down. They'd both jumped a bit in surprise at what he did, and then proceeded to stare down at him with wide eyes as he began to speak.

"I'm super sorry, you guys," Sorun said in an apologetic tone. "I... screwed up and missed out on your wedding just because I thought I bunch of stupid mystical crystals were more important than seeing two of my friends get married. And granted, it... kind of worked out really well since it lead to, you know-" he briefly rose his spectral arm, "- this happening an' me savin' everyone, but I don't think that's a very good excuse. I know an apology doesn't really cut it considering what I did, but-"

"Oh, goodness' grief, cut it out and stand up, mon ami."

The words spoken by Antoine caused Sorun to freeze in confusion. He was even more confused when he felt a pair of arms grip him and lift him up to his feet. He was greeted to a sight of both Antoine and Bunnie looking at him with some strange expressions halfway between amused and bemused. Despite that, they were both grinning at him.

He didn't get it.

"You're... you're seriously not mad?" Sorun asked, voice quiet and disbelieving.

Bunnie sighed at the question, shaking her head while also brushing a blonde lock to the side. "Sorun, hon, we can't exactly hold any ill will towards the feller that put his life on the line tah save the whole city, now, can we?"

"B-but the wedding-"

"Non, non, we are not wanting to hear any more about ze wedding," Antoine interrupted with a shake of his head. "Eet iz bad enough zose two demented maniacs had to go and ruin it and our dear home. I do not weesh to have heard you being upsetted." He stopped to allow Sorun a chance to speak, though the human found that he didn't have the words to respond to anything Antoine had said. This caused the coyote to roll his eyes and place a hand on Sorun's shoulder. "I will not pretended to understand why you did not go, Sorun, but, well, I am... I really am being the doubting one when I think of you getting on your knees to apologize to moi and mi amor."

A quiet, dry chuckle left Sorun. "Well... it's for when I made a really bad mistake. And you just happen to be two of the only people in the world I'd go that far for," he admitted to them. "You're seriously just gonna forgive me? Just like that?"

"We ain't exactly the type to be holdin' grudges, now," Bunnie told him. "Ah think ya already made it up plenty with what ya pulled back in New Megaopolis. 'Sides..." She trailed off, looking down at Sorun's arm. "You, um... Ah think ya've lost enough without needin' tah lose a couple friends, too. An' I don't wanna be hearin' anymore about it, y'hear?"

"I could not 'ave said eet better myself," Antoine said.

Sorun was still driven speechless. Even after all this time, when he'd got to a point where he almost expected this saint-like benevolence from these people, it still shocked him to no end when they actually accepted an apology for the things he'd done. That they were so easy to just forgive and forget like that. He couldn't help but rub his face with his hand in a poor attempt to hide his grin. Especially when they kept smiling at him like that.

"Alright, fine. We'll call it good since you guys won't leave it alone otherwise." He was forced to look away from them when he realized the grin on his face wasn't going away. "Thanks, guys. You're all too good."

"Don't mention it none, Sorun." Bunnie looked down at Sorun's arm again and pointed at it with her cybernetic hand. "Say, since we're on the subject, what do you plan on doin' with, y'know..."

"Oh, this?" Sorun took a few steps back and lifted his spectral arm up. "Well, the doc offered to get me a neato cyber-arm, but I'm not gonna lie I kinda dig this one already so I don't think-"

"SORUN!"

There probably wasn't anything on the whole planet that could have prepared Sorun when a black and yellow missile crashed right into him hard enough that he was almost sent onto his back right there.

How he managed to stay upright was a mystery even to Sorun. Not so much as a mystery was what slammed into him to begin with and was currently hanging off his neck with their arms wrapped around his neck. He only knew two bees, after all.

Just 'cause he knew him, though, didn't mean Sorun really appreciated being hung off of like this.

"Charmy...!" Sorun hissed out, reaching up to try and pry the bee Mobian off of him. Unfortunately, he held firm. "Charmy, c'mon-!"

"Why didn't you tell us you were awake, you big dummy!" Large, exaggerated tears were practically flying out from his eyes as he cried right onto Sorun's bare, bandage-wrapped chest. "You know how worried we all were when you wouldn't wake up!? You made us wait for days!"

"Man, come on, seriously!" Sorun's tugs became more frantic when he noticed five pairs of eyes fall on him. He couldn't recall the last time he felt so embarrassed when he registered the five amused smiles everyone was giving them. "I swear if you don't get off right now-!"

"Oh, come on, Sorun, give him a break." The human groaned out loud when he recognized the voice and looked up towards the doorway. He wasn't at all surprised to see Knuckles there. Or the rest of the Chaotix right behind him that were currently crowding into the room. The warm grins on all their faces weren't lost on him, either, and unfortunately, he'd reached his limit on warm grins for the day. "It's your fault for scaring us so much anyways."

"I will hit you if you do not get him to release me," Sorun growled out, still trying in vain to pry Charmy off of him. "Thought I told Nicole I didn't wanna deal with so many people at once...!"

"Yeah, lighten up!" A strong, green-scaled arm draped over his neck, locking Sorun in place. Sorun could have sworn he felt a grinding noise in his head as his eye slowly swiveled up to Vector. Bastard had a knowing look in his eyes along with the grin the crocodile wore. "Ya can't seriously say you're gonna try and worm your way outta here before we get a chance to catch up, are ya?"

Another arm from Sorun's other side draped over his neck, overlapping with Vector's. There was enough strength pressing down on him that Sorun couldn't even move if he wanted to. He knew from that alone it was Mighty's arm, and the voice alone was enough to confirm it definitively. "Gotta say I agree with him, Sorun," he said, and the mischievous tone in his voice was clear to Sorun's ear. "'Sides, you're still wounded, ain'tcha? Ya shouldn't go strain yourself on our behalf."

Gritting his teeth in indignation, Sorun turned his head forwards. He saw Espio there. Leaning against a wall and examining a shuriken in his hand, acting like he was ignoring the entire thing. He may have been stone-faced and lacked any and all amusement in his features, but Sorun knew he wasn't dense enough to not read the room.

But, when he sent the chameleon a pleading look, he'd just shook his head at Sorun.

"You know as well as I do any attempt to escape from them would be futile," he said. A small smirk played on his mouth. "And you'll have to think again if you think I'd let you leave here without us all thanking you for saving Charmy from what Robotnik tried to subject him to."

Biting back his growing insults, Sorun took another quick glance around. Knuckles was wearing the same grin as they were. So were Julie-Su, Ray, and Saffron. And everybody else, of course. Even with the ability to teleport he doubted he'd be able to get away, and even if he did Dr. Quack would probably just yell at him for being so active. So, with a deep sigh, he finally gave up and let his arms fall away from Charmy to hang limply down his sides.

"I think all my friends are a bit too good..."

A/N- RIP in pepperoni gum wrapper.

Chapter 46

Recursion Error

Episode 46- And now revolution, apparently

"~Black night, dark sky, hm hm-hm hm-mmm~"

Life at the hospital was boring. The good technically brand-new Tommy Turtle Memorial Hospital. Sorun didn't really know where that name came from, just that Nicole picked it out. He did, somewhere in the back of his memory, recall Rotor mentioning someone named Tommy once, when Sorun mentioned a turtle. His best guess was that he was someone the Freedom Fighters knew that died. He chose to refrain from ever asking out of respect seeing as he figured the dots he connected painted a good enough story. If not that, then the small statue of the guy out in front of the hospital said enough.

He guessed he really wouldn't be the first guy they knew that would die on them.

Thinking of Rotor now made Sorun quietly scoff and turn away from the window he was staring at while humming a song out. He got to leave the hospital today from what he heard. Sorun was still stuck here until Dr. Quack said he could leave. And while it wasn't like he was bored to tears since he often got visitors, at the same time, being stuck in a white room with absolutely no entertainment was leaving his mind dull.

He wanted his Chao to keep him company. Or to at least alleviate this boredom. He didn't exactly want to spend the last of his days wanting to bash his head against the wall.

He'd asked around. Virgil had been there with everybody else during the whole Egg Grape incident. From what he was told, they'd found somebody to look after the Chao until Sorun was well again, a mother and daughter pair that apparently arrived in Knothole a mere two days after it came to be. Sorun didn't know the details. Apparently Amy did, though, since she was the one that brought them here, but that was all he knew. He supposed he'd ask when she showed up to take him to where they and Virgil were later on.

Hope he hadn't given his temporary caretakers too hard a time.

A knock on the door drew Sorun's attention away from the window.

"Amy? That you?" He stumbled a bit when he distanced himself from the window, but soon after Sorun managed to right himself as he walked towards the door. "'Bout time," he said as he grasped the door handle and opened the door. "I'm going insane cooped up here, so can we-"

He cut himself off when he saw that the person on the other side of the door was not Amy. In fact, he didn't rightly know who the person standing in front of him was. A light brown fox Mobian that had on the same blue and red jacket that Antoine and some other members of the royal forces wore. He had an eyepatch, too, just like the one Sorun currently wore. Only his was on the left eye. An light blue eye that looked rather curious as it eyed Sorun.

"..." Sorun stared at the stranger for approximately one second and then reached his hand out in the hallway to point to the left. "Wrong room, dude."

"Actually, I'm quite certain this is the right one." Right when Sorun moved to close the door the Mobian stuck his hand out to halt him. "Your name is Sorun, right?"

Breathing through his nose lightly, Sorun opened the door back up and stared the Mobian in the eye. "I'm literally the only human in this city with a blue demon arm. I'm probably the only human on the whole continent. I know for a fact everybody that lived in Knothole was there in the thunderdome along with me and Eggman during that whole mess. You know who I am, man. What do you want?"

Whether the Mobian was at all taken back by Sorun's bluntness or not wasn't clear, but either way Sorun didn't find himself caring all that much. He didn't have the patience right now to deal with it, and he was expecting somebody. The only reason he hadn't slammed the door in the guy's face to begin with was because he wanted to be polite, but even now he felt that urge beginning to wane.

Fortunately, the Mobian seemed to get the point and cleared his throat. "May I come in to speak with you?"

Had he not asked so nicely, Sorun would have said no. Alas, he did, and Sorun felt himself compelled to respect his niceties by opening the door further. "I guess. Just please make it quick. I got plans."

The one-eyed fox nodded, and stepped into the room. Sorun closed the door behind him, remaining in place and staring at the door handle while wondering what was going on before sighing and turning towards the fox.

"So," he began, "these things usually start out with an introduction, right? You know who I am. What's your name?"

Sorun found it hard to get a read on the fox as he turned towards him. He kept his hands folded behind his back at all times, and he had a kind of... steely expression. Something that mostly just went to confuse Sorun as he stared at his eyepatch-covered face while nervously standing towards the door waiting for a response.

"My name," the fox said in an even tone, "is Amadeus Prower. General in the royal forces. I believe you know my son?"

The pale teen scratched his chin in thought. "Prow- oh!" He snapped his fingers in recognition and pointed at the other male. "You're Tails' dad? Yeah, I know him. He kidnapped me."

There was a noticeable flinch in Amadeus' form when Sorun's words registered with him. "I, uh... was made aware by him of your circumstances. I've actually been meaning to talk to you for some time now regarding-"

A short laugh from Sorun cut him off, causing him to regard the teen with an odd glare. "Don't sweat it, man, I'm kiddin' around. We're cool," he said. "If you really wanted to talk about that, though," he added, "you sure did wait a long time to get to it. I've been here for months, man."

"Yes, well... I've been busy." Amadeus briefly rose one of his hands to awkwardly cough into it before folding it back behind his back. "I'm glad to hear you hold no ill will towards him, though. He tries not to let it show, but I'd be a poor father if I didn't notice something had been eating at him for some time now. But, lately, he seems to have been put at ease. I suppose I have you to thank for that, along with, well, securing the safety of the entirety of the Kingdom of Acorn." His eye glanced up at Sorun's own eyepatch, and then down to his spectral arm. "You have my respect for everything you've done, and my thanks for saving my family along with everybody else."

There was a strong urge for Sorun to scoff and act flippant towards the fox's respects, but they sounded genuine. And it was hard to turn those down when they came from somebody who lost an eye like he had. So he made a simple "Mm" and nodded at him, and then asked, "Well, thanks, Amadeus, that means a lot, but I'm assuming you coming all the way here to say that wasn't the only thing you wanted to say? I mean it'd be really nice of you if that was, but..."

"No, you're right. There was one other matter." Without another word Amadeus turned towards the window and walked towards it. He stopped right in front of the window, choosing to remain completely still as he stared out at it. This continued on for tens of seconds, during which Sorun just awkwardly stood behind him while shuffling his feet, unsure of what to do. It carried on long enough that Sorun opened his mouth to say something, but right before he could

Amadeus spoke up again. "What do you see when you look out this window, Sorun?"

The Earthling closed his mouth and thought on the question while quirking an eyebrow at the fox. "Er... a city?" he tried. "A really nice-looking city."

"Yes, true, but what do you see beyond that?"

"Nanites? I don't kn- man, where are you going with this?"

Sighing, Amadeus turned his head halfway so that his eye met Sorun's. "Let me rephrase," he tried. "What do you think of the kingdom's government?"

"The monarchy?" Sorun asked. He reached his blue hand behind his head to scratch at it in thought. "I mean, it's... it's fine, I guess. Elias keeps things together well enough. City's not on fire, so that's good for him."

A scoff left the fox. "That's apt of you to say," he said, now fully turning around to meet Sorun. "Also apt of you to mention how it's a monarchy."

"'Cause it is...?" Sorun blinked and shook his head. "W-where are you going with this?"

Amadeus didn't answer immediately. What he did was turn his head to look out the window again, his body still pointed at Sorun. "Did my son Miles ever tell you of what befell me and my wife?"

"Uh... something about you being stuck in space until Sonic and Tails brought you back." He wasn't that privy to the details. He thought he remembered Tails explaining to him once. He also vaguely recalled blanking out for most of the story because of how ridiculous it sounded and because he'd had his mind on other things at the time. Something about them being stuck in space with a colony of aliens.

He forgot how that even happened in the first place. Or if Tails even told him.

Probably should have paid better attention in hindsight.

"It was an interesting government they ran up there, the Bem," Amadeus stated as he looked back at Sorun, who could have sworn he'd heard that name from somewhere before. "Did you know they ran a republic there?"

"No? Good for them I guess?" Sorun heavily blinked and ran a hand through his hair. "Is there a point to any of this?"

"My point is that my experience in an alien colony showed me a far more efficient form of government than what is currently operating in this city. When I came back to my true home in the Kingdom of Acorn all I saw around me were deficiencies in the system."

"The hell's this guy going on about?"

"Do you truly think that the current system of government is the correct one we should be operating under?" Amadeus asked Sorun. "One who has had a singular family line rule it for generations? One that landed us in a war with the Overlanders? One that was foolish enough to let it get completely overthrown and had the world thrown in chaos by giving a singular Overlander and his nephew a high position of power? One that was defragmented enough it was forced to allow children such as yourself to pick up the pieces and rebuild the kingdom back up from a small village hidden in the forest? A kingdom that is now currently ruled by a king that has no prior experience ruling and is only in his position solely because of a birthright?"

... As far as Sorun was concerned he had a lot of valid points, most of which he couldn't refute. "Well, uh... yeah, admittedly that does all sound pretty bad, but so far things with Elias has been going good."

"Yes, so far, but I'm not one to let things remain as they are because things have been well so far ." Amadeus took in a deep breath before speaking again. "I'm vying for a change with the system of government."

"Okay, alright, time out." Sorun held up a hand to stop the Mobian from speaking. He shook his head in disbelief for a few moments, and then refocused on him before he began talking. "So what you're saying... is that you're trying to start a revolution?"

"Yes, essentially."

"You fucking kidding me?" The sudden use of harsh language sent Amadeus reeling back a bit in shock. Sorun, meanwhile, continued to speak in the same breath as his eye narrowed at the brown-haired fox. "It's barely been over a week since Knothole got obliterated. A week! A week since that disaster and you decide that's what the people need right now? Civil upheaval? The fuck's going through your head?"

"It's because we're all safe from Robotnik thanks to the city's defenses that now is precisely a perfect time to do this!" The fox argued at him in a raised voice. "Without having that madman looming over our shoulders we can focus on fixing a system that's held us back, a system whose negligence is in part responsible for Knothole being lost in the first place!" He paused, eye narrowing a bit when he saw Sorun groan and rub at the bridge of his nose. "I'm not alone in this, you know," he told the human. "Half of the city's population is in agreement with me on this subject."

The statement made Sorun freeze up a bit in surprise. He slowly lowered his hand, and then looked towards Amadeus' face. He seemed to be truthful, which only went to go and make him even more surprised. "Seriously? You got half the city in on this?"

"Not everybody has been completely content with how things have been run for some time now," he informed the human. "They're scared. Scared now more than ever with the loss of Knothole. They want change. But change isn't exactly going to happen when the all the power in the kingdom is held in the hand of one man." He took a single step towards Sorun, and the sharp look he'd been giving the human softened a bit. "You really don't think there's an issue with that? One man holding all the power of the government? A man who gets to choose whether or not he has to listen to the people's wishes? Somebody who probably doesn't even know what he's doing compared to some of the citizens he's responsible for?"

A pale hand being rose up stopped the fox from speaking once again. He respectfully obliged, allowing Sorun to think to himself as the fox patiently waited. "I mean, he's not wrong. Monarchy ain't exactly the best government system to be rocking. There's a reason it kinda fell completely on the wayside back on Earth. And if half the people agree with him... shit, but Elias has been doing really good so far. For the most part, at least. Decent. He's been decent." He made a small sigh and looked away. "Then again, he's not really that enthusiastic about the job. Told me himself he doesn't think he's a good fit for it, but because of the whole monarchy lineage thing he's kinda stuck with it. And yeah, there's probably people with actual experience running things that'd do a better job than-" Sorun shook his head to interrupt his own thoughts. "Why am I even thinking about this? I'm not even a citizen here, and I'm dying soon anyways. It ain't my problem."

It wasn't as if government was his forte anyways. Far from it. And at the end of the day, this didn't really affect him, and quite honestly... he didn't care all that much. And the last thing he wanted to do was get in bed with what was apparently a revolution. He had better things to do. Like go die.

Still, there was one question gnawing at Sorun from all this. "What does all this have to do with me?" Sorun asked him. "Why did you bother to come all this way just to tell me this?"

"Well... I was hoping you'd join in with us on the protest."

A dry, humorless laugh left Sorun as he buried his face in his hand. "Oh, now I know you're messing with me..."

"I speak the truth," Amadeus stated. "You're, well... something of a local hero due to recent events. The one who singlehandedly confront Dr. Robotnik to save a kingdom of people who wasn't even the same species as him at the risk of his own life."

"You're gonna bring race into this now?"

"What I'm saying," the Mobian rephrased, "is that people deeply respect you for what you sacrificed, and if somebody like you was with us then our voice would be heard all that much clearer."

In other words Sorun had a lot of credibility 'cause he almost died saving everybody's lives, and if he was in on this it'd turn a lot more heads. Amadeus wanted to use him to gain more clout. It's how Sorun saw it, and the pale Earthling honestly couldn't say he appreciated the sentiment all that much. He couldn't rightly blame the fox for trying this, either, but he still didn't like it.

Because of this reasoning, his answer was immediate. "Yeah, I don't wanna do that. Sign me out."

Sorun's answer seemed to have the effect of stunning Amadeus a bit. His body had flinched, and his eye had blinked in surprise as he eyed the human with an unsure expression. "You're saying no?"

"Listen, Tails' dad-"

"Amadeus."

"Tails' dad, listen," Sorun reiterated, causing the fox standing across from him to grow a bit annoyed. "I can't say I really like the idea of you trying to use your son's friend for political gain. Don't feel like protesting with a guy who rolls like that. More importantly, though, I just don't want any part of this. It doesn't have anything to do with me." He turned to the side and then began walking towards his bed.

"That said," he continued, "I'm not exactly opposed to what you're doing, either."

"You're... not?" Amadeus asked, voice hesitant as he watched Sorun sit down on the bed. "Why not?"

Sighing through his nose, Sorun craned his head up at the ceiling. "Look, most of the countries in the world where I'm from switched to various republic and democratic governments. Hell, my own country America did the same thing. so I get where you're coming from," he explained. Amadeus perked up just the slightest bit and made to speak up again, but Sorun stopped him by raising a hand. "But listen, don't think switching the government to a republic system's gonna solve all you're problems. It's got its own issues, saw it all the time in America. Bureaucracy's slow as shit when it comes to changing and adding laws and the senatorial in-fighting's a nightmare, among other problems. But, otherwise... I guess it kinda worked for the most part. No government's perfect." He kicked his feet out onto the floor, crossed his arms, and turned his head away. "And far be it for me to interfere with the people's wishes. Ability to protest's a basic right. I ain't gonna interfere with that. So if you wanna round up half the town and go protest at the castle, then go ahead. I'm not with ya, but I ain't goin' against ya, either."

Sorun's words hung in the air for a few moments after he finished speaking. Amadeus continued to silently regarded Sorun, and then finally let out a resigned sigh as he slumped his shoulders a bit. "I... suppose that alone is more than I should have asked for. I apologize if I made it seem my intentions were less than pure. I merely want what's best for the people living here."

"Yeah, I know. Now get out of my room."

The fox didn't even hesitate in turning towards the door. Sorun had turned his head just slightly so his eye could watch the fox cross the room, and it was only when he'd opened the door halfway did he speak again. "One more thing."

Amadeus paused, hand still on the door's handle as he looked to Sorun. "Yes?"

"It is a peaceful protest you're planning here, right?" the human asked him. "Just a big rally where you all yell at the king? That it?"

"That is what my wife and I indeed planned, yes."

"Good. That's good." Sorun glanced towards the window. "'Cause I'm all for peaceful protest. Emphasis on the word 'peaceful'." He looked back at the fox. "I don't care what you people do as long as nobody gets hurt. If somebody does get hurt, though, or if even so much as a brick gets tossed through a window... then I don't care what your intentions are. I'll tear my way out of this hospital and drag you back here with me." He nodded his head towards the IV pole next to him. "Specifically I'll take that IV pole right there and break it across your face. Them's street rules. But that's only if things get a tad bit too rowdy. You understand."

The threat loomed in the air between them for a solid ten seconds. A legitimate threat, too, seeing as Sorun knew Amadeus knew Sorun could do it if he wanted to. He'd seen the fight, after all. And Sorun fully intended on fulfilling that promise if things really did turn violent, regardless of whose father Amadeus was. The Mobian himself stiffened up at the threat, while Sorun merely continued to stare at him with a half-bored, half-relaxed expression, going as far as to drum his spectral claws along his real flesh-and-blood arm.

"... Don't use that course language around my son." Amadeus stepped through the opened door. "Have a good rest of your day. And get well soon."

The door closed behind him a bit harder than it ought to have as Amadeus left. Sorun simply breathed outwards as he relaxed his body and looked back towards the window.

"I swear, the whole Prower family is out to kill me from stress alone. Merlin, Amadeus, Tails, I'm just waiting for his mom to get a shot at screwing me over. Huh. Miles 'Tails' Prower. Miles Prower. Ower, hour, miles per hour- OH GODDAMMIT-!"

It was official. This was the most humiliation Sorun had ever endured. Nothing topped this. It was the pinnacle. The summit of embarrassment. He couldn't stand it.

"Amy, please let me get out of the chair."

"Nope. Doctor's orders."

That was the summation of why he was sitting in a wheelchair being pushed around by Amy.

Granted, it was... somewhat relaxing, being pushed around the city's streets by the pink hedgehog. Nicole really had done a fantastic job designing the place from how immaculate it looked. How all the bushes and trees everywhere mixing and intertwining with the artificial architecture made the place look hyper-modern and at the same time natural and almost fit in with nature. It was nice. Homey. And admittedly it was very soothing being able to take in the sights as he was wheeled around.

Didn't stop him from hating being so restricted.

"So how are you doing, Sorun?" Amy kindly asked as he was gently pushed down a sidewalk by Amy. "I'm sorry if things have been a bit lonely in the hospital. We've all been a little busy reorganizing and getting used to things since we all moved here, and that's been a really big adjustment. I know Knuckles had to back to Angel Island yesterday to check up on things up there and for me personally it's been an utter struggle getting everything in my new home organized-" She cut herself off with a bit of a guilty chuckle. "Oh, sorry, I didn't mean to go on like that. You're feeling okay, right?"

"I've been good," he answered, eyelid twitching a bit as Sorun kept his head forwards. "So... what's the deal with these new people? And why did you give my Chao to them?"

"Oh, well, about that..." Amy made another chuckle, this one more nervous. "Virgil, um... he kind of just does what he wants. None of us could really keep him in our homes since he kept getting out and, well, nobody wanted to try and, you know, grab him." She made a soured face and turned to the side as she continued to push the wheelchair. "Your pet's kind of nasty, you know."

"You couldn't have just put him in one of the server rooms or something so Nicole could keep an eye on him?" Sorun asked. "He actually listens to her. Sometimes more than me."

"She said she was too busy," she answered with a shake of her head. "While we were trying to figure that out I had to go all the way to the Southern Baronies because we got a distress call. A mother and her daughter who had their home next to a Chao Garden all destroyed by you-know-who's nephew."

"Oh, yeah, Mr. I'm-Gonna-Cut-His-Head-Off-Next-Time-I-See-Him-'Cause-I-Don't-Gotta-Worry-About-Eggman-Bombing-The-City-Anymore." Sorun made an affirmative sound. "What was he doing harassing some random folks?"

Amy made an annoyed scoff. "Chao have a bit of Chaos energy in them and we guess he assumed the readings he got from the Chao Garden were a Chaos Emerald or Power Rings or something. He's made the same mistake before according to Sonic. Then he went and destroyed the place anyways, and the family's home along with it," she continued with a small sigh. "I saved the family and all their Chao but their homes were gone. I had to let them stay at my house until Nicole built them a new one, and I had to convince her to make a Chao Garden in the park where she put the artificial Lake of Rings she made. So the important thing is they're all fine."

"Okay... but why'd you give my Chao to them?"

"Because nobody else wanted to watch him and one of the people I saved, Cream, is really good with Chao. She even has some of her own and managed the Chao Garden she used to live next to; she's got a lot of experience. So I decided to just hand him off to her until you got better."

"Ah-huh." The sidewalks began to disappear as they entered into the park area of the city. With a small frown, Sorun craned his head around to face Amy. "It kinda just sounds like you foisted Virgil onto some random stranger just 'cause you didn't wanna look after him."

"He ripped one of my dresses, Sorun! I don't have many of those left since most of my stuff got lost in Knothole!"

Sorun's head flinched back a bit when Amy all but screeched that at him. He made a single sigh, and then faced back forwards while sagging in the wheelchair. "Alright, fair enough," he mumbled out as Amy resumed pushing him. "So this girl, er, Cream and- what was her mother's name again?"

"Vanilla."

"We're onto food now?" Sorun made an exasperated noise, shook his head, and asked, "So how is she with Virgil?" The last thing he wanted to hear was that his pet Chao had acted untoward a little girl that had been looking after him. He didn't even know if he should expect such a miracle like him behaving since Amy had went and dumped him with a complete stranger. Of course, the last thing he expected was for the Chao to do something seriously bad like accidentally poke a hole in the girl by mistake with one of his bladed arms, he wasn't that vicious, but then again he liked cutting Sonic at every available opportunity. Even so Sorun was fairly certain he only did it because he knew he couldn't actually physically harm the hedgehog.

At least that's what Sorun thought.

"I don't know," Amy said in answer to Sorun's previous question. "I've been so preoccupied I haven't really checked up on the both of them since they moved out of my home. But I'm sure everything's fine with-"

"No Mr. Virgil! No! Bad Chao!"

"Oh dear."

The part of the park Amy had wheeled Sorun onto looked relatively like a Chao Garden. Lots of grass, some trees here and there, a big pond in the middle surrounded by a bunch of Chao. All the same, default-looking blue and yellow things Virgil used to look like before he got his own form. And mostly they were all meandering about and minding their own business.

A disturbance towards the end of the Chao Garden was what drew Sorun's attention. There were two figures wholly different from the Chao all around, one Sorun recognized, and one Sorun didn't. The one he did recognize was Virgil's blue and black form, sitting up on a branch of a tall tree and looking down at the second figure, whom Sorun didn't recognize. A small, cream-colored rabbit Mobian in a white and orange dress.

"Alright, so... that's gotta be the Cream girl Amy mentioned." With a sigh, Sorun looked back up at Virgil. "Why's he gotta go and terrorize children while I'm not looking?"

The rabbit girl was reaching up towards the branch Virgil was sitting on while trying to hop up to him, but she was about ten feet too short for that. When Sorun looked closer he noted that there was something hooked on one of the blades on Virgil's arm. A small red bowtie. And he was also scowling down at the Mobian kid.

"Ugh, for the..." With a small groan, Sorun sat up off the wheelchair. "I'm gonna go deal with that."

"Are you okay to move?" Sorun paused and turned around at Amy, who was giving him a worried expression. "The doctor said-"

"Doctor, shmocter," he interrupted. "Amy, c'mon, I don't want the kid or Virgil to see me in a wheelchair and it'll only take me five minutes. Just give me this."

She looked ready to argue with him, but when he sent her a pleading look, Amy held her tongue. She looked towards the rabbit child in the distance, back to Sorun, and then made a small sigh as she shook her head. "Five minutes, and then as soon as we're out of sight it's back in the chair, mister," she said. "I don't need somebody yelling at me because I let you move around so much."

"Thanks Amy you're the best." Sorun flashed her a quick thumbs-up, to which she made a small groan and shook her head, seemingly already regretting her decision. Sorun ignored it and turned towards the distressed child and Chao, humming slightly as he thought on what to do.

"Could just walk up to them. In truth, though, just standing up on my own's kinda exhausting as it is. Could just teleport there... but I don't wanna freak the kid out." After deliberating with himself for a few moments, Sorun finally shrugged his shoulders and made up his mind. "Eh, Mobians're tough. She can handle the shock."

And so, his decision made clear, he Tricked right behind the rabbit girl that was shorter than even he was and appeared in a small crouch. She didn't register his sudden appearance, it seemed, though she did freeze completely when Sorun reached out and placed his right hand on top of her head between her large ears.

"Yo, kid. I want my Chao back."

The child continued to remain frozen even after Sorun finished speaking. He blinked a bit in confusion and removed his hand, still staring towards her even as she continued to stand in place. He started to worry he'd scared her too much, but finally she seemed to regain her senses and slowly, almost painfully so, turned around towards Sorun.

"H-hello...?" Her high voice came out as small and meek as she finally turned to meet Sorun's blue eye with her own brown ones. She'd made a small "Eep!" noise the second she registered Sorun's appearance, and then took a step back with widened eyes as she covered her mouth with her hands, eyes still affixed to him.

Sorun, in response, made a small hum and tilted his head. It almost looked like the child was afraid of him in some way from the way she was just standing there and staring at him with that wide-eyed expression. She was even shaking lightly. He wondered why until he looked down at himself, and then clicked his tongue in realization.

She was a child from outside of Knothole and this city. She probably had never even seen somebody like him before. Some weird, pale person in a black t-shirt and blue pants. The demonic-looking blue, spectral Bringer Claw replacing his arm and the eyepatch over his right eye probably didn't help his appearance, either. Or the way he'd just suddenly appeared behind her like he had.

He was probably downright terrifying from her perspective.

"Okay, maybe I could have approached this a bit more tactfully." Mentally kicking himself, Sorun stood up, placing his hands in his pockets, and tilted his head back straight. "Er... hi. Lemme try that again," he requested. "I'm Sorun. You're Cream, right? The person looking over my Chao Virgil?" He nodded up the tree. "That Chao up there?"

"S-Sorun...?" The name seemed to register with her, as he saw a bit of recognition flash in her eyes. The hands slowly lowered from her mouth, and she appeared to become much more relaxed. "Oh, you're Ms. Amy's friend!" she realized, her previous fear all but evaporating. She'd brightened up so quickly to him, in fact, that Sorun himself was slightly startled from how fast her demeanor had changed. "She told me you were hurt and couldn't look after your Chao. She seemed really worried about you."

"Er, yeah. Lotta... lotta people were worried." Sorun removed his left hand from his pocket and nervously scratched the back of his head while turning away. "So, Cream..." he continued as he looked back down at her, "what's the problem with little ol' Virgil?"

"Oh, Virgil..." Her demeanor shifted again, this time into a slightly displeased one. "Mr. Virgil's being very mean right now. He stole poor Cheese's bowtie and won't give it back!"

"..." Sorun tilted his head to the other side. "An' Cheese is...?"

"Cheese! He's this Chao right here."

She gestured to the side of her. Sorun followed the gesture, eyeing a Chao that was floating besides her. By all appearances, other than the small apple slice it currently held it looked the exact same as all the other Chao, so he'd quickly glossed over it when he'd first examined the girl thinking it was just one of the local Chao. It must have been Cream's Chao, then.

"Still... she called her Chao Cheese? For real?"

It took a monumental amount of willpower not to sigh out loud at that name right in front of the Chao's owner.

"Okay, lemme take care of this, Cream," he told her. "He'll listen to me."

"Are you sure?" she asked him. She looked hesitant at the idea, and even looked down with her hands behind her back while lightly kicking at her own feet. "It was my job to look after him, so I would feel bad if-"

"Nah, nah, he's a bit unruly, I get it. Just lemme deal with him, it's fine." He he leaned down to pat the top of her head again and gave her a small grin. "Sit tight and relax, huh?"

She looked back up at him after he removed his hand and gave him a small smile. Sorun had only seen a glance of it, though, as by then he'd already moved away from her and towards the tree. He stood a few steps away from it, sighing and looking upwards at the branch where his Chao was currently sitting on. He noticed that he was staring right at Sorun.

"Virgil, get down here."

Sorun saw that the Chao was staring at him with wide, surprised eyes. He'd obliged immediately and zoomed right off the tree branch, flying towards Sorun so fast that if Sorun didn't know any better he'd assume he meant to ram right into him. Fortunately his spectral arm managed to snap upwards out of his pocket and snatch the Chao in its grasp right before he hit him.

It was almost amusing to Sorun, seeing the look on the Chao's face. The wide smile he had on just didn't fit the appearance. The silver, crest-like horns, the sharp features, the pointed teeth; the smile just didn't fit with them. But here Virgil was, squirming in the spectral hand as he reached out towards Sorun with his bladed arms.

"Chao! Chao chao-chao! Chao!"

"Heh-heh. Glad you missed me, little guy. I'm touched."

Virgil froze almost immediately, and his mood changed in such a way he may as well have been a different Chao. His expression turned back into one Sorun recognized: a perpetual, grumpy-looking scowl. He even crossed his arms and turned away from Sorun, or at least as much as he could while still being grabbed.

"Chao." The tone was low and tersely delivered, like it was said in denial. Sorun understood immediately and shook his head as a result.

"Yeah, that's more like it. Sorry I worried you so much, pal," he said. "Did I at least look cool during the fight?"

"... Chao."

"Thattaboy." Sorun reached over with his other hand and rubbed at the spot between his silver, cylindrical horns. Virgil made a displeased noise and swiped at the finger, causing Sorun to pull back and grin a bit more.

"Alright, alright," he said, releasing Virgil so he could float in front of him with his v-shaped wings. He saw Virgil eyeing his arm, and asked, "What?"

Virgil didn't speak at first. Instead, he pointed down at the spectral arm that had been holding onto him. "Chao." He looked up at the eyepatch covering Sorun's lost eye. "Chao."

"I got a bit dinged up, so what? We're not talking about me right now," he said. "Now why don't you tell me why you're bullying the other Chao over there?"

Making another displeased sound, Virgil turned to the side, towards the Chao floating next to Cream. The plain-looking, saddened Chao holding the apple slice. Virgil scowled even deeper and turned towards Sorun.

"Chao. Chao-chao chao. Chao chao. Chao. Chao-chao. Chao. Chao."

"... I didn't get a word of that."

Virgil twitched, and then suddenly looked annoyed. "Chao." He gestured to the apple slice Cheese held. "Chao." He shook his left arm, which had the bowtie hooked to the black, organic blade on the back of the arm. "Chao."

"Ohhhh. Gotcha." Nodding in understanding, Sorun turned from his Chao to Cream. "He says Cheese stole his lunch and he's not giving the bowtie back until he gets his apple."

A gasp came from Cream, and she whirled right towards the Chao at her side, who suddenly looked very guilty from the way he shied away from her. "Cheese! Is this true?"

"... Chao..." the light blue Chao shamefully admitted.

"How could you!?" Cream exclaimed in an affronted tone. Sorun refrained from laughing due to how non-threatening her high voice and small stature made her. "Mr. Virgil is a guest of ours! You can't be mean to him like that!" She pointed up towards Virgil. "Please give him back his food so you can stop being mean to each other, Cheese."

Meanwhile, while they talked, Sorun and Virgil both turned to eye each other. "You gonna make up with her Chao at the end of this?" he asked him.

Virgil shook his head. "Chao-chao."

"Come on, man, you'll make the kid upset. And it's just an apple. You're seriously gonna hold a grudge over an apple? Just make up with the guy so the rabbit girl stops looking so sad."

After thinking for a moment, the black and blue Chao made a small sigh. "Chao."

Right after agreeing to Sorun's request, the lighter blue Chao floated into both of their views. Cheese apprehensively held the apple slice out towards Virgil, lip quivering in regret and the yellow dot above his head formed in a spiral. Virgil had taken one look at the saddened Chao before him, glanced back at Sorun, and then sighed again as he undid the bowtie secured to his arm.

"... Chao." Virgil tossed the bowtie up in the air. Cheese's eyes stared off after it, during which Virgil snatched the apple slice from his arms. The light blue Chao caught the bowtie and affixed it to his chest, while Virgil nipped at the apple slice he'd taken back.

After securing the bowtie to himself, Cheese looked back towards Virgil. "Chao?" The spiral turned into a question mark.

"Chao," Virgil replied as he took another bite of the apple.

"Chao-chao?"

"Chao-chao."

"Chao?"

"Chao." A pause. "Chao."

"Uh... problem solved, I guess." He glanced to the side at Cream. She was beaming a wide smile at the two Chao. "Er... yeah."

"Hello? Cream, dear?" Sorun's attention was drawn away from the three when he heard the sound of rustling and a womanly voice calling out behind him. "Are you here- oh my..."

"This her mom?" Sorun wondered as he turned around. "Ah, great, I don't really deal well with mo- what."

Oh, it was Cream's mom, alright. The Mobian woman he'd turned around to face was practically the spitting image of her, right down to the looks and clothing. What wasn't the same was the height. At all. In fact Sorun had never seen a Mobian as tall as the woman he'd turned around to before. His eye only came up to her chest. He had to look up just to see her bewildered eyes staring down at him.

"Why does she get to be so tall?" Sorun wondered as he took some steps back. "This is bullshit."

"Um... you must be Cream's mom," Sorun mumbled out, slightly flustered at the Mobian woman's height. "Vanilla, right? I-I'm-" he turned away to cough, "- I'm Sorun, nice to meet you."

"Oh, yes, hello." The older rabbit had gotten over her initial surprise over Sorun's appearance and straightened herself out. "You... would be the one who primarily cared for the Chao my daughter has been looking after recently, correct? I remember Amy kept speaking of you."

"Yeah, that's me." Sorun turned his head towards the smaller rabbit who, along with the two Chao, had apprached them. "Sorry if the li'l guy's been a bit of a handful for you two. I know you're both new here, so having to look after someone like Virgil probably isn't helping all that much."

To his surprise, Cream had shaken her head. "Oh, it isn't so bad. Mr. Virgil usually behaves himself really well. He hasn't ever misbehaved like this before."

"... That right?" Sorun's eye flicked up to Virgil. He avoided locking eyes with the Earthling, even grimacing slightly out of embarrassment it seemed like. "Huh." He focused back on Cream. "That's actually kinda surprising. He usually doesn't get along with that many people."

"Chao." That came from Virgil, who was still floating behind Cream with his arms crossed. It had come out sounding like a scoff.

He tried downplaying it, but he was honestly shocked that Cream called Virgil well-behaved. He usually was... but only around either himself and Nicole. Sonic's parents, too, on the occasion he was absent on a mission back in Knothole, though that was just for feeding purposes as he was usually left to his own devices otherwise. He tolerated people, but tolerance usually didn't go outside of that: basic tolerance. All the ire Amy had expressed earlier over the Chao said enough.

"Hm..." Sorun gave the small rabbit child a thoughtful look. She'd used to care for a Chao Garden according to Amy. Probably cared for this new one, too. Compared to everybody else he'd ever talked to about Chao that probably meant she was more an expert with them than anybody he knew, himself included. She had a parental figure to boot, and Vanilla seemed like a responsible person. She was a mother, she had to be.

Probably more responsible than Sorun was. Hell, individually they both probably were.

"... To hell with it. I'm not gonna be around much longer, and there's nobody better qualified. Not really sure about leaving him with total strangers, but... egh, I'll leave him with 'em for now and think on it. Come to a more final decision later."

Well, that's what he thought, but Sorun really doubted he'd find anybody better than the small rabbit family surrounding him at the moment. If they decided to do it, great. Worst case Sorun would just have to leave Virgil in the Chao Garden here when he finally died, and all things considered leaving him in a small park filled with his own kind in a safe and secure city surrounded by Mobians he implicitly trusted wasn't exactly the worse idea in the world. But he'd make up his mind on that later. For now he'd see if the family would take him so he could see if that would work out.

"Hey, Cream," Sorun said as he kneeled down in front of her. "You mind holding onto Virgil a little longer for me?"

Virgil's head whipped in Sorun's direction in surprise. "Chao?"

Cream seemed equally surprised at the request. "R-really?"

"Well, you see, I'm not really sure the hospital I'm staying at right now allows pets." He gave her a small grin while scratching the back of his head with his spectral hand. "I know he's a bit too smart to be called a pet, but I dunno if the doctors would see it like that."

"Chao."

Sorun looked up at the Chao when he heard the displeased sound he made. "Come on, don't be like that. I'm on thin ice with the doctors there as-is. You know how much they keep yelling at me over there?" He nodded his head to the light blue Chao with the red bowtie floating nearby. "'Sides, don't you wanna hang with your new friend for a bit longer?"

An affronted expression crossed Virgil's face. "Chao!" he said in denial.

"Sooner you accept it the less of a headache it is in the long run. Trust me on this one." Sorun looked back down at Cream. Her mouth was downturned, which made him pause a bit before speaking again. "Sorry if I'm asking for a bit too much here. I'm not saying you have to. I can just leave him in the Chao Garden and get him when I finally get out of the hospital, so-"

"No, no! It's completely fine. I actually wouldn't mind looking after him for a little bit longer if mother allows it."

At once, both of the Chao, Cream, and Sorun looked back at the older Mobian in the group. She looked about just as surprised as Cream had when Sorun made the request, though at the same time she still had that easygoing smile that looked downright motherly. And it was focused mainly on Sorun, forcing him to turn away a bit. "I don't think that would be much of a problem at all, Sorun. You don't need to worry. We'd be happy to keep him a while longer for you."

"T-that's great, thanks..." he quietly mumbled out.

"Mr. Sorun?" A tug on Sorun's pant leg drew his attention to the smaller rabbit. She still had that small, sad look on her face. "Mrs. Amy said you were really hurt. Is that why you have to stay at the hospital?" he saw her eyes look towards his spectral arm replacing his missing one. "Is your... is your arm supposed to look like that?"

She looked like she was on the verge of tears.

"Aw, geez, come on, no, don't cry, not in front of your mom, I can't handle crying kids." Thinking fast, Sorun put on a faux smile that looked as genuine as he could possibly make it and waved it at the small rabbit child. "What, this? Nah, the arm's supposed to look like this. I'm kinda special like that." His left Bringer Claw appeared over his shoulder, making Cream jump a bit. "See, I even have an extra third arm. If anything I have too many arms." The Bringer Claw disappeared as Sorun pocket both his hands and stood up from his kneeling position. "I, uh... just kind of got a bit hurt. Y'know, doin' Freedom Fighter stuff. Hazardous position. I'm completely fine, so don't worry about me."

"O-oh. Okay." To Sorun's immense relief, Cream looked to calm down. The corners of her mouth even started to upturn a bit, which was a welcome change to how it did look. "I only asked because Ms. Amy seemed really worried about you when we moved in with her. She and a bunch of her friends in the Freedom Fighters kept talking about you."

"Yeah, uh... some stuff happened. And they're really great people like that. But like I said, it's all good now, so... yeah." His tolerance needed to keep a straight face was running short. He couldn't do this much longer. "Listen, speaking of which, I gotta go back. Nice meetin' ya Cream, Vanilla. Cheese." He turned around to give the tall Mobian a brief nod, and then faced back forwards and downwards to give the smaller one and the Chao next to her the same nod. "I'll see you around, I guess."

"Bye, Mr. Sorun!" Cream waved to Sorun as he began walking away. "Please get better soon!"

"It was wonderful meeting you, Sorun," Vanilla called after him. "We'll make sure to look after little Virgil, so do make sure to focus on your own recovery."

"Chao!" Similar to his owner, Cheese waved after Sorun.

"Yeah, guys, I'll do that. Again, thanks." Sorun stopped moving when he crossed next to Virgil, turning his head so the two's eyes met. "Seriously, man, behave yourself around them," he quietly mumbled to him. "They seem really nice and I got enough stuff to worry about here."

Virgil rolled his eyes at Sorun, but then stopped when his eyes fell on Cream, who was looking towards them. He paused, continuing to stare after her for a few moments before the Chao sighed out and looked back to Sorun. "Chao." The sound came out as low and resigned, and with it came a small nod.

"Thanks, pal." Sorun gave Virgil a quick thumbs-up, and then quickly turned around towards where he left Amy and the wheelchair. Without another word, he continued moving forwards, choosing not to look back at the group.

"I don't know. I probably am just gonna end up leavin' Virgil with 'em," Sorun thought to himself. "They seem like a nice bunch. Might do Virgil some good if he's around another Chao like him, too. Give him a little friend he can act all cool around to stroke his ego further. Pfft, yeah, like that's the last thing he needs." He took a small breath and looked towards the sky. "It's all comin' together. Kinda scary to think about."

He passed a tree and saw Amy from the corner of his vision while he mused to himself, chair right besides her. He'd given her a single curt nod and continued walking forwards. He only made it a few steps before she called out to him.

"Sorun. Chair."

"Aw, come on, Amy," Sorun complained as he turned back to her, "do I really need-?"

She had her hammer in her hands.

Sorun froze when he saw it, and then looked up at Amy. Her eyes (eye?) was narrowed at him in a threatening manner. "You'd really hit a cripple, Amy?" he asked her.

"Won't have to if you get in the chair."

With a loud, resigned sigh, Sorun hung his head and made his way towards her and the wheelchair.

"Push me down the hill."

"No."

"Oh, come on!" Sorun turned his upper half around to look at the person holding the handles of the wheelchair behind him. "I barely ever get any fun while tied to this thing, Nicole, and the hill isn't even that steep!"

Nicole glanced her green eyes down at Sorun. Her mouth was in a thin line, and her expression was a cross between looking amused and stern. "My apologies, Sorun. I hadn't realized me taking time to personally come and visit you didn't provide you with adequate amusement."

Sorun opened his mouth to retort, but only wordless sounds came out as he failed to formulate a good enough response. He settled with sighing and turning back forwards, crossing his arms in the process. "That's not what I meant and you know it," he mumbled out.

All in all, behind all the teasing Nicole had a point. He could have just been left in his hospital room to rot, but the ever-merciful Dr. Quack allowed him movement in the form of a wheelchair outside of that place on the condition someone was there to wheel him around. Only reason he got Amy to take him out earlier was because of that. And it was the only reason Nicole was wheeling him around outside right now.

The AI lynx had wanted to show him around the city. Or parts of it, at least. Sorun had noted that no matter where she took him the hospital was always somewhere in sight or at least close by, and he wasn't even sure she had any specific destinations in mind. She was kind of just wheeling him around wherever, seemingly aimlessly, as they both talked about whatever was on their mind. Sorun didn't awfully mind too much, something that slightly surprised him. But it was nice just being there, talking with her, even if he was confined to a wheelchair. He didn't care where it was or what they were doing.

He still would have liked to go down that hill, though, if only because he'd never rolled down a hill in a wheelchair before. Not for any particular reason other than he just wanted to see what it was like. A spontaneous urge. Unfortunately, it didn't seem like Nicole agreed in letting him act on this urge.

"C'mon, it'll just take a few seconds," he eagerly said in an attempt to get her to push him down the grass hill they were on top of. "There's not even anything in the way, it's a clean shot. I'll be fine."

Nicole shook her head. "I am aware you have a proclivity towards unusual activities, Sorun, but I'm afraid I cannot allow that. You're still recovering."

He made a "tch" sound, and then gripped the arms of the wheelchair. "Look, how about I just get up and carry the chair halfway down the hill so it's not as dangerous-"

Sorun was stopped midsentence when one of Nicole's hands placed itself on his left shoulder, and then pushed down hard enough that he was forcibly sat back down in the chair. "I think you're fine here," she said.

Grumbling under his breath, Sorun finally relented and released his hold on the wheelchair's arms, choosing to fold them in his lap. "Alright, fine," he muttered out. "So, going back to what we were talking about before," he continued in a lighter voice, "What made you want to name this place New Mobotropolis?"

Nicole began pushing the wheelchair along again. When Sorun glanced back at her he saw that the stern look had completely vanished, leaving behind the small smile Nicole had on beforehand. "Originally the Kingdom of Acorn inhabited a city named Mobotropolis. It was renamed to Robotropolis at Dr. Robotnik's behest following his conquer of the city, though the city itself now lays in ruin."

"Oh, yeah, it got nuked 'cause of a foible in one of Robotnik's schemes, right?" Sorun asked. "I'm not really familiar with what happened exactly but that's the gist, isn't it?"

"Yes, essentially," Nicole answered. "There were many that were disheartened by the destruction of the city, even though much of what it had formerly been had been stripped away by Dr. Robotnik. One of the reasons I devised to create this city in the first place was to try and give the Mobian people here back a piece of what they had lost." Her features brightened up a bit more. "As it happens, the city ruins itself is contained so none of the nuclear material and fallout bleeds out into the surrounding nature, though I made it so that radiation from those ruins runs off to New Mobotropolis via an underground conduit. It gets filtered and transferred into the power generators that power the nanites that comprise the city. It's the primary source of power here," she explained, smile ever-so wide and sunny, with just the smallest bit of pride detected underneath Nicole's humble attitude.

"You decided to power the nanite city with... nuclear runoff?" Sorun asked, quirking his eyebrow. "Why?"

"More siphoning off and purifying the ambient radiation from the Robotropolis ruins, but yes, that is correct. It was a readily-accessible and abundant supply of energy that was doing more harm than good merely existing in city reduced to rubble," Nicole succinctly answered.

"Sounds... practical, I guess," Sorun admitted. Practical, if not a bit strange. If it worked, he supposed... "Won't the city run out of power though once all the radiation is clear?"

"That is why I created a Lake of Rings. The hope is that one day the energy conversion process will clean the Robotropolis ruins so that nobody will be harmed by simply being near them. Perhaps then a new city could be rebuilt there."

"Yeah, but they already got this city," Sorun said.

"True," she agreed, "but there's only so much space here. I would very much like it if this city remained indefinitely to give Mobians a home, but population numbers do not remain static. These are what-ifs for events that will not happen for decades from now, though. For now I believe everybody is content with this home, and I myself am content with the freedom it has afforded me."

Sorun turned around to look at Nicole again. A wry grin grew across his features. "You didn't make this city just to give everybody a new home, did you, Nicole?"

"Well... perhaps not, no." She turned a bit away from Sorun as the smile on her face turned a bit shy. "You know I always wanted a chance to live life among Mobians, away from that handheld. In a way that wasn't restricted by all the power requirements and time limits. I saw no reason why I could not benefit from the city the same as everyone else."

Sorun smirked, but said nothing as he turned back forwards. Not like he could blame her for wanting something like that after being stuck inside that handheld for practically her whole life. It made him wonder if she wanted that almost more than giving everyone a new home, but considering she'd done both at the same time, he didn't see any point dwelling on the question.

The wheelchair stopped. Sorun made a small, questioning hum, and glanced back up at Nicole. She'd stopped walking and chose to look down at Sorun with a strange look. The smile wasn't on her face anymore, though her green eyes were still staring into his one. She looked almost... discontent with something from the way she was looking at him.

"I made this city to help everybody... and yet, it seems not to have been able to help you all that much, Sorun," she quietly stated.

"Huh?" He gave her a confused look. "What do you mean? I woulda died if you didn't make the hospital and all the equipment in there for the doctors to save me. You've helped me more than anybody else here." In more ways than one, but he didn't feel it appropriate to go that far with it.

The corners of Nicole's mouth had briefly twitched upwards in appreciation of Sorun's words, but it hadn't gone to completely improve her mood all that much. "That means more to me than you know, Sorun, but... I'm not satisfied with just that." She looked downwards to his arm. The spectral one.

Oh. He knew where this was going immediately when she looked at the arm.

"I don't like seeing you like this. Missing body parts. Being... incomplete." She looked up at his face. Sorun couldn't help but note she was focusing more on his eyepatch than his actual eye. "Why won't you allow anybody to transfer cybernetic replacements on you?" she asked. "I could ask Rotor and Tails for assistance with the designs. We could make them in a way that would suit your tastes. It would only take me minutes to construct them from nanites, and the doctors are accomplished in their field. There would be absolutely no risk to you and you would have everything you lost back."

"I don't need them," he answered simply, raising his spectral arm up. "I have all the arms I need right here." He lowered it back into his lap. "If you count my Doppelganger I technically have seven arms."

"At least let me replace your eye," she pleaded with him.

He shook his head. "I'm fine."

"Are you that worried about having to adjust to cybernetics? You can talk to Bunnie; she could help you. I promise it won't be bad for-"

"It's not that," Sorun interrupted. "I just don't want them."

"Sorun, please."

"It'd be a waste of your time and nanites."

"It would not be a waste!"

They'd both flinched back when Nicole raised her voice. Sorun in surprise, not having expected her to take it that far. Nicole seemed more shocked than anything, having went as far as to release her hold on the chair to cover her mouth with her hands as she looked at him with wide eyes. A few beats passed, and she slowly seemed to calm down as she lowered her hands while looked down slightly.

"It would not be a waste to help you," Nicole quietly reiterated. "I would not be offering to give what I would consider a piece of myself to you if it were a waste. I'm doing it because you're you. Please just consider it, Sorun. For me?" she asked him. "I just want to help you."

It took all of Sorun's effort not to groan out loud and cover his face. He knew where she was coming from - he almost wanted to go through with it just to make her stop feeling bad - but he meant what he said. No point in becoming a cyborg when he was dying soon. No use in wasting everybody's efforts like that. No use in getting inhibited by hardware he wasn't familiar with when what he had right now worked just fine. And he for sure didn't want Nicole using her nanites on him. It was already eating him alive knowing what him dying might do to her without adding that onto it. If things were different he would have said yes. But they weren't. He just didn't have a use for them with the time he had.

But, he could at least give Nicole some hope. False hope made from a lie, but that wouldn't be so different compared to everything else he did to her and everybody else. Just a lie to placate her for a while longer until he finally died. It'd make him feel horrible, but at least it would improve her mood for the time being.

"I'll... I'll think about it, alright?" he said, causing her to look back up at him. "It's just not easy for me to get into something like that immediately. But I don't like seeing you so worried, so... I'll think it over. Just give me some time with it."

It tore at something in him to say that, knowing he was lying, but at least it got Nicole to brighten up considerably. She even started smiling again. "That's all I'm asking for," she said. "You needn't worry, Sorun. I'm confident we can get the resolution in the artificial eye's lens to a point that you will not even be able to tell the difference between it and your organic eye. I'll even see about making it resemble your organic eye. You won't notice a thing."

"Yeah, that's... that's real great, Nicole," Sorun mumbled out, lacking all energy as he looked to the right. "Real great... hm?"

He noticed there was somebody down at the bottom of the grass hill they were both on, sitting on a bench with their shoulders slumped over. When he squinted to look closer, he realized he recognized the regal red and blue uniform the person wore. He found it especially hard not to recognize the tail and the crown on top of their head.

"Hey, is that Elias down there?" Sorun asked, pointing towards the person in question. Nicole followed his gesture and looked towards where he was pointing.

"Yes, I believe it is," she said. "He looks rather unwell, Sorun."

"Yeah." A few sparks of blue electricity danced along Sorun's body as a small smirk played over his lips. "Yeah, he sure does."

Before Nicole could say anything else, she felt somebody tap her shoulders. She turned completely around to greet whoever it was behind her, but then stopped halfway when she realized it wasn't a person at all behind her. It was Sorun's spectral Doppelganger, who was playfully waving at her before it dissipated. When she turned back around towards Sorun, she saw him wheeling towards the edge of the hill, no doubt with the intent to roll down it.

"Yeeeaah- oh come on."

He'd barely even gotten any momentum before the grass in front of him rose up a few feet in the shape of a rectangular, green wall. The wheelchair had softly collided with it, halting all his momentum and causing Sorun to grow a flat, disappointed face. The wall was only lowered back down when Nicole had calmly walked behind him and grasped the wheelchair's handles.

"I believe we'll be taking the safe way down the hill," Nicole said as she turned Sorun's chair around. "There just happens to be a paved walkway right over there that leads to the bench Elias is sitting on."

"She's literally omnipotent here with all these nanites, isn't she?" A small, unenthused sigh left Sorun, and he found himself slumping into the wheelchair as Nicole gently pushed him along down the path. "All I wanted was a bit of fun, damn..."

Slowly - agonizingly slow in the most unenthusiastic and mind-numbing way possible all in the name of something as trite as safety - both Nicole and Sorun had reached the bench Elias was sitting on. He didn't even seem to acknowledge their presence. He wasn't even staring out into the pond that was in front of him. Just staring down at his own boots.

Nicole and Sorun glanced at each other with unsure expressions that mirrored each other, and then faced back towards Elias. It was Nicole that took the initiative and spoke out to him. "Your highness?"

Blue eyes darted up to the pair of them. The most Elias did was breath out slowly and look back down. "Hello Nicole, Sorun," he glumly greeted. "I'm glad to see you're doing well, Sorun."

"... You really don't sound like it," Sorun pointed out. His statement caused Nicole to raise a hand up and slightly nudge the side of his head. He hissed out in surprise and swatted the hand away.

"Do I not? Forgive me, I'm... I'm a bit out of sorts." Elias sighed again and looked up at the pond. "I presume you're here about the riot?"

"Uh... riot?" Sorun blinked in confusion, and then looked up at Nicole. He was even more confused when he saw she didn't seem fazed by the news at all. Like it wasn't even news to her. "What-what riot, there was a riot?"

And now they looked confused at him. "The riot," Elias repeated. "Half the town was lead by general Amadeus Prower in a massive protest. They kept demanding I step down from power."

"The guy actually went and did that? And I missed it?" Sorun thought. "When did this happen?"

"Sorun, it was this afternoon," Nicole informed him, sounding a bit stunned. "You... what were you doing this afternoon that made you miss all of that?"

"Well, uh... in the morning Amy wheeled me to the park 'cause I had a whole thing with Virgil going on, then I went back, and after that, uh..."

"~And the notches on his pistol numbered one and nineteen more- man, what is with the racket?" Sorun muttered out, interrupting his song as he looked towards the window. He could faintly hear what sounded like a crowd of people, though it was too faint for him to pick up anything intelligible. It mostly just served as annoying white noise.

White noise that made him lose track of where he was in the song.

"Damn, where was I?" he muttered to himself. "Man... I'm starting to run out of songs I heard in video games from back home..."

"... I dunno."

Elias looked a bit skeptical at Sorun's claim, as did Nicole, though he didn't act on it at all. He just looked back towards the pond. "I was forced to detain the general and disperse the mob."

"You... detained him?" Sorun asked. "Why?"

"Because what else was I to do when half of the city comes knocking on the castle's front door demanding I step down so they can reorganize the entire government?" Elias looked back to Sorun. "Do you think I made a mistake?"

"Well, um... did things get violent?"

"No."

"Was there any property damages? Like a thrown brick, or...?'

"No."

"Ah, ooh, oh..." Sorun nervously scratched at his cheek with his spectral claws. "You, um, you sure that was the best idea?"

"I don't know, Sorun. That's why I asked you if you thought I made a mistake."

"... That was a real question?" Sorun asked. "I thought you were being rhetorical." Nicole nudged the side of his head again, a bit harder this time. "Man, quit it," he quietly whispered as he softly batted the hand away.

"Yes, it was real." Groaning, Elias slumped forwards and held a hand to his face, shaking his head while muttering out in a voice so quiet Sorun had to strain to hear it. "I visited Amadeus in the detention center, and he... he made a number of valid arguments, Sorun. Time and again for decades the royal family has come up short. The war with the Overlanders, everything having to do with Dr. Robotnik, we've lost both Mobotropolis and Knothole now..." He made a deep sigh. "It seems like it's only because of the Freedom Fighters that anything ever got done. They're the ones that pulled the royal family back together, rebuilt the government, kept things in order under Robotnik's tyranny. And the good general was quick to remind me how a band of children was needed to keep the kingdom from falling apart in those dark times." He slowly turned to Sorun. "And how the only price we needed to pay to survive the invasion of Knothole was to watch a Freedom Fighter fight the Doctor one-on-one and get dismembered in front of all of us."

"I mean he's not exactly wr- don't you do it." Sorun turned just in time to see Nicole's fingers near his head. "Anyway, you don't think he maybe has a-" he briefly cut himself off to quickly glance at Nicole again, and when he saw no hand near him, he continued, "- point? Listen, I don't blame you or anybody else for what happened to me back in New Megaopolis, that was all on me, but the other stuff..." Sorun exhaled and looked up. "Well, I've only been around for about four and a half months so I can't really say I'm in a good position to criticize all that other stuff, but, well... it sounds kinda legit." He looked back down at Elias. "You seriously arrested him over a peaceful protest?"

"Don't make me ask again, Sorun. Just say you agree or disagree with me."

Shrugging, Sorun said, "Alright, I disagree." He waited a second, and when Elias looked for him to continue, he elaborated. "I know, like, nothing about the king game, RTS games were never really my thing, but I think it's reasonable to assume that a king's supposed to listen to his people, right? And when they tried talking to you, you... kinda just locked up the guy speaking for them," Sorun said, making Elias hang his head again. "If things went violent then yeah, that's when you step in, but they didn't. That's less keeping the peace and more stifling the public voice."

"And riling up half the people in the city is meant to keep the peace?"

"I mean when you say it like that-"

"And what am I to do, Sorun?" Elias continued. "Disband the monarchy that has been ruling the kingdom for hundreds of years? Hand the city over to people who want to be in power just because they asked? Is that the precedent I should set here? Is that what I'm to do?"

"... I don't know, man, I suck at politics," Sorun said, genuinely clueless at what to tell Elias. "Don't you have a sister to talk about this to?"

Nicole flicked his head.

"What did I ever do to you!?" Sorun exclaimed as he turned to the lynx. He froze in place from the stern look she was giving him, after which she leaned down to whisper in his ear.

"Sorun, king Elias is clearly in distress right now and you making foolish comments and adopting flippant mannerisms is not helping matters," she quietly informed him. "Please be more thoughtful to him and try to take this seriously."

"Come on, Nicole, I don't even want to have this conversation with the guy," Sorun whispered back, eye flicking back and forth between her and Elias, who didn't even seem to be paying attention to the pair. "Why can't Sally do this? She's his sister! And even more than that she'd actually know what to say here! She has real experience with this kind of thing!"

"Because Sally isn't here right now and he trusts you as someone close to him and as someone who saved the entire kingdom. Your input is not insignificant to him," she whispered, "and we wouldn't be here if you hadn't chosen to approach him in the first place."

"What, so just because I wanted to say hi to the guy suddenly I gotta deal with all this heavy political nonsense?"

"Friends are there when needed, Sorun, not when it is convenient."

"You're seriously gonna drop this wisdom on me right now?" That's what he said. Inside, he knew she had a point, and it was far too late for him to just wheel away. Nicole probably wouldn't even let him if he tried. And admittedly he didn't like seeing Elias look like this. "Ugh, why do you have to be the right one all the time...?" Sorun muttered to the lynx as he turned to face Elias once more.

Choosing to face Elias, however, didn't meant that Sorun still had a clue on what he was supposed to say to him. He was still completely blank in that area. Government jargon and shifting political systems wasn't his forte, and he actively avoided it. He had nothing for Elias, because he genuinely didn't even know who was in the right here. He didn't exactly agree with locking up an innocent protestor, but he didn't know if he agreed with what they were trying to do, either. Because they both had good points Sorun agreed with and he didn't feel like he was embedded in the kingdom enough to actually have a good opinion in the matter.

He wasn't even a technical legal citizen, for crying out loud.

Still, he had to say something. Or at the very least string together some random words until some miracle happened. That's how he got through most conversations in life, Sorun felt.

"So, Elias-"

"Maybe they're right," the king interrupted, causing Sorun to quiet down. "I'm no king. I've barely any experience running a kingdom. I only have the crown because I was born into it. Because I came back to Knothole after spending my whole life up on Angel Island beforehand. And now I feel like running away all over again."

"Hhhhh..." Sorun glanced away from Elias for a moment in thought, and then looked back to him. "Hey, man, I have doubts all the time, too," Sorun said, gaining the king's attention. "I know I usually exude this aura of utmost confidence in everything I do, but I really don't. I mean, especially back when I first got here, 'cause boy, that..." He paused just to shake his head. "You remember how I was. The whole fish out of water thing I had going on. Admittedly it still kind of goes on every single day, but, well... I kinda get what you're coming from."

It may have been a trick of the light, but Sorun almost saw Elias' mood brighten up just the smallest bit. A minute amount. Miniscule. But it looked llike something Sorun said got through to him somewhat. "And how do you deal with these doubts, Sorun?" he asked, almost desperately.

Unfortunately, all Sorun could offer was a shrug. "I don't know, never figured it out." He felt the hairs on the back of his neck stand up on end when he sensed Nicole's hand near his head, so he spoke quickly to stay her motions. "Most of the time it feels like I don't even know what I'm doing and everything I do end up doing is done in a blind panic. I'm a joke of a strategist. Never really plan all that much. So when I'm in doubt, and don't know what to do, I just do whatever feels right, without even thinking about it, and a good chunk of the time I'll have made... maybe not the right choice, but still a good choice."

The black-furred hand stilled in the air next to Sorun's head, and then lowered back down to Nicole's side. Sorun found himself exhaling in relief.

"I'm not sure I know a single person in the entire world that thinks like you do, Sorun," he heard Elias mutter out. The statement was followed by the squirrel making a bitter, sorrowful chuckle. "You really are unique like that, you know? I truly mean it."

"So does that mean my advice took?"

Elias chuckled again. "Oh, no. It's complete rubbish." Sorun frowned a bit, though it dropped when Elias spoke again. "Then again, this entire situation is rubbish, Sorun, so I truly think that rubbish advice is the best possible advice you could have given me."

"... Yeah, man. Totally." He was just winging it at this point, but it seemed like whatever Sorun was saying was working. He decided to roll with it. "So what are you going to do?"

"I'm still unsure. If I'm to be completely honest, if I were to follow your advice my first reaction would be to agree to Amadeus so we could hash out terms, but..."

"But...?" Sorun hedged.

"But there's still the issue of-" Elias cut himself off mid-sentence, looking at something behind Sorun with widened eyes as his posture straightened up. "My father."

Squeak.

"Speak of the devil..." He knew that menacing squeak from anywhere. The sound of a creaky wheel on a wheelchair. Even more, he knew that specific squeak. That was the squeak of the former king's wheelchair.

Taking in a sharp inhale, Sorun slowly turned his head around to where Elias was looking. He noticed Elias' mother there at first, Alicia, who was behind a wheelchair that most certainly was not Sorun's. Because in that chair was an aged squirrel Mobian, glaring towards his own son. Maximillian.

"He won't 'cause of his dad? Yeah, I guess I can see that. Don't really think the idea of giving up a monarchy spanning hundreds of years would really go well with an old-fashioned guy like..." Sorun's thoughts paused when he saw Maximillian's face. "Wait, what's wrong with him?"

There was something amiss in the old Mobian's eyes. They looked... strangely vacant, for some odd reason. Sorun couldn't place it. Even his general expression was only half-focused on Elias. He didn't seem distracted, but he didn't seem all there, either.

"Hey, Maximillian?" Sorun called out. He inwardly cringed when the Mobian turned his way, but didn't seem to be facing him completely. "Uh... hey, look, now we both have wheelchairs. Isn't that cool?"

"..." Maximillian's eyes just barely managed to focus in on Sorun. "What is an Overlander doing in the kingdom?"

"Uh... I'm a human. An Earthling human," Sorun corrected. "I'm Sorun. Remember? We talked about the wood tablet thing, and it was... it was a really awkward conversation? 'Member that?" No response. "I... saved literally the entire kingdom by fighting Dr. Robotnik in a mech suit of death in front of everybody? Lost an arm and an eye?" Still no response. "... Dude, come on, that was like a week ago."

"..."

Now Sorun was just uncomfortable. He looked up at Alicia, and then internally winced when he saw the pained look on her face. He looked back at Elias and saw he had a similar expression. A pained, pitying look.

"Sorun, erm... could, could you please give us the room, as it were?" Elias softly requested. "My father, he... he really only responds to familiar faces these days. I mean no offense, but your appearance... I fear it might upset him-"

"No, yeah, I get it. I'll... we'll leave." Sorun glanced up at Nicole, who was also giving Maximillian a sad look. "Hey, Nicole? Can we please go back to the hospital?"

"I think that would be best." Nicole gripped the handles of the wheelchair and slowly spun Sorun around. "We'll be taking our leave now." She offered Elias a hopeful smile. "King Elias, I'm sure things will turn out for the best, so please try not to strain yourself too much."

"Mm. Take care you two."

And then, they left. Not soon enough, as far as Sorun was concerned. Even as Nicole pushed him away Sorun couldn't help but look back towards the setting sun. He focused less on the orange horizon and more on the family trio that was slowly shrinking away due to the growing distance.

"All respect to Elias, but... I think his dad's going senile," Sorun muttered out, his eye still on the family. "Like... legitimately. Guy's really old, isn't he?"

"He is rather advanced in his years, yes," Nicole said in a tone a bit more quiet than usual. "I have doubts that Dr. Robotnik's attack, the destruction of Knothole, and the abduction of the entire kingdom helped his mental state."

"Yeah, probably not..." Having seen enough, Sorun finally turned his body forwards on the chair. "Must be really rough to be Elias right now..."

Sorun hadn't been able to sleep all that well that night. He hadn't slept at all, really. He'd laid in bed for a solid thirty seconds before he realized he just wasn't tired. And now it was the middle of the night and his room was probably the only one in the whole hospital with the lights on.

Too many things had happened today for him to just sleep on it. He tried to keep it out of his mind, but all that served to do was leave Sorun alone in an empty hospital room. Boredom led to him laying in bed and staring up at the ceiling. Boredom from that lead to pacing.

The exhaustion following that lead him to sitting at the window and looking out at the city.

"Dead of night and all lights are out. 'Cept for the ones in the castle." His eyes traveled to the center of the city, where the brand-new castle was. He couldn't help but look at the lit-up window he could see even at this distance, compared to all the other houses and structures in the city that were all dark. "Wonder if Elias is as sleepless as I am right now? Guy probably has almost as much stuff on his mind as I do." He exhaled to fog the window. "What am I even doing? My last days left alive and I'm spending 'em angsting away. Guess I really don't know how much longer I got, though..."

In truth, he hadn't been putting any effort forwards towards locating the last Chaos Emerald. Nobody had, really, but Sorun hadn't been pushing for it, either. Never even asked or inquired about it. Knowing it'd all end with that last Emerald had him dragging his feet towards the finish line. No more than delaying the inevitable, perhaps, but it was the best he could do with what he had.

"Wasted so much time being the standoffish guy in the corner when I just folded in the end anyways..." Sorun began dragging his index finger along the fogged glass to form a shape. "I don't even know what I'm doing anymore. Just... waiting? Is there anything I can do?" His finger curved upwards. "Just wanna spend a bit more time with them. With her. 'Til the end."

He'd only half-finished the heart he was drawing in the window until he saw a green flash of light reflect off the glass, coming from the middle of the room behind him. Sorun's eye had squinted in confusion as he stared towards the window's reflection, and then it widened dramatically when he saw it was Nicole's reflection.

There'd been a great, heavy wheeze of panic that left Sorun as he quickly wiped away the half-finished drawing with his hand before spinning himself and the wheelchair around completely. Indeed, Nicole was there. Staring right at Sorun. Before she'd even opened her mouth, though, Sorun had gotten the first word in.

"Nicole, jeez! You scared me," he sighed out. "You can't just teleport into people's rooms like that without a single word. It's super rude." Not even he went that far with his Trickster power. Scare people for laughs, sure, but he didn't invade privacy with it.

Nicole started, straightening up a bit while glancing away from Sorun with an apologetic look. "I'm sorry, Sorun. I'm still adjusting to corporeal life. I'll knock next time." She looked back towards him, and he saw her eyes brighten a bit in relief. "I just wanted to come check on you."

sorun relaxed a bit, though he was still a bit puzzled. "Okay...? Why?"

The relieved look in Nicole's eyes went away. She made a small frown before addressing him. "We're currently undergoing a small crisis," she told him. "Tails and his mother are currently attempting to break general Amadeus out of prison."

"Wow, really?" Sorun found himself so surprised that he actually laughed a bit, and had to cover his mouth as he stared down at the floor with a widened eye. "Wow, way to go, li'l guy. Never thought you'd take things that far." He always seemed too mild-mannered to do something like that. And here he was. Committing borderline-treason against the kingdom. Sorun had to respect it.

Nicole didn't look nearly as amused as Sorun did. "Sorun, this is serious," she said.

"I know, I know." The amused grin fell off his lips as he looked back up at her. "So what's gonna happen?"

"I went to inform Sonic of the break-in at the detention center, but he took off before I had an opportunity to tell him it was Tails. I'm going to the castle now to alert king Elias of the incident so he can decide how we proceed. I just came to ensure nothing was amiss here." She paused, glanced towards the empty bed, and then looked back at Sorun. "Why aren't you sleeping?"

As much as Sorun found the prospect Nicole randomly checking on him strange, if not a bit pleasant, he found the question stranger. "Because I couldn't sleep," he answered in a simple tone. "You seriously teleported in here just to see if I was okay?"

"Yes. I did. And now I must talk with the king." Nicole's form slowly began to disappear. "Please try and get some sleep, Sorun. You need your rest."

"I mean I'm not really that tir- and she's gone." Sorun probably stared at the spot Nicole had been standing for a good thirty seconds before he breathed out and wheeled back towards the window.

"Amadeus Prower. Gotta be honest. Don't really like ya too much. You seem like kind of a user," Sorun thought as he looked towards the castle. "But, on the other hand, guess your heart is in the right place for what you're trying to do for the people. And you seem like a straight-shooter of a dad for a guy who was absent most his son's life since he was stuck in space with aliens. I fucking hate the fact I can think that unironically and it's true.

"Still, you tried your little protest and it went absolutely nowhere. Got you locked up. Now your own family's putting themselves on the line for ya, so what's a desperate guy to do? You gonna skip the whole game and try to run to the final boss up there in the castle? Hell, putting myself in your shoes, I can't think of any other options. It's what I'd do. Don't really feel like letting you go all Julius Caesar on Elias, though.

"Ahh, Amadeus... you put me between a rock and a hard place. I really didn't wanna get involved. Maybe things'd go fine if I did nothing, but on the off chance it doesn't, well... that wouldn't sit well with me." He wheeled the wheelchair around and rolled it towards his bed. "Sorry, Tails. Looks like I gotta go feed your dad his own teeth."

He reached forwards and grabbed at the IV pole next to his bed. Maybe he was being paranoid. In fact, Sorun hoped he was being paranoid and that the first thing the fox Mobian would do after his family sprung him from jail was go straight to the king to try and enact some bloody coup in an ill-fated attempt at changing the government. Because that would be stupid.

It was because it was stupid that Sorun strongly suspected that exactly just that was happening, because that's what this world operated on: stupidity.

"Just in case I need that little saline electrolyte top-off on the way there," Sorun thought as he jammed the IV needle into his arm. "Alright. Full speed ahead! No stopping 'til I get to the castle so I can smash this over Amadeus' face in case he really did do a dumb."

With the IV pole in hand, bag of clear fluid hanging off of it and the tube connected to it stabbed into his arm, Sorun manifested his left Bringer Claw and began pushing the wheels on his wheelchair towards the door to the hospital room. One quick twist of the handle later and the door was opened, after which Sorun wheeled right out of the room.

It hadn't even been a full minute after the door to Sorun's hospital room swung closed after he left that it opened again. What popped inside was a head covered in a red hood, which slowly scanned the room to ensure it was empty. After confirming that the room was, in fact, empty, Rubrum quickly opened the door, slinked into the room, and then shut it behind him.

"Lookin' smooth," Rubrum mumbled under his breath as he stepped away from the door. "So I guess I just leave this lying around for him to find later. Where's the cabinet- oh, there."

After taking another brief look around the room, Rubrum spotted what he was looking for: the series of white cabinets above the sink in the back of the hospital room. He slowly began to approach it, all the while rolling around a syringe full of a clear fluid in his right hand.

With his left hand he reached up and opened the cabinet, gently placed the needle inside of the cabinet, and then shut it.

"Easy peasy." Giving himself and accomplished sigh, the red-cloaked man then turned towards the room's window and approached it. He opened it up, and then began crawling through it with some difficulty due to its small size. He'd finally made it all the way through, though right as he did and closed the window behind him his grip on the window had slipped, resulting in Rubrum yelling out a curse as he fell away from the window.

"Deja vu... I've just been in this place... before..."

So New Mobotropolis' layout wasn't that intuitive. In terms of the shape of the perimeter, it was circular in nature. A protective barrier surrounded the whole city (thank god, Nicole knew the value of walls), and beyond that was a small, artificial forest that circled the city. It was past that the city actually started.

The outer perimeter of a good half of the city was a residential district where all the homes were. Nice place, orderly layout and lots of grass and trees. Right in front of that was where the hospital was, and it was because of that Sorun had a good scope for how big the city was, because the park where the Lake of Rings and the Chao Garden were was clear on the other side of the city, a fact he'd learned when Amy took him there prior. So he had a rough idea for how big the city was, which was why he hadn't been looking forwards to taking a wheelchair all the way to Castle Acorn in his state. Because Nicole had placed the castle dead-center of the city.

Wasn't the worst distance in the world, but it was far from ideal.

"Hi-higher on the street, and I- and I know it's my time to... to go..."

Sorun's worries were justified as he'd already become winded a quarter of the way there.

"Calling you... and the search is... is a-a mystery..."

And that lead him here: crossing the New Mobotropolis streets in the dead of night. Singing with an exhausted voice. Body slumped forwards in the wheelchair in a panting mess as his Bringer Claws slowly and lethargically pulled him along by crawling on the ground at a slow pace, their forms flickering every so often.

The doctors had probably had a point when they said his body needed time to recover.

"Standing on my feet, it's so... hard, it's... man, this is hard, fuck it, you push me."

Sorun's Bringer Claws disappeared in the same moment his Doppelganger appeared behind the wheelchair. It automatically grabbed the chair's handles and began to push it forwards. Sorun, meanwhile, was just doing his best not to fall out of the chair.

"Hah... hah... deja vu...!"

Amazingly enough he'd made it to the castle. Even more amazing there weren't any guards. Whether it was because of the prison break-in or some other reason Sorun wasn't aware of wasn't clear, and he didn't care at all. All he cared about was that he finally made it to that damn castle.

Front door hadn't even been locked.

"What'd I tell you about locking your shit, Elias?" Sorun that as the Doppelganger wheeled him through the front entrance of the castle. "Doors unlocked, no guards... Elias is practically leaving the place wide open for Amadeus to just stroll up on in." He blinked. "Oh my fucking god, that's literally what he's doing, isn't it? He's trying to pull some one-on-one man-to-man final confrontation type deal- man, he's the kind of guy to do that, too."

It was completely absurd, but it was the only reason Sorun could think of as to why there were no guards and why the doors were completely unlocked. There'd be no other reason to do something like that unless Elias was vying for some kind of final confrontation whatever with the general. And the worst part was Sorun could see him doing that. And it was just absurd enough to be true by this world's standards.

"Goddammit, Elias, you weren't supposed to actually act like a stupid final boss," Sorun thought as his Doppelganger wheeled him forwards. "I'm gonna beat both of them up for being idiots, I swear. If it's really going down like that-"

Thunk.

Sorun's thoughts ended at the same time the momentum of the wheelchair halted. He tilted his head back a bit in surprise when he saw a wide staircase right in front of him leading up to a second floor. And when he looked down, he saw the wheels of the wheelchair pressed right up against the first step.

"Son of a bitch."

He ended up just abandoning the wheelchair to walk up the steps.

Worst choice Sorun ever made.

"Hah... how the fuck... does this place not have wheelchair accessibility... when old man Max is in a wheelchair...?" Sorun panted out as he made it to the top of the steps. He'd had to start using the IV pole as a walking stick halfway up, but he'd still made it.

Tired. He was just tired and out of breath from moving around so much. He would have just Tricked up the steps but it was hard enough maintaining the Bringer Claw replacing his right arm, and at this point that was the only limb he had capable of swinging something.

It was probably by a miracle he managed to find the room he presumed Elias was in. He'd just wandered down the biggest, most important-looking hallway he could find until he came to a door from which he heard voices behind it. It was another miracle he'd even made it that far considering he was barely standing on his feet. But here he was. And all he had to do was open the door.

The door that he realized was locked when he tried opening it.

"..." Eye narrowed at the door, Sorun passed the IV pole to his left hand, and with no hesitation punched the door with his blue right hand. The wood-like wood crumpled inwards, and at the same time all the voices Sorun had heard inside of the room ceased immediately. The pale Earthling paid none of this any mind as he slowly walked into the room, IV pole in hand.

"Both of you," Sorun called out as he walked into the room. "I'm gonna slap both of you fooooooorrrr- wait, what's going on here?"

Well... he'd been right about finding Elias here. He'd been right about Amadeus being here, too, so it turns out his intuition had been on point. What hadn't been so on point was that the mood he'd stormed into seemed... extremely relaxed. They weren't locked into some battle of mortal combat like he'd been expecting. They didn't even look that upset if Sorun was being honest with himself. They were sitting at a short table having tea of all things.

He crashed a damn tea party.

They weren't the only ones there, either. Elias' wife and adopted child were there, sitting on the bed next to who he presumed to be Tails' mother, another brown-furred fox, all of whom were giving him the same wide-eyed, bewildered look both Elias and Amadeus were giving him. Sonic, Tails, and Sally was there, and also had the same looks. Nicole was even there holding a tray with a tea pot and- oh boy Sorun didn't like that look she was giving him.

"Well, don't I look silly? I dragged myself all the way from the hospital just to find them having a completely amicable conversation." He honestly would have preferred if he'd arrived to break up some stupid fight instead of this. That way he wouldn't have looked like an utter fool right about now. More than that he probably could have avoided that glare Nicole was beaming at him.

How anybody could look so threatening while holding a tray of tea was a mystery to Sorun. And he didn't want to stick around to find out the answer. So he decided to do what he did best: run away.

"... Well, seems I made a mistake. Have a good night, all." With a small wave of his spectral hand, Sorun turned around in a desperate attempt at escaping.

Evidently Nicole had put the tray down somewhere because she'd teleported her lynx body right behind him, hands on her hips and face set in a deep frown. A very angry frown. One aimed right at him.

"..." Sorun turned back around to the room, only to encounter Sally standing in front of him with practically the same posture and expression Nicole had.

"Huh. Guess I'm dying sooner than I thought."

"Care to explain yourself?" Sally asked. Her eyes were boring straight into Sorun's one eye with such intensity he couldn't help but fidget on the spot.

"... Hold that thought," Sorun requested in a small voice. As calm as he could, which wasn't much, he turned towards the tube connecting him to the IV bag on the pole and flipped the small switch on the tube to allow the clear fluid to flood into him. "Okay, listen-"

"You're supposed to be recovering in the hospital," Sally continued in an icy tone. "You busting down the door to my brother's room is not recovering in the hospital."

"W-well I thought- you know, the whole riot thing- it sounded bad- I th-though Elias and Amadeus were gonna do something stupid like fight," Sorun stammered out. "So I want-wanted to, to... you know... avoid that."

A slow, deep exhale left Sally. The stern look didn't drop off her face in the slightest, but her shoulders did relax a bit. "They were fighting," she informed him. "Nicole and I handled it. And now we're talking. Peacefully." She eyed the door fragments at their feet. "At least we were until you punched the door in."

"Eh-heh, yeah, I... hah, ha-ha, I, I goofed up, yeah..." The laugh that came out of Sorun was one he couldn't control. Nothing too big; just a small, high-pitched giggle, but he couldn't have stopped it. And oddly, he didn't find himself caring about it too much.

Come to think of, everything felt kind of funny. Sorun couldn't tell why. Every second that ticked by was... doing something. Easing the tension, making the heart-splitting anxiety melt away.

Why was the whole room moving around?

"Sorun?" Sally's voice came to his ears muffled and distorted. And her face for some reason looked warped and really funny-looking, making Sorun giggle again. "Sorun, what's going on with you?"

"Ha ha, Sally, I don't... I don't think that's saline," Sorun giggled out as he pointed to the bag hanging off his IV pole.

His vision grew more distorted by the second, though he was able to make out Sally reach for the bag and turn it around to read it. By the time she was finished he was too far gone to see her give him a deadpan expression. "Sorun, this is morphine."

"Yyyyyep, that'd do it." In hindsight he probably should have read the bag befojrnfyerfpiernvyrfehbf-

It was hard to disappoint Sally even on a bad day. She liked to think she was an understanding person who could see all sides to an argument and could understand people well enough to see where they were coming from. Being mad or upset or annoyed at somebody for something they did was one thing, because that could be forgiven and made up for in most cases. Straight disappointment was a rare thing for her to experience.

She came awfully close when she saw Sorun collapse on the floor right in front of her. she would have thought he'd passed out completely if it weren't for the fact he made a small giggle every now and then. The only thing that stayed her from full-on disappointment was because she understood immediately why Sorun did what he did when he stuttered out that explanation to her with that terrified look on his face.

Sally couldn't put it past him. The Earthling had been proving a lot as of late he cared much more about people than he let on. A startling amount, even. The words he said alone during that awful confrontation with Eggman while they could do nothing but watch were still words she played over in her head sometimes. They'd been words that surprised her to no end, and she'd even felt a bit of pride hearing the words from how much she resonated with her. From hearing that to seeing everything he'd done, it'd been clear to her and everyone else just how much he actually cared. She still caught Sonic smiling from time to time about the fact he'd finally decided to call them friends. So with all that in mind, she couldn't too disappointed in Sorun when this was something she would expect out of him.

Didn't change the fact that he shouldn't have left the hospital, but in the back of her mind she was already thinking about letting it slide since she figured him being scared so much by her and ending up in this state in front of them all was punishment enough. And hopefully he'd learned from the experience.

Nicole didn't look like she was going to let him off as easily, but that was Sorun's problem.

"So careless..." Nicole mumbled out, reaching forwards to flip the switch on the IV tube to cut the flow of morphine. "Why is he like this, Sally?"

Sally found herself wincing a bit at Nicole's tone. She couldn't quite place how the AI was feeling other than she was unhappy, and even from looking at her it was clear she was displeased from the way she was looking at Sorun's fallen form.

"His heart was in the right place, Nicole," she offered, "he just..."

"Never thinks about himself?" Nicole interrupted. "Or how the way he treats himself affects others?"

"He just cares, that's all," she reiterated in a soft tone. "In his own weird way." She saw Nicole's body relax a bit, though she was still staring down at Sorun, prompting Sally to ask, "You're not upset at him, are you?"

"... No. Just worried," she answered. "I think I'm going to have to keep a closer eye on him with the security cameras so this doesn't happen again. At least until he can last without the wheelchair."

"That might be for the best," Sally admitted with a small nod. "Just try not to hold it against him, Nicole. You, well, you know his type."

It was by sheer coincidence that Sonic chose to zoom into the empty spot right next to her, looking down at Sorun in concern.

"Hey, is Sorun doing alright?" he asked.

"He's fine," Sally answered with a small sigh. "He went and accidentally drugged himself with painkillers."

A barely-contained snort of amusement left Sonic's lips as the worried look vanished. "W-wait, seriously?"

Sally didn't even look over at him when she'd smacked the side of his head.

The hedgehog quietly exclaimed from pain, holding the spot on his head that had been hit as he mildly glared at Sally. It only lasted a few seconds before he relaxed and looked back down at Sorun along with the rest.

"I'll take him back," Sally volunteered, walking over to and crouching down next to Sorun. "I think things here are calm enough anyways. And somebody needs to have a word with the doctors about letting their patients roll out the door while under their watch."

"It's kinda hard to keep an eye on a guy that can teleport, Sal," Sonic pointed out.

"Don't start with me now." Sally briefly glanced up at Sonic with a pointed look, which caused him to quiet down and back up a few steps. Satisfied, the chipmunk looked back down at Sorun and reached for him. "Come on, Sorun, let's go."

"We're goin' somewhere?" Sorun mumbled out in a half-slur. He had a dazed, unfocused look in his eye as Sally picked him up in her arms while Nicole helped by placing the IV pole above him. He didn't move around once during the process. In fact his body remained completely limp even as she began walking away with him.

"Mm-hm, yeah." Sally gave him an acknowledging hum and a forced half-smile before turning towards the others, at which point the smile dropped and she shook her head at them. They all nodded, prompting her to reciprocate the nod and then silently exit the room, Sorun's limb body in her hands.

She almost thought he'd fallen asleep with how quiet he'd been until she saw him turn his bleary-looking eye towards her.

"Where going?" he asked her.

"Back to the hospital," she answered, the forced smile returning to her face as she continued walking forwards. "Where the people whose job it is to look after you can actually do their job and make you all better so we don't have another incident like this."

"Noooo..." With weak, flaccid movements Sorun attempted to sit up in Sally's arms and reach behind her. He failed miserably. "Wanna stay with the pretty lynx lady..."

Sally stopped walking and looked towards Sorun's face for a moment. She couldn't get anything due to the absolute lack of clarity in his languid features, though, causing her to make a small sigh and continue walking. "You can talk to Nicole tomorrow," she said.

A childish whine left him. "No, don't wanna wait."

" To-mor-row ," Sally reaffirmed in a slow voice. "When you're in a better mindset and... what the?"

When she made it to the stairs and looked down, Sally saw that there was an abandoned wheelchair sitting next to the bottom step. She gave the empty wheelchair one questioning look before focusing back on the human in her arms.

"Sorun, did you... did you wheel yourself all the way here from the hospital?"

"Mhm."

"... Why didn't you just make a portal?"

"Kitty."

All in all it was a more coherent response than the princess had been expecting, and yet it still told her absolutely nothing.

"Okay," Sally mentally sighed out as she began descending the steps, "a t least it saves me the trouble of carrying him all the way back." She approached the wheelchair immediately after making it to ground floor, and then proceeded to carefully set Sorun down in it while laying the IV pole across his lap. She double-checked to make sure he was secure in the chair, and it was only after she was satisfied did Sally begin pushing the wheelchair.

While pushing the chair, Sorun's body had completely stilled in the chair, making Sally think he finally passed out. When they'd left the castle interior he remained motionless in the chair, and when they'd departed from the castle proper he was still completely silent. When they'd started moving along the paved street towards the hospital, though, Sorun began to lowly mutter out words in a voice quiet enough that Sally had to lower her ear closer to him to hear properly.

"I'm so scared of what's coming, Sally..." the human muttered.

"It's not that bad, Sorun," she mumbled back in an comforting voice, one hand on the wheelchair's handle while the other patted his shoulder. "We'll look back on this and laugh one day, alright? It really isn't that bad. We just need to get you back to the hospital."

"You're all gonna be so upset..."

"No, no, Sorun, it's okay. We're not mad. You sure don't make it easy, though," she said. "Just take it easy for now, alright, Sorun? You can go back to doing stupid stuff when we're all not worried about you falling apart on us."

"Mmmhhhh..." Sorun's breathing stilled as his body sagged forwards. Sally briefly stopped just to lean down further to Sorun's level, where she heard soft breathing and saw his chest slowly and steadily rising and falling. She made a sigh of relief at him finally falling asleep, and then wordlessly continued pushing him forwards towards the hospital.

"So it all worked out in the end?" Flat on his back and body covered by the shade of the tree his was lying under, Sorun cracked his eye open at the squirrel Mobian that was sitting right besides him. "It's all talked out? Everything finalized? Don't gotta worry about riots in the streets or anything like that?"

It was around mid-afternoon of the next day. A few hours after Sorun had come to from last night's escapades, of which he remembered little. All he did remember was going to the castle, walking into Elias and Amadeus calmly talking over tea, and then for some reason Sorun was hit with a sense of foreboding and doom before everything afterwards became a blank for him. He kept wondering why until it was explained to him he'd mistaken morphine for saline.

Not his brightest moment, right next to him having realized right after he could have just teleported himself to the castle and saved burning himself out using the wheelchair. Not his best morning, either, having to listen to Nicole speak in that quiet, subdued but intense voice she used at him whenever she was upset when she'd explained this all to him, followed by Dr. Quack yelling at him for leaving the hospital without a chaperone. It'd been a verbal lashing so intense Sorun was still surprised he'd made it through alive.

But he had, and now he was here. Sitting under a tree next to Elias as he explained everything that had happened to Sorun so he could catch up on everything he missed. The breakout at the prison, Sonic and Tails making amends because of something that happened between them during the night, and what had actually concluded as a result of it all.

"Yes. My sister had to be the one to talk some sense into the both of us," Elias shyly admitted to him. "We discussed our points, saw each-other's perspectives, and came to a decision we could both happily agree on. In the end it all worked out."

"Wow, so... talking with your sister, the thing I suggested you do, turned out the be the right answer all along instead of everything else you all tried to do. Amazing."

"I hear that tone in your voice," Elias said with a small pout as he turned towards Sorun. "What do you want me to say, Sorun?"

"I want you to say I was right," he said.

"Really, now?" Elias demurred. "I seem to recall you said I should just do what I felt like without thinking on it, or something along those lines. Which ended up with me dueling with Amadeus until we were stopped by Sally."

"..." Sorun scoffed and slung one of is legs over the other, closing his eye. "It's your fault for misinterpreting my golden advice."

Elias made a single, tired-sounding half chuckle as he turned away from him. "Yes, clearly..."

"So what ended up happening in the end?" Sorun asked. "What'd you agree to?"

"The power of the king is to be split between six democratically-elected council members, with me and any future holders of the crown acting as a seventh member," he explained.

"... Sounds kinda like a monarchy with extra steps."

Elias shook his head. "It isn't. Having a council that can outvote the king on matters gives the people a voice and say in how our government is run while still technically preserving the monarchy. To that end, we're no longer a monarchy but a republic, but... I think it's worked out for the best. I'm happy the royal line can continue, Amadeus is happy the people have a voice, the people are happy that positive change is happening, everybody is happy..." He trailed off as a slight sad look overtook his features. "Everybody but my father, at least. He won't speak with me."

"Surprised he can speak at all," Sorun thought, though chose not to voice this. "Don't worry about him. Tryin' to please everyone's a waste of time," he told Elias. "As long as most everybody's good with it then just be happy with it and move on."

"And what of you?" Elias asked. "What's your opinion on this?"

"It's your kingdom, man. Run it how you want. I don't care."

Nonplussed, Elias shook his head with a small grin as he stood up to his feet. "And here I thought you would have been a bit more warm to the reception of the kingdom changing to a governmental system that slightly resembled the one of your home," he said as he dusted off his blue and red jacket.

"Again, don't care. I'm glad it worked out for you all, though," Sorun said in earnest. "So you're gonna take off now?"

The Mobian nodded. "Diminished political power or not, I'm still king and have an election to oversee," he said. "Would you like me to take you there, Sorun? I could even leave you at one of the voting polls if you wish."

"Nah. As much as I'm raring to be a part of the democratic system, I'd have to be a citizen to do something like that. Which I'm not." In other words he was too lazy to vote, but Elias didn't need to know that.

The small grin on the king's face transitioned into a frown. An apologetic one. "Right, I... I never did get those papers to you, did I? Goodness, I never even started them," he mumbled under his breath. "Sorun, you... you're the one who saved the now-former kingdom. You've earned the right more than anybody else, citizenship or not. Nobody would question it. And I promise I'll do everything in my power to rectify this situation as soon as possible. I'm terribly sorry I didn't sooner."

"It's fine, man, no harm no foul," Sorun said, making Elias' posture ease out. "Just go do your thing. I'm just gonna relax here for a bit longer."

"Should I at least send someone to help you back to the hospital when you're ready?" he asked, nodding towards the empty wheelchair nearby.

With a small sigh, Sorun took his spectral hand out from under his head. "I think Big Sister up there's got it covered," he said, gesturing up to the tree. And the camera lens sticking out of the tree. The one that was looking down directly at Sorun.

"Right, of course." Elias blinked up at the camera, and then looked back down at Sorun. "May I ask why there is a camera growing out of the tree?"

"Oh, that's the beautiful thing about nanites all connected to a central computer system Nicole is in control of, Elias," Sorun stated in a sarcastic voice. "Literally anything in the city can turn into a camera. And Nicole thinks I have glass bones and paper skin so she's keeping me under twenty-four hour surveillance 'til I get better," he explained.

He couldn't be too upset at her over it. "For his own safety" had been her justification of it. And honestly, she was probably right with the stunts he kept pulling. Sorun didn't really mind all that much since it didn't inconvenience him. However it did leave him with a somewhat creeped-out feeling all the time knowing he was under temporary full-time watch by Nicole.

Elias offered the human a comforting smile despite the fact his eye was closed. "Well, Sorun, hang in there. It isn't forever." He turned and began moving away. "I must be taking my leave now. Until next time."

"Bye," Sorun called out. He placed his hand back under his head and settled in a more comfortable position, and then sighed out as he began to relax.

The quickest and most non-violent revolution ever having occurred to Sorun's knowledge aside, things were relatively easy for Sorun. Living inside of a cozy, protected city like this had perks. He may have been bored out of his mind in that hospital, but at least he wasn't getting stressed out of his mind going on risky, dangerous missions. It was nice, not doing anything for once. He didn't know how long it'd stay like this, but the break was welcome, and he'd take it for all it was good for until the end caught up with him. Whenever they got wind of that last Emerald.

'Til then, though? He was taking it easy. Both for his own sake and so people stopped worrying about him. It'd do everybody some good.

"Where can I find Knuckles?"

A voice. An unfamiliar one. Male, aged and... oddly had a sort of tinny-sound to it. Like it was filtered through an electric speaker.

Sorun made an unsatisfied groan. So much for peace. "Heck if I know, man. Ask somebody else."

"There is nobody else nearby. I require your assistance in locating Knuckles."

"We're in a town full of people, man. Go bug somebody else with this. Go bug a Freedom Fighter, any Freedom Fighter other than this one. Geez, go ask somebody in the Chaotix, they're the ones that hang around him the most. Just leave me alone."

"I beseech you-"

With a frustrated groan, Sorun opened his eye and bolted up into a sitting position. "You are really starting to test my patience here with- uhhhhh..."

... Well, he had absolutely no idea what he was looking at. It was a head inside of a floating, clear ball. A metal head with red sensors for eyes. A head that oddly looked like an echidna like Knuckles was. A floating metal echidna head.

"..."

"..."

"... Uhhhhhh..."

A/N- Yeah I know Cream and co. didn't show up 'til way later in the comics, but we're technically months in the future anyway 'cause the story's events made the canon timeline jank, so bleh.

Chapter 47

Recursion Error

Episode 47- Essence of stabbing a god in the face

There was little for Sorun to think as he regarded the floating metal head in a ball in front of him. Because that was just it: there was nothing. His mind came up blank as he looked at the head. He just plainly didn't know what to think.

What does one do when a floating head floats up to them and starts asking questions? Do they humor it? Scream and run away? Wonder why there's a floating head talking to them in the first place? Sorun didn't know the answers to any of these questions, as the answers were far beyond his mental capacity to grasp.

He did know he didn't want to deal with this, though.

Sorun pointed up and past the head. "Hospital's that way. If you're lucky there's a sanitorium you can admit yourself to," he said to the head before lying back down and closing his eye.

"You imbecile, I do not need medical attention!"

"You sure? You're missing a whole body. Seems pretty medically alarming to me."

There was an angered scoff, followed by Sorun feeling a presence settle next to his head. He opened his eye back up with an annoyed groan as he spotted the floating head right next to his face.

"Why even is there an Overlander here in this city?" he asked him. "It was my assumption this was a Mobian city."

"World's full of exceptions, pal. Some people live with a completely different species than them. Others get to live without a body despite the fact it shouldn't be physically possible. Do the impossible, see the invisible, row, row-" Sorun cut himself off by snapping his spectral arm towards the bubble. Blue claws wrapped around the clear sphere, causing the head to gasp out in surprise as Sorun lifted him up. "Twenty words. You get twenty words to explain why I have to deal with you."

The head's mechanical eyes darted around as they looked at the hand gripping him. He quickly regained what little composure a head could have and spoke out to Sorun. "My name is Dimitri. I come from Angel Island. A grave threat named Enerjak has arrived and I need help."

"... I didn't think you'd actually perfect-score the word limit," Sorun admitted after a long pause passed. He hummed a little and leaned his head back on the grass, his curiosity piqued. "Dimitri... and Enerjak, huh? Those names sound familiar... did Knuckles tell me about them...?"

There was some vague source of familiarity with those names. Sorun could have sworn they were names mentioned back when Knuckles had been explaining echidna lore to him. The problem lied in the fact that Sorun hadn't been paying all that much attention because the history of his people was so confusing. The names definitely rang a bell, though. Somehow. He knew they were relevant, Sorun knew it, and he tried digging deep into his memories to try and pull up everything Knuckles had told of them.

... Nah, he didn't remember.

"Those names mean nothing to me," Sorun said. "I think Knuckles told me about you, but-but I'm not gonna lie, man, I didn't pay much attention. I kinda just tuned him out after a while. I'd have an easier time decrypting the Zodiac Killer's messages than understanding echidna history."

It was almost astonishing how so much confusion could be shown on a metal disembodied head's face. Eventually confusion morphed into slow understanding as the echidna head's mouth set into a deep frown. "You really are an imbecile, aren't you?" he asked.

"I like to think I'm the smartest idiot on the planet. Unfortunately, insulting me will get you less than nowhere." Sorun lifted the head up more, much to his protest. "Farewell, Dimitri," Sorun blandly stated. "Go bother someone else."

Before the echidna head could get another word in edgewise, Sorun's spectral arm threw him. Where, he didn't know- he hadn't been looking. He didn't care, though, as long as the head was out of his hair.

Deeply sighing, Sorun settled back into a comfortable position on the ground. Somebody else could deal with the freaky cyborg head or whatever that was. Maybe Sonic would find him. Sorun hoped Sonic would find him. He coped with weird stuff well. Floating heads were right up Sonic's alley, not Sorun's.

No, sir, Sorun wouldn't be dealing with that at all. All he'd be doing is sitting here, relaxing and enjoying the day to his heart's content without a care in the world. Maybe he'd go and talk with Nicole later. That sounded nice. In fact, it sounded like the perfect idea-

"I have absolutely no idea what a zodiac is, but it is imperative that you at least lead me to somebody that can be of assistance!"

"..." Sorun deeply inhaled, and then slowly exhaled. "It takes a special kind of conviction to show your face after getting yeeted like you just did. For that, you have an infinitesimal amount of respect." Sorun sat up to lock his eye with the red eyes of the head right in front of him. "But that's all ya got," he continued, "so I'll give you one chance to tell me why I should care about your problem."

"The whole world will be doomed if you do nothing."

"As far as reasons go, that's a pretty solid one." With a groan Sorun stood up to his feet. Seemed like there was no getting out of this one if it was that severe- which it probably was. Floating heads didn't just come out of nowhere to undersell global threats, after all. "Hold, please," Sorun politely requested, before turning around to the camera in the tree. He frantically waved at the camera with his blue, spectral arm, and in less than a second Nicole's body appeared next to them.

"Sorun?" she began. "Do you require assistance with-?"

Nicole wasn't able to finish before Sorun placed the head-sphere in the surprised AI's arms.

"Here, take this. His name's Dimitri. He's a talking head. He's your problem now ." After handing the head off Sorun sat back down and leaned his back against the tree. Nicole, meanwhile, began trading odd looks with Dimitri. "Take him to Sally. Or Sonic. Or somebody else other than me. I don't care. Just get him out of my sight, please."

"Well... I suppose that is a reasonable request..." Nicole hesitantly stated, still eying the head in her hands with a mixture of curiosity and wariness. "I am afraid Sonic is currently indisposed at the moment, however."

"Finally ate himself into a food coma eating all those chili dogs, huh? I told him those things were poison."

"No," Nicole denied with a shake of her head, "as of this moment he is occupied conversing with Sally on how to deal with Dr. Robotnik, who is currently outside the city's defensive barrier-"

Sorun Tricked away.

"Sometimes I wonder how such a smart guy like Robotnik can also be an absolute moron. It's the wisdom thing. It's gotta be."

It wasn't really news for Sorun to know that Eggman absolutely loathed the fact that everybody from Knothole he captured managed to slip through his fingers and make a home in the nanite city they stole from him. He himself saw that sometimes he'd send a ship from his fleet to the city just to pelt them with ordinance from on high, probably out of spite. The dome-like force field that protected the city made it so it was little more than an annoyance more than anything else, but it made it pretty obvious Robotnik was frothing at the mouth in rage for what they pulled off.

All the more power to everybody in Knothole who collectively gave him a middle finger everyday by thriving in New Mobotropolis. Not a term Sorun would ever share with anybody he cared about, of course. At least not so crudely. But it's what he felt.

It absolutely bewildered Sorun that, after all that, the mad scientist would come here personally to carry out some stupid scheme, but if it meant him getting another shot at saving some years of life by killing him now so Sorun didn't have to hunt down that last Emerald, hey, he'd take it. And as a added bonus it got him away from the talking head and whatever nonsense he was carrying around with him.

"Still, fate of the world, huh...? Eh. I'll let the others deal with it. More their thing. I just wanna cut Eggman's head off."

So, after a series of Tricks, that left him here. Just on the outside of the wall that surrounded Knothole, in a small grass field. He didn't even need to look around long to spot Eggman in... something. Some machine that looked so ridiculous it made Sorun do a double-take.

It looked like some kind of weird robotic crustacean thing. A robotic red shell, not unlike a hermit crab's shell, with multiple mechanical tentacles waving out of it. Eggman himself was sitting out in the open inside a pilot's seat in the opening of the shell.

"Well, Nicole said that Sonic was busy getting briefed by Sally on how he's to proceed... which'll probably get accelerated once they learn I booked it out here," Sorun thought to himself as he manifested Yamato in his grasp. "Got seconds at best. And he's got no Chaos Emerald protecting this one. I'll make it quick."

There was no hesitation as Sorun pulled Yamato in and out of its sheath in rapid succession. Judgement Cut after Judgement Cut consumed and cut away all the mechanical tentacles writhing outside of the robot's shell. Eggman himself barely had any time to gawk at all the severed, disabled tentacles before Sorun Tricked right in front of him on the lip of the metal shell.

"Tell me, 'cause I really wanna know," Sorun began before Robotnik could get a word in. "The hell was your plan here?"

"Hrrgh..." The previous shock transformed to ire, and a frustrated growl left Robotnik's throat as he looked up at Sorun. "None of you would even have this city if it wasn't for that infernal AI Nicole," he angrily grumbled up at Sorun. "My plan was to upload a computer virus I had coded to end her so I could finally attack the city."

"Shit plan. I've seen what's she's capable of in that digital world, and trust me, it wouldn'ta worked," Sorun said.

"Well, we'll never know now, will we?" Eggman snarked. "You cut my Egg Nautilus' tentacles up before they could even do anything." He leaned back in his seat, frown still on his face. He oddly just looked more disappointed than angry now. "I get you're the practical type, but there's an order of operations to these battles you have to adhere to if there's any fun to be had in it. I took your arm and eye away, Sorun, not your brains, and you need as much of those as you can get."

"Ha-ha, die."

No sooner had the word "die" left his throat did Sorun stab forwards with the katana. No hesitation. No remorse in his eye as he plunged the sword's tip straight towards Eggman's face. It'd approached so quick that Eggman hadn't even had time to make an expression of terror as the sword neared him.

Unfortunately, the sword never made contact. Because a familiar voice just had to shout up at Sorun to make him freeze right before he'd plunged Yamato into Eggman's irritable face.

"Sorun, stop!"

Oh, he'd stopped. The point of the sword was mere millimeters away from Eggman's large, pointed nose, but he'd stopped. Eggman, meanwhile, head let out a heaving sigh of relief, while Sorun's face became strained in anger. Slowly, the both of them turned their heads, Sorun's right and Eggman's left respectfully, towards the voice.

It was Sonic. He was down on the ground in front of the Egg Nautilus, hands on his hips and foot tapping rapidly against the ground with an unhappy expression. And for some reason his green eyes were glaring up at Sorun , and not Eggman. A fact that made Eggman begin to grin, irritating Sorun all the more.

"What!?" Sorun shouted down to the blue hedgehog. "What do you mean stop!?"

"I mean stop!" Sonic shouted back up, and Sorun almost felt insulted that he had the gall to actually sound upset at him. "What are you even doing here, Sorun!? You're hurt! You're suppose to be resting in the hospital, not out here fighting Eggman! Get down from there!"

Sorun couldn't believe what he was hearing. "What the- no!" he shouted in refusal.

"Sorun, you have one eye!"

"And I'm still trying to figure out how many eyes you have!" Sorun tore his gaze away from Sonic and looked to Eggman. "Seriously, how many eyes do hedgehogs have?" he asked. "You see what I mean, right? The weird thing going on with their eyes?"

He couldn't help but be surprised when Eggman offered him a helpful shrug. "I'll be honest, Sorun, I don't know, either. I have a running theory that it's an evolutionary trait meant to give them higher depth perception, though I've yet to discover if the eyes are separate or just a single organ with two irises. Or if this theory is even true for that matter."

"... How does squishing a pair of eyes together give someone better depth perception?"

"Biology isn't perfect, Sorun. There's a reason I stick to machines."

"This is getting me nowhere." Shaking his head, Sorun focused back down on Sonic. "Can you just give me, like, a single second!? I'll get down after!"

"No! You'll get down now !" Sonic demanded. "You know how much you keep stressing everybody out by doing this!? I get it, you don't like being chained down, believe me I get it, but you gotta slow it down!"

"Yeah, Sorun," Eggman added, face-splitting grin on his face as he leaned back with his hands behind his head, "that's rather rude of you to be so inconsiderate of your friends. They're just worried about you."

With a barely-contained growl, Sorun reared back at Eggman and hissed out, "You stay out of this." He paused, eye blinking as he realized something. "Why am I even arguing about this?"

He stabbed forwards with the sword again, though this time Eggman didn't even flinch away from the relaxed pose and smug look he was giving Sorun. The pale teen didn't bother wondering why that was, although he got his answer when the tip of the sword was once again stopped millimeters away from the Doctor's face. It wasn't because Sorun had paused like last time, though.

No, this time the sword was stopped when a gloved hand reached out and grasped the blade before it pierced Eggman.

A deep, heaving sigh escaped Sorun as he slowly looked upwards. Sonic, in a burst of speed that had been all but imperceptible to Sorun's eye, had appeared right in front of him and was keeping a firm grip on the blade of the sword. And he was still maintaining that serious glare he was shooting Sorun, which only served to make Sorun that much more irritated.

"Hey. Just what do you think you're doing?" Sorun questioned the hedgehog in a low, even tone.

"Stopping you from making a terrible mistake," Sonic answered back in a tone equal with Sorun's. "Put the sword down, and go back into the city."

"Better idea. Let go of the sword so I can end the war in approximately two seconds."

"You're gonna end the war by taking a life?"

"Oh, come on! Do you hear yourself!?" Sorun shouted at him. "This is Eggman! There's not a single government in my world that would hesitate to kill him for a fraction of the things he did!"

"Well, you're not on your home world right now. You're on Mobius. And that isn't how we do things." Sonic shoved the sword away from Eggman. Sorun had stumbled back a bit, his eye still affixed to Sonic even with the blade held at his side. "Besides," Sonic continued, "we need him."

There probably wasn't a stranger sentence that could have been uttered to Sorun to make him as confused as what Sonic just told him. It was so unexpected that Sorun had nearly dropped Yamato and the scabbard held in his left hand, and he'd gone from glaring at Sonic to looking at him with a completely bewildered look. Even Eggman seemed completely floundered by what he just said, his hands falling away from his head as his spectacled eyes looked up at the blue Mobian.

"You... need me?" he repeated. "What exactly is running through your rodent-sized brain, rodent?"

"I can't believe I'm saying this, but I'm with Eggman on this," Sorun said. "What in the world do we need him for?"

"That talking head you met, Dimitri. Nicole brought him to me and Sal at the same time she told us you ran out here on your own," he said. "And he told us that Enerjak's back. So we need Egghead's help."

Some small part of Sorun had been hoping that Sonic could somehow pull some justifiable reason for why the hell they needed Eggman of all people's help in dealing with whoever that person even was. Sorun didn't feel any satisfaction from it, though. In fact he felt even more lost than he had before, and all it caused in him was frustration. He genuinely couldn't understand why he thought they needed the help of the man who ruined the entire world. For some random guy named Enerjak no less.

"Shoulda fucking locked myself and Eggman in a pocket dimension before he had a chance to stop me."

Even now Sorun still wanted to, but he couldn't when Sonic was this close. And he didn't have any illusion of being able to pull it off now, not when Sonic was actively against it. The guy could move faster than the electrical signals needed for Sorun to make conscious movement. He couldn't do anything. And that just made it all the more frustrating for Sorun, knowing Eggman was right there, mere feet away and completely vulnerable, and Sorun couldn't do a thing about it because Sonic wouldn't let him.

"We could do that. Alternatively," Sorun offered as he pointed his sword at Eggman, "you let me drop the crackpot over there and we just go deal with it ourselves."

Rolling his eyes, Sonic placed a finger on the sword and pushed it down back to Sorun's side. "A, we don't take things that far, and B, that's a mondo bad idea. We can't just 'go up' against someone like Enerjak. Not without some major preparation, at least."

"Why," Sorun angrily hissed out, "is this Enerjak guy such a big deal that we need Eggman's help?"

"Didn't Knuckles tell you about him?"

"Probably. Refresh my memory."

"Ah, for the..." Sonic's ears flattened against his head briefly in irritation, and at the same time he'd rubbed at his nose. His ears straightened back up as he took a deep breath to explain, during which Eggman had leaned forwards in interest to listen to him. "Okay. Enerjak: literal god. No good. If we fight him, we lose. If Eggy fights him, he loses hard."

"Watch it, Sonic," Eggman warned, though was quieted down when Sonic held a finger to his lips.

"Tut-tut-tut, the sane people are speaking," Sonic said, and then turned back to Sorun. He'd quickly smirked for a single second when he heard a growl of indignation from the scientist behind him. "Look, bottom line, every side's cooked goin' up against him alone. So as bad as it sounds, and I know it sounds bad, we gotta truce up for a bit."

Sorun scoffed. "A god? Sonic, come on," he said with a shake of his head. "He can't be that tough-"

"He is!" Sonic refuted with a raised voice. "Look, I-I don't know all the details, okay? It's mostly Knuckles that dealt with him all the time, but he went to Angel Island the other day to check on things and we haven't been able to raise anybody there, Julie-Su and the rest of the Chaotix are freaking out, it-it's a whole big mess, and you running off like this isn't helping anybody."

There was a beat of silence as Sorun paused. He thought over Sonic's words, and slowly Yamato and its sheath began to dissipate. "Knuckles is...?" he hesitantly asked, causing Sonic to shrug his shoulders and sigh.

"We don't know. Best case he lost all ways of contacting us, worse case he got captured by Enerjak," he said. "Sally's thinking of sending me and Tails up to the island along with a drone Nicole made so we can all scope things out. So I am asking you to please go back to the hospital so everyone can focus on the literal god coming for all of us."

"... Fine. Maybe this actually is a more pressing issue." He had serious, serious doubts it was until the detail with Knuckles came up. He'd seen the echidna in action enough. Suffice it to say he was... tough. Extremely so. Up there with some of the best fighters he met in this world. Hearing something bad might have happened to someone as capable as him did more than give credence to the threat. It all but confirmed it for Sorun.

But still, a god? That alone was too vague a word for Sorun to go on, which made it so he couldn't accurately gauge how big a threat Sonic was implying here. At the very least, someone powerful. Scary powerful if it was making Sonic desperate enough making truces with Eggman of all people.

"I still think you're overhyping this guy by a wide margin, Sonic, but... sure. I'll go," Sorun agreed with a small sigh. "On the condition," he added, halting Sonic from forming a relieved face, "that I go to where Sally is to check things out. Alright? I'll go to the hospital afterwards."

"Seriously, Sor- ugh, fine, sure, works for me, but you're gonna have to take it up with Sal," Sonic reluctantly agreed with a wave of his hand. "Just please go back into the city. I gotta hash out terms on old sunny-side down here."

Another scoff, smaller this time, left Sorun as his eye drifted towards Robotnik. The guy was practically eating all this up from that wide grin on his face, and Sorun knew he was doing it just to mock him for the fact he couldn't kill him because of Sonic. Sorun could practically feel the smug wafting off of him.

Another chance lost, then. But if Sonic was to be believed, which Sorun doubted, this was more important.

"Yeah," Sorun airily muttered as he began turning around. "You do that."

"Until next time, Sorun," Robotnik mockingly called after him in a faux-friendly voice. "Do try and get better for next time, you hear?"

Sorun didn't bother to deign him with a response before Tricking away.

"Ludicrous. All of this is just... so ludicrous."

That was Sorun's sole opinion on the matter as he stared up at a metal ceiling. The room was somewhere in the science center, one of the buildings in New Mobotropolis Nicole had built. In particular this room was a communications hub of sorts, or a makeshift one at least given the current situation. He wasn't actually doing anything, though. He was just in the back of the room sitting flat on his back on a bench, idly kicking his crossed legs every so often with his hands tucked under his head.

The teen turned his head a bit to look at the people in the room that were actually doing something. Sally was in front of a large computer and a bunch of monitors, one of which was displaying drone footage of Sonic and Tails on the floating island- which, according to Dimitri, was approaching the city. Not in of itself a good sign. Nicole was in the room concentrating on controlling the drone. Julie-Su was pacing around looking like a nervous wreck, likely, Sorun presumed, because of Knuckles. Dimitri was just... there. Existing. Kind of like Sorun was right now.

If Sally was upset at him, she wasn't showing it, probably because she was too focused on what was going on. He'd asked to stay for a bit and she'd just immediately ordered him to sit on the bench and do nothing, and if he disobeyed her Nicole would force him back into the hospital.

Nicole wouldn't even speak with him. He'd like to think it was because she was occupied controlling the drone. He also didn't really believe this was wholly true, and that maybe he'd pushed things too far with rushing after Eggman like that. Even she had limites, after all. Sorun feared he may have pushed them too much.

"I get they're worried for my health, justifiable worry admittedly if not for the wrong reasons, but goddamn, I'm not gonna fall apart from moving a little bit. And can they really blame me for taking a shot at Eggman?" The answer, apparently, was yes. "Really makes me feel like that one guy in the room nobody wants to deal with. Like I'm a liability or something. Christ, I'm not fuckin' fragile."

He didn't even know what was getting to him worse: that or this whole Enerjak situation. A situation which had come completely out of left field, right out of the blue. A threat that was apparently so great everybody was dropping everything and scrambling to deal with him. A freshly-elected council was already mobilized. Guards around the city were at the ready. It honestly felt like everyone was preparing for war.

"Over one guy I'm just hearing about now, though? Isn't it overkill? And god? Really?" He still didn't know what that implied. The word "god" meant a lot of things, too many to simply list. Sorun didn't even know if a title like that was applicable to the guy, even if everybody was acting like it did. Was he omnipotent? Omniscient? How far did his powers span, if he even had any? What was he, actually? Or who? He didn't know anything other than this was a threat that originated from Angel Island.

Because of course it did.

"Angel Island..." Sorun thought. "Fucking... echidna. Why do they always gotta complicate everything with their mere fucking existence?"

It all boiled down to a confusing mess for Sorun. He didn't know what was what, nobody was talking to him because they were either so preoccupied they couldn't afford the time or were too frustrated at his actions, or both, and he was sitting here twiddling his thumbs like the kid shoved in the corner at school.

He tried not thinking about Eggman, because thinking about how Sorun failed to kill him again on top of everything else was too much.

Some movement in the corner of Sorun's one eye drew his attention. He turned his head more to the side, enough to see the floating head stop next to him. A head that really did just look like Knuckles if Knuckles was a robot head, down to the mechanical dreadlocks. It, he, Dimitri, somehow looked old past all the electronics, though. Sorun couldn't quite pin down why. Or even what the hell he was.

So much was happening and he didn't have a clue on any of it...

"Hey there, Dimitri," Sorun muttered out in greeting. "It seems I vastly underestimated just how severe your problem was, because everybody's freaking out over it. Thanks for bringing all this trouble."

"You would rather I have remained silent and left you all in ignorance?"

Sorun snorted through his nose. "Sarcasm just flies right over your head, don't it? Guess it wouldn't be too hard, seein' as how low to the ground you are."

"Pah! Sarcasm," Dimitri all but spat. "The-"

"The last refuge of the witless, yeah, yeah, I know it's the lowest form of verbal combat," Sorun interrupted with a roll of his eye. "Doesn't stop me from using it as my go-to, though. I try to mix it up sometimes, but it's easy to default to it. Doesn't help how great a coping mechanism it is."

The floating echidna head paused. The red, mechanical eyes he had widened in surprise at the human. "That... you said what I wanted to say better than I would have said it," he admitted. "I'll admit, you confuse me. You strike me as someone that is somehow wise beyond their years and yet not wise enough at the same time. It's a confusing conundrum."

"Told ya already. I'm the smartest idiot," Sorun said. "Put too many points in wisdom and not enough in intelligence."

"Er... right." A beat passed. "'Sarcasm, the last refuge of the witless.' That quote. I quite like it. Is it yours?"

Sorun shook his head. "Nah. Stole it from a video game character. Like everything else." He sighed through his nose. "Don't even know if I got it right; I only ever heard it once and it's been a while. It was from this scientist guy in an RPG. Had a cool story, lots of themes about the devaluation of human life and real-life parallels to the soul-crushing reality of working in a corporation all alongside a really quirky cast of characters. You play video games? You seem like a guy who plays video games."

Dimitri's expression turned lost. "I... I'm afraid I don't follow a single thing you just said."

"..." Sorun turned his head back up to the ceiling. "You've lived a sad life, dude."

"On that, I sadly say we must agree." Dimitri's artificial eyes looked focused in on Sorun's body. Specifically, the blue, spectral arm replacing his lost arm, which was currently folded under the teens head. "What exactly are you?" Dimitri finally asked. "That arm. It's not natural. Just what is it? Who are you?"

"Question of the hour." Sorun turned his head back to Dimitri. "I'll tell ya if you give me the details on this Enerjak guy everyone's panicking over. Deal?"

The first step to unraveling this mess, Sorun supposed, was getting to the bottom of the mystery surrounding this Enerjak guy. Offering his own origin story in exchange didn't seem like a big price. Not like he cared about keeping himself a secret, unlike other things about himself. At the very least he hoped to get a rundown of his abilities.

Fortunately, Dimitri seemed to be in agreement with Sorun's logic. "That is fair enough," he decided. "Very well. Enerjak, simply put, is an entity who resides in the Chaos Force. I myself know very little on how he came to be, though I do know that, for all his power, he cannot sustain a physical form to interact with this world. He requires a compatible vessel. I myself was at one point Enerjak."

Any other time Sorun might have made some over-exaggerated response. Made a sarcastic response about how he sounded more like a ghost than a god, make a parallel to some piece of fiction from his world. Something like that. But Sorun was too mentally exhausted to do anything but slowly breath out. "So how'd that happen?" he asked.

"I was a young and ambitious echidna. For various reasons that are irrelevant to the conversation, I had infused myself with the power of a Chaos Emerald."

Sorun's interest was piqued with that statement. "Really?" he asked in a slow drawl. "I assume this was back when there were a lot more of the things, before the... great joining or whatever when they became the seven. So you juiced up on a lot of Chaos energy and became... what, little-g god, big-G God, what's the power scaling, what are we actually dealing with?"

"As Enerjak, my power was near-omnipotent," Dimitri informed him, making Sorun groan out. "The power allowing me to remain as Enerjak was lost to me, however, some part in thanks to... certain events that had transpired with the current Guardian."

"... Y'mean Knuckles?"

"Yes, that's correct. I harbor no ill will towards him. It's only afterwards I realized being Enerjak had corrupted certain priorities of mine, but such things do not matter at present," Dimitri said. "With a body aged hundreds of years and with no Chaos energy to sustain it, I was forced to undergo a full cybernetic conversion so save my life. My current... disembodied state," he'd grumbled out in a low voice, "was due to the demented curiosity of what can only be described as a mad scientist. An echidna by the name of Dr. Finitevus currently located on Angel Island who, until as of late, we'd thought had the interest of the echidna species at heart. Obviously we were incorrect."

"Ah, great, just what we needed. Another psycho-doc. And he's an echidna to boot, of course..."

"Somehow, in some way, he has found a way to reincarnate Enerjak," Dimitri continued in a grave tone. "I can't say I know for certain what his or Enerjak's true goals are, but I do know it can only mean disaster for all on Mobius. But I cannot hope to do anything in this meager state, and with the Guardian currently missing, I had no choice but to seek the Freedom Fighters out for help."

A small hum left Sorun's throat. "Alright, so... the lore is you juice up with Chaos energy, become Enerjak, get knocked out of the Enerjak state and get borged, crazy scientist guy on floating island brings Enerjak back somehow for some nefarious and nebulous purpose, got it, don't need any more details." He wasn't sure he even wanted more details past that. His brain hurt just catching up with that much. "Man, it figures," Sorun mumbled out as he lifted his right blue hand up above his face. "Some random echidna beams some Chaos energy into himself, and he gets omnipotence. I go out of my way to eat Chaos Emeralds, and the strongest thing I get from that is a nifty sword." He clicked his tongue in annoyance. "'Least I get to keep my sense of self. This Enerjak thing don't sound like that good a deal."

"You... what?" Sorun tore his gaze from his hand to the cybernetic head floating next to him. "You've absorbed Chaos Emeralds?" Dimitri repeated in a disbelieving tone. "How? Such a thing should not be possible. To absorb Emeralds in their entirety is... is unthinkable."

"Well, start thinking," Sorun retorted. "I don't have a link to the Chaos Force like everything else. Not even a weak link like most everyone else has. Just nothing at all. Zip. Nada. I'm a void-type."

"That's even more impossible," Dimitri claimed, though he sounded believing from the slight awe to his male, electronic voice. "Chaos energy fuels all life. It's present everywhere, in every facet of the universe, of the multiverse! It's ubiquitous in its nature. Nothing, absolutely nothing, should be able to exist without even the weakest link to the Chaos Force." His red eyes stared intently at Sorun's one blue eye. "If you did not have a link to the Chaos Force, you would be dead. Your cells would not function. Organs wouldn't be able to operate. Your very soul wouldn't exist. Life requires Chaos energy to function."

"Take it up with my home universe. Apparently it gets to defy all the rules." Dimitri quieted down at that, prompting Sorun to elaborate. "Yeah, I'm not from this zone. I'm from one that's apparently so far away they needed the power of all the Chaos Emeralds just to get there. That's how removed from the multiverse Earth is." He formed Yamato in his spectral hand's grasp, causing Dimitri to bob back a bit in shock. "The ability to get powers from Chaos Emeralds is a trait unique to my entire species. I'm the only one that ever got the chance to utilize it since I'm the only one that's ever been on Mobius, or anywhere else with Chaos energy for that matter." The sword disappeared, followed by the hand flopping down and hanging limply off the bench Sorun laid on. "To answer your question, I'm a human from Earth. Either call me that or an Earthling, though that latter identifier never really seems to take off all that much." He lifted his head up a bit. "And don't mix me up for an Overlander. I don't like being compared to them."

"Fascinating..." Dimitri's head leaned in closer to Sorun as he rested his head back down on the bench. "The sheer amount of Chaos energy in your body must be... staggering. Truly astounding. You do not even seem to be suffering any debilitating mental side effects due to your abilities, unlike the corruption of Enerjak..."

"From the powers, no. The stress of living, eh..."

"If only Albion hadn't been decimated by Eggman's fleet. I would have been quite interested to learn what the scientists there would have made of you," Dimitri said, making Sorun's eye flash to him. "Echidna resided there. They had a greater understanding of Chaos energy and its effects on living beings than anyone else on the planet I would think. I'm sure they would have been very interested to meet somebody as you."

A slight frown found its way on Sorun's face. "Don't take this the wrong way, Dimitri, but asides from Knuckles and Julie-Su, your entire species gives me a migraine. This whole Enerjak kerfuffle is happening because you echidna screwed around with Chaos energy. Why would I ever trust some pencil neck echidna to get anywhere near me with the intent to study me?" That just wasn't happening. He'd be liable to kill anybody that tried, not just for his safety, but because he plain didn't trust them not to mess up somehow and endanger multiple people around them. Like his friends. And Aurora and Athair's actions still rang heavy in his head.

He wouldn't say he hated the echidna species, but it was hard for him not to dislike them for how much their presence inconvenienced him. It was a drastic generalization Sorun tried to avoid. He didn't do a very good job.

"Perhaps I was too forwards," Dimitri admitted as Sorun sat up on the bench. "And, in truth, your fears are not unfounded. In terms you would probably use... our track history is not the greatest."

"You don't say?" Sorun shook his head, lightly scoffing as he looked up. Sally was still at the computer, now giving orders to Sonic and Tails on the island. Nicole was still focusing on the drone. "They're busy."

"Yes," Dimitri agreed, and then turned to Sorun. "I sense things are tense between you and the rest of the Freedom Fighters."

"Tense is putting it lightly. Nicole is getting ready to put me in a straight jacket and toss me in a padded cell until I heal from injuries I got in a fight because everyone's worried a slight breeze will atomize me."

He glanced up a bit after finishing speaking. He spotted Nicole still holding a hand to her head while focusing on controlling the drone. He also saw one of her eyes was half-opened and looking at him. She didn't look very pleased at what she heard, either. Sorun wasn't hopeful enough to assume it was just because she was concentrating on the drone.

Making an unsettled hum, Sorun turned back to Dimitri. "She'd probably be right to. Can't rightly blame them for the way they keep reacting around me," he continued, noting from the corner of his eye that Nicole's own opened eye widened just the slightest bit. "I don't like worrying them all the time like this, but it's hard to just sit still and do nothing. All this power, Dimitri, and sometimes it feels like I can't do anything with it."

The green eye that was watching Sorun continued to be trained on him for a few seconds after he finished speaking, and then it closed as Nicole turned her head back up to the front of the room. Her expression didn't change even the smallest amount, causing Sorun to make a sigh.

"Dunno if I saved it or not."

"So what do you plan on doing?" Dimitri questioned him.

Looking back to the floating head, Sorun said, "You know, believe it or not, I actually do think swinging a katana at a literal god would be the stupidest thing I've ever done and would like to avoid this entirely. And I'm sure everybody else would, too, since I'm a bit busted at the moment. What'll actually happen, though..." Sorun blew a lock of black hair out of his face and leaned back on the bench. "I don't know. I'm just gonna see where the chips fall and go with it. Plannin' ain't my style."

"Surely with all your power a more active role in this is warranted," Dimitri argued.

"Maybe, maybe not." Sorun shrugged. "We'll see."

Dimitri didn't look overly satisfied on Sorun's answer based on the scowl his mechanical face wore. "Then I hope for all our sakes you end up making the right choice."

Sorun remained silent as he watched Dimitri's head float off towards the front of the room where everyone else was. A commotion towards the biggest monitor Sally was sitting in front of had drawn everybody's attention, Sorun's included. And it was from there that Sorun finally got to see what all the fuss over.

There he was, right there on the drone's camera. Right in front of a small army of echidna, most of which Sorun saw sporting various cybernetic bits on their body. Part of that Dark Legion whatever he'd only paid half attention to. He was less focused on them and more on Enerjak, who was standing right in front of him. Seeing him alone made Sorun think everybody may have been right to worry about him.

He couldn't see his face. He had some kind of blue outfit on fitted with gold, regal-looking pieces. Even the helmet he wore that obscured his face looked to be made of solid gold, and also resembled something the Egyptian pharaohs of old from his world would wear. Something that brought great confusion to Sorun.

"Guy looks like he walked straight out of the pyramids with that getup, right down to the gold miniskirt and weird circle neck thing." An unsettled feeling began to grow in him when he actually saw the so-called god at work. A green aura of energy continually flowed around him. Cannon fire from tanks and lasers from weapons bouncing harmlessly off of him. Sorun had to watch as Enerjak effortlessly did little more than wave his hand and cause the legion of echidna in front of him to change. Just change, instantly, with but a single gesture. In a single blink of an eye Sorun watched as the echidna he fought changed from being cyborgs to full flesh-and-blood echidna. "So we got nigh-invulnerability to conventional arms and heavy munitions, the ability to selectively disintegrate anything just by looking at it, ability to regenerate damn-near anything on anybody just by thinking about it if he managed to de-cyborg all those echidna... holy fuck, he actually is omnipotent. Or at least really close to it. Teleporting, too?" He wondered as he saw some of the echidna he'd changed be enveloped in a green aura and shoot up into the sky. "Or at least some form of fast travel he can use on others, but I wouldn't be surprised to see him use raw teleportation at this point. Probably doesn't even have a range limit like my Tricks do."

None of what he saw just was good. He could say one thing for certain: nobody had undersold just how dangerous he was after all. Because Sorun was starting to get nervous looking at him. "Maybe Sonic was right to ask for Dr. Robotnik's help after all. Can they even beat this guy?" Sorun looked down at his spectral hand. "Could Yamato even hurt him? Maybe..." He glanced up at the screen again. "Dimitri became Enerjak from infusing himself with Chaos energy from an Emerald, right? But he's here, and Enerjak's there. Dimitri himself said he's a separate entity. So what does that make him, some... some concept of sorts? One that needs a host to exist?" Eyes back down to the arm. "Yamato can separate concepts..."

"Why is this even a matter of debate!?" Sorun was interrupted from his silent musings when a raised voice caused him to look up. The voice had come from Dimitri, who had risen his head up to be at eye-level with Nicole. "If you truly have limitless control of the nanites in this city, than construct a weapon to aid us in defeating Enerjak!"

The look Nicole shot at Dimitri was one Sorun had never seen on her before. He thought he'd seen her be angry before. From that time she'd been upset at him for avoiding her, or more recently for pushing himself too far despite everybody asking him to dial it back. Looks of exasperation and frustration. He thought he'd seen the worse she could do be thrown at him.

But what he saw right now, that look she was giving Dimitri, she'd never given him that look before. Something that looked like genuine anger. Eyes intensely narrowed, posture rigid, teeth bared. She'd never used anything even close to that on Sorun. She looked downright scary.

"I will not," Nicole asserted in a low and threatening tone, "devote the nanites or this city to weapons of any kind."

Unlike Sorun, Dimitri didn't even seemed fazed by Nicole's anger. "You cannot seriously-!"

Scraaaaape.

Both of them snapped their heads towards Sorun. The teen had manifested Yamato bare of its scabbard and had scraped it along the metal floor. Not hard enough to cut, but just enough to make that loud, unbearable sound. "Hey. Chrome Dome," Sorun intoned in a blank voice as he stared towards the floating head. "Leave her alone."

"You agree with her!?" Dimitri cried out, tone cynical. "You would take her side-!?"

"I look like someone who'd side with a guy he met half an hour ago over a friend?" Sorun muttered out. "Her nanites. Her choice. Deal with it or I'll drop you in the ocean." He tapped Yamato against the floor. "I'm not kidding around with that, either. I'll do it if you don't stop bothering her."

Dimitri had stared after Sorun for a couple of seconds, and then without a word scoffed and floated away. Sorun released the breath he'd been holding, though he'd only been allowed a moment's reprieve before Nicole appeared right in front of him, arms crossed and face... not nearly as angry as she'd looked with Dimitri, but still agitated.

"I can handle myself, Sorun," she said.

"I'm just trying to help." Sorun lifted up Yamato. "Speaking of which-"

"Absolutely not," Nicole interrupted with a shake of her head. "Sorun, you shouldn't even be here right now. I understand you wished to be informed of what was happening, but we only allowed you to stay here on the condition you go to the hospital and stay there right after."

"That was then. This is now. And right now I have an idea." He Tricked right behind Sally at the other side of the room before Nicole could get a retort in. The chipmunk started in her seat at his sudden appearance, but before she could get a single word out Sorun beat her to it. "Sally, hear me out. I need you to let me stab Enerjak in the face with my katana."

The sentence spoken by Sorun seemed to leave Sally absolutely mystified in her seat from the way she was looking at him like he'd sprouted a second head or something. She was quick to regain herself, though, and then adamantly shook her head at Sorun. "Not a chance. You're not joining the battle with the rest of us. Not when you're still recovering."

"No, listen, Sally," Sorun tried, "you don't understand. Yamato can-"

"Sorun. That is enough." A black-furred hand fell on Sorun's left shoulder. He turned around, purple and brown filling his vision when he perceived Nicole standing right behind him. "You are still in no condition to be doing anything as strenuous as combat. The entirety of the Freedom Fighters and Chaotix, with the exception of Knuckles who is still missing, as well as the forces in the city are ready to fight him. Sally is even calling for outside help in assisting us. I realize you wish to help as well, but it is unnecessary."

"Nicole-" Sorun weakly protested, though was quieted down when the AI began to lead him away from Sally.

"Please, Sorun, just please let us handle it. You've done enough." The lynx lead Sorun all the way back to the bench at the back of the room, where she'd sat him back down. By the time Sorun opened his mouth to speak back to her she'd already moved away back to the front of the room. This caused Sorun to sigh out as he sagged on the bench, Yamato disappearing from his hand.

"This is unreal. Frustrating. Infuriating. I get where they're coming from, I know they mean well, but they're seriously planning on fighting that ?" It may have sounded a bit hypocritical from him considering how skeptical he'd been of Enerjak at first, but seeing him on a screen, seeing those near-omnipotent powers at work... of course he had doubts they'd be able to actually do anything. He'd taken out an entire army by looking at it.

That was power. Power Sorun had doubts anybody in even the Freedom Fighters could fight against. Power Sorun didn't have, either. But maybe he had something that could cheat around it.

"I'm really fearing for them here. I don't want them fighting that guy." He looked back up at the front of the room. Nicole had gone back to controlling the drone, Sally and Julie-Su were in an argument, Dimitri had just straight-up left at some point, Sorun didn't know where... it was practically chaos. "If I'm right I'd only need a single shot at the guy- wait, wait..."

Enerjak was back on the screen. Looking right at the drone's camera. Uncomfortably close to the drone, mere inches away. He'd raised his hand, glowing green with Chaos energy. The monitor was barely able to pick up the drone being telepathically crushed before the feed cut out completely.

And then Sorun heard Nicole cry out in pain and stumble back a few steps while holding her hand to her head.

All the ambient noise in the background was deafened to Sorun's ears. His single eye had snapped right up to Nicole as the rest of Sorun's body froze, the pupil constricting to a pinprick. His heartbeat began to grow louder as blood rushed through his body at a faster rate. Underneath his completely blank face true anger began to roil in Sorun.

"Enerjak destroyed the drone Nicole was linked to. He hurt Nicole. He hurt her."

Sorun Tricked to Nicole's side without even thinking. He held a hand out to her, but refrained from touching her when she quickly managed to regain her composure and shake off whatever had hurt her. He still couldn't help but to call out to her even after seeing she appeared fine. "N-Nicole?"

"My link to the probe being cut so abruptly proved to be a bit more than expected," she mumbled out as her eyes turned towards Sorun. "I'm fine. More importantly, Enerjak is coming. Angel Island is already nearly over the city."

A small amount of relief flooded through Sorun. It wasn't enough to quell any of the quiet anger inside of him. "I'm not sitting on the sidelines while you all go out there."

Nicole grimaced. "Sorun, you said-"

"You're seriously gonna bench me when a god's about to come down here and-!?"

"We are not 'benching' you," Nicole argued, "we are making sure you don't get hurt any worse than you already are!"

"Nicole-!"

"Go to your room, Sorun!"

A flash of white-green light flooded Sorun's view, causing him to cry out in surprise. He felt a strange sensation along his body - like static running over him - followed by another strange sensation. Him sitting down on something soft.

"... Huh?" The white-green light faded from Sorun's vision, only to replaced by more white. The white of a hospital room. A hospital room the teen was certain he hadn't been in a few seconds ago. "What- what the- she... she teleported me? She can do that?" Sorun muttered out.

He hadn't known she could forcibly teleport people in the city. Or that the nanites had that type of capability. Did they? Did she build some kind of teleportation machine she could use it anywhere she wanted? Wouldn't surprise him; he saw similar tech on Eggman's mech suit. She herself said she was familiar with it. It still shocked him she even had something like that. And even more that she'd used it to force him back to his hospital room.

"... 'Go to your room.' What am I, four?" Sorun quietly scoffed to himself as he looked up from the bed he was sitting on. "I can't believe she- what happened to the door!?"

The door to his hospital room was gone. Simply gone. It just wasn't there anymore. Where once there was a door there was now only a smooth, white wall. Nicole removed the door.

"Oh my god, she did me like Ed's parents when they grounded him and trapped him in the basement by taking the stairs away in that one cartoon," Sorun mumbled out in disbelief. "She really does think I'm four, doesn't she...?"

It'd been... Sorun wanted to say around twenty minutes. Twenty minutes since Nicole effectively grounded him to his hospital room, a concept that still had him reeling. Could have been thirty minutes. There were too many emotions swirling around in Sorun for him to keep track of something like that.

Sheer bewilderment over Nicole having actually gone as far as to trap him in his hospital room out of fear for his health. Frustration over everybody treating him like he was made of glass. Exhaustion from this whole Enerjak situation. Fear over Enerjak himself. Unbridled fury at him having hurt Nicole, even if it was unintentional and momentary. It was all too much. Sorun couldn't think straight.

What made it worse was that he heard the sounds of combat outside. Sorun couldn't see it, of course- the most he got were glances out of a window that wasn't even a window anymore, just a glass pane that didn't open in any way. The thundering of Chaos energy attacks being shot off and other such things. Sorun could have sworn he'd seen flashes of very familiar-looking spear-shaped energy attacks in the distance, and flashes of a red and black form. So Shadow, then. Sally apparently managed to get through to G.U.N. and they'd at least sent Shadow.

It didn't do much to make Sorun feel better. He couldn't stand it. Everybody out there fighting somebody that seemed way out of their league, and here he was stuck in a hospital room pacing around like a maniac because he just couldn't sit still through it all. Too antsy. Too eager to get out there and help. Too worried about what was happening to everybody because the bloody idiots chose to fight a god .

"Yamato has the capability to rend man from devil. If Vergil can stab himself with the Yamato and separate his human and demonic halves, creating V and Urizen, then I can for sure separate Enerjak and whoever he's possessing. All I'd need is one clean hit." Sorun ceased his pacing and firmly planted down on the bed, groaning out loud in frustration. "Agh, but everybody has a fucking point! My body's shit, it just can't keep up with a Mobian, let alone a fucking juiced-up super Mobian god or whatever the fuck Enerjak is. Especially right now when I'm so many Emeralds deep I get winded so easy. I wouldn't last long enough. I need... I need something to help me."

He got up off the bed, and immediately turned to the back of the room. Towards where the cabinets were, above the small sink in the counter at the back. Sorun approached it without a moment's hesitation, and then began opening cabinets with the intent to rifle through them.

"Come on, this is a hospital. There's gotta be something, ANYTHING, that can help me out here. A pick-me-up, a booster of some kind, I'd take a fucking Flinstones chewable vitamin at this point if it'd even give me so much as a second longer-"

Sorun's thoughts cut out when he opened a cabinet and saw something. A syringe. A single, innocuous syringe just sitting there, looking so out of place in the otherwise empty cabinet. Sorun blinked at it, and then reached out towards it. He grabbed it, and then pulled it out of the cabinet. He rolled the syringe full of a clear fluid around so he could see the label on the others side, and then started reading it.

"... Oh. Oh, shit. Seriously? They just leave something like this lying around? Pffft, I'll take it. Perfect." The syringe was sent straight to Sorun's pocket. Maybe it wasn't so strange, seeing as he was in a hospital, but he wasn't going to look a gift horse in the mouth. The contents of that syringe were just what he needed.

"Alright. Got what I need. Now..." Sorun approached the unopenable window and made a contemplative hum. "How do I escape the hospital room? There's no door, and I don't know if even the Bringer Claws are strong enough to punch out a window made with Nicole's nanites. With my luck they'd just regenerate. Maybe I could..."

His thoughts trailed off, followed by Sorun's expression falling flat. He inhaled, and then looked down at his hand as Yamato appeared in his grip. "... Right. I can just do that." He looked up at the window. "Sorry, Nicole, but I can teleport, too." He sliced the sword through the air. "Or at least make portals."

Wanted to find where in the city all your friends were fighting a god? That was easy: just ignore the city shaking and follow the red and green lights in the distance. That's the method Sorun employed, anyways. He'd gone straight towards the source of the fighting after escaping the hospital, only giving the large island floating above the city a cursory glance before facing back to his destination.

"So that's what it looks like. Huh. Guess it's about what I expected. Giant floating island."

He only needed to round a house's corner to see where all the commotion was happening. It was in a small grass clearing, between a bunch of houses and near the library, all of which looked to be in rough shape. The first thing Sorun saw was the crowd of people. Not just all the Freedom Fighters. Not just the Chaotix, sans Knuckles. Not even just Shadow and Rouge, who were also there. No, there were even random New Mobotropolis citizens there, too, all grouped up to one side. And seemingly frozen in place, as they were all surrounded by a green aura and none of them were moving.

And in front of them all was the man of the hour himself. Enerjak. Nothing more to say about that. He was just standing there, talking, seemingly, to the crowd of Mobians he'd evidently frozen. Sorun's patience ended there, and he Tricked a few meters behind Enerjak and the frozen crowd.

"You know it's bad when you gotta rely on the cripple to save the day."

Gone was all the fear, the anxiety, the worry. Not when the source of all today's ire was standing right there in front of Sorun, in all his golden glory. Not when he was still upset at everybody for the way they were treating him, even if he understood it. Not when he had to see Nicole hurt like that.

He was just genuinely pissed off.

Enerjak had stopped in whatever monologue he'd been in, and turned around. The only part of his face Sorun could see past the gold helmet was his mouth and red dreadlocks, and Sorun saw Enerjak's mouth was open a bit in surprise at seeing him. Even the white lenses of his helmet seemed a bit wider in shock.

Sorun ignored him completely and looked towards the crowd behind him. He made a "tch" sound and looked towards where he saw Sally's frozen body. "Wow, Sally. You let civilians fight the guy but not me. Really feeling your confidence in me here."

He saw her eyes, as well as everyone else's eyes, move around, but that was all that could move. He even heard muffled sounds as they attempted to speak out, but nothing significant made it out of whatever that green energy trapping them was.

"What did you do to them?" Sorun demanded, facing back towards Enerjak.

"They're unharmed, I assure you." Enerjak's voice was completely normal-sounding. And also familiar to the point that Sorun was starting to suspect who it actually was. And it just went to piss him off even more. "They're all merely in stasis. I've quieted them down so we can talk uninterrupted, but they're completely aware of everything happening."

"... Knuckles, take the stupid hat off."

Again, Enerjak started in surprise. Afterwards he lowly chuckled, and obliged Sorun by reaching up and taking the helmet off. He tucked it under his arm afterwards to reveal... just Knuckles' plain face. Same face, same violet eyes, he even had an easy smile on his face.

Expression was off, though. It looked friendly, but there was something there not quite right that Sorun couldn't put his finger on. Might have been the Chaos entity possessing him. It was, but wasn't Knuckles at the same time, despite it being his face. It unsettled Sorun a bit.

"Nothing gets past you, does it, Sorun?" Knuckles - Enerjak - asked. "I'm... glad you're here, actually. So we can talk."

"Wow, this came out of nowhere. Like, literally. There was no buildup to this at all. It just happened." Sorun began to pace back and forth, eye still locked on Knuckles who followed him with his own eyes. "So, Knuckles! You're coming up in the world. Got god-like power, fought everybody and won, Shadow couldn't even scratch you it seems, hi Shadow, long time no see," Sorun interrupted himself by nodding at the nearby, frozen dark hedgehog. "I'd go as far as to congratulate you," Sorun continued, facing back to Enerjak, "if you didn't also seem to go completely insane by attacking everybody around you."

The pleasant smile that was on Enerjak's face started to drop off. "You, too, do not approve of my ascension, it seems," he realized. "Sorun, you have to realize that what I do is for everybody's own good, including you."

"You know, I've been getting that a lot lately. It's starting to really tick me off."

"You're angry."

"Ohhhh no, Enerjak, I'm not angry. Knuckles, if he's still in there somewhere and not a mind puppet at this point, saw what me being angry is back in New Megaopolis with everyone else. Me when I was fighting Eggman? Cool, quiet Sorun? That was absolute anger. That was my peak." He held his spectral index finger in the air as he whirled his body to face the god-like echidna. "We're not quite there yet, but we're gettin' there." The hand fell back to Sorun's side, and he made a large sigh. "I'll give ya a chance to explain yourself, though, even though I doubt it's gonna be good. But I'm a good person, right? And good people give others chances."

It was Enerjak's turn to sigh. "You misunderstand, Sorun. I am Knuckles."

Sorun scoffed in response, but remained quiet otherwise and allowed the echidna to continue.

"You are aware," he began, "that my people, the echidna people, were utterly decimated due to the machinations of Dr. Eggman, are you not?"

Shrugging, Sorun said, "Sure, real tragic. Failing to see the point, though."

"It's just one blot of misery on the bloodstained history that this planet has," Enerjak continued, looking down at the ground and grimacing. Sorun himself paused in surprise when he registered genuine anguish on his face. "My people, almost rendered extinct due to one madman and his sick fascination with technology. Before that my people were divided because half believed fusing their bodies with machinery and becoming abominations was the way to truly elevating the species. Before that the Overlanders used their technology to wipe out swathes of Mobians in the Great War. The effects of technology are still felt from how polluted parts of the planet are! This very city is powered by poison as a result of technology's misgivings!"

"What," Sorun interrupted, "does any of this have to do with attacking the town and our friends?"

"Everything, Sorun. Everything." He looked up at Sorun, and his expression turned even sadder. "Even you, dear friend," he mumbled out, making Sorun quirk his eyebrow. "You're only here because we abused technology out of desperation to defeat Eggman. We stole you from a home you can never return to, and stranded you in this world. And you still fought with us, despite all that." His expression grew warmer. "You have no idea how much I grew to admire you, how deeply I respected you for everything you risked for a cause you had no right to be a part of. I can never express how grateful I am to you for how you put everything on the line to save everybody when Eggman took us all to those life-draining pods of his." The warmness fell away from his face, the helmet creaked as the arm it was under tightened. "Seeing you torn apart like that, to yet another technological monstrosity perpetrated by Eggman, hurt deeply. Don't you see how technology-"

"Don't make this about me." Sorun's voice cut through Enerjak's speech, causing him to quiet down and look at Sorun with questioning eyes. Sorun's own expression remained flat and unamused, the teen having actually felt anger at the god having tried to use his own suffering as a reason for all this. "You don't like technology, I get it. It's... it's this thing with echidna. The Knuckles I know never really seemed like he was in the crowd of radicals that was flat-out against it, though, so I'm believing less and less you're a hundred percent Knuckles. It's lookin' more like Enerjak than Knuckles to me." Slowly placing his hands in his pockets with the thumbs hanging out, Sorun leaned his body forwards in Enerjak's direction. "You don't like technology. It's a grave sin or whatever. Okay. We've established that. Now why don't you tell me what you plan on doing about it?"

It was around halfway through listening to Sorun's own words that Enerjak adopted that surprised look again. It began falling to a neutral expression towards the end, and once Sorun finished by asking the question he sighed and nodded towards him. "You are correct. Technology is a sin; its use even moreso. Everything it has touched has created nothing but blights and suffering for those involved." He tilted his head upwards, towards the island floating above them. "Through the efforts of Dr. Finitevus, I have seen the light. The world is far too corrupt. It cannot be saved. The only answer is to cleanse it and begin again. To usher in a new age ruled by benevolent strength, not cold metal." He lowered his head back down to Sorun. "This is what I have decided."

"So you're gonna save the world by destroying the world. You know, they have a term for that. It's called a logical fallacy. Alternatively we could simplify it and call it what it is: you being a moron." Sorun crouched down, loudly sighing as he looked up at the island. "So Dr. Fish Stick up there got it in your head that the world needs a reset because 'technology bad', so you're gonna reshape the world with your neato burrito powers that got you possessed by Enerjak." His head tilted down to Enerjak. "You're literally a walking trope villain right now. You know that, right? Ultron, Light Yagami, Mass Effect Reapers, these names mean nothing to you but I can go on. It never ended well for any of these people, by the way."

"My cause is just," Enerjak argued, violet eyes narrowing.

"Ehhhh, not really." Sorun stood up to his feet. "So now that we've analyzed your motivations and, surprise surprise, they're awful, we get to the part where I say stop it before I stab you in the face."

The threat hadn't registered at all with the echidna. If anything, he just looked more sad. "Sorun, please. Consider your actions," Enerjak pleaded. "It doesn't have to be like this. I can heal you- restore everything you've lost! Please. Just stand aside."

"The whole world for an arm? What an offer," Sorun sarcastically remarked, going as far as to examine his spectral arm. "Lemme ask you this. Technology is a sin, right?" He gestured his arms out to the sides, gesturing to the city around them. "Is all this a sin? This genuinely beautiful city that gave everyone a home?" His arms fell to his side, and he cast a glare towards Enerjak. "More importantly," Sorun said, voice going still and eerily calm, "is Nicole's very existence a sin?"

There was absolute silence between them. Sorun stared at Enerjak expectantly, while Enerjak just silently gazed at Sorun. Even all of the people put in stasis behind them stopped their struggling against the Chaos energy restraining them to silently watch as Sorun let the question hang in the air.

"Well? Is it?" Sorun asked. "Technology is sin. That's what you believe. So is Nicole evil just because she's born from technology? Does her being an AI make her inherently evil? Is she not allowed to exist just because you say so? Are you gonna snuff out a sentient being over belief alone? Hm? Enerjak ...?" he all but hissed out.

"..." Enerjak's eyes hardened. "It's for the good of the planet," he settled on.

"Hm, alright." Sorun slowly inhaled, and then exhaled. Despite his overly calm appearance on the outside, the breathing did nothing to quell the wrath coursing through him. "Well, we're at that point," Sorun said, voice still calm and even, his iris constricted. "I couldn't possibly be more angry than I am right now."

A light frown. That was all Enerjak offered Sorun as he grabbed at the gold helmet held under his arm. A light frown and a pitying look. "Why oppose me, Sorun?" he asked, sounding hurt. "Why?"

"I just don't like you. That's all." He took his left hand out of his pocket. "Other than that? You hurt Nicole when you crushed that drone. You shouldn'ta done that." Yamato materialized in his grasp. "You called Nicole's existence a sin. You shouldn'ta said that."

Making a displeased sound, Enerjak donned the helmet over his head. "I'm monumentally disappointed in you, Sorun," he rumbled out.

"Yeah, I do that a lot," Sorun said back as he began drawing Yamato from its sheath. "Get used to disappointment."

The sword was fully drawn and and held to Sorun's side. Sunlight glinted off the silver blade, with the empty scabbard held in his left hand.

"Have you forgotten that I am a god incarnate?" Enerjak questioned him, half in amusement and half in a tired tone. "None before me have even posed a challenge. What could you possibly hope to do?"

"Mm, yeah, you got a point," Sorun admitted with a nod of his head. "You forgot to account for one thing, though."

"And that is?"

"I got the power to stop time from the last Emerald."

"... Wha-"

"Quicksilver."

It was less than when the word was said and more when it was merely thought did the power activate. The world around Sorun slowed to a crawl as a wave that inverted the colors of everything it touched expanded from Sorun's position. The colors slowly returned to their normal pigmentation, and at the same time the world came to an absolute stop. Falling leaves paused in midair. The energy roiling around the people in stasis behind Enerjak froze. Enerjak himself remained immobile.

All was completely still. All except for Sorun, who was calmly walking towards Enerjak with his sword in hand.

"Dante's ability from 'DMC3'. Now I can do it too, Shadow." Sorun stopped in front of Enerjak, silently staring down at his body. "Where's a non-vital area I can stab? Don't wanna accidentally kill Knuckles." He aimed the sword at Enerjak's stolen body, humming slightly as he aimed it. "I would assume the locations his organs are in are relatively close to a human's, but... eh, I don't know shit about Mobian anatomy. I'll play it safe and go for the shoulder. Doesn't matter anyway; I just gotta stick it in somewhere."

Yamato was plunged through Enerjak's left shoulder and pierced through to the other side effortlessly. Blood flew through the air, pausing midair momentarily before it began to slowly fall to the ground as time sped back up to its normal pace. Less than a second later it splashed to the ground.

Enerjak grunted out in both surprise and pain from the blade that, from his perspective, had instantly embedded itself into him. He only managed to stare at the blade in absolute shock for a second before blue energy coated the blade. "What are you- ergh!" Green sparks of electricity arced around his body. The blue and gold clothing began to fade in and out of existence, and as a result Enerjak loudly gasped out. "You... no, no stop it-!"

Sorun tore the blade out of Knuckles' shoulder. Along with the blade and some blood flew out a third thing: a golden, spectral projection of Enerjak that rolled onto the ground behind Sorun. In his former place was Knuckles, who, with his shoulder bleeding profusely, collapsed down to the ground.

Without even paying the fallen echidna a single glance Sorun turned to the golden ghost behind him. He wordlessly began to approach Enerjak's projection, his spectral hand flipping the katana around to hold it in a reversed grip. He stopped right above Enerjak, who was flat on his back and staring straight up at Sorun.

"Warned ya."

No sooner had the words left Sorun's lips did he plunge the sword down right through the ghost's face.

The reaction hadn't exactly been what Sorun had wanted. There was a lot of screaming and thrashing from Enerjak's golden spectral form, which was good. There were even cracks forming along his body. Even better. But Sorun had been hoping for a sword going through the ghost's face to result in instant death, not mere damage.

"Of course he'd be resistant. He's made of Chaos energy," Sorun's mind spat. "Fine. Whatever. If I can't do it in one, I'll just keep cutting him 'til he dies."

Enerjak had other plans, though, much to Sorun's annoyance. He watched as the spectral ghost glowed brightly, and then condensed down into a small orb. It flew away from him and Yamato, with Sorun lazily turning around as he watched the orb race towards Knuckles' body.

The gold orb flew right in without any resistance. Knuckles' eyes snapped wide open as the blue and gold clothes returned to his body. He stood up in an instant, Enerjak panting out heavily as green energy rolled over the wound on his shoulder and healed it in an instant. His helmeted head then looked up at Sorun, his mouth practically in a snarl as he stood up straighter.

"What... what did you do...?" he demanded, still lightly panting. "What did you do to me!?"

"The Yamato can separate anything. So I separated Enerjak from Knuckles," Sorun answered in a simple tone. "I wanted to just kill the Enerjak half right afterwards, but it seems you're a bit resistant to Yamato. You can still be damaged, though... guess I'll just have to do that a bunch 'til you're dust."

"That sword..." Enerjak's helmeted gaze fell from Sorun to the sword in his grasp. "I can see it for what it is. That thing... that wretched, ruinous blade... something like that should not exist."

There was something to Enerjak's voice that gave Sorun pause. Something different from the overconfidence and mightier-than-thou attitude Enerjak had thus far. There was fear now. His tone had gone completely serious, but underneath it was fear. Not an overwhelming amount, but it was there. Fear not directed at Sorun, but specifically at the sword. Yamato.

"The Yamato?" Sorun propped the katana on his shoulder and gave Enerjak a questioning look. "'S nothing more than a magic katana made from a Chaos Emerald. You know that."

"It's more than that..." Enerjak mumbled, taking a step back. His eyes were still on the sword. "Your will, your heart, you shaped it into that monstrosity! Why would you make such a vile thing, Sorun...!? Why would you create that!? Such a demonic, cursed thing -!"

Enerjak cried out in pain when, once again, Sorun had stopped time, walked up to him, and this time stabbed him through the stomach before time resumed again. Just like last time, Enerjak was torn from Knuckles when Sorun ripped the blade out. Unlike last time Sorun resorted to cleaving the sword down on Enerjak's ghost, again and again, making him scream more as numerous white cracks formed along his ghostly form. And like last time he went back into Knuckles to manifest his physical form.

Sorun hadn't waited for Enerjak to catch his breath, and walked right up to him with the intent of stabbing him again. When he stabbed down, however, there was a flash of green, and all Sorun managed to stab was nanites replicating dirt. He looked behind him, humming a bit when he realized that Enerjak had teleported to the other side of the clearing.

"You leave critical wounds on my body by doing that," Enerjak said, regaining his composure as he stood up straighter. "You'll kill me at this rate, Sorun. Is that what you want? To kill your friend?"

"First, Knuckles is my friend, not you. Second, you're regenerating the wounds." Sorun pointed his katana at him, at his shoulder and the wound on his stomach that sealed up faster than Sorun could perceive. "It doesn't matter where I cut, it seems.

"I gotta wonder..." Sorun continued, idly twirling the blade around in his spectral hand, "if you can even jump hosts instead of having to fix Knuckles' body over and over. Julie-Su's right over there, but instead of getting a new body you're sticking with Knuckles. And as far as I know, the only other echidna who's ever been Enerjak is that freaky Dimitri guy. After he dosed himself with a helping of Chaos energy. Knuckles told me his own dad did something similar and hit him with a Chaos energy beam when he was an egg. That's why he's special." The sword was flipped up to rest on Sorun's shoulder. "Could it be..." he wondered, "that you can't inhabit just any old echidna body? You need a special one that's been modified like Dimitri and Knuckles? One with an unnaturally strong link to the Chaos Force? If so, you're not gonna let your host body die. You'll keep fixing him up regardless of the damage I do. Which means I can cut you up as much as I want since Knuckles will be fine in the end."

It'd been a scenario Sorun had been running through his head as he'd walked towards the battlefield everyone was at. He'd seen it in various forms of fiction before. The all-powerful such-and-such needed a special host body to preserve itself so it could exist. A host body that needed to fulfill certain prerequisites. Dimitri telling Sorun Enerjak initially only existed because of what he'd done to himself had him thinking it was something along those lines. That Dimitri and Knuckles were viables hosts that met prerequisites needed for Enerjak to possess them. If so, it was simple: separate the entity from the host and kill it.

That's what he intended to do. To keep separating Enerjak from Knuckles over and over until he finally managed to kill it.

"You're making a mistake," Enerjak growled out to him as green energy gathered around his hands. "I am Knuckles!"

"So it's a fusion-type deal where you can't disassociate yourself with the host, same difference. I already proved you're separate beings by separating you." Sorun began walking forwards. "It's actually really sad if you think about-"

Sorun was abruptly cut off mid-sentence as a wave of exhaustion overtook him. He made a frustrated growl as he dropped to a single knee, his grip on the sword and scabbard loosening completely as the weapon fell to the ground. He began panting lightly as he looked back up at Enerjak. The furious snarl he'd had on previously was turning into a smirk.

"You may be able to wield the forces of Chaos such as I, Sorun, but your body is mortal," Enerjak stated. "You have limits, doubly so from your previous injuries. You cannot heal like I can. I can keep this up all day, while you're already on your knees after a couple of minutes."

"Yeah, yeah..." Sorun bit back on his own frustration as he, with some effort, climbed back to his feet. "That's why I stole this epinephrine from the hospital," he said, digging into his pocket for the syringe he'd pocketed from earlier.

Epinephrine. In other words: straight adrenaline. He knew enough medical know-how from his mom to know what it was the moment he'd read the label. Sorun'd been amazed to find a syringe of the stuff just lying there for him to take, and had taken it immediately in preparation for this. With any luck, it'd keep him going long enough to end this. He'd also crash hard right after, but as long as he finished before that happened, it'd be fine.

He'd deal with Dr. Quack's nagging later.

"Really, Sorun?" Enerjak asked in that disappointed tone of his, his hands lowered as he watched Sorun twirl the needle between his fingers. "You're resorting to using drugs?"

"Hey, if it works. Hope Cream isn't watching me set a bad example." Without another word, he plunged the needle into his neck and compressed the plunger. He felt nothing from it, of course, not the needle entering him nor the cold fluid flooding into his body, and only chose to take the needle out and toss it over his shoulder once he'd decompressed the plunger completely. "So- whoa, that hits different..."

Sorun was hit with a sensation soon after the spent syringe was tossed away. He felt... energized wasn't the right word. Close, but not quite right. Restless, more like. Like his muscles were ready to just move . He wasn't sure about the fact it felt like his heart rate tripled, though. A side effect he'd just have to weather along with everything else that was to come after.

"Haven't felt this good in months," Sorun thought as he made a short hop, katana and scabbard reappearing in his grasp. "It's gonna suck later when my body crashes from all this."

A low growl emanated from Enerjak's throat as the green energies swirling around his hands increased in brightness and intensity. Sorun's grip on Yamato tightened, with blue, barely-perceptible wisps of blue energy sliding up and down the blade. Both faced each other, ready to spring forwards at the other at a moment's notice in preparation for the fight to come.

Said fight was interrupted by laser blasts raining down from the sky and peppering Enerjak.

"... Huh?" Confusion stretched across Sorun' features as the blade he held was lowered down to his side. He watched, stupefied, as Enerjak's body was pelted by an endless barrage of lasers that impacted him again and again. He'd even tried to erect an energy shield to protect himself, though this was done to no avail as the shield was shredded apart in less then seconds. "Who's... oh, I see."

Looking up in the sky answered Sorun's question of just what was happening. A small fleet of ships flying in the sky bearing Eggman's logo hovered above the city, all of which were firing down on Enerjak. The beams impacting his body made him gradually disappear more and more. And then, Enerjak simply vanished completely.

"... I swear if I just drugged myself with adrenaline for nothing-"

"Whoa-ho-ho! Goodness gracious, that couldn't have played out more perfectly if I tried!"

There was no stopping the loud, aggravated-sounding groan that escaped Sorun, who by now was so sapped of willpower his shoulders were sagging and limp. He turned around and saw a familiar form materialize behind him. Eggman's form. A hologram Sorun would have believed was the man himself standing before Sorun in the flesh if he hadn't seen the image flicker into existence in the first place. And much to Sorun's ire he had the same smug smirk on his face that he had when Sonic stopped Sorun from killing him earlier on.

"... You teleport Enerjak somewhere?" Sorun asked in a bland tone, eye twitching from having to see that smirk on Eggman's face.

"Correct!" Eggman confirmed, grin growing wider. "Sonic was kind enough to warn me beforehand of this Enerjak fellow, so I thought why not take this opportunity to sweep a being of unbridled power off your hands to use of for my own devices, metaphorically and literally speaking? I'd do the same to you, Sorun, but, eh..." He tilted his head downwards towards his katana and pointed at it. " That little item makes it a bit hard to contain you. And it wouldn't that sporting of me anyways. So!" Eggman clapped his hands together. "You all get to live to see another day until I say otherwise and I get a veritable infinite source of energy. Win-win."

Sorun sharply inhaled. "I... genuinely hate you with a burning passion. And I'm not that passionate about a lot of things."

"Eh, you're just saying that." Eggman spun his head left and right to gaze at the damages houses and structures all around, making a light whistle while doing so. "Huh. Not gonna lie, place could use some work. I could take this opportunity to bomb your brand-new city since it seems all that clashing Enerjak did with everybody temporarily brought down your city's defenses, but... well, like I said, I'm a sporting man. We'll call it good for today. Do me a favor and tell that AI to at least try and make the place look presentable by the time I come back to conquer you all for real." He turned around and waved at the large gathering of Mobians behind him, who Sorun noticed weren't frozen in place by green energy anymore. "Good seeing you again, Sonic! Thanks for the heads-up!"

The last thing Sorun heard before the hologram dissipated was Eggman's raucous laughter, which he could have sworn lingered behind for a few seconds even after the hologram disappeared completely. The inhale Sorun had taken earlier was slowly breathed out of him, a process he had to repeat a few times to normalize his own breathing. Once he got it under control he looked over to where the Mobians were, his eyes instantly locking onto the blue form of Sonic.

He didn't even allow the hedgehog a second to get his bearings before Sorun Tricked right in front of the hedgehog, startling him and making him jump back a bit. And then he froze when he saw the intensely irritated look Sorun was giving him.

"Gee, Sonic, he sure was a lot of help. Thanks for that. Thanks for enlisting the help of the guy actively working to destroy us all and enslave the world. The guy I was seconds away from ending. Thanks."

Groaning a bit, Sonic rubbed a hand over his face and stepped closer to the other teen. "Sorun-"

"That was such a brilliant two-hundred IQ move that I can't even comprehend it, Sonic," Sorun scathingly remarked. "You must be five moves ahead of everybody else because I can't even begin to fathom this elaborate move of yours. We're all over here playing checkers while you're playing 4-D chess like some clairvoyant-"

"And you were gonna do what!?" Sonic interrupted in a raised voice. "You were gonna go take out the big bad on your own!? You really saw that workin' out for you!?"

"It probably wasn't gonna, no, but I still made it further than you all which was literally zero -"

"Both of you, cut it out!" Sally wedged herself between the two and pushed them away with her hands, sending sharp glares at each. "Sonic, now isn't the time." She turned to Sorun. "Sorun... adrenaline ? Really?"

"What?" Sorun gave her a hapless shrug. "I just found it lying around so I thought-"

"You thought it'd be a good idea to go injecting a random drug you found into yourself!?" she all but screamed at him.

Sorun didn't visibly react at all to the scream, instead giving her a flat look. "First of all, I knew what it was. I wouldn't have done it if I thought it was dangerous. I'll pay for it later on when it wears off and I start puking my guts out. That's my choice." He leaned in closer towards Sally, who wasn't fazed in the slightest and continued scowling at him. "Second, are we not gonna talk about how you let this random crowd of people join in on the fight against Enerjak and not me? Me and my all-powerful sword? The sword that actually did something as opposed to the nothing everyone else brought?"

He noticed from the corner of his vision that some of the Mobian citizens were shifting around uncomfortably while looking away from the pair. In fact, everybody was beginning to back off to give the pair some space. Sorun continued to stare right at Sally while some of the aggression in Sally's face disappeared as she glanced towards the crowd.

"I... we all... it was a desperate time, Sorun," she sighed out as she looked back at him.

"I tried telling you," Sorun said to her. "I thought I'd be able to go, 'hey, Sally, I think Yamato can separate Enerjak from Knuckles, maybe we can all plan around that and come up with some super great strategy to save the day.' Instead all this happened." He threw his arms out to the side. "Sally, I get it, I know you guys are trying to look after me, but for god's sake, woman, I'm not... I'm not super sturdy like you guys, but I'm not that fragile, either. I made it this far, didn't I? Granted not in one piece, but still. Come on."

"I know." Sally gave him a small nod and an accepting look. "Sorun, I-"

The pale teen held his hands up to Sally to stop her. "I don't want apologies. I just want to put it behind us so we can focus on more important things. Mainly that." He pointed up at the floating island above them. "And everything else. I'll forgive everybody for everything if we can just do that right now."

Honestly, he really just said it because he couldn't handle another round of apologies, and because there really were bigger and pressing issues. Fortunately Sally seemed to see the logic in everything Sorun said, and gave him an agreeing nod. Sorun just managed to breath out in relief as he saw Sonic's blue form approach them, flanked by Julie-Su.

"So," Sonic began, the two Mobians stopping next to Sally and Sorun, "what do we do now?"

"I don't know, I'm thinking." Sally turned around and began pacing in small steps, simultaneously rubbing her index fingers on the sides of her head. "We're not really in a good position to be doing anything right now-"

Something golden appeared in the corner of Sorun's vision, causing him to shift his attention from Sally to the object. He'd felt an internal shock from the gold color at first and thought it was Enerjak, but then calmed down when he saw it was just a large, golden ring floating in the air behind Sonic and Julie-Su. And then he grew confused as to why there was a floating golden ring behind them. Confusion grew to curiosity, causing Sorun to trick right behind the pair of Mobians so he could eye the ring with a curious eye.

"Huh, this ring..." Sorun thought as he looked to the center, where he saw that the entire hollow of the ring was filled with a bright, golden light. "It... kind of looks like a... portal...?"

That was as far as Sorun's thoughts carried him before a red-furred arm with a brown glove shot out of the portal, grabbed Sorun by the scruff of his shirt, and pulled him through the ring-portal.

A/N- You can really feel when I go from doing my own plots to just going through the comic's plots from how faster the pacing gets. You don't realize it reading the thing in comic format but once you actually write it out it just goes. And if the ending feels abrupt it's because this chapter and the next were supposed to be one, but it was getting a bit long so I split them in two.

Like a lot of things about the echidna the comics did I don't like, which is pretty much everything, they introduce a character like Enerjak with near-omnipotent powers. And the problem with introducing a character with near-omnipotent powers is that you either have to jump through a lot of writing hoops to find a way to get the main characters to beat them while making it look believable, or you just straight-out make them fight the god and win. The problem with that latter thing is that you're gonna mess up the power scaling by basically implying your characters can take out near-omnipotent beings, and that kills the tension. To be honest I would have liked never including Enerjak in the story to begin with, but guess what, he's an important character in the comics, so in he goes.

Comic suffers this problem a lot when you look deeper into comic Sonic's feats and how powerful he really is and realize there should really have never been any reason he couldn't have blitzed, like, ninety percent of the villain cast solo. Guy's stupid broken. I'm not even gonna get into the stupid universe-crushing mammoth guy and mountain-sized buff Tails.

That image of mountain-sized buff Tails is cursed.

Originally I did plan to just have Sorun flat-out fight him to a draw before Eggman teleported him away like in the comics with the justification being that he just happens to have a hyper-specific power set that's a perfect counter to Enerjak, but, again, gotta keep the power scaling consistent. So "Sorun fights Enerjak to a draw" turned into "Sorun gets some cheap shots in with time stop and then Eggman swoops in to teleport Enerjak away before they fight for real and Enerjak massacres Sorun".

Chapter 48

Recursion Error

Episode 48- Okay, doomer

"I'm getting real tired of people pulling me through random-ass portals."

Wasn't much to be said about the fact somebody pulled Sorun through a portal. He'd been pulled through a portal, and wound up on the other side face-down in some grass. Real grass, too, Sorun suspected, and not nanites perfectly imitating grass. But other than the effects of the epinephrine shot he'd injected himself with, he felt fine. Physically at least.

Mentally he was between being tired enough to give up and angry enough to start lashing out at everything in sight. He just felt done with it all.

Huffing out, Sorun rolled onto his back and stood up. Surroundings were unfamiliar, mainly from the fact he'd appeared in a grass field surrounded by strange trees that almost looked like palm trees. No people, either. Nobody except for the red echidna standing in front of him giving him about as odd a look as Sorun felt.

"..." Sorun gave the echidna a quick glance. Looked like Knuckles but with blue eyes, and way older. Reasonably aged if the old-looking tribal garb and gray eyebrows said anything, which Sorun had to do a double-take at, because he hadn't known echidna even have eyebrows. At least he thought they didn't whenever he looked at Knuckles and Julie-Su. He shook his head to purge these thoughts and looked at the old-looking echidna with a displeased look. "Thirty seconds, fill it with reasons why you pulled me through a portal."

"You are not Sonic," was the only thing the echidna offered him.

"Gee, really?" Sorun sarcastically exclaimed. "What," he continued with a grunt as he climbed to his feet, "did you see the arm and grab the closest blue thing you saw 'cause you thought it was Sonic?"

A low sound left the echidna's throat as Sorun finally stood up and dusted himself off. Sorun couldn't rightly place what that sound meant. "It was my intention to bring Sonic here to aid with the current situation surrounding Enerjak," he said. "It seems I brought you by mistake."

"Glad you cleared that up." Sorun took a glance at the trees around them. "Where's here, anyways?"

"Angel Island," the echidna answered immediately. "I've brought you to Angel Island."

"Oh. So this is the island, huh?" Explained the palm trees, at least. Didn't help to explain much else. "Okay," he mumbled out, turning back to the echidna, "and who are you?"

"I would ask who you are first."

Sorun's eye narrowed a bit in the echidna's direction. "And I would think that the polite thing to do after pulling some poor guy through a portal up to a floating island would be to introduce yourself to the aforementioned poor, confused, and now slightly-annoyed guy. But you don't seem particularly polite."

The old echidna gave Sorun an equally narrowed look with his eyes, which went along with the unpleasant expression he gave Sorun. The Earthling, for his part, simply kept staring back at the echidna while maintaining a blank expression mixed in with his sharp look.

Finally, the echidna gave in and relaxed his shoulders. "My name is Locke," he finally offered.

The name triggered something in Sorun's memory, and he found himself instantly recognizing it. "Knuckles' dad?" he asked, causing him to nod. "Ah. Dunno if you know this but your kid got possessed by a Chaos... thingy."

"Of course I know this!" Locke exclaimed in a frustrated tone. "It's my intent to fix this entire mess before things get too out of hand! I only had the one Warp Ring on me, but instead of getting somebody I trusted to be capable of helping I pulled you through instead." He approached Sorun closely enough that they were inches from each other. Sorun had rose his eyebrow as he gave the Mobian a questioning look. "I have no inclination as to what somebody of your kind was doing in that city, but if you've no way to contact the city below then I insist that you stand aside so I can do so myself."

Sorun's eye narrowed further, with his head tilting just the slightest amount. His hands twitched. "How about instead of wasting time doing that you just ask me to help with whatever you needed Sonic with and I'll do it in his place, Locke?"

"I am not willing to let an Overlander trample about up here while lives are at stake."

There wasn't maliciousness to his voice which made Sorun all the more confused. The lack of any scorn in his voice, however, did not stop Sorun from taking offense with the echidna for saying that.

"Ohhhh, pal..." Sorun turned his back to Locke. He took another exhale and shook his head. "I'm not even a- do you even know who I am?" Sorun asked, turning his head back around to Locke. "I know you and Knuckles were all radio silent for reasons, but do- have you kept with with anything that's been happening down on the planet for the last four odd months? Anything at all?" Sorun pressed a hand against his chest. "Everything Eggman did, the Chaos Emeralds, any of that? Any of that ringing a bell?"

To Sorun's disbelief, Locke shook his head. "I've been a little busy preoccupying myself with making sure my people on this island weren't wiped out amid the warring factions."

"Yeah, and I've been dealing with stuff concerning the whole world, this island included, so I'm sorry but I just... I just really don't fucking care about you or anything that goes on here. All the nonsense bullshit concerning you echidna and this island, I just- I fucking swear, it's not even self-contained here anymore, it's spilling out onto the planet below, and now there's this whole Enerjak thing going on, so guess what, Locke, this is now my problem, too." When Locke continued to maintain a harsh glare on Sorun, he sighed and rubbed a hand over his face. "Look," he said in a less hostile tone, "this whole thing is because of Dr. Fini-whatever the fuck his name is, right? What exactly did he do to start all this?"

To his credit, and much to Sorun's relief, Locke had taken a calming breath and eased off on the aggressive glaring before he spoke out. "I am... not entirely sure what he did. What I do know was that he somehow coerced Knuckles into using his abilities to absorb the power of the Master Emerald."

"Thing that keeps the island floating?"

Locke nodded. "Yes. Finitevus, he... tampered with the Emerald, somehow. Put a spell of some sorts on it. It corrupted Knuckles, made him more susceptible to Dr. Finitevus' will. Enerjak was the result."

The explanation made Sorun pause. An idea began to form. "He put some kind of curse on the Master Emerald, and that's what turned him into Enerjak?"

"Spell, curse, hex, whatever you wish to call it, yes! Finitevus has been constantly supplying him with his corrupted power-"

"If that hex was removed from the Emerald... separated, let's say... would Knuckles turn back to normal?"

"What?" Locke blinked in confusion, and then shook his head. "Perhaps, most likely, but we've not time to conceive a method for performing such a task."

"Then what's your plan?"

"Simply put..." Locke closed his eyes and tilted his head downwards. A low breath blew past his lips. "This is not the first incident involving Enerjak to arise. Back when it was still intact, a group I was a member of named the Brotherhood constructed a weapon that could end Enerjak and his host, once and for all."

The shock that hit Sorun was enough to straighten his head up as his eye widened in Locke's direction. "You wanna use a super weapon to kill him?" He quietly muttered out. "That's fucked. He's your kid."

"Not... not anymore. He's Enerjak." Locke's eyes opened back up, making Sorun go quiet again. There wasn't mistaking the pain in his face under that resolute and determined look in his eyes. Or any way to miss the way his voice just slightly quivered. He must have gone to great lengths to hide it, though, as Sorun wasn't able to hear it when he spoke further. "Whether you agree or not is of no consequence. This is the entire world we're-"

"You know," Sorun interrupted, causing Locke to angrily scowl, "when Knuckles first told me you decided to go and irradiate him as an egg, I got the impression your morals fell on the wayside and you were a really messed-up dude. Seeing you now, though, I think I was wrong." He turned away from Locke, a frustrated, tired look on his face. "Now I just think you're a fucking dumbass," he continued. "Maybe somewhere under there, way, deep down, is a decent guy and a half-baked father that at least wants to try and be a good person. Maybe. Somewhere underneath all that stupidity." He fully turned back around to Locke. "You don't wanna see the world burn, don't blame ya, but I'm not gonna let you off your own kid just to save it. I'd never forgive you, and you'd never forgive yourself." He started walking, not pausing after passing Locke's side as he said,

"Don't get me wrong, I'm not doing this for you. I'm doing this for Knuckles and everybody I care about that care about him. Nobody's dying. 'Cept maybe Doc Finny when I get my hands on him."

Save the world at the expense of a single life? Wasn't that just the story of his life. He already knew what that was like, and there was no way he was going to let that kind of fate fall on someone else. Not if he could stop it. And oh, he could. He had a pointy stick that said he could.

He wasn't letting Knuckles join him in the grave of dumbass martyrs.

"There is no other option-" Locke tried, but was stopped when Sorun quit moving and whirled back around to him.

"No way, echidna tech fucks everybody over from everything I heard, I don't trust it. We're doing this my way." His expression softened a bit, and he held his left hand up. "Listen," he tried in a quieter voice as he manifested Yamato, making Locke's eyes widen. "This is a sword made from a Chaos Emerald I absorbed. It's a thing I can do, don't ask. It has the power to separate anything it cuts." He lowered the sheathed katana to his side. "So what I wanna do," he offered, "is go straight to the Master Emerald and use the Yamato to separate it from the hex put on it. Knuckles goes free, threat averted, maybe I cut the evil doctor echidna man's head off along the way, don't know, we'll see. Just show me where it is and I can fix this."

After finishing his proposal, Sorun looked closely at Locke's expression. It'd gone through a number of shifts, from skepticism to disbelief to thoughtfulness, all while he stared at Sorun's sword. Through it all, though, Sorun could have sworn he saw the faintest glimmer of hope in the old echidna's eyes. Hope that maybe his son didn't have to die, which reaffirmed Sorun's belief that there had to be some goodness in there somewhere.

His belief that his goodness was stifled by stupidity was also proven by the red Mobian's next line. "I'll admit that the amount of Chaos energy I feel radiating from that blade is staggering," he admitted,

"but you'll have to forgive me for not trusting the word of an Overlander I just met. why would you be interested at all in saving Knuckles?"

"... 'Cause we're friends?" Sorun tried in a confused tone. "Why-why would I lie? Christ, man, I'm trying to help you!"

"You have no guarantee the sword-"

"It managed to separate Enerjak from Knuckles!" Sorun shouted at him, causing Locke to freeze right up. "I kept doing it over and over to try and save Knuckles, but the fucking ghost or whatever Enerjak is kept snapping back into his body! Maybe the hex on the Master Emerald is anchoring him to Knuckles, or something else, I don't know, but if it can do that it can separate the Emerald from the hex." He took a step closer to Locke and gave him a pleading look. "Listen, you don't like me, I don't like you, I get it. But I genuinely just want to save your son and everyone else here. I just need to know where the Master Emerald is and for you to take me there."

"I..." Confliction appeared on Locke's face as he stared down at his feet. "I don't..."

"For the- fine, we'll try this." With a frustrated grunt, Sorun tore Yamato out of its sheath. Two cuts were made in the air, forming a portal. Sorun stuck his spectral hand in the portal afterwards, looking through it briefly as he searched for what he was looking for. Locke looked on in bewilderment, and somehow the shock on his face grew even greater when Sorun pulled himself out of the portal, another Mobian in the grasp of his spectral arm, which he then set down on the ground while also cutting the portal away.

The new Mobian in question, which Sorun had pulled out from New Mobotropolis, was Julie-Su. Hadn't even been that hard to find her- she'd been in the same place everybody else had been when Sorun went through the Warp Ring as Locke called it, arguing amongst themselves. Sorun had simply plucked Julie-Su out of the crowd and put her here. And now the poor, confused Mobian was looking around left and right, nearly looking hysterical as she took in her surroundings.

"What- where- this is... the island...?" Julie-Su held her eyes up to Sorun, still looking completely lost. "Sorun?" she mumbled out as she got up to her feet. "What's going on? Why did you pull me up here?"

"Because Knuckles' dad is being an idiot, and I don't see his mom around anywhere, so you're practically the closest family he's got I know besides dad of the year back there since you two are so close," Sorun explained. "Here's the argument: I can solve the Enerjak problem and save everybody including Knuckles. Locke has his own way of getting rid of Enerjak, but Knuckles'll die. So what're we going with?"

Of course no matter what they were doing Sorun's way. He was determined to see it go that route. He also knew that the female echidna in front of him and Knuckles were in a romantic relationship, and that in no way she'd allow Locke to try and end Knuckles. More than that, she probably knew where the Master Emerald was. If Locke wouldn't take him, she would.

But maybe that wouldn't be necessary. Maybe somehow Julie-Su'd be able to convince Locke that Sorun was on the up-and-up and could do this. It'd certainly be nice, if not hopeful. He'd have to see how it went.

"What!?" Julie-Su had turned on Locke in a heartbeat, anger forming across her face. "Of course we're saving Knuckles!" she yelled out, stomping towards Locke. "You can't be serious! You'd destroy your own son-!?"

"The life of one compared to Mobius itself-!"

"If Sorun says he has a way-!"

"A random Overlander-!"

"He isn't an Overlander!" Julie-Su's outburst had given Locke pause, and as he eyed Sorun with an odd look the off-pink echidna in front of him said, "He's... it's a long story, but he's different, okay?" She turned her head around to the pale teen in question. "Sorun? Can you really save Knuckles?"

Sorun nodded. "Master Emerald got tainted. All I gotta do is use Yamato to separate the thing corrupting it and all's good."

That had certainly sparked some hope in Julie-Su's eyes. Understanding seemed to wash over her as she turned back to Knuckles' father. "Locke, please," she begged, "I know Sorun, we all do, we trust him! More than that I've seen what his powers can do! If he says he can do it, he can! We need to try his way!"

Locke, despite all Julie-Su's pleading, wouldn't so much as acknowledge her. He'd gone back to staring down at his feet, and that look of deep confliction in his eyes didn't provide a clear answer. Julie-Su scoffed in response, stepping away from the older echidna while shaking her head in disgust.

"I can't believe you, Locke. Your own son..." Giving him one last look of contempt, the cybernetic echidna turned away from him and towards Sorun. "Follow me, Sorun. I know where the Master Emerald is-"

"Wait." Julie-Su paused, and then turned back to Locke. Sorun looked towards him, too, eyeing him curiously as the older Mobian looked up and into Sorun's eye. "Boy," he said, "is all of this true? Do you truly have that power?"

"What have I been saying this whole time?"

"Hmph." Nodding to himself, Locke began to walk forwards. "I pray for all our sakes your words hold true," he said as he passed Sorun. "Follow me, both of you. I know a shortcut to the Master Emerald. Perhaps along the way you can tell me just who you are, Sorun."

Watching the echidna walk in front of him, Sorun turned towards Julie-Su. They locked eyes for a few moments, after which they nodded to each other, turned back to Locke, and began following closely behind him.

Locke's "shortcut" was to cut through the trees and shrubbery towards the Master Emerald, evidently. On calmer days Sorun wouldn't be that overly objective towards a hike. On days when he was running on a time limit due to the adrenaline running through him and was racing against the clock alongside a malevolent Chaos god and Eggman, he was in a bit more of a rush. Nothing to do about it, Sorun supposed. Without knowing where the Master Emerald was exactly he couldn't make a portal there, and Locke had no more of those strange teleporting rings of his. So on foot it was.

To pass the time he'd told Locke about himself. His reaction had largely been the same as Dimitri's- stark shock and some skepticism. Nothing more to say about that other than how intrigued he seemed over Sorun's abilities and how they manifested. Sorun, in return, had merely shrugged in response and said he just rolled with what the rocks gave him. He seemed equally surprised that Sorun's body was even able to handle that amount of Chaos energy without breaking down, especially since his species truly was unaccustomed to harnessing Chaos energy.

The irony wasn't lost on him.

In return for all this, Sorun had asked for the skinny on Dr. Finitevus. Somehow it wasn't as convoluted a backstory as Sorun thought it'd be. It was even worse.

"So this thing with Knuckles has happened before?" Sorun asked Locke as they trekked through the thin forest, Julie-Su trailing behind them.

"In part. He was no Enerjak, but he was still overcome with Chaos energy," Locke informed him. "The echidna inhabitants of Albion saw him as a threat, and attempted to... euthanize him, as it were, due to the threat his powers posed."

"Of course they did..." Sorun muttered as he ran a hand over his face. He knew from Knuckles the echidna on Albion were a bit more advanced than the ones here, though he never liked talking about them for some reason. He guess he knew why now. "Finite was there?"

"Finitevus, and yes," Locke confirmed with a nod. "He was... exposed to the Chaos energies Knuckles' body radiated. It morphed him, changed him. Gave him corrupted powers and twisted his mind. I was recently made aware the Albion echidna tried a preventative approach with him the same way they had with Knuckles. He pulled strings in response and had Dr. Robotnik use his fleet to destroy Albion. Those that remain are the few survivors and the echidna Enerjak sent there from the island earlier today."

"Trigger-happy paranoid echidna, evil scientist echidna, evil god echidna, cyborg echidna crazies..." A long groan escaped Sorun. "Your entire species, dude..."

Julie-Su and Knuckles were some of the only good ones that came out of that bunch. They had to be. There was something wrong with them. Sorun refused to believe so much could go wrong with a single species of Mobian due to sheer coincidence. Something was wrong with them. Collective stupidity, maybe.

Sorun's silent musing were interrupted when something appeared on his shoulder in a flash of light, and then spoke out in an unfamiliar voice. "Don't you suppose it's a bit uncouth to lump in an entire species with a few bad-"

A frightened scream left Sorun as he grabbed at whatever teleported on his shoulder and threw him away further into the forest.

Both Locke and Julie-Su stopped in their tracks, looking towards Sorun's in mixtures of confusion and puzzlement. Sorun himself was left staring in the direction he'd thrown whatever that had been, until another flash of white drew his attention to Locke's shoulder. The thing from earlier had teleported to the echidna's shoulder.

... It was a small, red, anthropomorphic ant that was around six inches in height. An ant with a brown hat and vest on. A little park ranger ant who had all four of his arms crossed and was glaring at Sorun.

"You throw everybody you meet for the first time?" the ant grumbled at him.

Growing sheepish, Sorun turned away and rubbed at the back of his neck. "S-sorry, man, you spooked me." He looked back to the ant. "I, um... didn't know Mobians came, y'know... so small. I know bees, like, fifty times your size so I figured... agh, it doesn't matter." He shook his head. "I'm Sorun."

"Archimedes. Pleasure to meet you."

"Weird name for an ant, but alright." Sorun looked to Locke. "Friend of yours?"

"Yes, we're well acquainted." Locke looked down to the ant on his shoulder. "Old friend. How are things?"

"Could be better by what I would say is a substantial margin," the ant informed him in a grim tone. "Finitevus set the Destructix to guard the weapon you're planning on using against your own son. You willn't be acquiring it without a fight."

Locke hummed in acknowledgement. "I see. It's a good thing we aren't going for the weapon, then," he said, making Archimedes tilt his head in surprise. "They're wasting their time guarding something on the other side of the island. Less obstacles for us."

"The who now?" Sorun asked, raising his hand to gain the attention of the two in front of him.

"Mercenaries under Finitevus' auspices," Locke explained. "Last I checked they were being lead by that Scourge rapscallion."

"The evil Sonic guy I heard about?" Sorun muttered under his breath. "Evil guy needs evil henchmen, I guess... well, whatever. If we're not gonna be running into them then why bother worrying?"

"Yes, I... suppose so..." Archimedes cast a questioning look to Sorun, and then focused back on Locke. "May I please ask who...?"

Letting out a single chuckle, Locke turned around and continued advancing through the foliage. "I'll explain everything to you along the way..."

Sorun continued walking behind them, hands tucked in his pocket as he made sure to follow in Locke's path. He glanced behind him towards Julie-Su in order to check on her, and then tilted his head a bit at her in worry. She didn't look too great. All the anxiety over Knuckles, he wagered. She just plainly looked worried sick, especially from the way she kept wringing her hands together like that. He continued to look at her state for some seconds, and then sighed under his breath as he slowed down to walk at her side.

She hadn't even seemed to acknowledge his presence even though he was right besides her now. It was only when Sorun cleared his throat to gain her attention did he see her eyes flick up to him, though even then his being there seemed to do little to help.

"So, uh... I know you're probably not doing alright, but... you gonna make it?" Sorun asked.

Slowly, she nodded. "I'll manage," she said, and inside Sorun felt himself cringe from the slight, broken sound her voice carried. "Thank you, Sorun. For doing this. I know this isn't what Knuckles wants."

"'Course not. He's mind-jacked, that's all. Y'know, 'cause... Enerjak and mind-jack, so..." The poor attempt at a joke didn't even so much as make the corners of the echida's mouth upturn. "Sorry, stupid joke, I-"

"Not, it's fine," she assured him. "I'm just worried about... about everything, you know? Him, the island, everyone in New Mobotropolis..."

"I know. We're gonna fix it," Sorun promised her. "Nobody's dying." Nobody important, at least. Finitevus' fate remained to be seen. "How mad at me is everybody back in the city?" Sorun suddenly asked in an effort to change the topic. "I know they can't be too thrilled with how active I'm being despite the doctor's orders."

For some reason that's what got a small chuckle out of Julie-Su. "Things got a bit heated, I won't lie. Mostly we were arguing what we were going to do about Knuckles, but you came up a few times. They're all a bit scared over you." She turned to look at Sorun as they continued walking. "I share some of their concerns," she continued, looking at Sorun's eyepatch. "Are you sure you're good to go with this?"

"'Til the adrenaline runs its course, yeah," Sorun answered. "Should carry me through the rest of this. After that I'm sleeping for a week straight."

"Ha-ha. I wouldn't blame you." The worried look returned to her face as she faced back forwards. "Just... I know it's wrong of me to ask you to push yourself so hard for his sake, but... but Knuckles-"

"Means a lot to you, and the Chaotix, and everyone else. He's my friend, too, you know," Sorun said. "Just trust me on this, Julie-Su. I got you all out of New Megaopolis, didn't I?"

"You lost an arm and eye in the process," she pointed out.

"Tch. Details."

They'd finally reached the chamber where the echidna kept the Master Emerald that kept the island aloft in the air. It was less a chamber and more a cave, though. A small rock cavern with an open ceiling, in the center of which lied a small staircase leading up to a pedestal holding a great, green Chaos Emerald that was bigger than Sorun himself.

Knuckles had... well, admittedly he'd probably been very detailed with explaining to Sorun its origins, but he hadn't paid that much attention. Something about a bunch of Chaos Emeralds from back when they were numerous fusing to the one big one that held the island up through some complicated series of events, and that its powers were much greater as a result. How it could be greater when the gems themselves could channel an infinite amount of Chaos energy was a mystery to Sorun, maybe smaller one's had a cap to their maximum output, but it didn't matter. The important thing was the Master Emerald. And the person standing in front of it.

The group of four had chosen to spy on him from behind a gathering of stalagmites near the entrance of the chamber. Sorun in particular took as good a look at Dr. Finitevus as he could, focusing in on his features while thinking to himself.

"Geez, the guy's givin' Infinite a run for his money here..."

He'd never wondered what an albino echidna looked like until he saw the one standing before the Master Emerald. Now he knew, and could have went on with his life without knowing. The guy's fur was pure white, also sporting straight, black lines and perfectly diagonal corners. Bandages in place of gloves and feet. Gold rings on his wrists and ankles, and some more adornments on his torso. A strange four-sided, gold shape on his head with a ripple pattern.

The crème-de-le-crème had to be the long, black cloak he wore with a gold star emblazoned on its back. It even had a frayed end to give it that all-important edge. Sorun couldn't help but quietly scoff at the sight, going as far as the shake his head.

"What a geek," Sorun muttered out as he silently drew Yamato. "'Kay, here's the plan." He glanced back at the two echidna and ant. "Um... I'll go take care of him, so just hang back."

"Alone? With no backup?" Locke incredulously stated. "You can't be serious."

"It's one dude and I can stop time," Sorun stated in a flat whisper. "I mean if it gets hairy then yeah, step in, but otherwise I'm gonna go deal with him. Quicker that way." He gave all three of them a nod. "Wish me luck."

With that, he Tricked to the bottom of the steps and took a deep breath. Dr. Finitevus' back was still to him, as he was facing the Emerald doing... something. Something that involved black arcs of lightning to occasionally shoot out of his hands. Something that gave Sorun slight pause, but in the end caused him to merely note it before looking to the white echidna's body.

"Hey, Finbarr."

The black lightning the echidna's hands emitted ceased. His entire posture had gone rigid as his hands slowly lowered to his side as the echidna registered Sorun's voice.

"Finbarr...?" Finitevus voiced.

"Why the hell do the edgy guys like Shadow, Infinite, and this nutjob always get the best-sounding voices?" It wasn't as rich as Shadow's, or as smooth as Infinite's, but there was still something there to the echidna's tone. Velvety, Sorun supposed. He couldn't help but be a bit jealous.

Finitevus finally turned around to address the intruder standing behind him. He'd already looked confused from the way his name had been mispronounced. His eyes, sclera dyed black and irises a smoldering orange, had opened up even further when he looked down the steps at Sorun. He looked, quite simply, at a loss for words at what he was staring at. So much so that he'd tilted his head to the side in a curious manner for a bit, and then set it back in a straight orientation as he continued to stare at Sorun.

"A human?" Finitevus asked. "Why is a human of all things here?"

"You're the first person in a while that's gotten it right," Sorun said to him. "It's always Overlander this, Overlander that, nobody that doesn't know me ever gets the distinction, I swear."

"The finer details are often lost on lesser minds." Finitevus' eyes traveled lower. To Sorun's arm right arm. "That's an intriguing arm you're sporting there," he said. "Just what is it, I wonder?"

"Oh, the arm?" Sorun rose up the spectral limb, which still held the unsheathed Yamato. "Tell you what." He looked back to the albino echidna. "If you stop all this Enerjak nonsense I'll tell you."

The offer actually managed to elicit a single chuckle from Finitevus. "That's certainly one way to go about this. I'm afraid I'll have to decline that generous offer."

"Welp, tried it the nice way."

A single Trick found Sorun right besides Finitevus, with his blade held to the echidna's throat. His eyes had widened in surprise once again, while at the same time his hands were lifted in the air.

"Listen to me, you pasty motherfucker," Sorun quietly rasped out. "It's been a long day. I'd say I'm tired, but I'm hopped up on so much epinephrine I couldn't sleep if I tried. All my friends are worried and it's driving me crazy. This whole mess makes me wanna either go into deep-sleep hibernation or bash a rock over my own head in the hope that I'd cause enough brain damage for me to lose the memory of today happening. If you don't remove the hex you put on the Master Emerald and turn Knuckles back to normal you're gonna lose your head."

Finitevus didn't even seem to be paying attention to Sorun, much to the human's confusion. He was looking down at the katana blade held to his throat. A wide grin spread across his face from the sight of the sword, revealing sharpened teeth, and Sorun had to resist shuddering when he made what sounded like a pleased hum.

"This... is a very interesting sword..." he said. "I would very much like to know where you acquired such a blade."

"Why does everybody keep talking about the sword- ohp!"

Using speed that caught Sorun off guard Finitevus had snapped his hand down, grabbed the katana by the blade, and flung it and Sorun off of the pedestal holding the Master Emerald. The human spun in the air a few rotations, and then Tricked safely down onto the ground. He looked up in time to see Finitevus slowly descend the stairs towards Sorun.

"A teleporting ability, the ability to create a construct from pure Chaos energy to replace a lost limb, a sword which radiates so much power..." Sinister chuckles rang out from the echidna's throat as he reached the bottom of the stairs. "Not even the Guardians have ever displayed such fidelity with wielding Chaos energy like you do so casually. Echidna with modified bodies to strengthen their link to the Chaos Force such as the current Guardian, Knuckles, don't even compare." He stopped right in front of Sorun, grin still wide as he eyed the human up and down, slowly. Like he was examining him. "You truly are remarkable. Fascinating in every sense of the word, and we've only just met," he said. "Just where have you been all my life?"

"... Uh." Sorun took a step back. "You know, around." Another step. "Can we talk about Enerjak now and how you're gonna turn Knuckles back, please?"

"Him?" The grin grew wider, and somehow even creepier, making Sorun take a third step back. "Don't tell me. The former Guardian, Locke, put you up to this?"

"I mean he's involved, yeah, but I'm mainly just trying to save my friend from destroying the world. And also save the world," Sorun said.

"So that's the reason." Humming, Finitevus looked up towards the exposed ceiling of the cavern and at the midday sky. "Are you aware of the history of my people?"

Sorun's shoulders slumped. "I know it's so convoluted I'd probably go insane trying to understand every minute detail of it."

"You jest, but you're not so far off the mark, as it were." The scientist looked back down at Sorun. "Hundreds of years, generation upon generation of Guardians and fighting between them and the Dark Legion, failure after failure of echidna science to wrought one disaster after another."

"They're fools, yeah, nobody's arguing that," Sorun agreed. "I won't lie, there's only two echidna I actually like. Eh, maybe two and a quarter with Locke. The rest though, oof... I'm probably gonna have ulcers by the end of this just thinking about 'em."

"Then you understand how hopeless of a species they are," Finitevus said. "That's not even getting to the world proper, which has its own set of issues. Overlanders misusing technology for their own gain, Dr. Eggman the most egregious case among them. Mobians stuck between preserving nature and peace and defending themselves, which only serves to divide them further and further. Everything in this world is too far gone." He perked up, grin dropping for a second before he gave Sorun an apologetic smile. "But where are my manners? You seem to already know me, butchering of my name aside, but I've yet to ask the name of this spectacular specimen before me."

"... Sorun."

"Sorun..." Finitevus hummed out. "The name is unfamiliar to me, and that much more enticing." He gestured a hand to Sorun. "You agree with me, do you not? Surely somebody with powers such as yours sees the world for what it truly is underneath the surface. How hopelessly corrupted it is. Do you not think it prudent to hasten the inevitable and start again?"

"Nah, not at all," Sorun denied, shaking his head at Finitevus. The answer caused the grin to fall away from the echidna's face. "You're a nihilistic, sociopathic doomer who stooped to using Chaos mumbo-jumbo to brainwash a guy into becoming possessed by some weird Chaos entity." He placed the blunt end of Yamato on his shoulders. "World's trash, yeah. That doesn't mean you gotta go ruin it."

"Well, that's rather rude of you." The eerie smile returned to Finitevus' face. "You agree with me in that the world is in a less-than-poor state, but not that it needs to be purged?" A single, sardonic laugh left him. "So you would, what, try and save it?"

"Fix the world of all its problems? I look talented enough to do something like that to you?" Sorun sighed out and shook his head. "Finitevus, I won't lie to you. If there's one problem in the world I do want to fix, it's Eggman and how his head needs to be separated from his body. Past that? I'll leave fixing the world to the people that actually know what they're doing. I just wanna hang out with my friends and play video games with a girl I really like, or even more than that go home to where I come from." He made a "tch" sound and looked away. "I'm not gonna actually get any of that, but... it'd be nice," he quietly mumbled out.

"... That's all you want?"

"I'm a man who strives for the simple things in life." He looked back to the puzzled echidna. "Why the face? It not fit your world view?"

"..." Finitevus shook his head. "Meaningless conjecture," he claimed in a low tone. "You've said enough. Onto the business at hand. You wish to undo the changes Knuckles has undergone to become Enerjak, correct?"

"Mmhm," Sorun confirmed with a nod. "I know it's 'cause of the hex you put on the big rock up there." He nodded to the Master Emerald. "Now listen, I heard you were responsible for Albion gettin' sacked, but that they tried to do some less-than-virtuous things to you. You probably did a bunch of other shady stuff I'm not aware of, but I'm not gonna judge on stuff I don't know. I'll let that all slide." He gestured his left arm, holding the sword's scabbard, around the cavern. "As far as this Enerjak thing's gone, nobody's been seriously hurt. Dark Legion got all their cybernetics taken away and a bunch of echidna got shunted to Albion, sure, but nobody's actually died or anything like that. So just this once, I'm gonna give you the chance to undo the hex right now. Do it and I'll turn around and walk right out."

It was much more than Sorun felt like giving him. Generous didn't even begin to describe it. And he really was doing it just because nobody'd died yet. Otherwise he would have skipped this conversation entirely and gone with stopping time to cut the echidna's head off and undo the hex. But Sorun wanted to at least try and do it peacefully, if only to avoid any potential fallout from other later on about him killing somebody since they seemed so against the prospect.

"I'm afraid I couldn't undo the hex even if I wanted to, Sorun," Finitevus said. The smile on his face didn't imply he was very sorry. "To put it in terms you would understand, the hex is 'locked' into the Master Emerald. Even I am unable to remove it in this state. And as long as that hex remains in the Master Emerald, Knuckles is bound to my will and shall remain as Enerjak."

"Oh?" Sorun glanced up at the Master Emerald. "That isn't a problem," he stated, causing Finitevus' smile to drop a significant amount. "This sword you're drooling over can separate anything. All I gotta do is use it to separate the Emerald and hex." He looked down to the white echidna. "So move it or lose it."

"You..." The smile was completely gone at this point. In place of it was a deep frown on Finitevus' face. "You bluff."

"Eh, maybe, wanna test it out?" Sorun pointed the tip of Yamato at the Master Emerald. "Just lemme give it a li'l poke and we'll know real quick if-"

A flash of green light interrupted the both of them. It was to the side of both Finitevus and Sorun, the pair of which had snapped their heads in the direction of the light. The light's intensity died down almost as soon as it arrived, and in its place was a figure kneeling down on the ground. Sorun didn't even need to look at them to identify them, as something had rolled away from the figure and stopped against Sorun's feet. When he looked down, he saw a very familiar, golden helmet staring up at him.

"Uh-oh." He looked up to confirm his fears, and then began biting down on his lower lip when he saw it was Enerjak sitting there on his knees. " That's not... wait, something's up with him."

From what Sorun observed, Enerjak looked positively exhausted. The green energy roiling around his hands was so dim that it was practically invisible. He was panting heavily, his eyes half-lidded like he was liable to fall asleep at any moment. Even the blue and gold garb he wore was cracked in some places.

"Enerjak!" Finitevus exclaimed in a surprised tone. Even he didn't seem to expect this kind of sight. "What happened to you?"

"My... my power... it was depleted," Enerjak panted out in Knuckles' voice. "Eggman's Egg Grapes... nearly ended me. Fought my way out, devastated his forces... but I'm nearly out of power. I need more to finish my work..."

"He drained himself escaping from Eggman?" Sorun thought. He looked between both echidna, and then glanced up at the Master Emerald. "... Screw it, if ever there was a time it'd be now."

Without hesitating for another moment Sorun Tricked back up to the Master Emerald. He'd faintly heard Finitevus gasp out and turn his head towards him, but by then it was too late as Sorun had rose Yamato up and slammed its edge against the giant, green Emerald.

Tink!

... Only for it to bounce right off.

"... Fuck."

The next instant found a floating, golden ring portal to appear next to Sorun much like before. What Sorun didn't expect was for a white, bandage-wrapped echidna hand to shoot out of the ring-portal, grab Sorun by the wrist, and pull him through the portal.

On the other side of the portal, down near the feet of the Master Emerald's pedestal's steps, Finitevus had thrown Sorun out of the portal he'd made, causing the teen to roll a few meters before snapping up to his feet. The first thing he registered was the sharp-toothed sneer Finitevus was sending his way.

"It appears you were all talk after all," he said. "You didn't so much as disturb the hex."

"Nah... that's not it," Sorun muttered out as he stood up. "Thing about Yamato is its ability to absolutely separate anything runs on Chaos energy. It's from a Chaos Emerald, you see. So when it tries to cut something made of pure Chaos energy like it, they cancel out," he explained. "Keeps up with the games' lore of the sword. Vergil's Yamato couldn't cut other Devil Arms like Dante's sword, Rebellion. Demonic energy against demonic energy, at least in roughly equal amounts, cancels out each other. Usually for me it isn't a problem since not a lot of things are equal in power to a Chaos Emerald, but it's been a problem a few times. It's the same reason I can't separate the Chaos Emeralds from myself, why Eggman's mech suit was so resistant with that Chaos Emerald he had, why I couldn't instantly kill a Chaos entity like Enerjak... why I couldn't affect the Master Emerald." Sorun scowled as he tossed the black scabbard away and held the Yamato with both hands. "If I can't separate Emerald from hex... then I'm just gonna have to jam the sword in there to get to the hex so I can separate hex from Emerald."

Finitevus bolted upright, having seen the logic in Sorun's reasoning. A small snarl played over his pale lips as black electricity began arcing over his hands. "I won't allow you." He pointed his hands to Enerjak. "Regain your strength so you can deal with this meddlesome human. Leave him alive, though." He glanced back at Sorun, snarl morphing into a smirk. "I'd like to get him on a dissection table and spend some time with him."

"Dude." Sorun gave the white-furred echidna a perturbed look, though it quickly turned to shock when he saw the black lightning arc off of Finitevus' hands leap onto Enerjak, who was beginning to slowly regain his green glow. "Oh shit, he's trying to recharge him. Quicksil-"

An uncontrollable cough left Sorun, and following that a wave of exhaustion hit him with such intensity that he was forced to his knees. He coughed again, a small amount of blood hitting the ground in front of him. He sighed and wiped the blood away with the back of his hand as he looked up at the pair of echidna. "Figures. Adrenaline's wearing off, and Quicksilver is my most stamina-intensive power yet... fine, I'll do it this way."

Following the blue sparks arcing along his body, Sorun's Doppelganger manifested right besides him. Finitevus had snapped his head towards the Doppelganger, half in shock and half in... some twisted intrigue that had him smiling in desire. He'd been so enamored by the Doppelganger's appearance that he'd just barely been able to bring his arms up to guard his body when the spectral Sorun ran up to him and kicked him hard enough to send him tumbling back. While that happened, Sorun cut a portal in the space next to him with Yamato, and then willed his left Bringer Claw to life. What happened next was that he simply grabbed a weakened Enerjak with the spectral claw, tossed him through the portal, and then cut it close with Yamato.

"No!" Finitevus scrambled to his feet as the Doppelganger disappeared, his earlier intrigue replaced by fury as he gazed at the empty spot Enerjak had been in, and then towards a kneeling Sorun. "What have you done!?"

"What? You thought you were the only one that could pull off portal shenanigans?" Sorun asked with a slight chuckle. "I got those, too."

"Where did you send him?"

"Ah, somewhere on Mobius." Eight Summoned Swords, four to each side of Sorun, appeared, with all their tips aimed at a yet again surprised Finitevus. "I may not be able to stand up right now, but I got more than enough power to end you right here and now. So you either-"

Mid-sentence Sorun had fired off the Blistering Swords towards Finitevus, who'd gone as far as to smirk a bit. Whether it was in intrigue at the technique sailing towards him or mild respect towards Sorun having the audacity to pull a cheap move like that was unclear. What was clear was that he had reflexes faster than the average Mobian, as he tossed up a gold ring in front of him which expanded into a portal. A portal that the eight Summoned Swords flew into.

And unfortunately for Sorun, a second ring-shaped portal opened up right next to him, from which the eight Summoned Swords flew out from.

The swords had been too fast and too close for Sorun to think properly. Indeed, in any other scenario he wouldn't have been quick enough to mentally detonate the swords midair so they wouldn't skewer him. In this instance, he wasn't, and nearly died right there from being impaled by eight spectral swords.

Fortunately for Sorun a certain ant who'd been watching the proceedings along with the two echidna at the back of the cavern was fast enough, and had teleported onto Sorun's shoulder in one moment, and then teleported him away in the next right as the eight swords impaled the spot Sorun had been kneeling in.

The two reappeared a few meters away, Sorun still kneeling down but with Archimedes still on his shoulder. Sorun stared towards the spot impaled with the blue swords, panting heavily, and the looked up to the ant that stood on his shoulder as gratitude washed over him.

"Th-thanks for that, Archimedes," Sorun panted out.

"Think nothing of it." Both the ant and Sorun turned their heads towards the albino echidna. "Now onto more pressing matters..."

Footsteps were heard as both Julie-Su and Locke stepped behind Sorun, both glaring towards Finitevus along with the human and ant. Finitevus himself was caught looking between the four adversaries, looking more displeased by the moment as he continued to glance back and forth between them and the Master Emerald.

"All that research, all that time spent casting... all for naught, it seems." With a bitter sigh, Finitevus held up a golden ring. "I'm wise enough to know to fall back when appropriate. It seems you lot have won this one. Take your precious Guardian back." He tossed the ring behind him, the golden hoop expanding into a wide portal. Finitevus took one step into the portal, but then paused halfway and turned back to look at Sorun. "I'd love to discuss with you at length about who you are and your abilities, Sorun, but time is against us. Rest assured you'll be in my thoughts." With a final wave, and a smile, Finitevus ducked into the golden portal. "Until we meet again."

And that was that. The portal closed behind Finitevus, leaving an empty space. All that was left were the four inside the chamber, the human among them proceeding to double over as he coughed some more. Both Archimedes and Locke looked to Sorun in concern, while Julie-Su had bent down to his level to place a concerned hand on his back.

"Is he okay?" This question came from Locke, who continued to gaze down at the human as he continued coughing while Julie-Su tried to sooth him by rubbing at his back. "That cough..."

"I- hck, ack!- may be... out here against doctor's orders," Sorun mumbled out in a tired voice. "And I might have injected a gratuitous amount of drugs into me just to make it this far..."

"Drugs?" Locke repeated. "What drugs?"

"Epi- khack!- epineph- khck!- I took adrenaline," Sorun gasped out, shaking his head to try and clear his clouding vision. "Usin' these powers, it wears me out. I just took it to give me some more time." His left arm tapped on Julie-Su's shoulder, who nodded at him. She helped him to his feet by keeping one arm on his back and another under his arm, after which he nodded towards the Master Emerald. "Can't say it was the worst idea. I still have to stab that."

As Julie-Su began to assist Sorun in walking towards the altar's steps, Locke, now carrying Archimedes after having teleported to the echidna's shoulder, gave the human's back a curious look. "You intend to... stab the Master Emerald...?"

"Gotta get in deep to get to the hex," he called back in a winded voice. By now he and Julie-Su were halfway up the steps, and while they continued to advance upwards, Sorun turned his head towards Julie-Su. "Hey," he whispered out, "I didn't teleport Knuckles that far. He's back in the spot we both were at when we arrived on the island. When I get this hex out he should turn back to normal."

A relieved smile overtook Julie-Su's features as they both made it to the top of the steps. "Thank you, Sorun," she said as she released the human, stepping back with some concern at seeing the Earthling wobble on his feet. "Are you alright to do this?" she asked.

"Prolly not," he honestly answered as he held up his spectral hand, Yamato appeared in its hold. "It's gotta get done, though."

Giving the sword a single look, and then glancing up to give the Master Emerald the same look, Sorun sighed out of exhaustion and willed his spectral arm to push the Yamato's blade into the Emerald.

There'd been significantly more resistance than Sorun had expected. Enough that he'd almost been worried that even his Bringer Claw wouldn't be strong enough to shove the blade through. Fortunately, it managed to crack through its surface, and Sorun let his power run through the blade as he used the sword embedded in the green gem to feel around.

"I'm feeling... yep, that's something," he thought. Past all the raw Chaos energy he felt in the gem - a fathomless amount of energy, he'd realized when he pierced the Emerald - he felt it. Some dark thing that didn't belong. The hex, he presumed. Yamato's power got right to work, and Sorun felt its separation ability affect it almost immediately. He saw as sparks of black lightning arced over the gem before something began to rise out of it from the top. Some formless, foggy, transparent purple thing, like a small cloud of dark energy. Sorun watched as the hex simply floated up and out of the chamber housing the Master Emerald, making a slight hum at the sight of it. "Huh. Well, that's that."

"Was... was that it?" Julie-Su asked, voice somewhat in wonder as she watched the hex float off. "Just like that? It's over?"

"It does feel kind of underwhelming, doesn't it?" Sorun asked as he tore Yamato out from the Emerald, watching in some interest as the hole he'd made in the gem was sealed and healed over. "Huh. Well, anyways, looks like all's well that-"

A horrible coughing fit interrupted Sorun. Waves of exhaustion had hit him, and his vision had begun to swim. It was bad enough that the human found himself stumbling around until he'd accidentally slipped and waved his left hand out to try and hold onto something to catch himself.

On the bright side his left hand found something to stabilize himself.

On the downside it was the surface of the Master Emerald.

"... Whoops."

Face suddenly alight in panic, Sorun tried to tear his hand away from the Master Emerald. To his horror, his hand was already affixed to it. Even more than that he saw arcs of green energy began to spark around his hand.

"No no no, not this one, not this one...!"

The green energies began to coalesce closer and closer to Sorun's hand. Try as he might, Sorun's couldn't free himself of the gem, and beyond that he faintly heard voices crying out his name behind him. Sorun couldn't find himself to even hear them as he continued to try and pull his arm away to no avail.

Hissing out in frustration, he looked down to his spectral hand, which still held Yamato. He looked back and forth between the hands two times, and then bit out a frustrated growl as he rose Yamato up.

"Ugh... fuck me."

As it stood, Sorun thought it was safe to assume absorbing the Master Emerald would be a surefire way of killing him right there. More than that, this Emerald was the only thing holding the island up in the air. It was bad enough letting it fall down to ground to destroy both it and surrounding area. It was even worse considering it was hovering right above New Mobotropolis at the moment. Letting the island fall there would mean destruction for the city and the death of everybody within it.

So it was a no-brainer that Sorun used the Yamato to cut through his left forearm and sever his own hand.

Even if his pain nerves hadn't been fried long ago, Sorun was so exhausted he doubted he would have felt his own hand coming off. He saw with some relief before tumbling down the altar's steps that the severed hand had fallen away from the Emerald and the green energies had recessed back into the Emerald. So that was good.

After that he had tumbled down the steps, leaving a small blood trail behind him from the bleeding stump of his left arm. The last thing Sorun was able to make out was a blurred Mobian face looking down at him before he fell unconscious.

Of all the things on the stupid goddamned list this had been one of the more out-there ones. Enough that Rubrum had to go double-check and triple-check when he first saw it because of how absurd it sounded and just to make sure he hadn't finally dove off the deep end.

It still amazed him he made it this far without going over, so it wouldn't have been that much of a shock.

Looking forwards, it made sense, at least from his perspective. It was only thanks to that perspective everything he'd done the list said to do made sense, and he was sure that to anybody else without this list, it'd probably look like he was doing nonsensical, random actions. And he wouldn't have blamed those people. Because even with that perspective even he sometimes struggled to understand why he was doing what he was doing.

Well, it wasn't his job to understand it. It was his job to follow the list to the letter. And right now he had to follow this particular letter.

- Put the hex Sorun separates from the Master Emerald in a jar and save it for later ()

... He fucking hated his life.

"Yeah, 'cause apparently you can just bottle this shit," Rubrum grumbled to himself. There was an open jar in his left hand and its lid in his right. And nearby a small cluster of trees just outside the chamber the Master Emerald sat in was the hex Finitevus had put on it that was now separated from the Emerald. Just floating around. And here Rubrum was, feeling like an idiot as he creeped up on the floating purple cloud thing with a jar.

"Highlight of my life right here," he groused as he swiped the jar over the purple cloud. He held the jar up afterwards, tilting his head when he saw the purple and black cloud of energy floating in the jar, and then quickly went to screw the lid on to seal it in. "Well, uh... that's-that's it, I guess, job done." Rubrum looked around at the empty forest around him, and then lifted both his arms up in a half-triumphant, half-confused show of victory. "Er, yeah, woo-hoo."

- Put the hex Sorun separates from the Master Emerald in a jar and save it for later (X)

"- orun, Sorun, lad, wake up!"

One of two things had woken Sorun up. Whether it was from being shaken so much or a voice calling out to him, he wasn't so sure. He wasn't so sure of anything at the moment. His mind felt... muddled, sluggish. Random, incoherent thoughts were the only thing that occupied his mind his his blurred vision slowly came into focus, revealing a red form kneeling above him. He recognized him as Locke due to the aged face, but that was as much as Sorun could think before the incoherent thoughts took over again.

"Sorun?" Locke's mouth had upturned a bit in relief when he was Sorun stir awake, though his eyes were still narrowed a bit in worry as he lightly shook the human again. "Are you okay? How are you feeling?"

"Mh..?" Sorun mumbled as he held his left hand to his head. "I don't... wha? Huh?"

Sorun quickly realized he had a left hand, causing him to reel back in shock. His incoherent thoughts snappped right back to normal as he stared at appendage.

The human teen distinctly remembered having severed his left hand in order to stop himself from accidentally absorbing the Master Emerald, so it came as a shock to him to discover that he still had a left hand. He knew it'd happened; nothing showed up on his dark shirt, but he saw some dark stains on his blue pants from where some of the blood had splashed onto him. And yet, there it was. His flesh and blood left hand.

"But... didn't I cut that off?" Sorun looked to Locke with a lost expression. "What gives, I thought... I thought I lost this?"

"Well, you did. Gave all of us quite a scare," Locke informed him with a mild chuckle. He then held up his own right hand, Sorun's eye widening a bit when he saw faint green glows shine around it. "But, when you removed Finitevus' hex it restored my own connection to the Master Emerald, me being a former Guardian. You're lucky I was right there to reattach it with some of my abilities. The arm was still warm and that sword of yours made such a perfectly clean cut that it wasn't even that hard to put it back on."

"O-oh. Really? You did that for me?" Eyebrow risen in surprise, Sorun flexed his fingers. Seemed to work fine. Still couldn't feel anything with it, but the mobility was all there at least. He twisted it around a bit experimentally, and then sighed out before turning back to Locke. "Sorry about doing that," he said. "I can't control it when I absorb Chaos Emeralds. I accidentally touched the Master Emerald, and I didn't want to absorb it and have the island fall on the city, so... yeah, I-I cut it off. Thanks for putting it back on."

Saved him a lot of trouble. He didn't even want to think about how anybody back in New Mobotropolis would have reacted if he came back missing yet another hand.

"Think nothing of it. I owe you enough that the least I could do was give your hand back." Locke turned his head to the spectral arm replacing Sorun's lost right arm. "Unfortunately, there's nothing I can do for long-lost limbs, so..."

"Eh, don't worry about it." A hand was held out to Sorun. The teen grasped it, and afterwards Locke helped him up to his feet. "So Knuckles...?"

"See for yourself," Locke said. He stepped aside, allowing Sorun to have a view of the Master Emerald's altar and its steps. Sorun saw with some surprise that Knuckles was sitting down on the bottom step, with Julie-Su sitting right next to him. He was sitting hunched forwards with a sad expression on his face, but otherwise it was just Knuckles. No egyptian-esque clothes or crazy green energy auras. Just him, his shoes, gloves, and a glum expression.

Casting one last glance at Locke, Sorun nodded to the older echidna and began walking to the two teenage ones. He'd stopped right in front of them, with both looking up towards Sorun. Both had mixtures of surprise and relief written on their faces, along with a bit of worry on Knuckles' part. Sorun simply stared down at Knuckles with a flat expression.

"You're a real piece of work. You know that?" With a sigh, Sorun sat down on the other side of Knuckles. "I'd say I'm sorry for stabbing you a bunch while you were Enerjak," he continued, raising his left hand up, "but this adventure concluded with me having to cut my own hand off, so we'll call it even on that front."

He saw from the corner of his eye Knuckles wince. "I'm... sorry about that," Knuckles apologized. "Are you okay?"

"Yeah, your dad worked his magic on me. Literally. I'm fine," he assured him, lowering his hand into his lap. "More importantly, are you okay?"

"That I couldn't tell you," Knuckles muttered out. "I remember everything, you know. It's... it's like it was me speaking, but it wasn't me. I didn't want to do anything that Enerjak did, but..." He shook his head. "I don't know. I wasn't myself."

"Eh, you got brainwashed by a creep scientist guy. A really, really creepy scientist guy. Nobody'll hold it against you. City got kinda dinged up, but Nicole can fix it easy," Sorun assured him. "Me running around outside the hospital on the other hand, nah, I'm a dead man when I get back."

His last sentence managed to elicit some humorless laugh out of Knuckles. "I don't think they'll treat you that bad."

"No, they-they will, but we'll get to that," Sorun said. "Look, it was real bad, but it turned out fine. I mean, no one died, right? You, uh... de-cyborged a bunch of the crazy echidna people and did, uh... what'd Enerjak do with all the other echidna again?"

"He sent them all to Albion. I guess they're just gonna live there now," Knuckles answered. "He sent some of the Dark Legion people there, too, but most of them are still up here, dingoes are in the desert... but I don't know, it's probably for the best if you really think about it. They can all just settle on Albion now without having to worry about warring factions attacking them at any moment."

"There, see?" Sorun softly hit Knuckles on the shoulder. "There's a positive thing right there."

"And..." Knuckles continued, a small smirk stretching over his mouth, "that whole 'try to drain Enerjak of his power' massively backfired on Eggman. Those Egg Grapes of his got overloaded and Enerjak ended up fighting him. Most of his forces got completely trashed."

Sorun blinked. His hand slinked back to his side, and he leaned forwards a bit to get a better look at Knuckles' face. "How much damage did Enerjak do to Eggman?" he asked.

"Oh, I'd say a good... ninety, ninety-five percent of New Megaopolis got destroyed," Knuckles answered, making Sorun's jaw drop open. "He wiped out most of his fleet, too. Probably only got one or two ships left."

"Well that's... actually pretty amazing." In that Eggman's total power got cut down to a meager fraction at least. It was actually spectacular when Sorun heard it. He would have taken the fleet alone getting destroyed, but his city, too? Most of his factories and robots getting deep-sixed? "Geez, Knuckles, war's gonna be really easy to win now that the guy barely has any of his stuff left," Sorun breathed out as he sat back on the steps. "I actually don't think this could have ended any better than it did."

He thought back on that statement and immediately considered that maybe it was false and Enerjak could have saved everyone the trouble and killed Eggman at some point while he was wrecking all his forces, but all this alone was more than what Sorun bargained for. It was making his ill-fated plan of blitzing Eggman once he got the last Emerald that much more feasible.

"Huh, we really did manage to turn this whole mad god emergency around, didn't we?"

"Yeah, I guess. Maybe," Knuckles admitted. "I still feel like an idiot getting duped like that by such a shady-looking guy."

"Fooled by literally the evilest-looking echidna I've ever seen? Granted I haven't seen that many but still?" Sorun deadpanned. "Nah, coulda happened to any of us. Don't sweat it."

Knuckles paused, and then looked up to stare ahead at to the end of the cavern. He slowly then spun his head towards Sorun, his face set in a blank expression. Sorun stared back with an equally blank expression, and after that they both cracked into equal grins and stared back ahead at the cavern.

"You're alright, Sorun," Knuckles said. "Thanks for all your help with this."

"It's all good, man," Sorun said back. "I think I'm gonna go back to New Mobotropolis now. You two want a ride?"

"Actually..." Knuckles hedged off, drawing Sorun's attention back to him. He glanced towards Julie-Su, who gave him an assuring smile, causing him to reciprocate it and turn to Sorun. "This whole thing has gotten me thinking that maybe I should be taken my position as Guardian of that big thing up there-" he gestured to the Master Emerald above them, "- more seriously. Plus the threat of Eggman's massively diminished now, so it's not like you guys need every hand on deck down there. So I'm just gonna stay up here. Julie-Su's staying with, thinking the Chaotix'll probably hop back up here too, we'll see. Plus, you know..." He nodded his head at the end of the cavern, where Locke was talking with Archimedes. "Get some, uh... some more time in with dad, you know? Been a while, so..."

"No, yeah, I get. Well I mean not really 'cause... eh, forget it." Sorun clapped his hands onto his knees loudly, startling both echidna next him, and stood up. "You wanna take the Guardian thing more seriously and spend some time with family now that everything's not so dire, I get it. Your other side of the family, mom and step-dad and half-brother'd all be on Albion with everyone else now, right?"

Knuckles nodded. "Yeah, that's right."

"Visit 'em sometime, man." Sorun slid his hands into the pockets of his bloodstained pants. "I'm going to the city. Catch ya around, I guess."

"Sorun, wait. One more thing."

He'd already been halfway to walking away from the pair of echidna before he heard Knuckles call his name out. He's stopped, and then turned around the address the echidna yet again. Sorun felt a small spike of curiosity when he saw Knuckles giving him an unreadable expression.

"Yeah?" Sorun asked.

"It's just... your sword, Yamato..." Knuckles got out in a hesitant voice. "Enerjak, he... you really spooked him with that sword of yours."

"I remember. He got really freaked out by it." Sorun had chalked up to him just being scared of it since it had the ability to separate him from his host, but looking back, he'd said some things that gave Sorun pause. "Demonic" had been at the forefront of specific words Sorun had taken an interest in. Demonic. The sword's lore origins were demonic in nature, true, but that was just that: the lore. The actual abilities were Chaos-based, even if they emulated Vergil's demonic Yamato from the games. And Enerjak had no way of knowing where Sorun had even pulled the sword from.

So what the hell had he seen to call the blade something like that?

"I remember everything from when I was Enerjak, so... I don't know. He - I - We, I guess, uh... kind of got a good look at it when you, you know... stuck it in us." Knuckles cleared his throat to clear the awkward air that suddenly emerged between them. "... The Chaos energy in that sword is really dark, you know?"

"... Dark?"

"Maybe that isn't the right... heavy, I guess. It's just different. And honestly, man, just being around it gives me chills," Knuckles admitted to him. "You sure that thing is safe? I know it's you and everything, but, well... something just feels really off with it."

"I don't know what to tell you, man. Sword's how it is." Sorun offered Knuckles a shrug. "Don't let it get to you too much. It's probably just some of Enerjak's leftover feelings lingering on ya. They'll prolly go away on their own. Just gotta clear your head. Take some time off to yourself, relax a bit."

"Yeah, you're probably right." Accepting the answer, Knuckles gave Sorun a nod. "I think I'll be doing that. Take care, Sorun."

"Bye, Sorun!" Julie-Su mirrored Knuckles as they both waved Sorun off. He reciprocated the wave, and then turned away towards the exit to the cavern.

On his way towards the exit he ran into the older echidna and ant that had been conversing with themselves as he talked with Knuckles. The former turned towards Sorun to offer him a small smile, while the latter hopped on the tip of a nearby stalagmite to be at eye-level with the teen.

"'Ello there, Sorun," Archimedes greeted. "Feeling alright? No, er... adverse effects or anything like that?"

Sorun shook his head. "Nah, I'm feelin' fine. Don't think the Master Emerald did anything to me. Probably a good thing."

"A fact I'm sure we're all in agreement on," Locke added in. "We never did properly thank you for everything. Helping to deal with the Enerjak situation, Dr. Finitevus, all that. And for... willing to cut a piece of your body off for the greater good. I know that couldn't have been an easy choice."

"Eh, easier than you'd think," Sorun admitted with a shrug. "It's all good, now, though. So no worries there." He glanced back towards the altar where Knuckles sat, and then back at Locke. "Not so bad for a 'random Overlander', huh?"

Locke grew a bit uncomfortable, while at the same time Archimedes shot the echidna a look. "Right, er... I must apologize for that," he said. "I'd mistaken you for their kind, and any encounter they've had with the island has never resulted in anything good-"

"It's fine, man, I get it," Sorun said with a wave, letting Locke relax a bit. Far be it from him to judge somebody for a justifiable stigma they had, even if he wasn't so pleased with it. He was always surprised enough he could walk around so freely among Mobians without them holding it to him, even if he wasn't an Overlander to begin with. Sorun was happy enough with an apology. "So you're gonna be spending more time with him, then?"

"Hopefully now that he's decided to take his mantle of the Guardian a bit more seriously," Locke confirmed. "I'd be remiss to say I didn't love my own son, but some of his recent decisions haven't sat that well with me. Such as leaving the island for those down below."

"Knuckles was just worried about everybody and Eggman. Can't exactly blame the guy for wanting to help curb a global threat that endangered everyone, his own species included," Sorun said. A low hum left Locke as a response as he looked down at his feet, making Sorun sigh out. "Look, I... don't really got a lot of experience with this sort of thing, so I don't know what to tell ya. Just try talking to the guy, at least."

A dry chuckle left Locke as he looked back up at Sorun. "I suppose I'll have to endeavor to do my best."

"You dot that." Sorun nodded to both of them, and then summoned Yamato. "Well, it's been real, guys. True experience in and out. I gotta go get my head screamed off by my doctor, though. Take care."

"I really am considering hitting you every time you do something stupid."

"Pretty sure they can get you for malpractice if you started doin' that, doc."

A deep sigh was all the Mobian duck in front of Sorun offered. A very unamused sigh at that. He took the stethoscope off of Sorun's bare chest, and as the human lowered his shirt back down he made a small hum as he looked down at the chart in his hand. Finally, he shook his head and looked back up to Sorun.

"Well, somehow despite all your recent activities and your abiding of non-prescribed 'medicine' -"

"You shouldn't leave needles sitting around," Sorun said with a shrug.

"That's not even a good excuse, but I suppose the fault is mine somewhat. I knew something was off last time I checked inventory, though I don't know how an epinephrine syringe wandered all the way up here from storage... well, it's irrelevant," the doctor finally decided with a shrug. "You made it out of that pretty much completely okay. Well, not okay okay, but you're not worse off than you were a few days ago. Actually you seem much better," he admitted with a bit of a surprised tone.

"Might have something to do with what happened on the island," Sorun offered. "Had some, uh... unorthodox procedures, we'll call it."

"..."

"I could say magic, but I don't think you'd like that."

With another sigh, Dr. Quack closed his eye and shook his head. "Yeah, I tend to tune out all that magic mumbo-jumbo and Chaos what-has-its I know some people can do. Not in my scope. What is in my scope is telling you how you're doing on a physiological scale. And as I said, you're doing fine."

"Ah, that's great to hear, Doc," Sorun said as he began to slide off the hospital bed. "So do I check myself out or-?"

"You," Dr. Quack said as he pushed Sorun back on the bed, "stay here because I'm not fully confident about releasing you from our care yet. Though I will consider letting you out of the wheelchair in a few days since you seem to be doing well on that front," he offered.

Sorun sighed as he was sat back on the bed. "Ugh, for the... fine, that's fair."

"Glad to hear it." The duck began stepping away from Sorun and towards the door. "Also, you had a visitor that wanted to come see you."

"Eh, I'm not doing anything else. Send 'em in." Sorun waved his hand to the doctor, who nodded to him as he continued towards the door. He left, closing the room's door behind him as Sorun sat back on the bed, leaning his back against the metal frame as he clasped his mismatched hands behind his head.

"'Getting better' he says. Ha. If only..." Sorun thought to himself as he looked out the window. It was dark outside due to the nighttime, though not that late into the evening. He still saw a lot of lights on in houses outside the window. "Wonder where that head guy ran off to? Eh, I don't really care I guess... Hope Knuckles'll be doin' well now after that whole thing. If I ever have to deal with that skirt-wearing thing again it'll be too soon." He heard the door to his room open again, prompting him to remove himself from the metal bed frame and slide down to the end of the bed. "Alright, who's... ah, boy."

He'd saw who it was standing at the open doorway, but didn't choose to say anything to them or greet them in any way. Instead he propped his head up onto his hand and looked the other way. There was a deep sigh from a masculine voice on the other end of the room, followed by the sound of footsteps and then Sorun's bed depressing as somebody sat right next to him. A few seconds had passed before the newcomer chose to speak.

"You're a bothersome handful. You do know that, right?"

Lightly snorting in amusement, Sorun finally looked to the side at the black and red body sitting next to him. "You can't talk," Sorun told Shadow. "You punched a god in the face and got knocked flat on your back."

Shadow rolled his eyes and looked ahead at the room. His scowl suggested he didn't seem that amused. "That isn't quite how it went down. And that's not what I meant." His eyes flashed back to Sorun. "I know the details of how you ended up this way. I just... hadn't expected it to be that bad."

"... 'Hey, Shadow, sorry to bug ya but I just called to tell ya Sorun got his arm and eye knocked out of him.' How were you expecting it to look?" Sorun asked him.

"I don't know," he admitted with a shake of his head. "How is it?"

"Eh, it's actually not so bad with this thing," Sorun said as he waved his spectral arm around. "It's actually way better than my normal arm. I'm thinking of cutting my left one off just so I can even them out."

Shadow looked greatly displeased by that statement. "That isn't funny, Sorun."

"So is it a bad time to tell you I did cut it off but had it put back on?"

"You..." With an exasperated sigh, Shadow looked forwards along with Sorun. "I should have been there," he said. Hearing that made Sorun a bit surprised, though he continued to stare ahead at the wall along with Shadow. "I realize the others were helpless to aid you. I don't blame them, but you shouldn't have had to do something like that alone."

"Really doubt you could have helped," Sorun said. "Yamato had trouble scratching that thing 'cause of the Chaos Emerald. It was practically invulnerable. Don't blame yourself," he said with a shake of his head. "I had to pull a lot of tricky nonsense just to pull off a win. Ended up using my whole bag of powers. Even then I still made it out an inch away from dying."

"So I heard." Shadow finally chose to glance back at Sorun. "When did you learn to stop time?"

"Emerald."

"I was being rhetorical," Shadow said in a deadpan.

Sorun slowly nodded in understanding. "Ahhh. You know, if you wanna be playful and say stuff like that you have to at least try and put some sarcastic edge to your voice. Otherwise people take you for real and it messes the whole thing up."

"Tch. Still trying to give me lessons on wordplay?"

Sorun shrugged. "Who knows? Might be nice, passing something along to someone," he said. "Not like I can teach this stuff to Sonic. He overhams it since subtlety's all but lost on that guy. His sarcasm sucks. Me, my sarcasm's dry to the point I got no hope." He turned to Shadow and poked him in the shoulder. "As for you, it just ain't your style. Not your jive, just doesn't mesh. Which is why you could actually pull it off if you seldom use it. You can use the whole unexpected angle since nobody'd see it coming from such a serious guy like you."

With a scoff, Shadow brushed Sorun's finger off him him and stared back ahead at the wall. "You must be alright if you have the energy to say all this."

"Pfft. I try to help a guy and this is the thanks I get?" Sorun interlaced his fingers behind his head and laid back on the bed. "It's nice to know you care, Shadow. I mean, going out of your way to visit little ol' me like this."

"I regret it more with every passing second. Evidently you're fine enough to the point it was a waste of time coming all the way here since you seem so well-off." Sorun felt the bed lighten as Shadow hopped off of it. He heard him walk halfway through the room, and then paused. "... Things on the other side of the world have quieted down some. We've been getting reports that the infrastructure in New Megaopolis was destroyed."

"Yeah, Enerjak went a bit wild on all of Eggman's stuff. His whole power structure's pretty much crippled now. I told Sally and the rest after I got back, so... yeah. It's lookin' pretty good."

There was a thoughtful hum from Shadow. "If there was ever a time to plan the Doctor's demise, it'd be now. That window is fast approaching."

"We'll get there, Shadow, we'll get there. I wanna wait 'til I get my hands on the last Emerald before we spring anything. Wanna be at max power to give us a good a chance as possible," Sorun said with a wave of his hand. "Just wait for that to happen and then we'll do something. At worst I'll get that last Emerald and use Yamato to teleport us to the New Megaopolis ruins. There'd be so little in our way at this point that if it's the two of us we could probably just beeline straight for him and blast through anything in our way until we got to him. One of us stops time, puts a Chaos Spear or Summoned Sword or whatever through his face, boom, job done."

"Not exactly the most well thought-out plan. Then again, with recent events it has some merits," Shadow admitted. "As it is, since things are a bit less hectic I'll be staying here in the city with Rouge for a bit. If something comes up you'll know where to find me. Until then I'll be around."

"Mm-hm, sure." His head facing the ceiling, Sorun waved the hedgehog out. "You do that. I'll let ya know if anything turns up."

His hand hadn't even hit the bed before he heard the door to his room close as Shadow left. Sorun had thought that was the end of it and had tried closing his eye and falling asleep right there in his awkward position on the bed. That was until he heard a knock on the door what felt like thirty seconds later from his perspective, followed by the door opening, followed by Sorun deeply sighing when he heard somebody softly walk into the room.

"I absolutely refuse to say sorry for a single thing I did today," Sorun said as he sat up on the bed to stare at the person who just walked into the room. His sentence and the way his face hadn't changed expressions caused Nicole to stop halfway to his bed, surprise lacing her features as she watched him.

"... How did you know it was me?" she finally asked after getting over the initial surprise of Sorun identifying her immediately.

"You're the only person I know that knocks on a door and then enters the room seconds later without waiting for anybody to say anything."

Looking abashed, Nicole glanced down towards her feet. "Forgive me. I'm still learning at adhering to social customs."

"Yeah, I know. It's fine." Sorun leaned forwards and clasped his hands together again, this time setting them between his knees. He kept his own eye focused on the floor as he felt the bed compress as Nicole sat down in it- right in the same place Shadow had sat in prior. "So. Today was crazy. But hey, it all ended that well end... ed, yeah, that doesn't work," he muttered with a shake of his head.

"The expression is 'all's well that end's well', is it not?"

Sorun nodded. "Yeah, but I tried putting a spin on it with a new end and it kind of fell apart and didn't work out." Nothing but silence passed after Sorun finished speaking. He got fed up with it fairly quickly and clicked his tongue out of irritation, and then looked up at Nicole. She looked about as uncomfortable as he felt, avoiding eye contact with him while having all but copied the slumped sitting stance Sorun had.

There was a strong urge for him to go and gloat about the fact that he'd been right and that everybody else had been wrong. That even slightly wounded he'd had more right to have been there than anybody else in that fight and that he didn't need to be coddled like some newborn infant that couldn't protect itself. He could be strapped to a wheelchair with no arms and still have more lethality than the average Mobian citizen on account he could summon spectral sword out of thin air. If anything he'd been the main factor in solving this entire mess.

Of course he didn't because that would be unnecessarily mean and bordering on cruel, and he didn't really have it in him to pull something like that on somebody he liked. So Sorun thought that a more tactful approach was necessary. Even if it killed him a bit inside that he couldn't gloat. Because he wanted to. Badly.

"Look, I... I get it, you're all really worried about me," Sorun said. "You don't want me doing all this crazy stuff because I'm in no shape to right now, I get it, it makes sense. I don't blame you at all."

"Then why do you keep doing it?" Nicole asked. "Time and time again we have all continued to try and keep you from endangering yourself further, but at every step-"

"It's not like I want to keep doing this," Sorun interrupted with an annoyed tone as he threw his arms up at the ceiling. "What, you think I actually like going up to random evil gods just so I can stab them? I-I-I'm not Sonic, I don't do crazy stuff like that for fun. Believe me, I'd like nothing more than to listen to you guys and sit in a hospital and do absolutely nothing until I got better again. I mean, that's the dream. To just sit around and do nothing." He sighed and sat a bit further back on the bed, enough that he was able to fold his legs in front of him. "But it feels like the world just won't let me take a rest because crazy things keep happening left and right. First a revolution happens and then the whole Enerjak thing happens right after, and I'm just left wondering what crazy, insane thing's gonna happen next. And I'd like to sit it out and let you all handle it, Nicole, but then Enerjak happens and I got this-" he formed Yamato in his hand, "- and-and I just- it- ugh..."

Yamato disappeared, and Sorun flumped right onto his back on the bed. Nicole, looking puzzled at the sight, leaned forwards as Sorun exhaled up at the ceiling with his arms stretched out far enough above him that his hands dangled off the edge of the bed.

"I just wanna sleep until the doctor lets me out of this hospital so I can do stuff," Sorun mumbled out. "I don't want any more crazy stuff happening. I don't want people yelling at me. I just want to do normal stuff for a bit. Why is that so much to ask?"

"..." Nicole's ears flattened halfway as she looked ahead, away from Sorun. "Perhaps we were all a bit overbearing on you," she said.

"No. You weren't," Sorun said, causing her ears to straighten back up as she looked back at him. "I can't really blame you for everything you did."

"Like you wouldn't blame me for putting you in a straight jacket?" she asked, and when Sorun looked up he saw Nicole frowning at him a bit. "That comment was a bit hurtful, Sorun."

"You took my door away."

The frown turned into a pout as she looked away. "The comment having a relatively solid base doesn't make it any less hurtful."

"You didn't even just lock it. You just straight-out took it away."

"I was worried," she snapped as she looked back at him. "And it seems these fears may have been a bit... misplaced," she finally admitted in a softer voice. "You... handled yourself well, it seems. With Enerjak."

"Eh, I'm not gonna lie. I think I just got really lucky," Sorun said to her as he sat back up. "I was really relying on that time-stop surprise of mine one-shotting Enerjak and it didn't, and if I'm being honest with you I don't think I could have taken the guy in a straight fight the more I think about it. I was really heated at the time and thought I could, but looking back Eggman teleporting him away to try and drain his powers only to have it blow up in his face is probably what ended up saving us. Which... would mean Sonic was right in making that truce with him..." Sorun realized as his voice trailed off. "... Goddammit, he was right."

How would things have gone if Sonic hadn't stopped Sorun from killing Eggman right then and there? Poorly, most likely. Chances were Enerjak would have won that fight, and Sorun didn't like thinking about how bleak things would have been for the world after.

Him and Finitevus made it sound like they wanted to erase most of the world's population through an armageddon to hard-reset civilization. It would have been the world being brought back to level zero by the gene bombs all over again, only this time with someone like Enerjak there to play (and probably accurately portray) god for the new generation that would rise up from the ashes.

All of that was avoided because Sonic stopped Sorun from killing Eggman.

Hard pill to swallow the more Sorun thought on it.

"Well, at least I was there to separate that hex from the Master Emerald," Sorun finally settled on with a sigh. "Who knows how things would have played out if I wasn't there, and it all ended well because of it. So how about we try not thinking about that, huh?"

"Yes, you did seem highly agitated during that fight." Nicole's voice cut through Sorun's thoughts, making Sorun face her once again. "I was observing through the surrounding cameras. I was too busy attempting repairs to the city's defensive systems knocked out from all the fighting between Enerjak and Shadow, so I couldn't intervene directly. I saw what had transpired though." The corners of her mouth lifted up a bit as she glanced away from Sorun. "You... seemed particularly upset at how his aversion to technology related to me."

"Oh, you... heard all that, huh?" It was Sorun's turn to look away from her as he rapidly brushed as much of his dark hair in front of his face as possible to hide himself. "W-well, you know, I... you really freaked me out after the drone thing and-and, well, I..."

"It's okay, Sorun. I understand." A hand placed itself on the teen's shoulder, causing him to freeze in place. His vision was a bit dark from the hair over his one eye, though he was able to make out Nicole reaching her arm over to touch his shoulder as she smiled at him. "It's nice to hear somebody regard me so highly they'd go out of their way to fight a god." The hand squeezed down a bit. Sorun assumed there would have been a bit of pain from the pressure he felt had he still has access to that bodily function. "It was flattering. Also incredibly foolish of you. But flattering all the same."

He was too flustered at the moment to form any kind of response to Nicole after hearing her words. Fortunately, Nicole had chosen that time to release his shoulder and stand up off the bed.

"I'm happy to have people like you and Sally that regard me so highly. It's made my experience of fitting into real life all the more worthwhile," she said to him. "We can speak more of this later, at a more appropriate time when you're better. For now, I'd like to let you get your rest. It's been a long day for everyone." Her body slowly began disappearing. "Good night, Sorun."

No sooner had she disappeared from the room did Sorun loudly sigh out and flop right back onto the bed. He'd brushed his hair away from his face after to reveal a large blush that had grown on his features.

"Why's it gotta be like this...?"

Chapter 49

A/N- I saw it a couple of times in some reviews, so I'm addressing it right now: no, I'm not planning on doing anything with Anarchy Beryl.

Recursion Error

Episode 49- A deal with a devil

"Thanks for helping me with this, Mighty. I owe ya one."

These words were spoken by Sorun, who at that moment had stepped out of a portal sitting right in the center of his hospital room. From behind him ambled out Mighty from the portal, who was balancing a TV in his hands with a game console and controllers stacked precariously on top of it.

"Aw, it's nothin', Sorun. If anything I owe you for your help with Knuckles during, y'know, that whole thing from a few days back." Mighty set down the electronics and turned back to Sorun just in time to catch him cutting the portal closed. "Though," he continued with a small smirk, "I'm kinda surprised you held out so long in here without getting your hands on this thing with the way you act around it."

Sorun turned around towards the armadillo, his eye twitching in irritation while his mouth was set in a happy grin. "It's been hectic, man, come on. I haven't really had a good opportunity until now."

"Are you sure it's not because you just forgot all this game stuff was in the HQ?" Mighty asked him in a teasing tone.

"You know what, man, you'll never know 'cause you don't have proof of squat." He threw Yamato over his shoulder as the sword disappeared in a show of blue spark and particles and began to approach Mighty. "I don't really have an end table or something to prop the TV up on so we'll just have to leave it on the ground. Maybe I can have Nicole make, like, some bean bag chairs or something later on. Or an end table."

"Sure, but, uh..." Down on his knees, Mighty looked up to Sorun with a confused expression as he held the TV's power cord in his hand. "Where are we supposed to plug this in?"

Humming in acknowledgement, Sorun took a quick glance around the room. He looked towards the various medical machines stacked near his bed, and then nodded his head towards them. "Eh, just plug it into the outlet over there. It used to power all that stuff, but I pulled 'em out."

Mighty followed Sorun's gaze towards the wall, and then squinted. "Don't... don't you need all that stuff?"

"Nah, not really," Sorun denied with a shake of his head. "I've been getting better. Doc even let me out of the wheelchair, so yeah, that's been great. I can actually walk on my own free of scrutiny." That was probably one of the best things about finally getting somewhat healed of his injuries. Getting out of that infernal chair so he didn't have to feel embarrassed being pushed around in that thing. He'd never get back in a chair for as long as he lived. Which wasn't long. "But yeah, it's been real great. Nicole stopped worrying about me so much so I don't have a camera following my every footstep, so that's been... that's been substantially less weird all around." He got down on his knees on the other side of the TV from Mighty. "How's Knuckles been doing?"

"Ah, he's been doing fine," Mighty answered as he continued to examine the power cable. "Most of the other guys in the Chaotix are up there with him. Thinking maybe tomorrow I'll go join 'em." He gave Sorun that certain look that suggested he wanted to ask him something. "Hey, you think when I do that you could portal me up there?"

"Eh, I dunno," Sorun said. "The island went back to floating around its usual track around the world. I either need exact coordinates or a general idea of where the location I'm making a portal to is. It's easy when I'm going to a static place. Little harder when it's a giant, floating island that keeps moving around." He briefly paused to bend forwards and grab the game console. "I mean I'll try, but you might wanna ask Tails to fly you back in case I can't. Pretty sure I can make it work though."

"Cool, that works. Thanks, Sorun."

"Mm-hm." Sorun made a small hum as he continued to examine the game console. "I just hope I can get this thing to work. I haven't played a video game in forever and being stuck in this hospital room's been torture, so I thought maybe I'd set the old system from the HQ up to try and bring back the simpler times. Was thinking of inviting Nicole here to play this later on. I think she'd like it." His grin widened a bit as he looked up at Mighty. "But hey, if you wanna stay around for a bit to get a few rounds in with me first that'd be cool."

"..."

"Hey Mighty, did your eyes always glow a ghostly green like that?"

A few minutes prior

"Usually I don't intervene so heavily, but I guess this is a special case. No helping it, I suppose."

The location was above the detention center inside of New Mobotropolis. Or just the prison, as Rubrum would put it simply. An admittedly nice-looking prison like everything else in the city, fit in with the aesthetic weirdly enough, but he wasn't here to admire architecture. He had a job to do.

And right now his job was sitting in a cell inside the prison. The prison he was sitting on top of with his legs hanging off of the edge of the spire that was the detention center building. Rubrum looked down towards the ground entrance to the prison with a small sigh.

"The five bozos locked up down there are some villains the Freedom Fighters had to deal with and locked up a bit before Sorun arrived in this world if I'm remembering this right. Normally how things would have gone is they would have all gotten free by now, but then I happened and screwed up the proper order of things. As a result they wound up stewing in the Knothole jail for months longer than they were supposed to before they got transferred here along with everyone else after Sorun bailed everyone out of New Megaopolis.

"My target... Mogul, right?" Rubrum wondered. "Hnn... I was told that he made Tails, Mighty, and Mina magic sleeper agents. Apparently he encountered the latter two as children and used his abilities on them back then to mark them with some mind control curse, and then did the same thing to Tails on some adventure. It was all part of this grand plan of his to use them as hostages to coerce Sonic into giving him the gray Chaos Emerald so he could use its power to bust himself and the others out of prison. "

His hooded head looked to the side, at the duffel bag sitting next to him. He stared at the cyan light bleeding out from the bag's opening, and then looked back down at the ground entrance to the prison.

"Yeah, well, that's not gonna be able to happen now with everything I set in motion. Six of the seven Chaos Emeralds are in Sorun, and I have the last one. Which means that even with his sleeper cell puppets he won't be able to escape. And unfortunately, if the plan is to proceed as intended, he needs to get out of that place. So it looks like I'm gonna have to step in and lend a hand."

It wasn't something Rubrum was very comfortable with, being so direct with his intervention. Pulling strings in the background, subtly shifting things in his favor, playing the whole "mysterious benefactor" role in front of Eggman, admittedly none of it was really his style and he didn't like doing it, but it was necessary. As necessary as him needing to directly deal with this issue. His anxiety was only magnified given the high chance of somebody as important as a Freedom Fighter seeing him while he was doing this.

He only had once shot to pull all this off, after all. That's where a majority of his stress came from.

"Gonna have to smash any camera in my way so Nicole can't get a recording of me." Rubrum stood up and grabbed the duffel bag containing the Emerald. "With any luck everyone'll assume Mogul pulled off some magic trick and managed to escape. Wouldn't be the most unbelievable thing. From what I heard he at one point had enough power to crush entire universes with his bare hands before Tails did something to stop him. He has an unusually strong link to the Chaos Force due to his exposure to a Chaos Emerald from way back when. Strong enough that he got god-like powers. It's not unreasonable to think he'd find a way out of there after a while. That'll have to be the story everybody buys."

He made the motion to step forwards and fall off the top of the prison... but then froze with his one foot hanging in the air.

"Wait. What about the others?" Rubrum suddenly realized. "Bean and Bark I'm not worried about. The bear doesn't talk and the duck... well, I don't think anybody'll pay attention to anything he says. Naugus, that fucking motherfucker , is a bit too feral right now to recall any of this. Nack... nah, I don't see him ever bringing it up with anybody important. And even if he does I won't show off anything too damaging. It'll be fine. All's I gotta worry about is Mogul, but I already know how I'm gonna take care of that. We're all good."

His mind made up, Rubrum walked off the edge of the spire and dropped down to the ground below.

Finding the way to the holding cells for him had been a piece of cake. Destroying security cameras along the way while also ensuring he wasn't seen by them were equally as trivial, if not a bit challenging from how small and nearly unnoticeable Nicole made the damn things. Stealth may not have been his specialty, but with his abilities, he didn't need all that much skill in that particular area.

He was a bit surprised on how little of the city's guards were actually inside the structure itself. On the outside guarding the perimeter, entrances, and manning the searchlights, of course. On the inside it was practically a skeleton crew. Rubrum supposed he could see some of the logic; the security cameras set up by Nicole did enough of a job guarding the place, and on a practical level he really did doubt the prisoners themselves had any way of escaping. Not if Mogul had needed to concoct this half-baked "brainwash people into hostages" attempt of his. Desperate move that one, especially if he used cards he'd been holding for likely over a decade if Mina and Mighty said anything.

All that just to bust out of jail.

"I know the guy's immortal and everything, but there's playing the long game and then there's... whatever that was," Rubrum thought as he descended the stairs into the holding area. "I guess I can't be too judgmental. It woulda worked, after all."

The holding area quite honestly didn't look like anything Rubrum had ever seen in a prison. It was a corridor, basically. Each side was lined with cells, the doors of which weren't doors at all but clear glass panes. The cells themselves didn't have doors, of course. Not when Nicole could willingly teleport anything in the city she wanted. Doors to prison cells were unnecessary in that case; another reason Rubrum doubted escape from this place was near-impossible.

The corridor ended with another cell, this one slightly larger than the ones to each side of the corridor. He saw who he was looking for in there: a brown-furred mammoth Mobian, massive in size. At least three to four times Rubrum's own size. Casually laying back against the wall of a cell that barely fit him, reading one of the many books stacked to his side.

"The hell? They gave him books?" As he slowly walked down the corridor, he glanced to the side at one of the empty cells. The bed was the standard metal-plank-chained-to-wall prison bed, utilities looked pristine, and the lighting was pleasant, too. Even the temperature in this place felt pleasant to Rubrum's skin. "For prison cells these rooms aren't actually half-bad. Some Mobians really are too nice for their own good. Or maybe that's just Nicole. Wasn't there a place the kingdom had literally called the Devil's Gulag? Some prison in the middle of the ocean somewhere or something like that?" Rubrum held a hand to the back of his head as he continued to slowly walk forwards. "Ahh, I'm not too sure actually..."

"Hey, what's all this? What's goin' on?" Rubrum looked to his left at a cell he passed when he heard that accent. A purple-furred Mobian. A... something, he couldn't remember. Weasel? Probably, though he didn't look like one in Rubrum's opinion. The brown hat and singular fang sticking out of his mouth was a good enough identifier for the Mobian he knew as Nack. The sharp glare he was giving the passing man not as indicative, but still distinctive enough. "Ah, for the- and who's this clown suppos'd to be, huh?"

Rubrum had wordlessly passed his cell, though he had gone as far as silently show him his middle finger as he passed. Nack had looked incredibly offended by this and banged on the glass pane of his cell in defiance.

"M-monster..." The red-cloaked man stopped, his hand going limp as he turned to his right. In that cell was a relatively short, green duck Mobian. A duck Mobian who was looking straight at Rubrum with quivering eyes. His who body was shuddering out of absolute fright at the sight of Rubrum, to the point that he was sweating intensely as he slowly backed away from the glass pane of his cell. "Bad, very bad, monster, demon, go away, please please please go away..."

The cell right next to him contained a relatively large polar bear Mobian with an off-white, almost tan fur color. He was doing his best to look into the cell next to his, with a look of worry and concern on his face over the shaking duck. Even the purple weasel on the other side of the corridor seemed off-put by how the smaller Mobian was acting.

"H-hey, Bean, c'mon..." He actually seemed unsettled at the sight, and then reared his head towards Rubrum. "What's the big idea, fella?"

"It's nothing of concern to you," was Rubrum's only reply as he continued onwards. He came to an abrupt stop at another cell, inhaling sharply as he turned to look at the thing inside of it.

The thing that resided inside of the cell was a creature so grotesque Rubrum didn't rightly know if it was even a Mobian. That chimeric abomination. That overly stocky body. A wart-riddled, Mobian bat head whose features were so feral that if Rubrum didn't know any better he'd say it was a lost cause. A cybernetic pincer claw hand that continued to erratically open and close.

Rubrum couldn't control himself he he rushed forwards and slammed his own forearm against the glass pane fast enough that those observing jumped back in surprise, while Mogul, ever casual, just turned a page in his book. Rubrum himself had breathed out so harshly at the sight of the thing it came out as a hiss, and both of his hands began rapidly twitching.

"Mutant, degenerate fuck," Rubrum harshly thought as he glared at the thing past the shadow of his hood. "If I could I'd wring you apart with my bare hands right now..."

He wanted to. Deeply. The hatred flowing through him at the moment would have made it so easy. It was the same feeling of intense, hopeless frustration he'd felt when he'd held his sword to Eggman's throat, but hadn't been able to cut his head off. All because of His plan. His actions. These factors were the only things keeping Rubrum from tearing his way into that cell to tear the thing inside apart.

"You'll get yours. You always do." Rubrum pushed off the glass with a scoff and averted his eyes from the thing. He turned towards the end of the corridor at the cell containing the mammoth Mobian, and began to approach it once more.

In another time he would have laughed at the comedy the image a anthropomorphic, tusk-sporting mammoth wearing a white business suit and reading a book in a jail cell provided. At the moment Rubrum just didn't feel like laughing, instead choosing to stop right in front of the cell containing the Mobian. The mammoth's green eyes had only given the red-wearing man a cursory glance before he looked back to the book in his hand, while his trunk hadn't even flinched from his presence. The cheek alone had gotten some amused rise out of Rubrum, if only a little.

"Sorry about that back there. I really don't like that thing," Rubrum greeted as he lowered himself to sit down on the ground while placing the duffel bag he held in his hand right next to him. "Mammoth Mogul. We need to talk."

"Do we now?" Mogul's deep, baritone voice seemed to cut through the walls themselves as he flipped another page. "You will have to forgive me for lacking any recollection of having ever requested to engage in the act of consultation with a deviant garbed in rags-"

"Yeah man, listen, do you think we could keep the verbiage on a lower level here?" Rubrum requested in a tired voice. "I don't know when the AI who runs the city is gonna realize I killed all the cameras on the way here, so we're kinda on a time crunch."

Another page is flipped. "That is none of my concern. Time, you see, is a resource I am in abundance of, whereas it seems you are in short supply. If there is any singular individual in our midst without a leg to stand on in this negotiation, it would be you."

"This fucking guy..." Rubrum had to resist reaching up to rub a hand over his face. He couldn't suppress the small sigh, though. "You got me there," he admitted to the mammoth. "I think you'll change your tune when you see what I got in the bag, but we'll get there."

"That remains to be seen." The large Mobian glanced up from his book at one of the cells back behind Rubrum. "I am curious, however, in why you would show such animosity towards Naugus."

The name alone made one of Rubrum's hands twitch. "It's not important," he said with a shake of his head. "What is important is this."

He reached forwards and opened the top of the duffel bag. Cyan light shined out from the opening, drawing the attention of every single person in the holding center. Mogul seemed most interested out of them all, going as far as to lower the hand holding his book down halfway to his lap as he stared towards the bag with now wholly interested eyes.

Rubrum's hand started reach forwards while his shadowed face continued to look up at the Mobian. Pale, human fingers rested against the Emerald, and then the whole hand clamped down on it. The Emerald was risen out of the bag and held in front of Rubrum as his hooded head continued to look up at Mogul.

And then the Emerald left his hand as he casually tossed it up in the air.

"You know what this is," Rubrum claimed. He caught the Emerald as it fell back into his hand, only to continue to casually toss it up in the air over and over. "How much do you know about Sorun? The human Freedom Fighter?" he asked. "I know you must have seen him. You all were in those Egg Grapes along with everyone else while he was fighting Eggman."

"That curiosity?" Mogul voiced, his eyes lifting up and down as they followed the Emerald. "A rather anomalous figure that seems to have shown up out of the blue. I'll admit I know little other than what I saw him display. His control over the energies of Chaos was a peculiar sight to behold, even if I myself found them lacking in great capacity."

"That right?" Rubrum drawled out as he continued to toss the Chaos Emerald up and down.

"I had heard of certain technomancers within the Overlander community who possessed psychic abilities that could control machines, though Overlanders being Overlanders I hear the persecution rates for these individuals were quite high. It was my initial assumption that the boy was somebody unfortunate enough to be born with similar abilities who sought refuge with the Mobians of the kingdom. I find myself questioning these assertions with each passing day with the words I had heard him speak during that battle," Mogul said. "The boy's abilities are a mystery to me. So crude and inflexible, and yet at the same time the power behind them was mildly impressive." His eyes narrowed a bit as he looked to the side. "That sword, on the other hand... its very nature felt erroneous." He looked back to Rubrum. "What purpose does inquiring about the boy serve?"

"Oh, plenty," Rubrum said as he caught the Chaos Emerald. "Sorun... is a human from another zone entirely. One completely inhabited by humans void of any link to the Chaos Force. On his own Sorun isn't special; only thing special 'bout him is how his powers manifested. Otherwise any human from where he comes from can absorb Chaos Emeralds like he can to get powers out of them."

"Truly?" Mogul rumbled out, sounding slightly interested. "I had never thought such a phenomenon could be possible. A being lacking a connection to the Chaos Force... I suppose, given the proper environment to thrive in, such a thing could be possible." A deep hum rumbled out from him. "I find myself questioning why he would be so limited to those simplistic abilities given the nature of Chaos Emeralds."

"Yeah, I'm sure you'd know all about that." Rubrum began tossing the Emerald back and forth between his hands. "Here's the deal. It's nearly impossible to remove the Emeralds from Sorun, and he's absorbed six of the seven. Which means the one I got right here is the last one." He snapped his hands together and cradled the cyan gem between his fingers as a look of realization came across Mogul's eyes. "You seem to be catching on. Wanna escape this prison? You need more power than what you got right now. Only way to amplify your abilities is with a Chaos Emerald, and I just happen to have the last one in the world." He placed the Emerald down on the ground in front of him. "So let's deal. And try to keep in mind the clock's tickin'."

The mammoth Mobian in the cell in front of Rubrum looked down at the cyan Emerald sitting in front of him. Its intense glow shone off the wall around them, and even from here Rubrum could see its light blue light reflecting off Mogul's eyes. Mogul himself had creased his furred eye ridges in concentration as he contemplated Rubrum's words and offer.

He seemed to reach a conclusion, as he slowly set down the book he'd been holding amongst the pile besides him. "I assume you have terms," he said at last.

"Mm-hm. First things first. That magic mind control thing you have on Mina, Mighty, and Tails? Yeah, I'm gonna need you to dissolve that."

Mogul froze a bit. He kept it cool, Rubrum would admit that much. Not so much as a facial muscle twitched and his eyes remained in the same expression they'd been in. Even his voice remained the same normal tone as he spoke out.

"How could you possibly know about that?" Mogul questioned him.

"I'd rather not say," Rubrum answered. "I know you put some magic Chaos spell thing on them. Remove it."

"And that is what you want in exchange for giving me the Chaos Emerald?"

"No, that's the prerequisite for us beginning negotiations."

Mogul tensed up slightly. "You would ask for more than that? I'm already having to pay a steep price in relinquishing my Fearsome Foursome-"

He was interrupted mid-sentence when Rubrum burst out in laughter. A gasping type of laughter made from disbelief, so intense that Rubrum was forced to hug his sides he'd laughed so hard. It was enough that he fell to his side while he laughed, causing Mogul to eye him in annoyance from his behavior. Even some of the other prisoners from behind them who had been listening in to the conversation gave Rubrum odd looks as he continued to laugh.

Finally, the red-cloaked man's laughter seem to subside. He let out one last wheezing gasp, and then laid his palms flat on the ground in order to push himself up.

"Haaaa... sorry, it's just- you were spitting out all these big collegiate-level words and then you hit me with the 'Fearsome Foursome' and I just- it was too much." Shaking his head, he breathed out while righting himself back into a sitting position. "Alright, where was I? Oh, yeah." His shoulder slumped forwards a bit as Rubrum's voice grew a bit more serious. "Get rid of the mind control you have on them or I walk out with the Chaos Emerald."

A hard, unflinching glare was sent Rubrum's way from the Mobian in front of him. He said nothing at first, instead just maintaining that glare, waiting for Rubrum to flinch. He remained still as a stone, though, causing Mogul to lean his head back a bit in silent acceptance.

"Very well," he agreed. Rubrum cocked his head to the side in interest as both of Mogul's eyes began growing a solid green color, and at the same time a green, four-sided diamond shape appeared on his forehead. He closed his eyes in concentration, after which the diamond shape on his forehead faded.

Meanwhile

"Mighty? Uh... Mighty?"

Sorun wasn't too sure what lead him to poking Mighty's fallen, unconscious form with the scabbard of Yamato. One moment everything had been fine. The other moment Mighty's eyes had started glowing green, and a strange shape had appeared on his forehead. Sorun had been worried something was about to happen before all the green glowing faded, followed by Mighty doubling over onto the floor and falling unconscious.

Hence why Sorun was poking him.

"Mighty, come on." Poke. "Mighty." Poke. "Yeah, he's not waking up," Sorun sighed to himself as he stopped poking the Mobian's body with the scabbard. "What was up with the green stuff?" he wondered as he stroked his chin in thought. "Looked kinda... magic-y. Should probably help him in case something is wrong, but I don't know anything about Chaos magic. I know anybody that does?"

Some seconds passed as Sorun thought. Finally, he reached an answer and snapped his fingers.

"Oh yeah, that g- oh, yeah. That guy ," he all but hissed. He briefly contemplated ignoring it altogether in favor of just hoping that Mighty could sleep whatever that was off, but as he gazed at the armadillo's body he felt a bit of worry well up in him. And then his worry gave out and, with a sigh, he stood up to his feet. "You're lucky I like you so much, man," he muttered out as he picked Mighty up with his spectral arm. "C'mon, Mighty. I'll have foxy grandpa check you out."

Detention center

"There. It is done," Mogul stated as he opened his eyes up. "Now what do you want in exchange for the Chaos Emerald?"

"Hm... that's it, huh?" Pale fingers began to idly tap on the surface of the cyan Emerald as Rubrum made a contemplative hum. "Well... you don't really have anything I want if I'm being honest," he said. "So what I want... is the Chaos Emerald."

He finally managed to get some reaction out of Mogul with that request. It wasn't much; just a bit of eye-widening on Mogul's part. And it seemed to be more in confusion than anything else from the way he was staring at Rubrum.

"I beg your pardon?" Mogul asked. "You... want what you are trying to trade me?"

"Yeah, I want it back after you use it to get out of here," Rubrum explained. "I'm not giving it to you for you to keep. It's more of a loan. A minute-long loan. I still need the Emerald for one other thing."

"That's absurd." He didn't sound at all pleased by the offer. In fact, he sounded downright disgruntled. "You would give me the Emerald only for me to have to give it back shortly after? You act as if my liberation from this penitentiary is all you desire."

"Look, man, I'm just trying to scratch stuff off my to-do list. I don't question it. I just do," Rubrum said. "If you don't like the offer, tough. It's all you're getting."

Mogul's eyes narrowed a considerable amount at Rubrum. "And you truly think I would just freely relinquish the last Chaos Emerald simply because you asked?"

"I would think a man of your distinction would have a bit of integrity when it comes to things like this." Rubrum leaned his hooded head to the side and propped it against his fist. "Besides. If you don't give it back, I'll just take it ."

The last words of Rubrum's sentence were punctuated by small bolts of red lightning arcing over his body. There'd been something else too- a small presence that had radiated out from his form. It had only lasted for a brief moment, but that moment had been long enough for the other four prisoners behind Rubrum and the one in front to feel it. It had been something that caused the voices of those that could speak to die in their throat and have them step back away from the glass panes, all the way to the backs of their cells. Mogul, meanwhile, stayed still as a statue.

Highly-evolved animals or not, Mobians still had fight-or-flight instincts hardwired into them all. Instincts that had begun screaming at them for the single moment that presence that radiated from Rubrum's body hit them. Instincts that told them the thing sitting so calmly on the floor wasn't just a threat. Not even a force. Just that being near it alone meant the possibility of unavoidable death, and that they needed to get as far away from it as possible.

It was the kind of instinct that overwrote all thought processes with fear, and had the prisoners not been boxed inside of cells that would have ran away. As it was, all they could do was press themselves to the walls of their cells to try and gain as much space between them and Rubrum as possible. The only one who didn't seem so heavily affected was Mogul, who looked down at Rubrum in an unimpressed, if not slightly wary, expression.

That feeling had only lasted for a single second, though, and went away right after. It had still been a shock to the systems of the Mobians around him, though, leaving them all in sweating, panting messes pressed up against their walls as they stared bug-eyed at the man in the red hood. Mogul was the least worst for wear, having been able to maintain his composure for the most part, though even he had large beads of sweat matting the brown fur covering his head as he continued to stare at the being in front of him acting so casual.

"So," Rubrum said in a light tone, acting as if his mere existence hadn't just momentarily set off everyone's instincts that were telling them to run away from him, "what's it gonna be?"

The mammoth got through the instinctual shock he'd received quickly enough. He leaned closer to the glass separating him and Rubrum, peering deep into the shadows of his hood as a threatening scowl overtook his features. "I am Mammoth Mogul," he boomed out in a low, threatening voice. "My life has run a duration of which your mind could scarcely comprehend, and shall run longer still for an amount you cannot even fathom. I wield powers beyond your understanding and am your intellectual superior. I will not be strong-armed by petty scare tactics produced by second-rate tricks performed by an amateur wielder of Chaos energies such as you-"

"Spare me the drivel and cease your incessant pontification, Mogul."

Mogul stopped talking when he heard that. Out of everything else, that had been the one thing to make him the most surprised. The use of advanced grammar. Rubrum, meanwhile, continued to stare up at the mammoth while drumming his fingers along his hooded head.

"Yeah, that's right," Rubrum said, "I can use big, fancy words too."

The Mobian in front of him actually looked offended at that. "And yet you demean yourself to that of a lowly commoner by speaking with such indolent grammar."

With a sigh, Rubrum dropped his head. "Dude, nobody cares you can pull ten-gallon words out of nowhere like you do." With a small groan he stood up to his feet. "I guess I can't be too surprised you'd act like this. I almost expected it." His shadowed face picked up to look at Mogul.

"I really adore that aspect about you Mobians," Rubrum continued as he gradually approached Mogul's glass pane step by small step. "You almost always fall into extremes. The average Mobian is either good to the point they're sickeningly naïve or they're cartoonishly evil. And if it's not one of those they're prone to being impulsive idiots." He stopped centimeters away from the glass pane. "That's why I like living among them so much. They're so easy to read. Predict. Co-existence with Mobians practically requires no effort if you're keen enough, because they all fall into these neat little archetypes. And if you look past all the faults they're generally pleasant to be around." He looked Mogul up and down. "Well. Most," he added with a scoff. "You're sharp, Mogul. Not just because you're smart but because you have an ungodly amount of experience nobody without immortality like you could ever catch up to. You know what I mean when I speak of Mobians this way. You're a manipulator. I bet you did this kind of thing all the time to other people back in your heyday. You probably don't even need powers to do something like that at this point you're just that smooth."

It was Mogul's turn to scoff. "You speak as if you Overlanders-"

Rubrum's fist snapped out and impacted the glass pane hard enough that spiderweb cracks spread along the impact point. Mogul had started out from the sudden strike and moved back a bit, while Rubrum had to take a deep breath to calm himself.

"Do not ... compare me to that subhuman trash," he snarled out. "That garbage species is nothing but a dreg of what humanity used to be before the gene bombs." He removed his hand from the glass and took a single step back. "Did you know that they're actually a devolution of the human species?" Rubrum asked. "The gene bombs the Xorda used, you see. They were meant to render all organic life on this planet to its base components using specific isotopes used in the bombs. They were basically neutron bombs intended to wipe everything out. But those isotopes they used were derived from Chaos energies, and since life here on this planet is unusually close to the Chaos Force compared to most other things in the universe life here re-evolved due to a reaction to the isotopes found in the gene bombs. Humans who survived the gene bombs in their bunkers and underground sanctuaries were still affected by the bombs' effects, though. Their entire genetic pool was damaged. Not to a detrimental amount; they can still reproduce, and in some physical and mental aspects they're actually superior to humans. But damaged is damaged. Their warped evolutionary tree branched so far away from humanity that they ceased being humans and became Overlanders.

"I despise them. Utterly and completely. I can respect the humans of Station Square. Their instincts may have been dulled to a rounded point after years of living so peacefully in that city of theirs under a mountain that no longer exists, but at least they never lost touch of who they were. At least when they were exposed to the world they sought cooperation with the outside species instead of conflict. Because they had an urge to grow. To thrive and learn about everything around them. Because betterment through knowledge is human nature; they display that perfectly! But it just seems to me that Overlanders inherited more of humanity's bad qualities than good. The wars, the blatant schism between Overlander and Mobian territories. You know what I mean.

"Ah, but... maybe I'm overgeneralizing. Not all Mobians are so nice. Some Overlanders tolerate Mobians just fine. But exceptions don't excuse the majority, and the bad I've seen from Overlanders far outweigh the good. I look at them and all I see are things pretending to be human. Caricatures of humanity. Homunculi. Ghosts. Mockeries living off the corpse of a beautiful species. If you need an example of them at their worst then you don't need to look any further than Eggman and his twisted little nephew. Though I hear he has a niece named Hope that's rather nice. She'd be an example of an exception. And then there's Mobians like the bandit tribes in Yurashia or the ones in Sandblast I can't find myself standing. Exceptions. The same foolishness from everyone. Over and over."

With a deep breath, Rubrum ceased speaking. His back fell against the nearest wall, after which he breathed out a loud sigh while reaching a hand behind his hood's shadow to rub at his face. Mogul looked on, completely silent with his eyes trained on the red-garbed man, expression a cross between intrigue and quite plainly being disturbed by what he heard. The others in the back were still too scared to speak up.

"... Well, it's all beyond me at the end of the day," Rubrum quietly mumbled out as he pushed off the wall. "Besides, I have bigger things to worry about than animal people and broken humans. I came here for one reason and one reason only: I've a job to do. And I'll eviscerate anything that stands in my way of accomplishing this mission. Fortunately for everybody in this room you're all too important for me to hurt."

His elbow shot out and impacted the glass pane sealing Mogul's cell. It shattered away, opening up the mammoth's cell and exposing the wide-eyed Mobian within. Rubrum barely paid this any mind as he used his foot to kick the cyan Emerald up and grab it with his hand.

"I apologize for that. Sometimes it all becomes too much and I need to vent," Rubrum stated in a sorry tone. "Now take this Emerald before I shove it in the cavity in your chest, Mogul. We're almost out of time."

Without even waiting for a response, Rubrum causally tossed the Emerald towards Mogul. The mammoth easily caught it in a single hand, his eyes still giving Rubrum that perturbed stare. Even so he still proceeded to pull down the neck of his suit's shirt to reveal a perfectly circular hole in the center of his chest. The Chaos Emerald fit right into the organic slot, and the instant it was fit in Rubrum had felt it. A sensation like an electrical charge seemed to grow and manifest around the mammoth's body as green energies began to swell and gather around him in an aura.

"Ah... how long it's been." He spared Rubrum a cursory glance before looking up at the cells holding the other four inmates. "My fellow prison-mates, I would extricate you from your cells if only to spare you another moment of listening to this madman before us."

Whether the other four had even heard him was unknown. Naugus, in his feral state, was at this point frothing at the mouth at the mere sight of Rubrum. The duck was still looking at him with fearful eyes, while the polar bear and Nack stared with wary eyes tinged in fear. They'd maintained these expressions even after green Chaos energies swirled around them, followed by them all disappearing completely as they were teleported away by Mogul's powers.

"'Madman' is stretching it a bit, don'tcha think?" Rubrum asked as he turned his hooded head back to Mogul. Green energies began to swirl around his own body. "My feelings are actually kind of hurt here. I was just speaking my mind out."

"And I've no time to entertain the philosophy of what amounts to little more than a child angry at the world," Mogul said as his own body began glowing a brighter green. "This is where we part ways, my mysterious malefactor. For both our sakes, I sincerely hope our paths do not cross once more."

"Sure, but before you leave can I have the-

Zap!

Zap!

"- Emerald... back? Wow, really?"

Rubrum no longer found himself standing next to the cells of the New Mobotropolis detention center. In fact, he didn't rightly know where he was. Somewhere snowy definitely, seeing as he could barely see anything in front of him past all the white snow blowing past him. The wind howled unusually loud, too, and even for a frigid environment it was colder than normal.

The top of a frozen mountain, then.

"Did he seriously teleport me all the way here hoping I'd freeze to death? Or did he just put me somewhere as far away as possible?" Rubrum wondered to himself. "Bold, if not stupid. I'll respect the hustle if nothing else."

A few miles outside of New Mobotropolis, just in front of an outcropping of trees leading into a forest, there was a flash of light. At the epicenter of this light was a Mobian mammoth in a business suit, whom began to lightly brush his white suit off once the light around him dissipated. This action continued until he felt satisfied in the cleanliness of his suit, after which he began stepping forwards. A light breath blew past his ivory tusks as his face began to relax into an easy expression.

He was finally free of it all. That prison, the meddlesome heroes in New Mobotropolis, that insane man in the red hood, all of it. The time had come for a new business venture, away from all that. Something to occupy himself as he bided his time-

"Okay, but seriously, I really need that Chaos Emerald back, Mogul."

His footsteps froze at the voice. His voice. The voice of a man he knew for a fact he'd teleported to the top of the highest and coldest mountain he knew of, one that wasn't even on this continent. He slowly turned around towards the source of voice, knowing it was impossible that what he heard was some sort of auditory hallucination, but hoping nonetheless.

No, he was there. The red-hooded man, sitting on a nearby rock. The empty bag from earlier he'd used to carry the Emerald was even in his grasp, which he was now casually swinging around. And though Mogul couldn't see his face, the mocking smirk he was sending his way was palpable in its intensity.

"You know, I really didn't think you were gonna do that," Rubrum said. "I thought you were gonna take the honorable route here, but I guess it doesn't really matter at the end." He slung the bag over his shoulder as his face, shadowed by the hood he wore, continued to look at him. "But you know, I gotta say. That's some serious power I feel coming off of you. All from one Emerald?"

"The powers I wield while in possession of this Chaos Emerald classify me as a god, the likes of which are beyond your mortal mind," Mogul boasted in a voice that was at least three times as confident as he sounded before. "How are you here?"

Rubrum shrugged. "All that power," he continued, "and what do you choose to go do with it? Trivial villain shit that gets nobody anywhere?" He made a breathy sigh. "Ah, I guess I'm not in a position to preach. Well, anyways. 'Bout that Emerald."

"What use could you have of it?" Mogul demanded of him. Green energies instinctively began to gather around his hands as he unconsciously took a step back. "Somebody of your caliber wouldn't have the slightest idea of what to do with all this power. You're undeserving of it."

"Bit presumptuous, don't you think?" Rubrum asked. "C'mon, I just need it for my list. Please give it to me?"

"And you'll do what if I refuse? Resort to fisticuffs to wrench the Emerald from my body?" Mogul questioned him. "I'm afraid you lack the proper scope to accurately measure just how vast my power is if that is indeed what you imply. Were not listening to me prior? I am a god , child."

His voice was punctuated by an unnatural echo that reverberated around the mammoth's body, as well as his volume being magnified by the Chaos energies within him. Rubrum stared on, unimpressed even if his hidden face couldn't show it. If anything, he relaxed even more out of boredom at the sight of the power-radiating Mobian, making the motion to yawn while doing so.

"I've gone up against a lot of guys calling themselves gods," Rubrum informed him. "None of them really ever lived up to the title."

"I sincerely doubt one who spouts off such puerile bravado such as you has ever matched any individual possessing even a fraction of my power and intellect."

Rubrum shook his head. "Sure, whatever. Listen, Mogul, thing is I can't really hurt you, so tearing that out of your chest is a no-go for me. But I don't need to use violence here. I can just take the hood down and show you my face, after which you'll just give it to me willingly." The energies around Mogul's hands dimmed as confusion lanced through the mammoth. "But you don't want me to show you my face, Mogul. You don't want to know who I am." Rubrum's voice had gone into a lower warning tone, and he'd leaned forwards on the rock he sat on. "I'll give you the chance to just give me the Chaos Emerald. Because you really don't want to know the truth. Trust me on this."

Seconds passed. Mogul's eyes glared towards Rubrum, and not a word was said from him.

"Mogul?"

The green energies around the mammoth's hands increased their glow in silent defiance.

"Don't do this to yourself."

Rocks, dirt, and small pieces of debris began to shift and float around Mogul's figure as the Chaos energy in him charged further and further.

"Last chance."

His green eyes turned to a solid green as the attack Mogul was readying to unleash on the man in front of him neared completion.

A sigh. "I tried to help you, man."

Rubrum's pale hand slowly reached up and tore down the hood concealing his face.

Mogul's breath hitched in his throat. The earthen debris that had been floating around him instantly fell back to the ground as the Chaos energy in him died down. The green energy in his eyes dimmed, and slowly, his hands lowered back down to his sides. All he could do was stare at the face looking at him from that rock, feeling nothing but complete disbelief at what he saw.

"What...?"

"Pretty wild, huh? Since you've seen my face, I'll go ahead and tell you everything. It all began..."

"So, uh... they-they just had, like, hexes in them this whole time? Just sitting there in them waiting to be turned on?"

As it was, the only person Sorun knew in all of New Mobotropolis that had even inkling into the mystical aspects of the Chaos Force was Tails' uncle, Merlin. Whom Sorun had threatened to kill. And generally disliked.

Honestly, he would have preferred avoiding him entirely, but Mighty's condition worried him, so he decided to put aside all that hatred for the time being to seek out his aid. He had little doubt he'd find help in the old fox; the Mobians that lived in this city weren't ones to turn away from helping others due to grudges, and Merlin didn't seem like an exception to Sorun. So he'd had to swallow his pride and carry Mighty outside of the hospital to search for the wizard.

Only problem was that he hadn't actually known where he lived; Sorun never made it a point to learn where anybody's new houses in the residential district were, really. He'd only found his house to begin with because he'd run into Sonic while looking for it, who at the time had been carrying Tails' unconscious body. Strangely enough the same thing that had happened to Mighty had happened to him, and fortunately, Sonic actually knew where Merlin lived. So he'd lead Sorun there.

Interestingly they'd arrived to find the old fox already had guests. Two yellow mongooses, one Sorun was familiar with and one he wasn't. Strangest of all was that a third victim in the mystery of the green eyes was Mina, the singer. Her boyfriend, Sorun briefly caught his name being Ash, had apparently been taking a walk with her when her eyes had glowed green and she'd collapsed right there in the street. Merlin had just happened to be nearby at the time and had brought them back to his own home in order to try and aid the girl.

Three patients later and doing whatever magical examination he did, the three worried teens had gotten their answer. Apparently they'd been affected by a hex, one not so unlike the one Finitevus had put on the Master Emerald on Angel Island. Hexes that had been implanted in them long ago that, for whatever reason, had been deactivated without seemingly any rhyme or reason. The deactivation had been what knocked them out to begin with, though Merlin had been quick to assure them they were fine.

Evidently he was right, as Sorun was watching the three previously-unconscious Mobians out and about. Tails was conversing with his uncle, Mina was busy trying to calm down an intensely-worried Ash, and Mighty was... well, he'd gone back to sleep. Sonic and Sorun were standing outside near the house, watching the proceedings with relieved looks on both their faces.

"Yeah," Sonic said in answer to Sorun's previous question. "Merlin took 'em out of them all, so we shouldn't have any more problems. Gotta wonder how those things ended up in them to begin with. Or why this had to happen now."

"Got no clue, man," Sorun honestly answered with a shrug. "It's over with now, though, so I wouldn't think too hardly on it."

"Speakin' my lingo, Sorun, speakin' my lingo."

They both glanced at each other for a brief moment. A playful smirk stretched across Sonic's lips, while Sorun had rolled his eye with a small scoff while turning away. He'd done it just in time to catch the sight of Tails hugging his uncle. He had a sort of sad look on his face for some reason, which drew Sorun's interest. He continued watching as Merlin retired to his small home while Tails began to approach the two that had been watching him.

"Yo, Tails," Sonic greeted as the fox approached them. "What was all that about?"

"Oh, i-it's nothing, Sonic," Tails answered, though his ears had flattened halfway to his head. "My uncle Merlin just said he's moving out of the city."

Sonic looked to Tails in surprise. Sorun, meanwhile, had snapped his head to the direction of the old fox's home as a scowl replaced his features.

"He said he wants to travel around more to help 'discover himself' more and to learn more about the Chaos Force. I don't really know the details," Tails admitted to them. "I'm a bit sad he's leaving, but he said he'll be okay. And my uncle's a pretty smart guy. I'm sure he'll be okay."

A small hum came from Sorun. "Right. Of course he will." He looked back to the two Mobians. "I have something I need to go do. I'll see you two later."

"Huh? Oh, sure. Seeya," Sonic said with a wave. Tails gave him another wave along with a smile, which Sorun had only taken the sight of for a single second before he Tricked away.

A small, satisfied sigh blew out from between Rubrum's lips as he used his left hand to pull the red hood back over his head to conceal his features once more. In his right hand was the cyan Chaos Emerald, which he was casually tossing up and down in the air. "Glad you saw some sense finally," he said as he turned to his left. "Woulda been a chore taking this from you by force. But you're a sensible guy it seems, Mogul."

To his side was the mammoth in question, who was sitting down on the rock Rubrum had occupied prior. His large, flap-like ears were flattened against his head, and his entire body language looked like he was low on energy. His face, though, told a different story. His eyes had a distant, vacant look to them, and his mouth seemed to be set in a permanent state of shock and disbelief. His demeanor as a whole screamed being withered. Withered to the point he could collapse and die right there.

Slowly, his eyes turned in Rubrum's direction. That vacant, hopeless expression of his only seemed to magnify tenfold when he caught sight of the red-garbed man standing in front of him, so casually tossing that Chaos Emerald up and down. A shuddering breath had left the mammoth as he opened his mouth to speak.

"It's impossible... it can't be true..." His voice was a voice void of all confidence. Broken, like he'd just been told the worst news in his life.

"Afraid it is," Rubrum blithely replied. "That's the whole truth, from beginning to end." He slowly began to walk towards him. "I said you wouldn't like it. Guess I was right, because you look downright suicidal right now. I honestly can't blame ya."

"I could tell them," Mogul threatened, his voice still hollow as Rubrum stopped in front of him to prop a leg up on the rock. "You cannot harm me. There would be nothing stopping me from going to the Freedom Fighters and revealing everything you've said to me."

"Aw, you're not gonna do that." Rubrum leaned forwards and patted Mogul on the shoulder with his free hand. He flinched from the contact. "If you were actually serious about something like that, we wouldn't be having this conversation." He leaned in closer to one of Mogul's flattened ears. "Hey. Mogul," Rubrum whispered out. "I'm gonna let you in on one more thing. I was faking it when I tried warning you away from making me pull my hood off. I was gonna tell you regardless. I just felt like fuckin' with ya."

Mogul shook his head in denial. "You lie."

"Nah, it's on the list. See?" Rubrum dug into his pocket and brought out the list, and then held it out for Mogul to see. His eyes briefly glanced at the list, followed by him making a small moan as he averted his eyes from it.

- Give Mogul the last Chaos Emerald so he can teleport himself, Nack, Bean, Bark, and Naugus from the New Mobotropolis detention center (X)

- Tell Mogul the truth so he becomes docile (I might fuck around with him just because) (X)

- Get the Chaos Emerald back from a now-docile Mammoth Mogul (X)

"My life's been a living hell for a while now, Mogul, so you can't blame me for trying to milk some enjoyment out of this," Rubrum said as he pocketed the list. "Now I got things to do. And you, my large and not-so-in-charge friend, have a... what is it, a casino to go build and manage? Something about you originally wanting to wait out Sonic until he died of old age because you're convinced the universe gave him plot armor or something stupid, I don't know, I didn't pay attention to every minutia of detail when all this way laid out for me."

He took his leg from the rock and took a few steps back. He took in the sight of the defeated mammoth in front of him, and then spun around and began walking away.

"I know it's rough knowing your immortality doesn't mean anything anymore, but try to enjoy the time you got left," Rubrum called back. "Seriously, try and enjoy it. You still have more time than everybody else, after all."

"Devil." Rubrum stopped walking when he heard that word lowly exclaimed at him. He turned around, and then tilted his head to the side when he saw the harsh look Mogul was sending him. "A demon under the guise of a man. A schemer who acts with so much confidence, but you're trapped just the same as us. You're a fool. A mad fool."

"... Don't I know it." Rubrum turned back around. "Have fun knowing every action you take from now on is meaningless."

With that, he continued walking forwards. He'd bent down briefly just to pick up his duffel bag his feet had crossed, after which he resumed walking forwards. Mogul remained silent at his departure, something Rubrum paid no mind to as he left. It was only when he was far enough away from Mogul did he turn his head back down to the Chaos Emerald in his hand.

"Well, it looks like we're at that point," Rubrum muttered to himself. "All that's left to do with you is give you to Sorun."

He tossed the Emerald up in the air one more time, and then tossed it into the duffel bag. He proceeded to twirl the bag by its handle around his wrist. With the bag spinning around, Rubrum looked up in the sky, towards the broken moon.

"The stage is all set, Sorun. I puppet mastered my way all the way to this point to line it all up for you. You're the leading man here, after all, and we can't start the show without you. So it's time you got your next Emerald."

With New Mobotropolis being a relatively new city, there were no roads that lead to it. Even beforehand when it was simply a blank nanite city there had been no roads, with the place mainly just having been a facility owned by Eggman. As such the city lied in a field, surrounded by trees, near the Great Forest, and with a large stream at the city's back.

As such, anybody traveling to and from the city would have to walk through a field lightly populated by trees just to get there. All in all, not that bad of a hike, as the environment itself was pleasant enough. As such the fox wearing a hooded robe with a knapsack stuffed with personal possessions on his back strolled through the land with relative ease. He'd traveled far enough that the city had disappeared behind his back, and a light smile was on his face as he continued moving forwards.

That was until three blue swords rained down from the sky and stabbed down into the ground in front of him. The old fox had stumbled back a bit in fright from the swords blocking his path, and then froze entirely when the cold edge of a katana was held to his neck.

"Hey, Merlin." The fox Mobian looked to the side to see a blue, spectral arm holding the katana held to his throat and the pale human attached to the arm. His one eye stared coldly at him. "Leavin' so soon?"

"... Hello, Sorun," Merlin greeted in an uneasy tone. "What brings you out here?"

"What does it look like?"

A loud gulp was heard. "I see." Merlin made a nod small enough his head had barely moved. He took in a deep breath, and then closed his eyes. "I had thought you wanted to wait until after you succeeded in finishing Dr. Eggman off before doing this, if time allowed you."

"Eh, you know, I figured I'm kind of getting close to dying here, and seeing as you seem to be leaving to somewhere I changed my mind and decided to just do it now," Sorun explained. "I feel bad for Tails, but... I just really don't like you, Merlin. Or any of the Neo-Walkers. You all kind of fucked my entire life over."

"Is that how you see it?"

"Yeah. It is." The blade's edge pressed deeper into Merlin's neck. "So I'm ending you."

Silence at first. Sorun continued to hatefully stare at the fox with his sword held out, while Merlin seemed... rather startlingly calm, given the circumstances. He simply continued to calmly breath even in the face of getting his head separated from his body, not looking worried in the least. He seemed so calm, in fact, that Sorun was almost off-put by how he was reacting.

"Fine, then. Do as you will," Merlin said. "I'm powerless to stop you. And I've no regrets."

"You've a lot of cheek to say something like that after what you all did to me," Sorun said. "Your attitude..."

"We foresaw a world devastated by Dr. Eggman. With your intervention our vision went from certain doom to wholly uncertain. We did what was necessary in order to prevent disaster to this world we cherish," Merlin calmly answered. "If I have to give my life so that my family and all people on this planet have a chance at living a peaceful life, then so be it."

"It's way less noble when it's my life you're throwing under the bus here."

His eyes still closed, Merlin said, "You speak as if you do not agree with the decision we made, Sorun. Don't tell me, after everything you've done with the Freedom Fighters, after all this time, you haven't come to the same conclusion-"

"Don't." The blade dug into Merlin's neck hard enough that a bead of blood began to run down the sword's length. The fox's face twisted in mild discomfort. "I grew to like them all, sure. Would I rather see the world saved than completely destroyed by that madman? Of course I would. But none of you had any right to drag me into this by forcing me to remain silent about what the Emeralds have been doing to me using that curse."

"All the curse did was force you to remain silent, Sorun. It never forced your actions. It was you who decided to come back to the Freedom Fighters after you left. You who continued to absorb Emeralds. You shout your grievances at me, and yet this entire time all you've done is furthered your progress to the end via the Emeralds." The corners of his mouth upturned in just the barest of smiles. Not one that was mocking in any way. It looked genuine. "You already made your mind up long ago, haven't you? The proof is in your actions. You would have just used your sword to separate the curse from yourself so you could tell the Freedom Fighters everything if you had no intention of seeing this through to the end."

"..."

"..."

"... I could have done that?"

The smile dropped off of Merlin's face. His eyes snapped open in surprise, and despite the sword biting through his neck he'd turned his head to directly face Sorun. "Pardon?"

Sorun's own face was set in such a degree of surprise that Merlin found himself stunned. His eye was opened wide, and the human's jaw had dropped open a bit. He seemed to lose all focus on Merlin as he vacantly stared ahead, his focus so lost that his sword arm dropped away from Merlin's neck.

"Oh, man..." The expression on Sorun's face morphed into something else. The face of somebody who just realized something that they knew they should have known all along. A look of self-pity and realization all mixed together in a face that looked like Sorun was disappointed with himself. "I really am an idiot, aren't I?"

"I... sincerely thought you knew. All three of us did," Merlin confessed, looking just as surprised as Sorun as he rubbed at the shallow cut on his neck. "How could you have never considered this?"

"Because you're right? I don't know." With a sigh, Sorun dropped his shoulders and looked up at the night sky. "Back when I ran away and came back, I made up my mind and decided to go through with this whole thing because I genuinely want to give this planet a chance at living. Because I didn't want a future ruled by Eggman come to pass. To be honest with you, after that the curse... never really came up in my mind all that much. Just whenever I thought of you three."

A gust of wind passed by the now-silent pair. Sorun just continued to stare up at the starry sky, while Merlin watched the human with the now-vacant expression. His hand slowly dropped from his throat, and he gave the human a questioning look.

"Well, now you know," Merlin said. "What will you do now?"

"... Nothing, I guess," Sorun answered in a small voice. "I'll always hate what you people did to me. The principle behind it. Don't think I can forgive ya. But I know why you did it. I remember Aurora hoped that I'd change my mind after a while and see the why of what they did, and while I can't agree with it... I understand," he softly admitted. "I genuinely do want to save them, Merlin. Somehow all those people back there grew on me so much that... that I'd be willing to give my life for 'em. Not like I can just go home and forget about all this anyway, and even if I had the option I doubt I'd take it at this point. So this is the next best option. Lying to them hurts. Knowing how my death'll affect them hurts more. Knowing I'm gonna die, pfft, I'm terrified out of my mind over that, Merlin. But if they all get to live, then... it's worth it. So I'll keep going. Get that last Chaos Emerald so I have the best possible chance at closing the book on all this. I'll get mourned for a bit and everybody will move on with their lives afterwards, but if it means giving them the ability to live a life outside of fighting, then at least me dying means something. I'm not content with it. But it'll have to do."

After he finished talking, Sorun's head slowly dipped downwards. He looked at the katana in his hand, and then glanced at Merlin, who was giving him a sympathetic look. He felt like he should have been mad at that look, but at the moment, he just couldn't muster up the willpower to care. Or even enough to raise his sword back up for that matter.

He couldn't very well kill somebody over something Sorun himself was willingly going along with, could he? He didn't think he'd be able to live with it.

"... Go." The sword dissolved from Sorun's hand as he turned his back to the fox. "Just go. I don't care anymore."

"..." The soft crunching of someone stepping on earth and leaves reached Sorun's ears. He felt a light pressure on his left shoulder, and turned to see Merlin's hand pressing down on it. "Thank you, Sorun," he said. "I know this isn't fair to you. I'm truly sorry for that. But you have my gratitude that you finally saw the right path. I promise your sacrifice won't be in vain."

Sorun shrugged the hand off him. "Never let me catch your face ever again, Merlin."

Saying nothing in response, Merlin simply turned around and began walking back in the same direction he'd been traveling prior. Sorun himself remained rooted to the spot, waiting until the quiet footsteps disappeared. It was only when all was silent did he tilt his head back up at the sky to look at the shattered moon.

"I guess all that's left is to just wait..."

A/N- So I had some wacky stuff originally planned for this chapter. So wacky, in fact, that I took a second look at what I had planned and realize I probably shouldn't go ahead with it for a couple reasons.

So how it was gonna go was it was gonna be this whole thing where Mogul would try to use Sorun as a human battery for power only for it to fail. It was gonna lead to this whole thing where he'd try to mind control Sorun, but then end up in his subconscious and be driven out when he opens a mind door that exposed him to a bunch of ridiculous 21st century internet nonsense, blah blah blah, it was a really dumb idea in hindsight, and it would have ended with Sorun cutting off an arm and threatening to separate him from his immortality if he didn't get back in the cell.

It's, uh, it's probably pretty obvious why I decided to not go ahead with that. I'll put a bunch of goofy stuff in the story for gags, sure, all the lightheartedness and jokes contrasts well with the dark undertone of the story, but I think blasting the immortal mammoth dude with Sorun's memories of Reddit posts and memes woulda... woulda been taking it a wee bit too far off base. So I did this instead.

Funny to think about, though.

Chapter 50

Recursion Error

Episode 50- Final affairs

"You know... I don't think there's been a single stormy day since we all arrived in New Mobotropolis."

Was the weather on Mobius always perfect as far as Sorun observed? No, of course not. It wasn't always clear skies and sunny days, though they did make up more than a fair amount. There'd been cloudy days. Windy days. Rainy days. But when he and everybody else had started living in New Mobotropolis every single day had been a clear, sunny day.

How long had it been since they came here? Two weeks or thereabouts by Sorun's estimate. He found it hard to believe how much had changed in that amount of time, all that had happened, but maybe all of that was just normal by this world's standards. So he didn't think too hard about it. He just sat there on the park bench he'd happened by, staring up into the midday sun as it hung in the sky.

Since it was one of his last.

The Freedom HQ was still technically a viable command center the Freedom Fighters used, but ever since the kingdom's - now republic - relocation it was a bit more of a trek just to get there. Technically just close enough to be accessible by foot, but that was by Mobian standards. If one were to measure the distance in human standards it'd be the kind of distance that needed to be traversed by vehicle.

For Sorun it was possible to get there via the simple use of a portal, but at the moment it seemed it wasn't necessary. He'd been ready to transfer himself there and even went as far as to summon Yamato before he was stopped by the messenger sent out to speak with him. One of the republic's guards. A - in Sorun's opinion, anyway - overly buff dog Mobian, who'd only found him just to tell him Sally requested his presence. Hence him getting ready to teleport over to the HQ before the guard corrected him and stated his presence was needed at the castle, as that was where she was.

He'd quickly thanked the guard before opening a portal anyways.

It'd taken some directions from some of the castle guards due to how complex the layout was for Sorun, but with their help he eventually found where Sally was. It was in a small little room that looked like a boardroom; even had a long, rounded table. At the head of the table were a bunch of drawn-on maps, and standing in front of the table were two Mobians. He recognized one as Sally. The other one he didn't know. A black and white Mobian. Sorun couldn't rightly guess the species from appearance alone, but the long, bushy had him think of a skunk. So he decided to just go with that.

The unnamed Mobian and Sally exchanged some final words, and then he left her side to make it to the exit. Sorun assumed that he'd come in just as they'd finished up, and they really only crossed paths after they walked past each other going opposite directions. Eyes had met, with Sorun taking some note of the skunk Mobian's blue, sunken eyes. He decided to initiate a greeting.

"Hey."

"Hey."

And that had been it. The Mobian left, softly closing the door behind him, while Sorun made his way to Sally's side. He'd found himself looking back towards the door the black and white Mobian had exited from, and then looked towards Sally.

"That guy seemed a little intense," he'd commented.

The chipmunk had cast a sad look towards the now-closed door. "That was Geoffrey. He's a member of the Secret Service." Her blue eyes drifted over to Sorun. "Hershey was his wife," she informed him in a quiet voice.

"Oh." One of the Mobian casualties from when the gray Chaos Emerald was taken from Castle Acorn in Knothole. Went to explain that look he saw in the Mobian's eyes. "Poor guy," Sorun mumbled out in a bit of a sympathetic tone.

"I know. It's terrible." They spent a few moments in silence, and then Sally softly sighed before speaking again. "I'm glad you could make it. Something big's come up."

"That so?" Leaning to the side with his spectral arm propped on the table, Sorun glanced down at the maps spread out on the table. "Would it have anything to do with all this stuff?" he asked.

She nodded. "Ever since the near-destruction of New Megaopolis, Eggman's security and defenses have been severely lacking. We decided to take advantage of this and have been a lot more proactive in our actions against him. Scouting groups, recon missions, and the like. Intelligence gathering. Geoffrey was part of them," she explained. "We've just gotten word that Eggman's up to something. One of the ships in his Egg Fleet survived Enerjak, and as far as we can tell he's piling up a majority of his surviving mechanical forces on the ship."

"What, is he planning a full-out assault on the city?" Sorun asked. "Not exactly the best plan. Nicole got the defenses back up, and even then it's just one ship. Ship full of robots, maybe, but it ain't exactly numbers we haven't dealt with before."

"I don't know. Maybe he's desperate. Might be a last-ditch attempt at overthrowing us using what little of his forces he has left, might be a play at trying to distract us long enough for him to cook up a new plan. It's almost impossible trying to predict his plays with the way he thinks," Sally muttered out with a shake of her head. "Anyways, we're doing our best to prepare. The council signed off on us all mobilizing, so all that's left to do is prepare. All the Freedom Fighters are present and accounted for, the Chaotix up on Angel Island agreed to lend a hand, even Team Dark is here, so... all in all, we're in pretty good shape."

"The whole band back together again," Sorun quietly stated. Come to think of it that was every single person present when he first came into this world, back on that day in the Freedom HQ. He couldn't even remember if there was a time they were all in one place together like that after that time. The closest may have been that party, but Shadow hadn't been there. "So why am I here?" Sorun asked Sally. "I assume you're gonna brief everybody on this later?"

The princess nodded. "Yes, I am, but something else came up that might be of interest to you." She leaned forwards a bit and tapped a finger against one of the maps. "This is one of Eggman's off-site storage facilities we keep tabs on. It's a few miles out from New Megaopolis. Recently... we got some interesting readings from there. Readings that match that of a Chaos Emerald." Sorun had stilled just the barest amount, while Sally looked up at him with a grin. "So I was thinking maybe while we all go meet Eggman and his ship head-on to fight off the invading force you could go get that, get your last power, and then just teleport to the ship to link back up with us and join in on the fight." Sally leaned down to the table, resting one arm on it while the other propped its elbow on the table. She rested her head in her hand and gave Sorun a smile. "Pretty good, huh?"

"... So that's how it is, huh?"

It most likely hadn't been what Sally expected Sorun to say based on how the smile dropped off her face in lieu of confusion, nor the way he said it. That blank, almost sad tone. Even stranger was the small smile that adorned his face that completely contrasted with his tone as he leaned on the table right next to Sally, both arms folded under him. A breathy chuckle left him as he dipped his head down.

"When's all this happening?" Sorun quietly asked her.

"Um... tomorrow," she answered.

"Right. Okay." Sorun breathed in deeply, and then slowly exhaled. "Am I going alone?"

"I, um... didn't feel comfortable sending you out alone so soon after the doctor cleared you, no, so I was thinking of sending Shadow along. Just as some backup in case something bad happens. I summoned for him, too, but you got here first." The corners of her mouth lowered a bit when she saw the human continued to have his head bowed down. "Sorun? Is everything okay?"

"Yeah. Yeah, I'm... I'm fine." He exhaled through his nose and lifted his head up so that his singular eye met up with both of Sally's. "You know, I suddenly remember that we shook on a deal day two of me coming here," he suddenly said. "I believe the deal was I would be a Freedom Fighter until we found all the Chaos Emeralds, after which you would make it a top priority to find a way to send me home." He sent her a wry grin. "You kinda broke your promise to me, Sally."

She actually began to look a little distressed when Sorun pointed this out to her. Sally opened her mouth to say something, but the only thing that managed to come out was a sigh as she looked away from him. "Sorun, I... I-I don't..." She began stuttering as she searched for the right words to say to him. "I didn't mean to do something like that," she said as she turned back to him. "I'm sorry, I wouldn't have-"

Sorun had reached a hand out and softly tapped the center of Sally's forehead, making her words die in her throat. "I know. It's okay," he calmly said to her. "I already said I forgive you all, didn't I? I know you never would have made that deal with me if you knew my return home was impossible. It's partly my fault for touching the first Chaos Emerald anyways," he reasoned as he lowered his left hand.

"No, Sorun, don't say that. You couldn't have known," Sally denied, shaking her head.

The reaction elicited a small chuckle from Sorun. "Yeah. Seems like we all did stuff without knowing the consequences. That's life, I guess," he said. "Nobody to blame, so what are you to do?"

"Keep moving forwards, I suppose," Sally answered. "What else is there to do?"

Sorun breathed outward as a small smile grew. "I always admired that about you. The way you just... remain so unshaken no matter what," he said, causing Sally to turn to him in surprise. "So cool. A cool, level head, cool personality, cool everything." Sorun's eye glanced at Sally's torso. "... Maybe not so much a cool fashion sense."

Sally sent him a flat look. "What's wrong with my vest?"

"Nothing, nothing, just... you know, it wouldn't hurt to invest in a shirt or something. Just saying."

"I don't want one."

"Of course you don't," he sighed out. "Back on topic... I don't know, you just seemed to have it all. No powers like me in the beginning, but somehow you got to be up there with the best with all that talent of yours. I would say I was a bit jealous, but if I'm being honest with you I was a bit jealous of everybody back then because of how strong you all were," he admitted, making Sally's expression soften. "But you had kindness above all that. There I was, some random useless guy fresh in this new world, and you go out of your way to try and get him settled. Even when it seemed like he didn't really like anybody around him, which... admittedly at the time I didn't... you still tried to make friends with him just because you were worried over him. And in all that time, over all those missions, you never lost your cool, and it actually helped to keep my own head on straight. And... you really are nice to be around." He turned his head towards her, a smile on his face. "I just wanted to say thank you for being my friend, Sally. You're really great."

"Sorun..." Sally grew bashful as a small, happy smile graced her lips. Happy. But still bashful. "That's very sweet of you to say, but what brought all this up?"

He shrugged. "Who knows? I just felt like being spontaneously nice."

"Well, thank you for the compliments, Sorun. I'm happy to hear you think so highly of me." The smile on her face lowered a bit as her posture deflated slightly. "I just wish we could do more for you. I know you've moved past it all for the most part, but I still feel bad. Part of me still blames myself and the Freedom Fighters for you winding up in this war alongside us. Getting hurt so badly just because you chose to stick with us."

"..." Sorun leaned towards her and clapped his hand on her shoulder, making her jump slightly in surprise. "Try to let go of those feelings by tomorrow, huh? For me?" he asked her, still maintaining a small smile. "No matter what happens, I don't blame any of you, alright?"

Eventually, Sally managed a smile that mirrored Sorun's. "Alright. I'll do my best. Now why don't we wait for Shadow so we can plan this properly?"

"Can do, Sally."

Shadow had arrived at some point after that. Wasn't much to say; it was all business and straight talk at that point as they tried to figure out the best way of going at this, which simply boiled down to the Freedom Fighters and Chaotix flying up to Eggman's ship while it was en route to New Mobotropolis to fight there. Meanwhile Sorun and Shadow would go to the storage facility, where Sorun would absorb the final Chaos Emerald and then use Yamato to transport both him and Shadow to the ship to join the rest in the fight. Simple and efficient.

So that was that, then. He was gonna die tomorrow.

The only solace he took was in the fact there was a high likelihood Eggman would be on that ship. No, it was almost a positive certainty he'd be there. If there's one thing Sorun learned about him, it's that he liked to have a personal presence for these big showdowns. It was all but guaranteed he'd be there. All Sorun had to do, with all his powers and lack of pain, was push his way to Eggman and end him before his body finally gave out and he died. At least, that was the plan.

"Can't believe this is it. Last day today, then tomorrow... tomorrow that's it." He leaned back on the park bench he sat on as he gazed back into the sky. "I could do what Merlin said, separate that curse from me, but... I don't know. It's already way too late. I'm dying as-is. Nothing anybody can do to change that. Might as well go all in tomorrow to try and finish this for good."

He would have expected to feel nerve-wracked. To feel nail-biting panic, to be freaking out to the point he was a broken down, nervous wreck, but... oddly, he didn't feel any of that. He didn't know what he felt, what he was supposed to feel at this moment. Acceptance? No, there was none of that. He didn't want to die, or leave these people. He didn't want any of that. He only did it because he had to do it, but just because he endeavored to do it didn't mean he was at peace with it.

Just as he told Merlin. He didn't accept it. He just learned to live with it. But even that was beginning to crack apart.

"What's even gonna happen to me when I die? Does it all just go black, just like that? Like going to sleep forever? Endless void for all eternity while I'm in a state I can't even think because I'm nothing? Do I go somewhere? Do I even have a soul that can go somewhere?" These were the questions that kept haunting him the longer he thought about this. Questions he'd once long ago didn't worry about and figured he'd deal with if he was ever near-death or was getting to that age. But here he was, planning on dying tomorrow, and he couldn't help but wonder what it was going to be like.

Gloomy. Forlorn. Frightened. He didn't know if these words applied. He felt these emotions, but at the same time didn't. Like hollow feelings running through him. The only solid emotion he felt was a desire to just continue to sit on this bench all day, and then tomorrow, and then the day after. Or to do something and just stall. Anything to make tomorrow not come.

The irony of somebody like him who could briefly stop time not being able to stop tomorrow from happening elicited an almost muted chuckle bereft of all joy from Sorun.

Slowly, groggily, like he'd just woken up from a deep sleep, he stood up off the bench. "I guess I'll just walk around. See where my feet take me," Sorun decided. "Don't know if it'll help ease all this existential dread I'm feeling, but... eh. I'd teleport up to Angel Island to see the Chaotix, but I don't wanna make things weird showing up out of nowhere acting all strange, so... I'll just see what happens."

Blindly wandering through the streets of New Mobotropolis, Sorun didn't know what to expect. A chance encounter with somebody, maybe, or just him biding his time as he waited for the inevitable. He hadn't made up his mind on what he was supposed to do with what little time he had left, and just thinking about that alone had his stomach turn over.

And then life threw a yellow thing clothed in black and red at him.

It happened out of nowhere. He was walking along the streets, probably looking like the most pathetic thing on the planet, when a Mobian he'd come to know and fear just popped up out of nowhere and put him in a bone-crushing hug. At least he assumed it was a hug that tight. The pressure felt high and he couldn't breath.

"Oh, you beautiful, beautiful man, you!" Honey released her hold on Sorun and stepped back. The relieved, warm look that had been on her face was wiped off in microseconds, after which she'd placed her hands on her hips and was angrily squinting at him with her golden eyes. "I spend all this time worrying about you being hurt and I don't even get so much as a hello at the new boutique when you get out of the hospital? What's the big idea, hm?"

Sorun gave her a flat look. "Yeah. I could really tell how worried you were from all the visits. All zero of 'em."

"I wrote you a card. You should be thankful," Honey asserted, turning her head away from Sorun while raising a palm up to his face. "Oh, it's been absolutely dreadful, Sorun. My entire stock got blown to smithereens in Knothole! Nicole was nice enough to make me a new shop, but I had to outsource brand new materials from the marketplace and then I had to remake my entire stock from scratch! I'm practically ready to fall apart here..."

"..." Sorun looked to his lost arm, and then looked back at Honey. "Ah-huh."

"Oh, but I guess it hasn't been that bad. Believe it or not my business has been doing better than ever, having to basically restart aside. I've been getting a ton of requests left and right to the point I'm always busy." She turned back to Sorun with a bright smile on her face. "I even had to set up a PO box since I've been getting requests from outside the city! I, uh... eh-heh, had to mail everybody the new mailing address since, y'know, Knothole, but otherwise it's been great! Can you believe I've even been getting some requests from Station Square!? The people there really seem to like my products!" She'd clasped her hands together and stared up at the sky, with stars practically in her eyes. "It's... all I've ever wanted aside from world-renown fame..."

Sorun found himself being a bit surprised at the exuberant cat. He didn't think he'd ever seen her this happy, but he supposed, at some level, it made sense. Honey was somebody lucky enough to know what they were truly passionate about and made a business out of it. And now her business was blooming at a level she had to work to keep up with... no doubt with his help, he'd thought to himself. He went to great pains going out of his way to advertise for her.

Well, it seemed to pay off. She was happy and in a good place, and Sorun... well, he felt he could at least take some solace in the fact he did a little good for somebody he liked. To some extent. The craziness under that seemingly-harmless exterior made him question himself on this assertion. But she was good people, and he was happy for her.

"Well, good for you," Sorun said to her with a nod. "I gotta go-"

"Nuh-uh-uh!" A low-energy, annoyed groan left Sorun when he felt Honey grab his left wrist. She'd whirled him around so that they were directly facing each other, and that wide smile just refused to drop off her face. "I got it through some pret-ty reliable sources that you had a large part in all this success I'm seeing."

"What exactly kind of sources does a clothes maker have?" Sorun questioned her with a raised eyebrow.

"It's fashionista, get it wrong again and I'll slap you," she threatened in a serious tone. "Also one of my customers that wrote to me said they heard you promote my brand on TV over there."

Sorun blinked, and then looked upwards. "Oh, yeah, I guess I did do that. Wow, I didn't think it'd actually take off." He looked back down at Honey. "Er... you're welcome?"

"Oh, you..." Her face, which had dropped to a blank expression, made a small smile as she looked down at the wrist she held. "You know, Sorun, back in the village where I used to live before coming to Knothole I... I don't know. I always had big dreams, but even with all my skills and my ideas I just never seemed to take off living in such a small place. Knothole was a big change, but it offered so many opportunities that I thought I could finally make something of myself. And then you came along and, well, I'll admit I made that deal of ours more out a whim than anything else, but... but you really did more for me than I could have ever asked for."

Growing a bit uncomfortable from the contact, Sorun made a small scoff and turned his head away. "I just spread the word about your clothes around a bit. That's all," he said. "Even a braindead idiot like me couldn't have screwed it up."

"Yeah, I know," she said, making a tic mark appear on Sorun's forehead, "but you still went way above and beyond to advertise me during all your travels as a Freedom Fighter, and now... heh, it just seems so unreal. I feel like my life is finally going somewhere, and it's all thanks to you."

When she picked her head up so that they were eye-level with each other, Sorun saw the smile on her face. Probably the first genuine smile Sorun had ever seen Honey wear. There wasn't an ounce of the teasing or manic nature he usually associated with her whenever Sorun was with Honey. All he saw right now was a single, pure smile full of gratitude that was directed right at Sorun. He was stunned into silence from the sight.

"So yeah. Thank you. Really," Honey said. "And for, you know, saving the whole city from Eggman and the death robot and everything."

"Y-yeah, sure." His spectral arm unconsciously rose up and began scratching the back of his head. "I'm sorry the coat got ruined during the fi-"

"You should be sorry !" And there it was. The craziness. The absolute mania that overtook Honey's angered face as she tore her hands from his wrist and began pinching a struggling Sorun's cheek. "I slave away to make you that coat only for you to get it ruined in front of the whole city! How do you think it reflects on my brand when they see the sleeve get torn off so easy or how well the blood stains the fabric!?"

His spectral arm snapped forwards and slowly began to pry the yellow cat's hand away from Sorun's face. "Forgive me," he ground out in a sarcastic voice, "I should have known the coat wasn't stress-tested to withstand being hit by a wrecking ball ...!"

"Hmph!" Honey pulled her hand away, causing Sorun to stumble a bit from the sudden motion. She'd turned halfway away from him after, arms crossed with her nose turned upwards. "I suppose I can be magnanimous enough to forgive such a transgression," she said, turning a bit towards him as a grin spread on her face. "I seem to remember a certain human I know that admitted to how much he really appreciates my work in the face of death."

"Tch." He pocketed his hands and glanced away. "Musta been all the blood loss. I was delusional. I don't even remember saying that."

Honey tittered a bit at that, tail playfully swaying behind her as she rolled her eyes. "How silly of me, of course you weren't in a well state of mind. You would have been singing my brand praises otherwise. I know you value it that much." Before Sorun could retort, she held something out to him. "So here. In return for all the gratitude you made me feel. And saving my life. And everybody else's, too. Really you're just a great guy and I wanted to give you this."

Sorun found himself startled by the sudden appearance of a white box being held out to him. Half because he didn't know where Honey had even been hiding the box, and half because he hadn't been expecting a gift. He looked back up at Honey, who was just smiling at him expectantly as she shook the box a bit at him. Hesitantly, he accepted the gift from the cat and proceeded to open it up and look inside.

"... A new coat?" A white one, too, from what he observed. Virtually identical to the blue long coat Honey had gifted him prior before he'd ruined it in the fight against Eggman. He looked up while giving Honey a questioning look. "Why white?"

"Well, I needed something to contrast with the blue arm thing you have. Blue coat would blend too well," she said with a dismissive wave. "Honestly, I'm gonna have to rethink your whole color scheme now that you have that thing. Do you know how stressful you make my life?"

"Yeah, poor you." He gave her back the empty box after taking the coat out, and then slipped it over his black shirt. It was, of course, a perfect and comfortable fit. As good as slipping on a second skin. "It's okay, I guess," he said to her in a bland voice.

She playfully huffed at him. "Just try not to mess this one up, huh?" she asked him.

Sorun glanced down at the white sleeve covering his right arm. Long enough that only his spectral hand was revealed. "I got something important coming up. So no promises." He looked back up at her. "White doesn't play nice with oil stains, either, so don't expect anything."

In response, Honey lightly hit him on the chest. "You're awful." She turned around fully, looking back to give him one last smile and a wave. "I gotta get back to the shop to fill some of these orders. Stay safe, Sorun."

"Yeah..." Sorun watched the golden cat walk off down the street. He absentmindedly ran his left hand along the right sleeve of his new coat as he watched her disappear around a corner. "You too, Honey..."

He entertained the idea of going around to everybody, individually. Saying his approximation of goodbye to them all, maybe even go pay Virgil a visit. Something to make him feel better as he got closer to the end and to give them all some sort of closure on things. He'd gotten the idea around when he was with Sally, when she'd all but given him a date on his death and he had spontaneously blurted all that stuff out to her. Figured maybe it was the least he could do.

But then Honey happened and all it had done was make him feel worse, not better. So he decided against it. Couldn't take the heartache, too much pressure. That left him sitting up on the ceiling like a creep.

The ceiling in question was in the new air base Nicole constructed inside of New Mobotropolis. Tails finally got that paved runway he wanted for the plane. And a new Freedom Fighter Special made from nanites since the old one got destroyed along with the rest of Knothole. And here it was, stored in an air hangar with everybody running around in preparation for the mission tomorrow. Rotor was sitting in a nearby chair, crutches leaned up against a computer as he read off some string of diagnostics. Tails and Antoine were off to the side discussing something, while Bunnie was hefting up some large, mechanical part with her mechanical arm while she idly chatted with Amy. People who he'd gone on to consider actual friends. Funny to think about seeing as how much he disliked them when he first got here. Tails especially.

Were Sorun made of sterner stuff he might have been able to endeavor to say something to them all before tomorrow happened instead of him watching them as he sat on a support strut on the ceiling, but he wasn't, so he couldn't. Maybe it was for the best anyways. Made things less weird. And besides, he wouldn't even know what to say. So he was content with just sitting up here and watching them work.

He probably stayed up there for a whole hour before he teleported away.

It was with a reserved sigh that Sorun sat down at the stool. The aged, blue hedgehog behind the counter looked a bit surprised to see him sit there, as he'd been in the middle of cleaning a glass. Sorun offered him a slight nod as he slumped forwards on the counter.

"Heya, Chuck," Sorun quietly greeted. "How's the new diner holding up for you?"

Fuck it, why not get a last meal? He doubted he'd be able to stomach breakfast tomorrow, and the sun was getting low to the horizon. And he was not eating hospital food as a last meal. Unfortunately, he also didn't know of any decent food places, and he had no money to buy his own, or even supplies or the know-how to prepare anything, so... he was here. In Chuck's Diner. The new one that came with the new city.

"It's been doin' me fine, Sorun," Chuck answered in a light tone as he set the glass down. "What's gotcha so glum, chum?"

"Eh, you know... big mission thing tomorrow. Haven't really been out and about in a while. A bit nervous," he lied. "Wanted some food to take my mind off it all, so... here I am."

"Ah, I getcha," the aged hedgehog said with a nod. "So, what'll ya have?"

It was only at that moment did the fact that Sorun had no money caught up with him. It'd caused his eye to widen slightly, and mentally he'd cursed himself out for having forgotten something so important. "You know on second thought," he decided as he made to leave, "I'm thinking maybe-"

"Nah, nonsense. It's on the house," Chuck offered, causing Sorun to freeze. "Least I can do to help. I know things must not be so easy for you at the moment."

"You've no idea," Sorun sighed out as he sat back down. A feeling of gratitude flooded him as he looked up at the mustached hedgehog. "Thanks. I really need it."

"It's no problem, Sorun, no problem at all," he assured with a hand wave. "What'll ya have?"

"Did you ever start making french fries?" Sorun asked him with a hopeful tone. He hadn't had any good fries since coming to Mobius. They'd been his favorite. He wanted that much at least.

Alas, and much to Sorun's dismay, Chuck shook his head. "'Fraid not, Sorun, sorry. It's not really that popular a request, so, uh... yeah. I could get you a chili dog?"

"I'm not having the last thing I eat be one of those abominable things," Sorun harshly thought. "Just get me a regular hot dog with ketchup," he softly requested. "I don't like that chili stuff."

Chuck had the gall to look almost offended by the claim, but Sorun didn't care. Ketchup was the superior condiment in his opinion: more consistent texture and it didn't override his taste with all the flavors mixed into chili. He absolutely refused to eat chili on anything as a final meal. He'd rather not have his final meal be a fucking hot dog, either, but his options were limited.

A loud, zipping sound followed by a gust of wind ruffling his hair drew Sorun's attention to his left, albeit in a slow and languid manner. He wasn't all that surprise to see Sonic there sitting on the stool next to him, that trademark smirk on his face, green eyes of a nebulous quantity fixed on Chuck.

"Yo, unc," he greeted with a small nod. "Get me the usual?"

Chuck nodded. "You got it, sonny! Comin' right up!"

He left to go prepare the food. Sorun had felt eyes on him the second he'd went away, but he merely sighed as he stared down into the counter. So Sonic had been the one to start the conversation.

"So, Sorun," he greeted in that same, carefree tone, "what brings ya here?"

"I'm sick of jello."

"... Huh?"

"All day. Every day. Since I've been in that hospital. Jello." Wasn't even the good shit he had back on Earth. Jell-O. It was some off-brand Mobian knock-off. And unlike Chao Cola it didn't really compare to the original Sorun was accustomed to. "If I have to eat one more cup of that stuff I don't know what I'll do, Sonic."

"Alright, alright, heh heh, chill," Sonic soothed with a half-amused voice. "Guess I can't blame ya if you've been livin' off that junk this whole time. Blech." He snapped his fingers and pointed at Sorun. "Oh, hey, you got a new coat. Honey?"

"Mh." He forced himself to turn towards Sonic. "What brings you here?"

Sonic nodded his head behind him. Sorun followed the nod, and saw two older blue hedgehog sitting at a table nearby in the diner. One organic, one made of metal. "Me and the 'rents wanted to go out to eat," Sonic said as his mother waved to Sorun, who gave a half-wave of his own. "Wanna come say hi?"

"... I'm good," Sorun replied as he faced back forwards on the counter.

The reaction had caused Sonic to pause. He tilted his head a bit to the side, and then leaned on the counter so he was somewhat closer to Sorun.

"Hey, you okay?" he asked, the barest hint of concern lacing his voice. "You look a bit out of it."

"It's the thing tomorrow."

"Oh, yeah, that." Sonic nodded and straightened up in his stool. "Ehhh, don't sweat it, Sorun. All of us against one measly ship fulla Badniks? It ain't even a question of if we'll win it or not. Eggman'll go crying back to whatever's left of New Megaopolis with his tail tucked between his legs, an' the rest of us'll come back home to get ready for the next time fathead pulls a fast one," he claimed. "You're worrying over nothing."

"Hn." If only. "I wanted to apologize." While he still had the chance to, at least.

"Huh?" Sonic blinked. "What about?"

Sorun sighed in response, straightening out in his stool so he could look Sonic in the eye. "I was unnecessarily hard on you for a majority of the time I've been here," he began. "It was for various reasons. Frightened of my situation, anger over the circumstances, confusion, hopelessness over it all, I... never really felt that good," he said, causing Sonic to go still. "I kept pushing you away when all you wanted to do was be a friend. I don't know, maybe you saw how bad I was hurting and just wanted to be there for me to make it easier. Practically everybody did. I kept denying it over and over again for stupid personal reasons." He turned his head forwards so he didn't have to look at Sonic. "I'm glad I gave up eventually and just decided to accept it. It's been... easier, since then. If I had any regrets, it's that I didn't do it sooner." His fingers tapped on the counter. "So... yeah. Sorry about that." He shook his head. "I'm no good at this-"

"Nah, no, Sorun, it's okay. I get it." When he glanced back at Sonic, he saw the hedgehog giving him a small smile. "I'll be the biggest of bigger men-"

"Not a thing."

"- Totally is, shut your mouth - and say that I never really got what was going on in your head, still don't, really, but... yeah, you had me a bit frustrated there at times," Sonic admitted with a small laugh. "I mean, I guess I get it. You had stuff you needed to work out on your own, it's understandable. I just wanted to help since you always seemed... not good, you know? Like, all the time." He began to lightly kick his feet absentmindedly. "I was really glad when you started hanging out with Nicole since it was somebody you could air all this stuff out to instead of keeping it bottled up inside, and I saw it was working. It was, like, real tiny changes over time, but you started to become easier and easier to hang around with. You started doing stuff with other people, getting friendlier, the whole wedding thing threw me for a loop-"

"Can we not talk about that?" Sorun interrupted with a small groan.

Sonic made a sheepish laugh. "Heh, yeah, sorry. The point is I'm just glad you're finally, you know, cool with all of us now. So everything before? Water under the bridge, don't even worry about it. You're one of us. Nothin's ever gonna change that."

"... Thanks, Sonic."

"Don't sweat it, man, it's nothing," the hedgehog assured him. "Can I ask exactly what had you hung up for so long that it took you months to get over it?"

Sorun made a small hum. "I'll tell you tomorrow after the mission. How about that?"

"Sounds good to me." Sonic's black nose twitched, causing his head to snap forwards just in time as Chuck put a paper plate in front of each teen.

"Din's up, gents."

"Alright!" Sonic immediately dove for his, grabbing it at a blurred speed and opening his mouth like he intended to eat it in one gulp. He very well may have, too, if he hadn't seen the hot dog in Sorun's hand. The hot dog covered in ketchup. "Sorun. What's that?" Sonic demanded.

The human teen took a bite of the hot dog. It tasted bland. "A hot dog," he said.

"A hot dog? Not a chili dog?" He looked positively disgusted by the sight of it. "You would dare taint the food of the gods with an inferior condiment?"

Sorun rolled his eye as he took another bite. "My deepest apologies for not having your refined flavor pallet, Sonic," he said in a sarcastic voice. "You know, this kind of reminds me of back home," he suddenly said, getting Sonic to calm down. "Me and some friends at a diner after school. Kind of a trash place to be honest with you, but it was close and the food was decent. We always ordered the same things, every time. I'd always just get fries and a soda, David, I don't know why, he just loved this kind of hamburger they sold there, the kind of burger that didn't look like meat and that you instinctively knew you probably shouldn't put in your body, but Dave craved the things, never knew why." He took another bite of the hot dog, now three-fourths of the way through it. "This just reminds me of that. Of those times. Just nice to think of, is all."

"Yeah, I can see that." Sonic had already inhaled his own chili dog. "Must have been nice."

"It was," Sorun agreed. "There was this one waiter that worked there that was really nice. Cool guy, always knew when we were coming and had our orders all memorized and everything so we never had to wait and the food was hot. I think he was an illegal immigrant."

"What makes you say that?"

"'Cause when we came to the diner one day it was closed and there were ICE vans out in front. Never did see that guy again after that." Shame, too. The waiters they got after that guy never really hit the same notes as him.

"ICE vans? You mean like ice cream?"

Sorun laughed. "If only." He finished off his hot dog.

"Well, maybe we can make it a regular thing," Sonic offered, making Sorun turn to him in surprise. "Yeah, after the big mission tomorrow we'll all come here to celebrate. We could even make it a regular thing after missions. It'd be really nice, huh?"

It did actually sound nice to Sorun. Shame it couldn't be made a reality, but... it did sound nice. If not to relive his old memories, then to make new ones with new friends. Maybe then he wouldn't have been stuck as the nostalgic mess he was now, moping about the approaching end.

But that's all it was. A nice thought.

"Maybe. We'll see," Sorun offered, and to his amusement the blue Mobian next to him made a small fist-pump in victory.

"Yeah, alright," he happily hissed out in victory. "It'll be great, Sorun. You'll see."

"I've no doubt, Sonic." He spun around in his stool to directly face the hedgehog. He took a whole ten seconds to look at his face, near the end of which Sonic had grown a bit uncomfortable at the silent staring, causing Sorun to silently chuckle. "It's been an experience, Sonic." He hopped off the stool. "There's somewhere I want to be right now. I'll see you later. Tell your parents I said hi."

"Mm, alright. Bye."

Sorun didn't look back as he left the restaurant.

"Well... that's it, then."

These were Sorun's thoughts as he leaned his arms against the railings lining the hospital's rooftop. He stared out towards the setting sun, the horizon a clashing of yellows and oranges and reds while the sky above grew dark. He made a low sigh at the sight.

He hadn't expected his last day to be so... he didn't know, mundane? Then again technically tomorrow was his last day, but he considered this one to be his last free day, so to speak. His last day to enjoy himself.

Well, he didn't enjoy any of it. Never even got close to the precipice of accepting it all. If anything, he only went further away from it.

"I don't know what I expected," Sorun thought as he stared out into the sunset. "Some kind of, I don't know, happy ending to this. Something I could walk away with, anything, but I didn't get that." He shook his head. "Assuming I don't fuck it up tomorrow, at least everybody else gets a happy ending. That's what's most important, I guess. Woulda been nice if I got a happy ending, too, but whatever."

He couldn't help but wonder if he was even going to get any sleep tonight.

"May I ask why you are on the roof, Sorun?"

Sorun had to grimace to avoid sighing out loud when he heard that voice. She was the one person he wanted to see the most and avoid the most at the exact same time right now. And without any plan on what to do, he rapidly tapped on the railing with his hands a couple of times before he turned around.

Yep. There she was, looking the same as always. Same purple toga dress. Same brown and black fur. The same small and polite smile that shined brighter than any other smile Sorun had ever seen. Same green eyes he couldn't help but get lost in every time he looked at her. Every part of her had that effect on Sorun.

Hard to believe this was the last time he'd ever see Nicole.

"You never stared off into the sunset all dramatic-like before?" Sorun asked her as he leaned back on the roof railing, resting his elbows on top of them. He kept his tone casual and carefree, even if on the inside he felt like crying.

"No, I have not." Nicole had walked to the empty spot on Sorun's right side while giving him a curious look. "Is there a specific purpose this serves?"

"None at all."

"I see..." She leaned her back onto the railing right besides Sorun, though unlike him she'd clasped her hands together right in front of her. "You didn't answer my question," she pointed out.

"Ah, I dunno. I just wanted a quiet place to think," Sorun answered her as he tilted his head up to the sky. "Doc said I'm basically good to go, so after tomorrow it's no more hospital for me."

"You'll have to move the TV and game console out from your room," Nicole reminded him.

"Yeah, I'll put it back in the HQ," he assured her. "Tomorrow. After the mission." Let it never be said he wasn't lazy to the core. If there was one reconciliation he could get from all this, it was one less chore he had to do due to his impending death. It didn't bring any comfort at all, but it was still something.

"Actually," Nicole said, making Sorun tilt his head down towards her, "I've a better place in mind for them. But as you said, that can come later."

He made a small hum, his eye traveling to the side a bit. The long, black hair that Nicole's avatar body had was usually worn loosely and freely. All except for a strand of hair on each side of her head that was fitted through a line of purple and orange beads. He'd risen his spectral hand up just to touch and examine them, with Nicole not reacting at the slightest to the touch.

"You never told me why you put these in your hair," Sorun said as his clawed, blue thumb ran over the beads. "Or why you wear that dress."

"They're simply preferences of mine," she explained. "Why do you ask?"

"I was just wondering." He carefully released the strand of hair and rested his elbow back on the railing. "It's a nice look for you."

There was a breeze that passed between them as the two silently looked ahead. Sorun not being able to think of anything to say, and Nicole... well, he didn't know what she was thinking. Whenever he'd glance at her from the corner of his eye, and act he was forced to turn his head a bit to do, he caught her in a look that suggested she was deep in thought. That and looking the slightest bit flustered. He didn't quite know why, but he suspected it was his earlier comment and had begun to feel somewhat regretful over it.

Sorun figured he might as well try diverting the conversation to a different topic.

"Hard to believe how far everything's come," he remarked as he faced back forwards. "From a little underground base to a city to fighting a bunch of killer robots to all this... it's been a pretty wild ride."

"It has been quite eventful, hasn't it?" Nicole agreed. "I myself had some difficulty believing it all when New Mobotropolis was first established, though these feelings have since subsided."

"Well, I mean, yeah. It's been a big change for you, hasn't it?" Sorun asked as he turned his head to Nicole. "You basically got everything you ever wanted, right? Full sentience and sapience, ability to feel emotions like organic beings, you can finally interact with the real world in a body you can keep up for as long as you want, and you made the city for everybody. You finally got your own life."

Nicole kept her head pointed forwards, with her face lowering down slightly. "You're kind to say as much, but I cannot say I have obtained everything I want."

Sorun readjusted himself to a more comfortable position on the railing. "Oh, yeah? What else is there?"

"Well, an end to the war so we could all live safely and peacefully would be optimal," she began. "Though even without that the opportunity to live life among others in of itself has been wonderful. Beyond wonderful, even." She held up one of her black-furred hands and began rubbing the fingers together. "I have you to thank for much of this."

"Pfft. I didn't do anything," Sorun denied with a shake of his head. "You had other people like Sally looking out for you. And you were the one that made that body and the whole city. Really, a majority of this is thanks you to. You should be thanking yourself."

"This is true. But I cannot take all the credit," Nicole said as she clasped her hands back together. "Yes, I was the one to create this body and city. I could not have made it this far without the help of my friends, though. And, beyond that, life would not be worth living if it was not with others, would it not?" The fingers on her hands began to wring together, almost nervously. "I'm grateful for Sally and the rest having been with me through this process, but I'm most grateful to you, Sorun."

Sorun narrowed his eye a bit in confusion. "What did I do?"

"You were always there for me. You spent so much of your time to collect those Power Rings just so I could manifest my holographic body, all to simply do activities together. We shared common interests and played games together, and I will confess playing those games with you has been the most fun I've ever had. You listened to me whenever I spoke, always was in concern over me whenever there was danger, and opened up more to me than anybody else. You also went to great lengths to worry me at times," she added with a small grin, "but I know your heart was in the right place. I do not think life without friends is one worth living, and I was fortunate enough to have those with the Freedom Fighters, but having a friend such as you has helped me realize just how much life has to offer.

"And so... to that end..." The grin fell away as a nervous look overtook Nicole. Her hands unclasped, with the fingers on her left hand flexing once before the hand itself began to move out to her side. "There is one aspect to life I have yet to experience, you see, but... it is not something I can do on my own." Her hand began to inch closer towards Sorun's blue, spectral right hand. "You are always there to help me experience new things in life, so... I would ask your help in this matter if you would be willing..."

Sorun tilted his head downwards, to his right side. He saw the hand that was approaching his own, his eye having widened at the sight. He mentally sighed out, with him just silently watching as the hand came closer and closer.

And then, right before they made contact, he snapped both his hands up and clasped them behind his head as his eye closed.

"You know what I want?" Sorun suddenly asked. "A statue."

Nicole had recoiled her hand back to her front in surprise at the sudden movement. She'd fully turned her head to Sorun afterwards, looking confused at Sorun's words. "A... statue...?" she echoed.

"Yeah, a statue. Not, like, a big one or anything, but I figured, y'know, maybe I could get one after everything I've done," Sorun said, eye opening up at the sky. "I mean you don't have to or anything," he continued as he looked back down to be eye-level with Nicole, "it's totally optional, I just always kind of wanted one of me."

He saw that she continued to look at him with that same, confused look, one that refused to dwindle no matter how much Sorun waited. Finally, he sighed and dropped his hands back down to his sides.

"I'm sorry, I just- it's the mission," Sorun apologized as he pushed off the railings. "It's got my mind all over the place," he continued as he turned to Nicole, "so I'm not really thinking straight. Can't really focus on anything else right now. I just got out of the hospital, you know, so it's my first official mission since the whole Knothole thing, I'm kinda nervous, it's-it's messing me up a bit," he said, making a nervous chuckle as he rubbed at the back of neck.

Nicole's ears perked up. "Oh! I see the issue." She actually seemed relieved for whatever reason as she herself pushed off the roof railing. She was even smiling a bit. "You're not in the right state of mind due to tomorrow's events, I understand." She clasped her hands behind her back as she began walking forwards, having moved past Sorun. "Perhaps I was wrong to have tried and asked this of you with your thoughts already occupied with tomorrow. My apologies, Sorun. It can wait until after you've all finished the mission."

"U-uh, are you sure?" Sorun asked, remaining rooted to the spot as he watched Nicole walk away. "You can- you can still ask me, it's not like I can't take some time to-"

"No, it's alright," Nicole assured him, turning her head back to him briefly to give him a smile. "You have enough to worry about without my request distracting you further. I'll simply ask tomorrow when you're all finished and there is no imminent danger."

Sorun's breath caught in his throat. There would be no time after tomorrow. "Nicole, I really think you should ask me right now."

"It isn't that time-sensitive, Sorun. It can wait a day."

He sighed out loud, mentally cursing at himself. "Hey, Nicole?"

The way he'd called out her name was in a softer tone than he usually spoke in. It was enough to get Nicole to stop and turn back around towards him, where she saw Sorun awkwardly rubbing at the side of his head as he looked towards her.

"Do, um... do you think we could have one more game?" When she gave him a questioning look instead of an answer, he spoke again. "Before the mission tomorrow," he clarified. "It helps calm me down. I just wanted one last game with you before tomorrow so I'm a bit more focused."

That wasn't the whole truth, but otherwise, he wasn't lying. Playing games with her had been his favorite pastime while stuck on this world. The only thing he looked forwards to every day and something he got lost in enjoying. And it was only ever with her. Always. It was always her.

He just wanted a bit more time with her. One more game. Just one before the end.

And then she had to go and shatter his heart when she shook her head. "I'm afraid I've other matters concerning the city I need to attend to," Nicole informed him. She offered him a small smile. "However, I'll be sure to clear up as much time as possible tomorrow so we can play after the mission. We'll have all the time we need to talk then."

"Yeah, that... that works. Sure." Sorun's hand flopped lifelessly back down to his side. He couldn't even manage a fake smile, so all he managed to offer Nicole was a small wave. "Goodbye, Nicole."

"Until next time, Sorun." With one last smile, and a nod, she disappeared on the spot.

The second she'd disappeared Sorun sighed loudly as his back crashed back into the roof railing. He ran his left hand over his face, pulling it up through his dark hair before letting it go limp to his side once again.

"Oof." A sad frown formed on Sorun's face as he looked at the spot Nicole had been standing in before disappearing. "Sorry, Nicole... that's not something I'm going to be able to do." He slowly blinked, and then turned his head to look at the city below. "I wonder what she wanted to ask me? Guess I'll never know now." Another sigh. "I never did get to tell her how much I really liked her. Maybe... no. I can't. It'd be too cruel to her. I just don't have time." He spun his body around so he could lean forwards on the railing. "Who the hell are you kidding, Sorun? It's not like she'd ever take a loser like you anyways."

At this point he probably could have thrown himself off the roof right there with how he was feeling. He wouldn't, of course, not with everything at stake. But there was still something tempting about having the option of throwing himself over right now so he could just end it at this moment so he didn't have to feel all this anymore. The disappointment, the sorrow, the dread. All of it weighing him down.

Maybe it was a good thing he'd die tomorrow. He couldn't handle this anymore.

"Ugh... I just... I just can't anymore. It's too much." He felt his body crumple against the roof railing. No energy in his body, no will to keep standing. All he could manage to do is look up at the sunset, his eye sunken in so far that he looked more tired than humanly possible. "I just really... really can't do this any longer..."

The next day

There had been quite a bit of commotion as tomorrow finally became today. The Freedom Fighters were scrambling around that large ship of theirs, chattering and offering words of encouragement as they prepared to take off. The Chaotix had come down from Angel Island to join them just for the occasion. He himself stood off to the side in the hanger, leaning against the wall with his arms crossed as he waited for his partner in this mission.

"Just where is he?" Shadow thought to himself as his crimson eyes glanced around. "It's not like him to be late like this. He's usually punctual for this sort of thing."

One of the better traits he could say about Sorun was that he liked to show up on time. He didn't care about being perfect in many areas, though one was his small little quirk about not liking to be late for things. It was a little eccentricity about the human that Shadow found himself appreciating in him in the time he'd gotten to know him. Among other things.

He could still hear Rouge's teasing voice in his mind, causing him to internally grimace.

"So, did you check up on him?"

"Yes. He seems to be doing well. Your worry was unfounded."

"Ah, yeah, my worry. Of course," she had said. "I heard from the pilot of the airship you rode to the city that you were pacing around pretty nervously during the whole ride there."

"Hmph. Maybe the pilot should be focusing less on me and more on driving the ship."

"Aww, don't be like that. I think it's kinda cute you're so worried about your new buddy like that."

"He is not a 'buddy'. He's a comrade. And a competent one at that. At least in some areas..."

He still couldn't shake that urge to roll his eyes at the bat whenever she brought Sorun up with him. He'd be first and foremost in admitting he hadn't liked the human when he first showed up in that base the Freedom Fighters had. He'd outright loathed his presence alone for how little he offered. His attitude hadn't made Shadow think any less of how utterly onerous his existence was.

That had been then, though, and the human had gone great lengths over self-improvement. Absorbed those Emeralds and gained those powers of his. Powers the origin of which Sorun had shared solely with Shadow.

It still surprised him, how much blatant trust Sorun had put in him despite the mutual dislike they shared for each other. Trust born out of logical necessity more than anything else, which Shadow could silently respect. And from that trust he'd learned a bit more about the human and found out they had thoughts and opinions that lined up with each other, and he grew to respect Sorun a bit more.

And then he'd gone and started going to Shadow for help in controlling his powers. He knew he'd periodically go to that coyote for help with swordsmanship due to his katana, but he almost exclusively went to Shadow for help with his abilities granted by the Chaos Emeralds. Again, a logical choice Shadow could respect, and it was one more thing to put over Sonic since he was coming to him for help and not the other, blue hedgehog.

Regardless of what Shadow felt for Sorun, there was no denying he was incredibly competent with his powers. Probably the most thing he was competent with was using them. That and those games of his.

He'd never play another video game with him again after that humiliating loss he suffered. A worthless pastime.

But they'd practiced, and Shadow had been impressed by the potency of Sorun's abilities. Enough that he'd taken one of his techniques for himself. And... much to his surprise, he'd grown to enjoy those little sessions of theirs. Particularly when Shadow had been showing him how to teleport- by far Sorun's hardest technique to master. Shadow hadn't been able to hold back the smirk at first when the human had been teleporting himself into trees, over and over, having to rely on Shadow to instruct him and on how to visualize where he wanted to appear, how to construct his own mental triggers to seamlessly perform teleports.

It was nice, being relied on, and having someone look up to Shadow for instruction. He didn't know why. The feeling was just... acceptable to him. They'd fought together some against the mad Doctor's Badniks, and Shadow was pleasantly surprised to find they worked well together. Sorun wasn't overly boisterous like the Faker, didn't crack jokes like him or some of the other Freedom Fighters mid-fight or hesitate. He was focused and endeavored to destroy his opponents as quickly and as efficiently as possible. Partly, Shadow suspected, because Sorun always had some fear of them, no matter how strong he got through his powers. Nonetheless, Shadow liked the way he fought, and liked how efficient they were together.

So, he'd decided to share private things with him. Things he shared with precious little others. Not everything, of course. But enough. To pay back that trust Sorun had given him, and to see what would happen if this trading of trust continued. More and more he'd been surprised by Sorun, the way he thought, his... pragmatism, and the inane way he managed to describe his brand of common sense. Inane, if not a bit amusing.

Sorun wasn't her. Not by a long shot; never would be. More than that, they were complete opposites. Even their looks were different- his blue eyes were a tad darker than hers had been, and much more piercing. But that inane, funny way he spoke in, the reasoning behind those silly words that resonated with Shadow so much, he couldn't help but be reminded of her, even if they were opposites.

From then on Shadow decided that he tolerated Sorun enough that he found him able to stand his presence. He'd wanted him to join G.U.N. after that, to join his team. Mostly because he legitimately thought the Earthling would fit in better with them than the Freedom Fighters, and because he considered him staying with the Mobians here was a waste of his skills and powers. Especially with that cold, pragmatic mind he hid so well behind his inane speech and mannerisms. And he'd figured it wouldn't be the worst thing in the world, having somebody like him on the team. Shadow had been a bit dismayed to find Sorun didn't associate with Overlanders at all, something he'd hoped would actually serve to put Sorun at ease. He didn't associate with anything on the planet though due to his nature.

Much like Shadow himself, now that he thought about it.

Well, no matter what happened, Shadow trusted that Sorun would make the right choice. The fact he was actively plotting behind the backs of his comrades to kill Eggman said enough, something Shadow approved of and another reason he thought he should just leave them to join him and Rouge. Hopefully they'd be able to carry that pact they'd made out today to finally make the planet a safer place and out from under the thumb of the Doctor. It'd be tight timing, messy: they weren't in a position to plan something airtight. He himself wasn't comfortable at all with it. But Sorun was due to get a new power with this last Emerald. Maybe it'd be the edge they needed to pull off a miracle. Failing that, they'd just improvise.

"Hey. Shadow."

The familiar voice caused Shadow to turn to his side. He saw Sorun leaning on the wall next to him, a new, white coat on with his hands tucked into his pockets. He'd glanced up at the eyepatch that was on the human's face, and had to repress the scowl that threatened to form on his face from the sight.

He remember when he'd gotten that call from Rouge, about what had happened in Knothole and what Sorun had done in order to save everybody. He'd been conflicted. On one side, he'd been glad and had somewhat been proud over the fact that Sorun had been able to beat Robotnik at his own game. On the other hand, his mind wouldn't leave the subject of the wounds he'd sustained in the process, and he'd set out to check up on him as soon as possible because of it. As a professional courtesy.

When he'd finally seen the human with his own eyes, he'd wanted to hit him and yell at him for being so careless with himself and getting hurt bad enough he'd lost a limb and an eye. But, at the very least he'd substituted his arm with a Bringer Claw, and he seemed to have adapted to using one eye. In fact, he'd... seemed completely fine, despite the wounds. Speaking in that same, inane way of his. He'd fought a god and actually managed to wound him with his abilities, something Shadow couldn't even do, nor would acknowledge as long as the subject never came up. The worry had vanished in an instant leaving Shadow irritated over the human, and he'd left. Immense relief as well that he was fine. But mostly irritation.

Sorun was fine, so there was no reason to think more on it. Even now he looked fine. A bit tired-looking, perhaps, but that could have been due to any number of factors. But he doubted it affect Sorun in any negative way. He looked calm, and if his greeting said anything his head was in the right place right now. Focused on the task at hand with little room for words.

As it should be. And the same reason working with him was refreshing to Shadow.

"What took you so long?" Shadow questioned, tone annoyed. "You're late."

"Am I?" Sorun quietly mumbled out. "My apologies. Overslept."

"Hmph." Shadow uncrossed his arms and pushed off the wall. "It's no matter. The plan is still a go?"

"Yeah, I got the coordinates for the facility with the Chaos Emerald and the location of the ship. Making portals won't be a problem. We'll go, I'll get the Emerald, then I'll take us to the ship so we can meet up with everyone else."

"And the other plan?"

"... We'll see what happens," Sorun said to him in a low tone. "No matter what he's dying today. We're just gonna have to wait for a good time to go for it."

An unsettled hum left Shadow. "Not ideal. We'll have to make do," he decided. "Are we going?"

Wordlessly, Sorun turned his head around. By now the Freedom Fighters and Chaotix had piled into their ship, and its thrusters were beginning to warm up as it prepared to take off. He looked back at Shadow and nodded.

"No reason to delay. I'll get us going." His katana flashed into his hands, which he proceeded to unsheath. "I know she wasn't part of the plan," he said as he slashed the sword downwards in the air, "but how come Rouge isn't coming with us on this?"

As a horizontal slash was made, making a hair-thin, blue cross in the air, Shadow answered him. "She said one of her sources gave her a 'lead' on something concerning our target location, and went to investigate it. G.U.N. provided an escort for her and a ship for faster transportation."

"Generous," Sorun succinctly replied as the cross folded inwards to make a portal.

"We do work for them. And they have a vested interest in this operation going smoothly," Shadow explained.

"Sure." Sorun sheathed his sword. "Kinda a little late going to investigate something we're about to walk into, isn't it?"

Waving a hand, Shadow began to walk towards the portal. "That was hours ago. If something was truly amiss, we would know about it by now. She wouldn't be that slow. I imagine all went well and she's to meet us on the Doctor's ship." He took his first step into the portal. "Now come on. Time's wasting."

He heard a sigh from Sorun. "Time. Right..."

And with that, they both ventured into the portal.

Hours ago

She'd be spending a lot of time telling Shadow she'd been right about the bad feeling she'd gotten when they met back up.

The base she was in was an old one, one of Eggman's old bases. Decommissioned by the Freedom Fighters some time ago, but the computers here were still operational and had a link to the Egg Network. It was always finicky getting the generator in the place up and running, but it was always worth it seeing as some divine oversight made it so the computers' logins weren't password-protected. A simple switch on to access the network, no fuss, no muss, no encryption to work around. Direct access.

Maybe at one point Rouge should have told her superiors she had access to a source this good, but she wasn't one to give up good sources. And the people that worked at G.U.N. may have been good people, but she didn't a hundred-percent trust somebody at some point to not screw something up, somehow alert Robotnik this computer existed, and then do something to pull the plug on it. It was more like she was ninety-eight percent certain, maybe ninety-nine since they were professionals.

That one percent was a bit too big for comfort, though. Besides, she wouldn't be much of a spy if everybody knew where she got her info from.

On the bright side Robotnik wasn't exactly as shrewd as she was when it came to secrecy. Oh, sure, it wasn't like he broadcasted his entire plans on the network for everybody to see, he wasn't a genius for nothing, but it didn't stop him from leaving clues. Listed objectives and progress updates, lines of communication here and there, bits and pieces of information one could use to construe a convincing-enough solid chunk of intel. It wasn't foolproof. It was more often than not she came up with nothing fishing around the network for information. But, just sometimes, she'd find something that made the effort worth it. Like right now for instance.

Something like the mention of "artificially-generated Chaos energy waves" being thrown around over and over. Numbers being listed for the amount of Badniks being loaded into the ship the Freedom Fighters were set to assault. A set of coordinates that just happened to be the exact same location that Shadow planned on raiding with Sorun because they received a reading of a Chaos Emerald there.

Around the exact same time Eggman was preparing to launch his attack.

Didn't take a genius to see where this was going.

"It just had to be a trap, didn't it?" Rouge sarcastically remarked as she shut the computer down. "Fake Chaos energy readings to try and split the group up during the attack. Trying to lead some people into a trap, huh? Kinda sad nobody saw it coming, really. Ah, well. Looks like I better go make a trip."

One small detour to shut the generator down later, and the bat Mobian was outside the base. Right in front of her was a shuttle. A small thing, only fit four people, pilots included. But it was fast, which was what she needed right now. Cool on the exterior she may have been, but a small bit of her was concerned about the trap her partner was about to fall into. The more rational side of her managed to remind herself that it wasn't for hours yet, and this shuttle was fast enough to make two trips all the way to New Mobotropolis. Everything was fine. She'd make it with time to spare to warn everyone.

"Alright, pack it in, boys," she called out to the three Overlander soldiers standing guard outside the ship. "We're all done here."

"Ma'am." The three soldiers briefly saluted her and turned around to the small, gray-colored shuttle. She wasn't too far behind them, being the last to fit into the small compartment in the shuttle. The door leading to the interior closed, and the four thrusters on the corners of the small ship fired to life.

He felt a shudder underneath his feet as the G.U.N. ship began to lift up off the ground. Soon after the ship itself rose high up into the air, while the thrusters readjusted positions to push the ship forwards. The man standing on top of the shuttle paid none of this any mind as he fiddled with his hands.

"Poking your nose where it shouldn't belong, Rouge? Well that's just unfortunate for you, ain't it?" Had the roar of the shuttle's thrusters not been drowning it out, there would have been an audible snap! as Rubrum finished covering his hands with tight, black gloves. "Can't have you just go and ruin the show, now, can I?"

Chapter 51

Recursion Error

Episode 51- Rubrum

G.U.N. soldiers were trained to be professionals. To have their minds honed to a razor's edge so they could fit themselves into the mindset of being the ideal soldier. Personnel whose minds were utmost focused on duty before all else, and, while on-duty, had a mindset to reflect this.

"Man, what are you talking about? It's blue."

Most of them at any rate.

"You're tellin' me turquoise is blue?" The pilot in the left seat of the shuttle turned his head to his co-pilot sitting on the right side of the cockpit. "You're trippin', man. Trippin'. It's green."

Sighing at the clouds rushing past the shuttle's windshield in front of him, the right pilot turned his head to meet the eyes of the left. "And you're colorblind. Turquoise is blue, not green, you're an idiot, case closed."

"Nah-nah-nah-nah, no, no way, it's green. I'm tellin' ya it's green," Left said. "Dude- I- you- I've seen it with my own eyes! It's green!"

"You know if you would have made an argument for it being somewhere in the middle I would have agreed with you, but since you're dead-set on dying on a hill just to be wrong, I'm gonna stand my ground." Right blew past his lips and turned his chair back forwards to the controls. "Just look at the name. Turquoise. It fits right in with blue, like cyan and azure. It's a blue word."

"You're bringing names into this now!?" Left exclaimed. "Man, you can't- I took an art class, you can't pull this nonsense on me. I know what colors are. I got a certificate that says I do on my file."

"How many things can you describe that are turquoise?" Right asked. "No, seriously, how many things? I bet the only time you ever even saw the word turquoise was when you were looking at color pallets while figuring out what to color your 'projects' in your art class."

Sighing, Left rubbed at the bridge of his nose. "Hey, uh, don't-don't Rouge got turquoise eyes?"

"Oh, don't even try asking, man," Right said with a shake of his head. "She's got rank on us. I don't wanna get written up because we were more focused on arguing about colors than flying the ship."

"Come on, dude, it's not like it's storming or anything. Sky's as clear as it could be. Besides, she's a girl, right? Girls are into this kinda thing I think. It'll take like five seconds-"

"Yeah, she's a girl that can kick you into next week with both her eyes closed and three limbs tied behind her back. Trust me man, you don't wanna bug her with this."

"I mean I was kind of getting a real chill vibe from her, but whatevs, dude."

"Good." With a huff, Right crossed his arms. "... Her eyes are more an aqua anyways."

"Oh don't even START WITH AQUA-!"

A hand burst through the shuttle's windshield and grabbed Left by the face. He didn't have the time to scream out in surprise before the fingers gripping his head squeezed down and crushed his cranium into a pulpy mess.

Right, who was on the other side of the cockpit, did scream at the sight of his co-pilot having his head mashed into mush only for him to then fall lifelessly out of his chair. He then looked towards the window, which was where he saw him. A man completely covered in red clothes crouching outside on the windshield of the shuttle, with his left hand holding onto an outside part of the shuttle while his right hand, covered in a now-bloodied black glove, was sticking in through the hole in the windshield he'd made.

The remaining pilot, so stunned by the gratuitous act of violence, could do nothing but watch in shock as the hand sticking through the windshield lowered itself to the control console. The hand wrapped its fingers around the control stick to the shuttle, and then pulled it up hard enough that the stick was halfway towards being pulled out of the console completely, to the point that it was sparking electricity and some wires were exposed at the bottom of the stick.

Following this, the ship lurched. Its front had turned completely down as the shuttle began to nosedive straight towards the ground. The remaining pilot had finally managed to shake himself from his stupor and moved to act. He'd known that the windshield to the shuttle was reinforced and resistant to damage, despite the fact the stranger in red had seemingly managed to punch through it, and he didn't have confidence in his ability to accurately aim at a target as small and nimble as an arm. So he'd unsheathed his combat knife and ran right towards the arm while stabbing down towards it.

His efforts proved to be for naught, as right before the knife stabbed down into it the red-sleeved arm snapped upwards and snatched the pilot's wrist. It effortlessly twisted the wrist completely around, creating a sickening snap! sound and causing the pilot to scream out in pain. The knife was dropped as a result, though it was quickly caught by Rubrum's hand only for it to then throw the knife at the soldier's head. The blade had sunk right into his forehead, causing his eyes to roll to the back of his head and his body to fall lifelessly to the ground.

"Aaaaand we're goin' down..." Rubrum thought to himself. He pulled his arm out from the hole in the windshield, and then looked over his shoulder. He made a small grimace behind the shadow of his hood from the fast-approaching ground. "Yeah, that's gonna hurt."

He looked ahead just in time to see the cabin door leading to the cockpit open. He saw a very shocked-looking white bat in the open doorway, staring at both him and the bodies of the soldiers with wide eyes and a gaping mouth.

Rubrum had just enough time to wave at her before the nosediving shuttle slammed him and itself right into the ground.

Turned out getting slammed right into the ground full-speed by a plummeting shuttle hurt worse than Rubrum thought it would.

It'd happened so quickly it'd been a blur, even to him. There'd been a lot of loud sounds. A burst of pain across his everything. A lot of bouncing and being crushed. All ending with him being under something that'd fallen off the shuttle after it crashed into the ground.

With a groan, he kicked off the heap of metal that had been lying on top of him. He slowly sat upwards, sighing out as the throbbing pain along his body dulled and at the feeling of bones and muscles regenerating and righting themselves into their proper positions. He looked up with a sigh, his neck cracking from the movement, and then began to climb to his feet as he observed his surroundings.

The shuttle had crashed down in an otherwise unpopulated part of a forest while heading towards New Mobotropolis. Conveniently enough, it had crash-landed in a wide, natural and clear path between the trees that went in a straight line. Other than that, there was nothing around. Just trees and the hunk of metal he was staring at.

In of itself, the crash had been devastating. It hadn't exploded, but considering it'd crashed full-speed right into the ground it was all but decommissioned. He saw, with some surprise, another survivor that had been tossed all the way to the direct opposite side of the crash site.

That survivor, the white-furred bat Mobian, had made a small groan as she blearily blinked her eyes open. She slowly sat up as she shook her head, seemingly no worse for wear, and then looked up at the wreckage of the G.U.N. shuttle. It was barely recognizable at this point, being half-buried in the ground, misshapen due the metal buckling so severely from the impact, and was burning. Rubrum saw her gasp out when she saw the single surviving G.U.N. soldier of the group pinned under the burning shuttle wreckage sitting on his legs, who was trying desperately to pull himself out. She'd only turned her teal eyes towards Rubrum himself when he began limping towards the soldier.

"Son of a bitch, that hurt..." Rubrum had groaned. He began winding his right shoulder up, and slowly his limping gait started to transition into a normal walk as his body rapidly healed. He made it halfway to the struggling G.U.N. soldier, and then stopped when he crossed the mangled body of one of the pilots he'd killed earlier. "Surprised you even made it," he scoffed out as he crouched down to the pilot's body. "The bat not so much, Mobians are freakishly tough like that, but you? The hell do they make these ships out of?"

Rouge watched as the man's black-gloved hands rummaged around the dead G.U.N. pilot's belt, only for him to then pull the man's sidearm away. He stood back up while admiring the pistol, and then tilted his hooded head in the direction of the pinned Overlander soldier. Realizing what he intended to do, Rouge shot upwards into a ready crouch, but to her dismay before she could even flap her wings Rubrum had aimed the pistol at the soldier and fired off three rounds into his head, ending him.

"You'll be in my heart for as long as I remember your face, generic soldierman," Rubrum said. He looked down at the pistol in his hand, and then made a small hum. "I'm keeping you for later," he decided as he stuffed the pistol into the interior of his hooded robe. Satisfied, he then turned around to face Rouge.

The white bat was crouched down about ten meters away from him. She'd visible tensed up when his hood-shadowed face turned towards her, and her breathing had increased by a small amount. She managed to maintain a semi-calm composure, though, her eyes narrowing in his direction as her dark bat wings experimentally flapped. Rubrum had been the one to get the first word in.

"Well, if it isn't Rouge the flying rat," he greeted, though the insult had gotten no visible rise out of the agent. "Snooping around, as per usual. You wouldn't happen to be on your way to warn all your pals about the little trap Eggman set, would you?"

"What would you know about that?" There had been a couple of times Rouge's eyes flicked to the bodies of the dead G.U.N. personnel, though they had been momentary glances. She still seemed completely serious, if not a bit nervous at the sight of the red-dressed man in front of her.

"Oh... about everything," Rubrum admitted.

"And just who are you?" she demanded.

Rubrum shrugged. "My name ain't all that important, Rouge."

The steely gaze she continued to give him didn't falter in the slightest. Her eyes tipped down just enough to eye the red clothes covering his entire body, as well as the black boots and gloves covering his hands and feet, and then she looked back to his face completely concealed by the shadow of his red hood. "Alright. What are you?" she tried.

"Equally unimportant," Rubrum said. "You sure you should be fishing for information at a time like this, Rouge? You got a guy that just straight-murdered three of your boys right in front of ya. Now ain't the time to be pulling this spy shit."

Rouge's focused expression was finally broken by a small frown. She slowly began to rise up into a standing position, and then dusted herself off a bit as she continued giving Rubrum a wary stare. "That mean to imply you're gonna try doing me in, too?"

He shook his head, causing surprise to bloom on her face. "Nah. Can't," he said, causing the bat's surprise to turn to confusion. "That said, uh... I don't suppose if I just asked you to chill out here for, I don't know, like a day or something while the big throwdown between Eggman and the Freedom Fighters goes down you'd listen?"

Her answer was immediate. "Not a chance."

"Nobody ever makes it easy for me," Rubrum sighed out. "Look. Rouge. I'll make you an offer. If you just sit here for a day I'll leave you alone. Hell, you don't even have to do that. I just don't want you telling anybody about the trap until the fight's over with." He slowly rose his right arm up and pointed at her. "If you don't do that... I'll tear your wings off."

Dangerous.

It was the one thing both her experience and her instincts were screaming at her as she looked at the person standing in front of her. Not just because he'd somehow crashed a G.U.N. shuttle with his bare hands, or how he'd mercilessly killed three soldiers without batting an eye. Relevant factors of course- ones that made Rouge just that much more wary of him.

His demeanor. That was what was setting her off the most above all else. That casual manner of speech and the way his body language was so relaxed, a stark contrast to how wound up she felt just looking at him. The words he spoke had so much confidence behind them, like what he said was a undeniable fact. No cockiness- genuine confidence. Rouge was experienced enough to tell the difference between ignorant cockiness and confidence, and this man in red in front of her was practically oozing with self-assured confidence. Which was why she'd retracted her wings just the barest amount when he'd threatened to tear her wings off while also raising her hands into a guarding stance. She legitimately believed him when he said that he was going to tear them off with his bare hands. Believed enough that she'd felt her spine shiver.

"... Just kidding." Her guard wasn't lowered in the slightest, though Rouge did cock her head in confusion when the red-dressed man she didn't know as Rubrum made a small chuckle, and then opened the hand he was using to point at her as he lowered it back to his side. "You're a bit too important to cripple. But I can still break you as much as I want as long as you'll make a full recovery afterwards."

"Just what is he playing at here...?" He didn't seem like somebody who was more chatty than they wanted to be. That'd been another bad sign on top of everything else; there was calculated cleverness under the casual speech that Rouge could see. "Is he with Eggman? That's the only reason he'd want me to stay quiet on spilling about the trap to the others, but... there's something off with him. Way off. This isn't some random goon he hired. None of the signs are there. He's... I don't know what he is..."

That was in terms of what his agenda was, or even literally what he was. With his entire body being covered with clothes she couldn't determine his exact species; for all she knew he might not have been a Mobian. An android? Wouldn't be the first time Eggman used something along those lines. All she could determine was it was a male from how the voice sounded and the general shape of the body.

She shook her head. Speculation wasn't going to get her anywhere, and there was no way she was going to listen to the directions of whoever this was. She somewhat doubted he'd just let her fly away, too. He still had that gun from the deceased soldier and she didn't want to risk testing how good his aim was. So it seemed she'd have to fight. Even if there was something in the back of her mind telling her that was an exceedingly bad idea.

The man in red seemed to pick up on her decision from the way his shoulders slumped slightly. "Alright, have it your way." Strangely, he turned towards the wreckage of the shuttle. "Let's at least make it a bit interesting."

Rouge felt nothing but confusion as he walked right in front of the wreckage. She grew even more confused, and worried, when his fist punched right through the damaged steel hull of the ship. His hand seemed to rifle around in the innards of the wreck for a bit, and with a satisfied hum he pulled something out.

"The... the ship's power couplings...?" Rouge thought to herself. In Rubrum's hand was indeed that component of the ship. Two metal cylinders connected together by a short cable. The man spun them around so he held the couplings by one of the cylinders, and then his hooded head looked towards Rouge.

"Hahhhh...!" He shifted into a kung-fu stance startling fast. A... horrendous stance, from what Rouge observed. His footing was completely off and his posture was so wrong she wanted to sigh at the sight of it. It looked less like a professional martial arts stance and more something emulated off a cheap comic. "Ata!" He began to spin the power couplings around himself, like he was using them as a pair of nunchucks. "Wa-wa-wa-wa! Ata! Ha! Hiyah!"

By now Rouge's guard was beginning to drop as she looked at the sight in front of her. There he was, a man who'd killed three men without even flinching, who Rouge had pegged as somebody being incredibly dangerous... shouting out goofy kung-fu noises as he spun the power couplings all around him. It wasn't even that good; she could see from the way he was spinning them he had no actual experience or skill using that type of weapon. They looked like badly-emulated movements, like his stance was. There was no denying he had speed, though. Intense speed and reflexes that compensated for his lack of skill based on the way he was spinning the makeshift nunchucks around so successfully if not skillfully. He was strong, too, if the fact he'd punched through a steel bulkhead with his bare fist said anything.

Just what was he?

"Waaaa...!" He spun the nunchucks around one more time, ending with one end of the power coupling being held under his armpit while the other end was held by his hand. He was still in that ridiculous kung-fu stance. "I've always wanted to try out nunchucks." With his free hand, he gestured towards the bat. "Come on, Rouge! Don't leave me hanging here!"

"Fighting me with a weapon you've never held before?" Her wings flared out to her side. "Big mistake!"

She took off the ground like a bullet, flying right towards the red man's position. She'd spun in the air once to gain momentum, lifting her leg up as she approached and then delivering an expertly-crafted kick right down onto him.

The kick hit nothing but air.

"Y'sure?" Rouge landed on the ground, surprised at the empty space. She then spun to her right at the voice to see her opponent standing next to her, looking down at his nunchucks in contemplation. "I don't know, I mean... rule of cool still applies, right?"

Scowling, the bat Mobian kicked out towards the man again. To her surprise she actually saw him dodge the kick this time. A dodge that seemed so lazily performed but with such terrifying speed she couldn't help but be off-put by it. She tried again and again to kick him, but every single kick whiffed right past the man's hooded head as he just dipped out of the way each and every time.

"Oh, yeah, guess I should be doing some stuff, too. Wa-ta!"

He'd struck out with the power couplings too fast for Rouge to dodge. She felt it connect with her side, and immediately pain shot up her body from the hard impact. She grunted from the pain and tried hopping back to create distance between them. To her disbelief, Rubrum had countered by jumping up in the air after her, and began spinning. Spinning in a way that the end of the nunchuck was held out to the side, like some demented windmill spitting out kung-fu noises.

Rouge was struck again, this time in the face. More pain lanced through her senses, causing her to growl slightly as her wings beat off the ground. She was able to maneuver quickly to the man's backside, though before she could even strike he'd made another exaggerated kung-fu noise and swung the power coupling behind himself. The end of it struck her calf, hard enough that she'd felt the vibrations of the hit right in her bones. The pain was enough to cause her to shout and hop back.

But he wouldn't let her gain distance. He'd dashed right in front of her at frightening speeds, continuing to swing the nunchucks at her. Every single hit was punctuated by one of those ridiculous noises he'd make along with pain exploding on one part of her body. Anger and frustration began to rapidly build up in Rouge the longer this went on. Indignation from being made a fool of from just how casual this person was acting over something so serious. For doing so much damage to her of all people and acting like it was nothing.

Nobody made a fool of her like this.

For as fast as he was with the nunchucks, he had absolutely no skill using them. Just raw speed and reflexes. The hits were delivered with the same types of swings, over and over. Even the amount of spins and flourishes he'd do with the power couplings between hits were limited. He may have been swinging them too fast for Rouge to keep up with, but there was a pattern to the hits. A pattern she was learning quickly past all the pain the hits were giving her.

That was why, eventually, she finally managed to land a hit. She'd struck her leg out in a quick jab, right in the middle of the power coupling being swung towards her. Its momentum was shifted as a result of the kick, causing it to spin around and bash the hooded man right in the face. He sputtered and stepped back from the hit, having left his center wide open. She'd lifted her leg up once more and delivered a straight kick to the male's chest.

The hit was sufficient enough that he was sent skidding back away from Rouge. She hadn't even waited for him to stop, having leapt right into the air after him. It was only when his feet skidded to a stop did Rubrum look up just in time to see Rouge spinning towards him with her leg extended. He grasped both power couplings and held it up with the intent to use the cable to guard him. This did little, as the resulting axe kick from Rouge had completely split the cable.

Rubrum stumbled back a bit as a result, looking down at his split apart nunchucks in what Rouge thought was surprise. She would have allowed herself a small smirk as she leapt back if it wasn't for the fact he began laughing.

"Ha ha! Alright!" He nonchalantly tossed the severed power couplings away and gestured to Rouge again. "You wanna play? Let's play!"

Where there had once been the beginnings of a smirk was now a frustrated frown that was directed at her opponent. He simply just stood there, arms swaying to his side in a carefree manner as he tapped his foot to an unheard tune, like he was waiting for Rouge to hurry up and make a move. It was with a fair bit of anger behind it did she leap up into the air again.

Angry as she may have been, it hadn't managed to cloud her mind or her skill as she wound up another kick midair. The man she was aiming for just continued to stand there, his hooded head looking up at her as she came closer. Even when she fell within striking distance he did not move, and by that point she thought a hit was assured.

But, it wasn't. He'd waited until her muscles began moving her leg to dodge. It made it so her kick came within millimeters of hitting him, but it was still a miss. The tree he'd been standing in front of, however, was not so fortunate. Her kick had been made with enough skill that there was a thick seem running straight through the entire trunk of the tree the man had been standing in front of. A large creaking sound was heard, with Rubrum having turned his head towards the tree that began falling backwards, while Rouge kept her eyes locked on him.

"Ah... that's the Rouge I know," he said as the tree fell fully down to the ground. He ducked his head to avoid getting struck by another kick. "You and that monster kick of yours."

"We've never met," Rouge said as she defensively hopped back away from him.

"Meh... I guess that's technically accurate," he agreed with a shrug.

"Well maybe we oughta get to know each other," Rouge suggested, doing her best to ignore the pain of the previous hits as she offered him a teasing smile. "I'll tell you something about myself if you tell me who you are."

"Ah, but we're already in the middle of doing that." Rubrum held his fists up and began lightly hopping on his feet. "And I gotta say, I'm real disappointed with what I'm finding here."

Rouge frowned. Even in that loose fighting stance he looked too casual for comfort. She decided a straightforward approach was appropriate, and dove right in.

Kick upon kick was unleashed on him. Not a single one of her attacks managed to hit him, each and every one just slightly grazing past him. The most she'd ever been able to do was ruffle the clothes he wore, with him ducking, bobbing, weaving, and overall just dodging every attack she sent him. The same couldn't be said for his performance.

Oh, she'd managed to dodge some of his hits. Some , and just barely. A vast majority of them were landing on her, though, and they hit harder than the makeshift nunchucks had. She wasn't failing to dodge or block those hits for lack of trying, either.

It was strange, though. That style he was using it. In-between taking blows from him Rouge managed to eye just what he was doing, and she couldn't help but be confused by his movements. He was repeating moves. The same ones, over and over, and in the same pattern. That pattern was one of the only reasons she was able to dodge to begin with, because otherwise the hits were coming too quick for her to keep up with.

A left hook, a right uppercut, followed by Rubrum spinning around and performing roundhouse kicks with both legs.

A left hook, a right uppercut, a delay, and then Rubrum using his left leg to perform a flurry of straight kicks, ending with him dodging backwards and then rushing forwards with a straight right punch, all in a single motion.

That was it. Rubrum kept defaulting to those two exact same combos, never deviating from them. He'd mix it up by ending combos prematurely sometimes, feints like that, but otherwise not only would he solely use those attacks, he'd use them in that exact same sequence. It was absolutely baffling to Rouge why he would employ such a style, and even more why he was refusing to expand and use other moves. If it wasn't for his seemingly monstrous strength and speed any competent fighter would have been able to counter and beat him a million times over by now.

She had a sneaking suspicion why he was limiting himself so much, though. The same reason he kept making small chuckles and laughs whenever he dodged her attacks, or on the rare occasion she dodged his. The same reason he was using such basic combos. The same reason he managed to punch through solid steel but a hit on her wasn't going straight through her. For some reason, he was holding back on her. She couldn't tell if he was a legitimately inexperienced hand-to-hand fighter or not, but he was definitely limiting his power. And an idea began to form in her head because of this observation.

Her wings flapped and sent her flying backwards, creating distance between them. Rouge's feet skid across the ground slightly, while Rubrum had tilted his head to the side as he looked in her direction.

"You... you really know how to flatter a girl," she sarcastically remarked through feigned, heavy breaths, "holding back like that."

"Well, what can I say?" Rubrum asked, not even bothering to deny it. "I'm having a blast hitting you over and over. Besides. You're not worth putting in actual effort."

"That's it, keep giving me what I want..." If it weren't for the need to keep on her act and the pain preventing it, she would have smiled. "I'm gonna make you eat those words!"

Her wings beat down roughly, and the bat was sent rocketing forwards. Her leg was cocked back, her face twisted in an enraged expression in what was seemingly a hot-blooded, reckless charge forwards. Rubrum had actually slumped his shoulders in disappointment a bit at the sight, and cocked back his own left fist in preparation.

"You always start with a left hook with those combos of yours." She knew that it would come at a speed too fast for Rouge to counter. She knew exactly what was coming, though. What kind of punch, its length, its trajectory. And she'd be a poor fighter if she didn't know how to counter a specific type of punch. So when she entered Rubrum's attack range, she'd struck.

The hooded man had struck out straight towards her, having assumed she'd charged him in blind rage. And indeed the look on her face reflected this assumption. That was, right until the movement to punch was made, at which point the expression on her face shifted from an enraged one to a confident smirk. She'd flapped her wings and twisted her body in preparation before the left hook was even initiated, so that when when the left hook was initiated it'd whiffed right past her. Rouge then wrapped her own arms around the limb in the process of it missing her, and with the assistance of her wings used the vast strength behind the punch's momentum to spin the arm's owner around.

Rouge had intended to flip him onto his back, though his own strength and reflexes proved too great for that. She'd still managed to spin him around and leave him open, though, and struck when the opportunity presented itself. She'd kicked him in the side of the head. A kick even stronger than the one that'd cut down the previous tree in a single strike. A kick with all her strength and skill behind it.

Rubrum's head had snapped to the side under the force of the kick. A kick that'd been so intense Rouge had felt his skull completely shatter under her heel. The man himself gasped out in surprise at actually having been kicked, and more than likely from his skull caving into his brain. More than that, his hood had been jostled just the barest amount. Rouge had quickly retreated from him after delivering the kick, settling down on the ground in front of him with in a low stance as she gazed up to his face.

The hood hadn't been moved back all that much. Not enough that the shadows covering his face receded. She still couldn't tell what he was. What she could see were straight locks on long, red hair poking out from the underside of the hood, only being revealed due to her kick.

"..." Rubrum had frozen, seemingly catching on to the fact some of his hair had been exposed from the kick. Slowly, his hand reached up to grasp at the hood. "Well then..." he hissed out, sounding quite upset as he moved the hood back to conceal his whole face. "That kick would have killed me if I couldn't regenerate, Rouge."

"Kinda fighting for my life here," she commented between heavy breaths. "What? Didn't think I'd pull my punches like you?"

"Nah, not at all. You're the kind of person who'd let a whole world burn for a fucking gem. That's primarily the reason why I really don't like you, Rouge."

The white bat made an unbelieving scoff at that. "You really think I'm that bad?"

"Doesn't really matter what I think, does it?" With a light groan, Rubrum flexed his neck back and forth and began to stretch his arms behind his back. "I guess it's time to stop messing around. I've had enough fun with you."

She couldn't help but give him a teasing smirk in response. Her entire body ached, and the longer this went on the less and less confidence she had in winning something like this. But the one hit alone had her feeling good enough to be a bit cheeky. "Aw, really? All it took was a single hit from little old me for you to finally get the lead out?"

"I'll do you a favor and spare your teeth. Wouldn't wanna permanently mess up that pretty little manipulative smile of yours."

And at that point, everything fell apart for Rouge.

The G.U.N. agent apparently didn't have an accurate scale of just how much Rubrum had been holding back against her, because it was after that sentence was said that her entire body began to explode in pain. Blow after blow was struck on her at various points along her body, delivered at such speeds she couldn't even move to get out of the way. It felt like she was being hit in multiple spots at the same time from how fast Rubrum was attacking her with punches and kicks. So fast she could barely see him move, and much, much harder than any other hit she'd ever taken in her entire life.

Bones began creaking uncomfortably from the heavy blows. She felt and even heard some fracture. Her entire body was so inflamed in pain from the beating she was becoming numb to it.

It had ended with Rubrum began kicking her. Kick after kick mixed into spins that was knocking Rouge's entire body back, with Rubrum keeping pace with her with his spins and kicks. He'd become so ferocious in his kicks that he began kicking upwards, with Rouge's body being sent up into the air while the momentum from his own kicks carried Rubrum up with her. The final kick was when he began spinning in front of her while they were midair. His entire body spun at a speed he was nothing but a blurry red wheel to Rouge's darkening vision, before he finally stopped with his leg extended right above her. All that momentum from the spinning was delivered into a single, vicious heel kick that sent Rouge rocketing towards the ground with a pained scream.

Before she'd even hit the ground Rubrum had somehow appeared on the ground, and hit her with such a powerful straight punch that Rouge's trajectory shifted. All she could manage was a weak grunt as she was sent sailing back into the wreckage of the shuttle. Her body had impacted the flat wall of the crashed shuttle so hard the metal dented from the impact. And from that point, she lost the energy and will to keep moving.

"Holding back is such a pain... 'least I got it kick the greedy bitch's face in." With a quiet sigh, Rubrum ran a hand over the hood covering his head. "That would have been disastrous of she saw my face. Ah, well... managed to save it. No point in worrying."

He looked ahead, towards the wreckage that he'd sent Rouge to. She was lying flat on her back against a slab that was angled just enough that was was able to lie there without sliding off. Even from here he could see just how sorry of a state her body was in. Battered, beaten, bruises all along her face and body, blood leaking from the corner of her mouth. The heavy breathing and rapidly-blinking eyes suggested she was still conscious. Barely hanging in there, but awake. Good enough as far as Rubrum was concerned.

"You got skill. I'll give you that much." Rubrum had approached the metal slab she was lying on, and then turned around so his back was leaning on the metal slab right next to her. "More skill than almost anybody else. But skill's all you got. You're no Shadow. No Sonic. No Knuckles. You don't have any real power to put you up there with the best. You're nothing but a filthy thief with more talent and skill than you have any right to possess."

He turned his head down to Rouge. The bat had turned her own head towards him just to look at him. Past all the labored breathing and heavy bruising along her face, she still managed to give him a defiant glare.

"But most importantly... you don't have a concept as to what true strength is. You had its meaning slapped right in your face and you still don't have a damn clue." Rubrum leaned down so he was closer to Rouge, his tone lowering some. "Somebody as selfish as you will never understand. You made that abundantly clear to me with what you tried to do."

"I don't... know what you're talking about..." Rouge grunted out.

"Mm. You wouldn't." Rubrum rose himself back up, still leaning next to the beaten bat's body. "Must feel terrible. Knowing your pal Shadow is about to walk into a trap. A miniature fortress rigged with so many traps and robots he'd be preoccupied there all day along with Sorun. All for a Chaos Emerald that wasn't even there to begin with...

"At least that's what would have happened if I didn't go and put the real Emerald there."

Rouge's heavy breathing was interrupted with a small gasp. Her eyes widened a bit, and her battered features grew more confused. "W-what...?"

"Yeah. I was already there. Disabled all the traps and killed all the robots. Whole place is empty. I put the last Chaos Emerald at the back of the place for Sorun. It's just sitting there and waiting for him to take it."

It was an explanation delivered with no hesitation and so lightly it carried the same weight as somebody talking about the weather. It's what Rubrum said to her, though. And it seemed to cause no end to the confusion Rouge suffered if the lost look she had said anything.

"That... that makes no sense," she mumbled out. "Why? Why would you do that?"

"Oh, 'cause the Chaos Emeralds are slowly killing Sorun." Rouge's breathing stalled completely when she heard that. Her eyes widened as far as they could go, and she began to shake slightly. "Yeah, I wanna say he'll have around... twenty-ish minutes once he absorbs the one I put down for him? Somewhere around there. After that? He's done for. Dead. Finished."

"That's a lie," she ground out. Her voice was pained and full of denial. The livid glare she maintained towards him remained defiant. "He's not the kind of person to hide s-something like th-that... he would have told someone...!"

"Shows what you know. Some spy you are." Rubrum's head turned towards the wreckage. "I don't think the ship's busted up enough so badly that the emergency beacon won't be working. Even if it isn't G.U.N.'ll send search parties after a while. You'll be fine once they get you to an infirmary. But that'll be way after Sorun dies. There's nothing you can do to warn anybody in time in the state you're in."

"Why?" Rubrum turned back to Rouge when he heard her ask that question. He couldn't tell if she was starting to believe him or if she was just getting drowsy from losing consciousness. "Why... why are you d-doing this? Who a-are you?"

"The answer to your question is a fascinating one. Unfortunately, it's not for your oversized-ass ears to hear." He flicked one of Rouge's ears, causing it to flick and for her to grunt out. He then pushed off the metal slab, walking backwards while still facing Rouge, who did her best to keep her eyes on him. Based on the fading look she had she seemed to finally be losing consciousness. "Let's just say it's all in accordance with His will and leave it at that, huh? Now go ahead and get your beauty sleep. You really need it right now with how your face looks."

If Rouge had any further words for him, she wasn't able to get them out. Her wounds had finally become too much for her, and she'd blacked out right there on the slab. Scoffing at the sight, Rubrum turned right around. He quickly removed his black gloves to reveal the pale, human hands underneath them, and then tossed the pair of gloves on a nearby pile of burning rubble.

"Alright, that's that step finished. It'll get my existence out to G.U.N., and eventually it'll wind towards him. Not enough to completely blow my cover. Just enough to get him thinking and make things smoother later on." Once the hands were free from the gloves, Rubrum dug into the pockets of his cloak and brought out the piece of notebook paper for him to see. "Let's just do a last-minute double check here..."

- Genocide the Xorda so the Black Arms can invade Mobius (X)

- Go to Dark Mobius and kill Dark Enerjak (Silver won't be around to take care of it) (X)

- Go to the fake Chaos Emerald signal trap set up during Eggman's desperate assault, disable the trap, and place the real Chaos Emerald there for Sorun (X)

- Body Rouge (X)

- Save Eggman's life ()

- Kill Sorun ()

"Alright, deep-sixed the Enerjak from that beyond fucked up zone, Black Arms should take a long while to get here , after the whole split mess if I timed it right, yep, yeah, mhm, looking good..." There was no helping the sigh that left Rubrum as he looked at the two next objectives. "This hurts my soul just to read. Ugh... why the hell did He have to make things so damn complicated?"

Chapter 52

Recursion Error

Episode 52- Game Over

Something was weird.

"You know, I expected to find, I don't know... resistance? Some robots guarding the Emerald? Something ?" Sorun's single eye glanced around the area as he and Shadow continued walking down a metal corridor, cutting through one large room to the next large room.

It'd be foolish to think that Eggman would just leave a Chaos Emerald sitting around without it being guarded. Both Sorun and Shadow had taken the portal to the storage facility expecting a fight. Sorun himself had walked right out of the portal with his sword in hand, while Shadow had walked out with green energy crackling around his hands.

Except... there was no resistance at all. There were robots, for sure. Dead robots. Everywhere. Badniks that looked like they'd been crushed, stabbed, and cut to pieces. Freshly destroyed, too, as some of them were still smoking and sparking.

The both of them had given each other strange looks before proceeding down further into the facility. The same sight greeted them at every turn, and at every room. Destroyed Badniks. Not a single one was left alive. On one hand it was making the mission a breeze so far, but Sorun couldn't help but feel something was amiss from how strange this all was.

"This is extremely peculiar," Shadow agreed with him, his own eyes scanning any destroyed Badniks they passed. "There is absolutely no way he'd leave the Chaos Emerald unguarded."

"Maybe he was betting on us being so busy about the attack he didn't think we'd spare people to come get the Chaos Emerald," Sorun reasoned as he stepped over an Egg Pawn that'd been cut in half.

"He's not supposed to know we're retaliating," Shadow reminded him.

"Smart guy like that? He knows we know."

"Hmph. That doesn't explain all the freshly-destroyed Badniks all around us."

"Does it really matter?" Sorun asked him. "As long as the Emerald is still here then it's no skin off our backs."

Shadow turned his head to the human with a scowl on his face. "And if it turns out whoever did this did so to acquire the Emerald for themselves? What then?"

"Then we forget about it and just go to the ship where the fight's taking place," Sorun smoothly answered. "Nothing we can do about it if that's true."

Shadow hummed, but said nothing as he turned back forwards. For as much as Sorun could tell that meant he agreed with him as well as was troubled. Admittedly it mildly unsettled Sorun as well. Partly because nobody but them should have known about Eggman having the Emerald, and partly because he didn't know anybody that could do this. He'd heard some hubbub about there having been some prison breakout back in New Mobotropolis that had some people mildly concerned, but he didn't know if it'd been one of them or not.

Well, as he said, nothing to do about it if the Emerald was actually gone. He'd just go attack Eggman with one less power. It wasn't optimal, but if everybody else was there, Sorun wasn't as concerned. They'd have to make do.

As they crossed past another room of dead robots, Sorun spoke out to Shadow. "So Rouge is just gonna join us midway through the fight there?"

"I believe so, yes," Shadow answered.

"You believe so," Sorun echoed. "She didn't tell you?"

"She told me she was investigating a lead, and left it at that." He made a low hum as he glanced to the side at an Egg Hammer that looked like it'd been torn to pieces. "She does what she deems appropriate at the time. But she gets good results, so I pay no mind to it."

"Doesn't really sound like a mindset somebody in the military should have," Sorun noted.

"We're agents. It's different," Shadow corrected. "And she's an agent along with me for wholly different reasons than mine."

"Oh, yeah?" Sorun airily replied. "And what'd that be?"

"She had an impressive set of skills in subterfuge, espionage, infiltration, stealth and stellar hand-to-hand, as well as other talents," Shadow said. "They were ideal traits for an agent, and G.U.N. had no access to a Mobian as skilled as her. She took the job because it paid and she's good at what she does."

Sorun rose an eyebrow in surprise. "Pretty impressive," he commented. "What'd she do before coming to G.U.N.?"

"She doesn't speak much of her previous life. All I know is that she stole rare treasures for a living."

"Ah." There was a pause as Sorun thought for a bit. "She's kind of flirty with Knuckles sometimes."

"Hn." All Shadow offered in response was a grunt of acknowledgement as they'd entered a hallway.

"It's just kind of weird," Sorun continued, "since, you know, Knuckles is already in a relationship with Julie-Su. And the guy's kinda clueless about women, so whenever she makes a pass at him it goes right over his head. Saw it a couple times back when you two lived at the HQ."

"I don't think things like that matter for her. She goes for what she wants."

"... That's kind of messed up, isn't it?"

With a small sigh, Shadow shrugged his shoulders. "I work with her because we were paired up due to being Mobians, and because her skills make her a highly valuable partner. I talk with her so we can better communicate on the field and because she's not as naïve as the average Mobian. That's the extent of our relationship. What she chooses to do in her personal life is her business."

"Hn." Sorun mimicked Shadow's earlier hum of acknowledgement. Wasn't his business. He was dying too soon to care. He personally thought Rouge was wasting her time with Knuckles the way she was going, guy was straight enough to cut grass by laying on it in Sorun's opinion, but he had more important things to worry about. Like the Chaos Emerald.

The... Chaos Emerald that was just sitting over at the end of the room they'd just walked into...

They'd just opened a door at the end of the hallway they'd entered previously when they saw it. The door lead to a large, wide, and round room. More robots lied around in heaps. An inordinate amount of Badniks that practically littered the whole ground of the room. And just there, in the center of the room, was a pedestal holding up a Chaos Emerald that glowed a bright cyan color.

Cautiously, both Sorun and Shadow had stepped into the room. Both kept a wary eye out, scanning the walls for any possible traps, or on the robots in case any were just playing dead. But nothing happened. There were some turrets sticking out of the wall in some locations, but like they Badniks they, too, were damaged beyond functionality.

The room was genuinely cleared.

"This is just weird," Sorun muttered under his breath as he and Shadow both relaxed at sensing a lack of danger. "We're just gonna get it for free? I'm not complaining, but still."

"Hm..." While Sorun began to approach the Chaos Emerald, Shadow had stopped when he felt his foot impact something. He looked down in interest and bent down to grab an object that lied at his feet. He picked it up to examine it, but to his visible disappointment it was just an ordinary duffel bag.

With a huff, he discarded the bag by dropping it back onto the ground. He then turned towards Sorun, who was standing in front of the Emerald. Just staring at it, with an unreadable expression on his face. It carried on long enough that Shadow decided to speak his name up.

"Sorun?"

"Kind of weird it's another blue one, huh?" Sorun asked. He'd found his own voice to grow quieter at the sight of it, of its bright blue glow. A glow that promised an end for him.

This was it. Once he reached his hand out an absorbed the Emerald... that was it. It'd be over for him soon after. How soon he didn't know exactly, but he didn't imagine he'd make it to see the end of the day. Something inside him just made him feel this.

Oddly, he felt a bit victorious. He never thought he'd even make it this far to get to the final Emerald. He figured a robot would have taken him out at some point before he got here. And admittedly, he did almost die at various points, but... here he was. Plain old Sorun, who managed to fight all the way to this point, all to give everything up to have one last shot at Dr. Eggman. His heart couldn't help but ache terribly at the thought of what was to come. A great pain that was, oddly enough, mixed with a bit of accomplishment.

"Kind of feels like I just got the last achievement or trophy or whatever in a video game," Sorun thought to himself as he gazed unblinkingly at the Emerald. "Just... wish it didn't have to hurt so much..."

"What color?"

"Huh?" Blinking his eye, Sorun turned back to Shadow, who was looking at him expectantly. "What?"

"What color did you expect the last Chaos Emerald to be?" Shadow reiterated.

"Oh. I don't know. Orange, I guess. But this rounds out the colors well enough, too."

A beat passed as the two stared at each other in uncomfortable silence.

"... Well? Aren't you going to absorb it?" Shadow asked.

"... Yeah. Gimme a sec." With a deep breath, Sorun turned back around to the Emerald. The final Chaos Emerald. He slowly exhaled as he brought his flesh and spectral hands up. "C'moooon DT..."

And then, without delaying a moment longer, he placed his hands on the Emerald.

It was the same show as always. Blue sparks of electricity, the Emerald dissolving into pure energy and absorbing through his arm and into his body. He felt nothing at the exchange but a lukewarm feeling, his hands dropping back to the sides once the Emerald vanished.

He felt the change seconds after.

Shadow saw it from where he stood. The chin-length black hair adorning Sorun's head began to change. It began to grow lighter and lighter from the hair tips all the way to the roots, like dark ash or ink was being washed out of it by some invisible force. In mere seconds Sorun's purely black hair had changed to hair that was as white as pure snow. It was an appearance that otherwise looked out of place on Sorun's youthful face.

"Oh. Oh, wow." Sorun held his right, spectral hand up to his face. The Bringer Claw had disappeared. In its place was different spectral arm. A blue arm that was much more dim and transparent, but was shaped exactly like his flesh and blood arm used to be, and was adorned with swirling, ripple-like patterns. The arm began to brighten in intensity until it glowed a solid blue, and as Sorun watched with a curious eye he saw, felt even, something grow from his shoulder all the way to his fingertips over the glowing arm to replace it.

And then, in less than a tenth of a second, it was just there. His normal right arm. It'd regenerated so fast it almost hadn't grown so much as instantly appear. His true, pale right arm. He flexed it, feeling with great satisfaction the pressure of his tendons extending, the feeling of blood rushing through the veins of his new limb.

"Oh, sure, now you give me the ultra high-speed regeneration," Sorun grumbled under his breath. He looked to the side towards Shadow, who was giving him a wide-eyed, surprised look. "Pretty neat, huh? It's not Devil Trigger, but I'll take a Devil's Body any day of the week."

"What exactly has happened to you?" Shadow asked, his voice having trailed off as he stared at Sorun's regenerated arm.

"I guess the Emerald gave me Dante and Vergil's freaky human/devil hybrid biology. Or some emulation of it at least. Did it really have to go all-out with the white hair, though?" he mumbled as he flicked away one of the white locks from his face. "Makes... kind of sense, I guess. I mean, that Enerjak guy was regenerating whole limbs and organs from those cyborg echidna he de-borged just by looking at them. Geez, even you can regenerate, can't you?"

Shadow made a slow nod. "Yes. How are you feeling?"

"To be honest? I don't think I've ever felt any better, actually." He wasn't even exaggerating when he said that. The feeling he had throughout his entire body was nothing short of incredible. It was like experiencing the energized, good feeling of waking up from a good nap and having shed off hundreds of pounds of weight at once all rolled into one feeling, perpetually felt through Sorun's body. He just felt so... light. Free. Powerful. It was intoxicating to the point he made a small laugh. "Yeah, this feels amazing," he commented as he reached his new right arm up.

His fingers grasped around the eyepatch covering his right eye and ripped it away. The long, ugly scar running through his empty right socket was revealed, only for blue energy to then run through the scar. Almost instantaneously, the scar thinned, and then disappeared completely to leave Sorun's face unblemished of any scars. And then his right eye opened to reveal a perfectly functioning blue eye.

"Oh, man, I almost forgot what depth perception felt like," Sorun gasped out in wonder, blinking both of his eyes as he looked around the room. "Christ, Shadow, is this what you feel like all the time? Just straight health?"

"I don't... exactly know..." Shadow found himself at a loss for words as he watched Sorun crouch down a few times, and then spring up straight and hop on his feet, laughing lightly all the while. "I take it this is good?"

"Yeah, yeah it's- oh, wait, what the...?" He paused, a look of confusion crossing his face. He opened his mouth and stuck his fingers inside, and then made a strangled sound of surprise as he took his fingers out. "Oh, wow, that one tooth I lost a few years ago when me and the guys tried playing tetherball with a bowling ball grew back."

Shadow heavily blinked, the mystified look on his face refusing to leave. "What...?"

Sorun seemed to ignore him completely, instead choosing to look down towards his midsection. "This is really great. Like, like this just feels really- MAN I'M CUT!"

In the process of examining himself Sorun had reached down and pulled the black shirt under his white coat up to examine his torso. He'd been pleased to find all the scars created when he'd been hit by all that shrapnel in the fight against Eggman had vanished completely. He was beyond pleased to find that where there had once been a flat but fairly unimpressive stomach was now a muscular abdomen with a six-pack.

It wasn't just his abdomen, either, now that he more closely examined his body. It was almost like his entire musculature system was redone completely, or that what had already been there was so improved by whatever the Chaos Emerald had done to his body it may as well have been different. He'd gone from having a below-average build to having what may as well have been a build reserved for the peak of humanity. Still thin, but muscular. Lean.

God damn , he looked good.

"I would have given up literally any power to have gotten this one first before anything else," Sorun said to himself as he lowered the shirt. "Why did the best one have to be saved for last? Seriously, look at this!"

The white-haired Earthling walked over to one of the dead Egg Pawns lying on the ground near him. He'd crouched down, and then picked the robot's body up above his head. Effortlessly. With a single hand. He didn't even feel any strain from holding it up the body felt so light to Sorun. He made a small scoff and then lightly tossed it. And evidently that was still too much power, as he ended up accidentally tossing the robot body all the way across the room.

It was a healing ability and strength that was completely foreign to Sorun. Something that felt so out of place but at the same time so right. Even when he punched outwards to experiment with his speed he couldn't help but be surprised. His punch was one with such speed his arm was little more than a blur that slightly distorted the air around it when he punched forwards. He did it over and over, admiring the black speed lines that appeared alongside his punches.

This was the one thing he wanted above all else. It wasn't Devil Trigger, but it was the next best thing. Physical ability on par with a Mobian. Far above, even, if these results said anything.

"I take it you're satisfied?" Sorun quit punching the air and turned towards Shadow. He'd managed to get over his initial surprise, and had approached closer to Sorun. He'd crossed his arms while his crimson eyes had given Sorun an appraising look, and just barely there was a hint of an amused smirk on the corner of his lips.

"Satisfied doesn't come close," Sorun told him. "It's-"

He was interrupted with a cough. Multiple, consecutive coughs that sounded much more severe than they should have been. Or maybe they sounded just right, seeing as every single cough was accentuated by blood being coughed out from Sorun and splattering against the ground. Shadow had been so surprised by the sight he'd stepped back in shock, the smirk dropping right off him as he looked down at the blood. Sorun, at least, had stopped coughing after a bit. His face had fallen into a stony expression as he gazed at the blood on the floor, followed by him sighing.

The good feeling he got from his white-haired body was all but gone. Dropped in an instant by the cruel reminder he wouldn't be able to enjoy this new physique of his for long. He wouldn't be able to enjoy anything for long. That Chaos Emerald was the last one. He didn't have much longer left. All he had left in place of all the joy from earlier was an empty, sad feeling.

"Way to kill the mood. Hm?" He felt something tingle on his throat. It was a strong enough sensation that he lifted his fingers up to feel at his throat, only to recoil them away when he felt something lift up off of it. He watched as a small vapor cloud of purple energy floated up to his face, and then quickly dissipated right in front of him. The tingling in his throat disappeared soon after.

He knew instantly what that cloud had been.

"You choose now of all times to remove it? So, what, I can get the truth out to somebody so they know why I'm about to keel over? 'Cause nobody can stop me at this point?" Sorun bitterly thought to himself. "Fuck you, Aurora."

"Sorun?" Hearing his name get called out made Sorun straighten up. He turned towards Shadow, who looked to him in concern. "What's going on?"

"Well... there's an important detail nobody but me ever knew about absorbing these Chaos Emeralds, Shadow." He decided to just come out and say it. For simplicity's sake and for the sake of time, which he was running out of. A large part of him felt scared for doing so. A larger part told the other part it didn't have time to worry. "There's a reason I was so resistant to you back then when you tried forcing that red Chaos Emerald on me." He glanced back to the pedestal the Emerald had sat on, and then looked back at Shadow. "These things are killing me. I'm gonna die pretty soon here."

There'd been little to no emotion in Sorun's voice when he said it. It came out as quiet and low, and slightly cracked, and all he could manage to do was stare impassively at the dark hedgehog standing in front of him. For his part, Shadow had denial flicker across his face. Not shocked disbelief. Pure denial, like he just didn't believe Sorun's words. He shook his head and looked down, appearing more confused than anything else.

"No. No, that doesn't... that doesn't make any sense." He looked back up at Sorun. Not upset. Just confused. "Chaos energy doesn't work that way. An overabundance of it can't harm you, Sorun."

"Humans like me can't handle Chaos energy," Sorun hollowly replied. "No Chaos Force link. Remember?"

Now the understanding was beginning to show. The denial Shadow had was beginning to fade away while realization slowly set in. "No, you're... that isn't true..."

"It happened right after the first one. While I was unconscious." Sorun turned away from the Mobian. "I don't know if you've ever heard of them, but Aurora and Athair are the ones that laid it all out for me. They're these, uh... ghosts, I guess, real close to the Chaos Force. Knuckles knows them, talked to 'em before. Ask him about them when you get a chance. Pulled me in a vision, said each Emerald would take years off my life since my species just didn't evolve to use this Chaos stuff." He turned his head back to Shadow. "I-"

Sorun's words were cut off when a gloved fist hit him square in the center of his face.

The unfortunate aspect of having a regeneration ability now was that his pain receptors weren't fried anymore. He still had an unusually high pain tolerance even among his fellow humans back on Earth, and it seemed that this body made him somewhat further resistant to pain seeing as being punched hard enough to get sent flying across the room and into a wall hadn't resulted him feeling the worst pain imaginable. It still hurt a lot once his back slammed into the wall, resulting in him sliding down into a slumped sitting position.

"Pretty sure he broke my entire face with that punch," Sorun thought with a sigh. By the time he began thinking the bones and muscles in his head had already healed. "Man, what the f-"

His thoughts ended when Shadow appeared right in front of him. His hand shot downwards and snatched onto the collar of Sorun's shirt, after which he was hauled upwards so his face was directly in front of Shadow's. He was about to say something, but Sorun's words died on his lips when he saw the state that half-alien hedgehog was in. A strange combination of his mouth being in an angry snarl while his eyes looked like he was in despair.

"Why wouldn't you tell us!?" a distressed Shadow screamed at him. Sorun had found himself so taken back by how distraught he sounded he couldn't help but go limp in his grasp. "You fool... you idiot, why!?" he screamed out again as he roughly shook Sorun.

"I couldn't," Sorun quietly said. "Aurora used her powers to put some... curse thing on me. That purple thing you saw earlier. Every time I tried telling someone my heart stopped."

"That's why...?" A look of realization came over Shadow's face, and he became so shocked he'd inadvertently dropped Sorun back on the ground. "That's why you acted like that... you, you kept pausing-"

"Yeah, you kept making my heart stop with the questions," Sorun groaned as he sat back up. Shadow, meanwhile, had bowed his head while he rubbed a hand over the side of his face.

"Why wouldn't you just remove it with your sword?" Shadow asked him.

At that, Sorun made a hollow chuckle. "You have no idea how much it hurts knowing you figured that out in seconds when it took me three and a half months-"

" Stupid !" Shadow lashed out again, this time punching the wall next to Sorun's head hard enough that the metal wall heavily dented.

Sorun, who didn't even flinch from the hit right next to his head, glanced at the fist before turning his eyes to Shadow who was heavily breathing.

"Shadow, by the time I figured out I could it was way too late. I already had six in me." He looked down at the floor. "Besides, Athair and Aurora, they... they have this limited ability to see into the future. They didn't imply it was very exact or clear, but they had a bit of foresight. They said if I didn't collect Emeralds to get as much power as possible to take Eggman out he'd win. Flat out. They envisioned a future where he won if I didn't do anything." Shadow's breathing calmed down slightly as he listened to Sorun. "The future where I went ahead with it wasn't certain, but it was better than certain doom at Eggman's hand." Sorun shook his head. "I-I couldn't do it, Shadow, I... I tried, I tried running away because I didn't want to die, but I just. Couldn't. Do it. I didn't want the planet to turn into some smog-filled wasteland. I didn't want everybody to die, to see a future where all the Freedom Fighters and my friends get captured, have unspeakable things done with them, get executed, I... I couldn't bear the thought, Shadow." He pressed his palm on the floor and slowly picked himself up to his feet. "I don't want to die. I really don't. But I wanted that future to happen even less. So I decided to go through with it. Even if I knew I could have used the Yamato to remove the curse I probably wouldn't have. I was that desperate to ensure that future wouldn't come to pass that I just went along with it even though it's been eating at me every single day since."

He picked his head up to look at Shadow. He had such a pitiful look on his face that all Shadow could do was silently stare at Sorun.

"I... I'm so messed up, Shadow, but I just don't have time to tell you everything," Sorun mumbled out.

"Just take them out," Shadow tried in an uncharacteristically small voice. "You can separate things with your sword, so why-?"

"Tried. Didn't work."

"But-but your regeneration, can't it-?"

"It appears that isn't so." Shaking his head, Sorun began to slowly walk past Shadow. "Even Vergil had a limit to his regenerative abilities, and since the powers are tied to my heart and how I interpret the powers from the games, the limits I know of are imposed on me. Years of constant fighting cumulated in so much damage that his body was falling apart faster than his ultra high-speed regeneration could fix him." He held his hand up to examine it. "I'm not literally flaking apart into pieces, at least, but the end result will still be the same. The regeneration can heal everything, but it can only go so far. My stamina is high - likely much higher than humanly possible - but no matter how absurdly high it is, even with this body there's still a limit. I can't go forever." The white-haired human turned to the black-furred hedgehog. "That is why... we really must be going. I don't have much more time left, you see."

"..." A look of pure confliction settled on Shadow's face, overtop the distraught look. He tried to say something to Sorun multiple times, but looked so lost that he wasn't able to form words. Eventually, he seemed to come to a decision, and then shook his head at Sorun. "No."

Sorun's shoulders slumped as his hand fell. "Shadow..."

"You're not wasting any more energy by fighting." His shoulder roughly brushed past Sorun's shoulder as he quickly stomped away. "You're staying right here until I get you help."

"There's no helping this-"

Shadow whirled around at Sorun. The angry snarl returned to his face. "I'm not letting you die!" he screamed at him. Sorun was frozen to the spot, while Shadow heavily breathed out from having raised his voice. "I don't want to lose you, too," he'd whispered under his breath, almost too quietly for Sorun to hear, before turning back around. "You're not fighting, and that's final. You're going to stay and rest until somebody figures something out-"

"Shadow, I beg of you!" Sorun had shot forwards and gripped Shadow by the wrist, stopping the hedgehog in his tracks. He turned his head back around to yell at Sorun again, but stopped when he saw the pleading look on the human's face. "This is my final request," Sorun continued in a soft voice. "Nothing can be done to save me. And if I'm to die, I want it to at least mean something. I don't want my friends to be hurt, and believe it or not that includes you. So before I die, I want to drag Eggman down to hell with me."

"... If your soul is bound to wind up anywhere, it wouldn't be there." With a resigned look, Shadow pulled his wrist free from Sorun's grasp. "We'll go."

Sorun blinked in surprise. He stared silently at Shadow for some seconds, and then turned away from him at the same time Yamato appeared in his grasp. A blue cross was quickly cut into the air in front of him, following which it folded inwards into a portal.

Once the portal was opened, Sorun sheathed the katana back into the scabbard held in his left hand. He waited a moment, and then turned his head halfway so one of his eyes met Shadow's eyes. "Thank you, Shadow," he said. "I don't think I'll have time to explain to the others, so... do me one last favor and tell them for me, will you?"

"... Tsk. You have a lot of final favors, Sorun." Whether he was being sarcastic or not was unclear to Sorun due to the low, downcast tone Shadow had adopted. Sorun made no outward reaction, and then turned to the portal.

"Sorry for asking so much." He began stepping forwards. "Come on."

Without another word, the two of them silently walked through the portal.

The scene on the other side of the portal may as well have been a war zone from what Sorun saw.

It was a somewhat familiar sight. Like he was standing near the end of a giant, floating aircraft carrier's runway, with clear, blue sky all around. In fact he was fairly certain this was the exact same model of ship as the one he, Sonic, and Tails had acquired the first Chaos Emerald from, all the way back then. Might've even been the same specific ship, really, though there was no knowing how many of the same types of ship Eggman had built before Enerjak destroyed most of them.

The runway was littered in the bodies of Badniks of various types, too. When Sorun looked to his right he saw everybody just to the side of him and Shadow. Both the Freedom Fighters and Chaotix, all huddled up into a singular group and fending off any robots that came their way. Some must have noticed their arrival, as quite a few pairs of eyes had turned over to look at them.

And then Sorun got impaled through the chest when he heard heavy footfalls. He'd managed to turn his head just in time to see the red Egg Pawn that had rammed its lance through him.

"... Fucking ow." He hadn't made any sound in response to the impalement, or to the Badnik still running forwards and carrying Sorun along with his body hanging off the lance held in the robot's hands. He just continued to stare down at the lance carrying him with curious eyes. "Wow, this hurts, but... oddly enough not as much as I thought it would. This body's weird."

It still felt like a giant, sharp, metal object pushed in through his chest and out his back, which in of itself was excruciating, but it wasn't an overwhelming type of pain. He found it curious.

He'd made it all the way to right in front of the group of Mobian before he felt another burst of pain on his left shoulder when an Egg Pawn from behind lanced through his shoulder, stopping his momentum. It didn't even stop there when a third and final Egg Pawn ran up from the side and ran its lance all the way through Sorun's right thigh.

All the sounds of fighting that had been going on all around went silent. Everybody, even the surrounding Badniks, had gone completely still as everybody present looked towards the skewered human standing in front of the Freedom Fighters. Sorun himself had turned his head towards the group, his face remaining impassive when he saw everybody staring at him with wide, horrified eyes.

And then he looked ahead and downwards at the lance impaling him and made an annoyed sound. "I just got this coat."

His palm shot outwards and hit the face of the Badnik standing in front of him that'd impaled his chest. Much to the surprise of everybody staring, its face had crumpled in and its body had been sent flying back a good twenty meters before sliding to a stop. The other two Egg Pawns impaling Sorun silently turned their heads towards the Badnik that had been knocked so far back, with another dying when Sorun's hand grabbed its mechanical head and crushed it completely in his grasp.

"I freakin' swear, that crazy cat'd kill me if I wasn't already dying if she saw this," Sorun grumpily thought to himself. He turned around and began to approach the Freedom Fighters, having removed and tossed away the lance in his leg in the process. The final Egg Pawn, the one holding onto the lance stuck into his shoulder, was dragged right behind Sorun as it maintained its hold on its lance. Sorun briefly paused, reached behind him, and then grasped the lance only to pull it out of his shoulder. And then he threw the lance, the Badnik skirting away after losing losing its hold on the lance, and then fell onto its back.

It hadn't been able to get up before Sorun tore the lance out of his chest and threw it with enough force that it buried itself all the way to the hilt in the robot's midsection. Its lights dimmed immediately after.

"Ahhh..." With a satisfied sigh, he ran a hand through his white hair, and then turned around to the Mobians behind him. He found it a positive they didn't look horrified anymore. More bewildered than anything else. He turned his head to the front of the pack, where he saw Sally standing closer to him than anybody else. She had the same deer-caught-in-headlights look that the rest of the Freedom Fighters and Chaotix had. "We're not too late, are we?" Sorun asked her in a bland tone.

"Um... no, you're a bit earlier than expected, actually..." She said. Sally then quickly cleared her to regain her composure as she looked Sorun in the eyes after forcing herself to look up from the hole in his chest that had sealed itself. "Are you okay? You just, um... got stabbed."

"Yeah, 'cause guess who got a sweet new regeneration power from the last Emerald?" He waved his regenerated right arm at the group, and then pointed at his right eye. "Do you see the point?"

There had been the beginnings of smiles that began to spread around to everybody when they saw Sorun's condition. And then he'd made the pun, and all the growing smiles dropped right down to flat looks all around, all directed at Sorun. Flat stares and an awkward silence that made Sorun unconsciously shuffle his feet as he began to regret what he'd said.

"... Ohhh, I get it! Eet iz because he iz having both of ze eyeballs now-!"

Somebody punched Antoine's arm. He shut up with a startled yelp.

"This is why I don't do puns," Sorun groaned to himself as a scowling Shadow walked to his side. "Alright, bottom line, thank you for the concern but I am quite literally better than ever."

"Are you sure there isn't anything else worth mentioning?" Shadow asked. Sorun turned to him to see the dark hedgehog's eyes boring into his own. "Something vitally important?"

Sorun shrugged. "Eh, it can wait. No need to distract anybody right now. 'Sides, it ain't all that important."

Shadow blinked, giving Sorun a look like he'd just been slapped across the face. "Not important...?" he'd repeated in a quiet voice. If Sorun's vision wasn't so good right now he would have thought he'd hallucinated seeing Shadow actually look hurt for a second there. But he'd dropped that look immediately, going back to his normal scowl as he turned to the side towards Sally, who was looking back and forth between them with an odd look. "I noticed not everybody's here," he said.

"Well, Rotor's flying around in the Special to draw this ship's attention-" Sally began, though was cut off when Shadow held his hand up.

"No, I mean Rouge," he clarified. "Did she not show up?"

Sally shook her head. "We haven't seen her or heard any word from her."

A look of surprise flashed across Shadow's face. "That isn't right..."

"Maybe she got lost. No helping it now." Sorun nodded his head behind him as he turned around. "We still got all that to deal with."

The runway on the ship was still filled with robots that were all staring at the massive group. Sorun was less focused on them and more on the giant ship behind them all that the runway was attached to. He stared with loathsome eyes at the robots blocking the way as Yamato appeared in his hands.

"Useless pests." Slowly, he began to draw the sword from the scabbard. "Serious question. Eggman on the ship somewhere?" Sorun asked as he turned his head to Sally.

His eyebrows rose a bit when he saw her nod. "As far as we can figure, yes. He taunted all of us through the ship's loudspeaker a bit before you got here."

"Sounds like him." Just when the sword was fully removed, Sorun heard a zipping sound right next to him. He glanced to the side just enough to see Sonic looking at him with a half-exhausted, half-relieved look.

"Man, Sorun, why do you gotta act so scary all the time?" he asked with a loud sigh. "I know you can heal now and everything, but do you really have to go and get stuck like that? Doesn't it hurt?"

"Ehhhhh I pretty much just ignore it," Sorun lightly replied.

Sonic sighed and shook his head. "You really do have a high pain tolerance, huh?" He looked past Sorun and at Sally. "So what are we doing here?"

"I was thinking..."

The rest of what Sally was saying was tuned out by Sorun as he continued to stare ahead. A slight scowl formed on his face at the sight of all the robots. The incredibly weak robots, at least compared to how strong he was now. Robots that only served to stall him and waste more of his time. "Maybe during all the fighting I can pull time stop and slip past 'em all. Most of the forces are probably out here, so the inside should be relatively clear. Even if it isn't, well... doesn't really matter now, does it?" His grip tightened around Yamato's handle. "No matter what, I need to get to him before I run out of time."

"Alright, so we're just gonna blast our way forwards?" Sonic's voice drew Sorun's attention, causing him to glance towards the hedgehog again as he continued talking to Sally. "Kinda a blunt plan for you, isn't it?"

"Well, we don't really have a lot of choices right now, do we?" she countered as she nodded to the horde of robots all in front of them. "It's all in or bust at this point. Our only option's to push onwards."

"So we're going with charging forwards with reckless abandon?" Sorun asked. "Yeah, sure, I can get behind that."

Without another word, he Tricked right in front of the closest Egg Pawn.

"Alright, let's see if I can actually get this to work..." He knew early on trying to mimic the movements and sword techniques of a video game character was fruitless. Not because he didn't know the moves. He knew them intrinsically from burning every frame of their animations into his memory just to get through those games on all the highest difficulties, to visualize the hitboxes. Sorun knew the movements perfectly. The problem was at the time he wasn't a video game character like Vergil and just didn't have the supernatural hand-eye coordination or dexterity to pull Dark Slayer style off. So he'd had to rely on more conventional, basic swordplay to effectively use the katana he used.

With this body, that logic wasn't so applicable anymore.

It'd... half worked, somewhat, when he tried. The execution was flawless. Sorun had jumped in the air while spinning around with his sword at the same time, hitting the Egg Pawn and lifting it into the air right in front of him while doing so. The issue came in that he was still using a magical katana that cut through everything, and the Egg Pawn wasn't a video game enemy. So when it rose high up in the air along with Sorun, it fell away in two halves as a dropping Sorun watched them fall with a somewhat disappointed look.

"... Why do I even try anymore?" He mentally sighed at himself, and then Tricked in front of a whole group of Badniks. He'd appeared in a low stance, sheathed katana in his left hand with his right hovering over the handle. He grabbed it, pulled the sword out in a single slash, and then pushed it back into the scabbard only to pull it out again. Over and over he'd rapidly pull the blade in and out of the sheath, unleashing countless slashes the robots and rending them to pieces in a blink of an eye. "This new body really is too great."

He slashed out one more time with enough force that Sorun's body slid forwards, behind the robots. He spun the sword around in his hand, and at the exact moment he'd slammed the sword back into its scabbard the robots fell apart into pieces. He spun on his feet and dashed forwards in a straight line, rapidly slashing at anything in his way before abruptly stopping and sliding on his feet until his momentum gave out. Again, he spun around and sheathed his sword, causing white sparks to fly out where the bottom of the sword met the scabbard. And again, a handful of robots became undone by his sword.

"Okay yeah, no, they're just way too weak for me now." He looked backwards, past all the robot corpses he'd just made. Both the Chaotix and Freedom Fighters were holding their own against the robots attacking them. And faring fairly well, too, seeing as the Badnik numbers were dropping while the Mobians looked to be just getting started. "Screw it, they can handle themselves and I'm just wasting my time with the basic fodder. I'm cutting my way to the final boss."

If things were different, and he wasn't so limited on time, he would have stayed with them. Maybe showed off a bit more in front of some people just to try and milk some praise out of it, maybe even try and wow Antoine with the sword skills he could use now. He doubted anybody even saw him do any of what he just did since they were all so preoccupied fighting. He didn't even have enough time to stop and appreciate just how strong he'd become now to consider killer robots he'd once feared as mere fodder. Annoyances to be cut down without a thought.

He didn't even have enough time to think about how much of a shame it was.

To that end, he'd used Quicksilver to stop time completely. He sprinted past all the frozen robots at speeds he was sure normal human senses would have grown nauseous over, and in a time so short he could scarcely comprehend it Sorun had made it all the way to the front of the ship the runway was connected to, at the back of the Badnik horde. He barely held back the scoff that formed on his lips before he turned around and cut an entrance into the ship.

He heard a peculiar sound just as the hole was made by the cut. A loud spinning sound mixed in with the sound of countless robots behind Sorun being shredded. He turned around, shocked to see a blue form spinning through dozens and dozens and dozens of robots as it span through the air right towards Sorun. In the span of what Sorun counted to be one or two seconds Sonic alone had cut through what was probably around a hundred Badniks of various types before stopping on his feet right in front of Sorun. He didn't look the least bit worst for wear. He was even smirking at Sorun.

"Hey, man, what's the hurry?" Sonic asked a wide-eyed Sorun in a carefree voice. "Fight's back there."

"Hhh..." Getting over his shock quickly, Sorun nodded his head at the entrance into the ship he cut in. "Everybody out here has things handled. I figured I'd take a shot at the big man while a majority of the robots out here are distracted."

"Yeah, I kind of figured you'd go and pull a move like that," Sonic commented, yet again making some surprise grow in Sorun. He was surprised for a third time when Sonic glanced over his shoulder, shrugged, and looked back at Sorun. "I guess you got a point," he admitted. "No way a bunch of two-bit bots are gonna get the better of all of them, especially when they're together like that." He gave Sorun an even bigger, almost competitive smirk. "You got a whole lot more than just healing and a new hairdo out of that Emerald, huh? I saw those moves back there."

Sorun perked up a bit in silent pride. "Maaaybe," he evasively answered in a coy tone. "Were they a bit too fast for you to make out?"

Sonic rolled his eyes. "You're pretty fast now, but you ain't that fast," he said. "Seriously, though, what's with the hair?"

"It turned white on its own, I don't know, is this really the time?"

"I guess not. I swear, those Emeralds give you the weirdest stuff..." Sonic clicked his tongue and pointed a finger gun at Sorun. "I think it's a neat look for ya, actually. I bet Nicole'll really like it!"

Sorun's entire body flinched. He deeply frowned at the reminder of her, and then turned his head away from Sonic. "Why did you have to go bring her up?" he quietly asked.

"Ahh, no reason. Just teasin'." Sonic stepped forwards a bit so he was at Sorun's side, his green eyes staring at the hole in the ship. "Anyways, if you're heading directly towards Egghead himself I may as well join in. Everybody else has our backs covered. Sound good?"

No, it assuredly did not sound good. Sorun didn't want anybody getting in his way of killing Eggman, and Sonic already proved he was somebody that would actively get in the way of him doing just that. But unfortunately, saying no to something as sensible as Sonic's suggestion without a good reason wouldn't deter him with going ahead with accompanying Sorun anyways. And try as he might, Sorun couldn't think of a good reason to get Sonic to stay behind.

And so, with a sigh, Sorun nodded his head. "Fine. Just don't slow me down."

"Hah! All that new power the Chaos Emerald gave you is going to your head a bit, isn't it?" With a laugh, Sonic began walking towards the hole in the ship. "Well, come on, Sorun! Let's do it to it!"

The words he'd heard elicited an almost pained groan from Sorun. He stared after Sonic's spiky backside, and his face wrinkled in an unpleasant way at the hedgehog's phrase. "I'm almost glad I'm dying just so I never have to hear that again," he quietly muttered under his breath as he began following after Sonic.

There were all sorts of humbling experiences Sorun had experienced in life. Humbling experiences that served educational purposes he begrudgingly accepted. Seeing Mobians in the Freedom Fighters that displayed abilities far above his own, at least months ago, had always made some hopeless pit form in Sorun's stomach at seeing just how generally better or smarter or more powerful everyone around him was and how he was basically nothing compared to them.

Things like being beaten at video games by Nicole was humbling in that it was exciting. She was his only equal there in that area. The only person that could challenge him and make him really enjoy his favorite pastime. The constant back-and-forth between them was exhilerating. But everything he did with her was exciting, so he didn't know if that counted.

Then there was this. Seeing Sonic cut through swarms of Badniks as he and Sorun pushed deeper into the ship. If they bothered to keep track of the numbers, Sonic would be far ahead of Sorun in terms of the sheer number of robots he'd dismantled. Even before that, on the runway on top of the ship when Sonic had blown through a hundred robots in the blink of an eye Sorun had begun wondering.

"I always knew he was powerful. Still though..." He'd known all the way back when he'd watched Sonic cut through anti-air guns probably thirty or fifty times his own size like they were nothing while Sorun watched from the safety of a circling plane. He knew when he fought with him at that factory that Sonic was a lot more powerful than he acted. That little display of Sonic's on that runway, though, with all those Badniks. Even now, as the two made their way through the interior of the ship, with Sorun merely lazily slashing away at the odd robot while Sonic effortlessly blitzed through the rest. Even with his newfound speed it seemed to Sorun like Sonic was just making a light jog to keep up with him and destroy all the robots in their way.

"Just how strong is Sonic really?"

"Kinda feelin' like you're slacking here, Sorun!" Sonic called out as he spun through yet again another robot. He landed on the ground already matching Sorun's pace as they ran through the metal halls. "And here I figured you'd wanna show off your new powers a bit more!"

He did, once. Until Sonic started showing off. And the knowledge of the time limit he was on in the back of his mind was still keeping Sorun down. "I think I showed off enough," he replied in a terse voice.

"Why you gotta be so serious? We're doing great," Sonic boasted. "'Sides, we've cleared out so much of this place I doubt there's much else left."

"You say that now..." Sorun muttered in response. They were coming up on another large door, one of many that had been blocking their path forwards deeper into the ship. Like the previous doors, this one had been swiftly cut through by Sorun's Yamato.

The two of teens had slowed down to a small walk, and then stopped completely when they came to the next room. Massive. Spacious. Circular. The kind of room Sorun had grown accustomed to Eggman using whenever he wanted to throw something big at someone, which made his shoulders slump a bit. The fact there was a giant TV monitor hanging on the other end of the room did nothing to curb his suspicions.

And just like clockwork, the TV flickered to life. It went through some static at first, and then switched to a broadcast of Eggman. Nothing surprising there. Sorun focused less on the man himself and more on seeing as much of the background behind Eggman as much as possible. He was pleased to find that most of the metal interior he saw greatly resembled what he and Sonic had seen as they ran through the ship. He most assuredly was somewhere close.

"Well, if it isn't Sonic and... Sorun?" Hearing his voice drew the white-haired Earthling's attention towards the screen. Eggman, oddly enough, looked a bit confused as seeing Sorun standing next to Sonic. "What are you... wait, did you- did you dye your hair?" He leaned closer to the monitor and readjusted his blue-tinted spectacles. "I-I'm confused, what's going on here?"

Sorun blinked. He didn't know what to expect out of him, but that kind of reaction hadn't been one he'd ever dream of. Him being clueless as to why Sorun was standing there. What had he expected after having just left the Emerald there for him to grab?

"It's from the last Chaos Emerald," Sorun announced to him in a slow voice. "The one you so graciously left for me in that storage facility."

"... No?" The explanation for some reason only served to make Eggman even more confused. "I'm, uh... I'm pretty sure that was a fake signal I set up. There wasn't a Chaos Emerald there. Just a trap." A beat passed. "How did you get past my trap?"

It was Sorun's turn to look confused. "There was no trap."

"Come again?"

"There was no trap."

His lips thinning, Eggman tapped at the side of the monitor at something. The microphone, Sorun assumed, from the small booming sound that came from the monitor's speaker. "Err, Sorun, I don't think the audio receptors here are picking up the sound right. Finicky things, you know how it is. Could you speak up louder?"

"Eggman, there wasn't a trap," Sorun called up in a slightly louder voice. "There were a bunch of busted-up robots, but no trap. The Chaos Emerald was just sitting there waiting for me. I'd thank you for just giving it to me freely, but... well, I'm starting to think that wasn't your intention."

"But that doesn't make any-!" Eggman cut himself off at the same time his entire body went rigid in realization. "Oh, that interloper..."

He'd venomously hissed out. There'd been so much spite that seemed to be running through him that he'd even went as far as to bang his fist on something nearby.

Sorun blinked again and tilted his head. "Does he know the Emeralds are... no, that's impossible, and it doesn't explain the dead robots. What does he mean by interloper?" he thought. Sonic, meanwhile, had placed his hands on his hips and began to impatiently tap his foot on the ground at a rapid pace as he glared up at the TV screen.

"Save it for somebody who cares, Doc," Sonic called up. "Come on, we all know the drill at this point. Show us the big, bad new Badnik you cooked up so we can whoop its butt and move on to you."

"You obstinate... ergh, fine. Have it your way." Eggman extended his finger and reached out to press a button that was outside the viewing of the screen the two teens were watching. "We'll see just how far that attitude of yours will carry you when you get a look at my newest creation!"

A loud whirring sound reached the ears of both Sonic and Sorun. They looked up towards the ceiling, bored expressions plastering both their faces, as a large aperture in the ceiling began to open up. No sooner did it finish opening did something large drop in from the new hole in the ceiling, and then land on the ground in the center of the room with enough force that the ground underneath the teens' feet shook slightly. They both continued to watch with bored, unimpressed faces as the new Badnik in front of them began to slowly stand up.

"It's gonna take a lot more than some quick footwork and a new hairstyle to take this one down, boys." It was a much sleeker robot than most of the other ones of Eggman's make that Sorun had encountered. A thin, bipedal form with sleek, nearly seamless silver plating. A thin torso and limbs, and a head that was actually shaped like a head and featureless save for two round, red sensors for its eyes. Its left hand, both of which sported pointed, metal fingers, was empty. In the right one, which earned an eye raise form Sorun, was a katana. A gigantic, thick katana whose blade length looked more than twice as long as Sorun's whole body. "I've taken to call this one the Egg Ninja."

"Egg Ninja, huh?" Sorun looked down at the katana held in his right hand, scoffed, and then looked up at the giant Badnik four times his size standing in the center of the room. Both he and Sonic slowly began to walk towards it side by side, with Sorun raising his left hand and slowly wagging his finger left and right at the robot. "You should come to realize that copying my weapon will serve you no good."

"A cheap imitation ain't gonna get ya anywhere, Eggman," Sonic added. "Just give it up now so we can save everyone some time and go home."

"We'll just have to see about that, won't we?" Eggman snarked back at them. "Egg Ninja! Attack them!"

The large Badnik, practically skeletal from how it was constructed, swiveled its head down to look directly at the two teens that stopped right in front of it. For a brief second, red light flared out from its round, red eye-sensors, and soon after it had rose up its huge, broad katana. Sorun rose his eyes up to lazily follow the machine's movements, and right as the katana was risen far above its head, it swung down towards Sorun in particular.

Slow. It was the only word he could use to describe how slowly the edge of the large katana was bearing down on him. Not that the machine itself was slow- in fact, Sorun suspected if he was running on normal human reflexes it would have swung too fast for him to react in time, and he would have had to rely on Sonic to save him. But with this new body and its reflexes, the blade was slow to him. Painfully slow, almost. So much that, when its edge had just reached him, all he had to do was lazily hold up his own katana to block the Egg Ninja's.

A loud clang! sound resounded throughout the room from the contact of the blades. Sparks flew out from the contact, the force from the strike had blown some of the teen's hair back, and while Sorun's arm and sword were completely still, he could see and even feel the Badnik's arm and sword shake from the effort of keeping the deadlock between them going. For Sorun, all he felt was a moderate amount of pressure pressing down on Yamato. Sonic stood off to the side, arms crossed and mouth in a smirk as he watched the display.

"Not bad for a new haircut, huh?" Sorun muttered out. Blue energy flowed up the length of Yamato, after which Sorun pushed the blade further. It effortlessly cut through the Egg Ninja's katana with such force that the half of the blade that had been cut away flew high and above Sorun and Sonic, spinning end over end through the air before it fell to the ground. Its tip impaled the ground just behind Sorun and Sonic, who stood unflinching as they glanced at each other.

"Alright, alright, not bad," Sonic complimented. "You got the cool factor down pat, the one-liner was on point, and the sharp bit landing behind us was a nice touch. I'll give it a eight outta ten."

Sorun made a half-amused snort. "Such high standards," he drawled out in response. "You wanna finish it off? I can't be bothered to fight a knock-off."

"Yeah, sure thing." Sonic looked back up at the Egg Ninja, which began to back off away from the two. "What was that thing you said once? Spin to win?"

"You got it." There was a blue flash as one of Sorun's Bringer Claws appeared. It opened its hand up to the ceiling and hovered next to Sonic. "You ever hear of a Fastball Special?"

Sonic looked down at the large, blue hand next to him. His smirk grew into a wide grin. "Nope, but I think I can figure it out." He looked up at Sorun. "We throwin'?"

"We throwin'."

A look of complete understanding was passed between the two of them. Without needed any instruction Sonic jumped up into the air and began spinning. His spinning, spherical blue form fell right into the open palm of the Bringer Claw, which began to rear back in preparation. Blue, ethereal sparks began flying to the sides of the palm as Sonic's spines inadvertently ground into the spectral hand holding his spinning form. Sorun paid this little mind, and instead focused on aiming at the center of the Egg Ninja.

Sorun's Bringer Arm threw Sonic soon after.

Even Sorun's newly-enhanced perception couldn't keep up with Sonic as he flew threw the air. It was less his ball-like form collided with the Badnik and more like a straight, blue line had just instantly appeared in the air and punched right through the silver robot's chest. The line went all the way to the back of the room, to the TV that had once displayed Eggman's shocked face before Sonic had made contact and shattered the monitor completely. His body continued to zoom around, his ball-like form trailing a blue speed line behind him as he passed through the Egg Ninja multiple times, separating limbs, its head, and rendering its torso to smaller and smaller pieces.

It'd all taken place in a fraction of the time it took Sorun to blink.

Once he had blinked the robot was already falling to the floor in pieces, with Sonic standing right there in front of Sorun. He looked as smug as ever, and even a bit excited.

"Whoo! We gotta do that one more often!" A light chuckle left Sonic as he made a small hop, stretching his neck left and right while Sorun stared at him. "What'd you call it? Fastball Special? Yeah, yeah I really like it. It's got a real nice ring to it."

"... Your speed's kind of scary, Sonic," Sorun breathed out as he sheathed Yamato. "I'm probably fast enough to catch bullets out of the air now and I still can barely follow you when you move like that."

"Ah, well, what can I say?" Sonic asked with a wide grin and a shrug. "Speed's my game, and I'm the best player in it."

"You're the kind of person that dumps all their points into dex, aren't you?" A sudden sound reached Sorun's ears and made his head perk up. Metal footsteps on a metal surface. "Mm?" He turned his head around. "Shadow?"

The unexpected appearance of the black and red hedgehog caused surprise on the part of both Sorun and Sonic. Sorun more at seeing that look he had on his face. He looked disturbed and angry at the same time, though he was trying to hide it from the slight strain Sorun saw on his face. He didn't seem to be doing a good job of it, and somewhere deep down he felt a bit guilty at seeing the expression on Shadow's face.

Sonic didn't seem to pick up on it, though, perhaps mistaking it for Shadow's usual dour mood, and chose to wave at the other Mobian. "Yo! Shads! How's everything going outside?"

Somehow, Shadow managed to add a grimace on top of everything else on his face. "Not poorly, but things could be better," he said. "How's the situation in here?"

"Well, Eggman had this shiny-new death bot all ready and waiting for us," Sorun said, right before softly kicked at one of the pieces of the Egg Ninja that'd rolled to his feet. "Wanna say it lasted, like, a minute. And most of that was just Eggman monologuing." He looked back to Shadow. "Probably not much more resistance in here with everything we cut through to get here and all the robots that're outside."

Sorun looked right into Shadow's eyes when Sonic finished speaking. The unsaid message seemed to be received by him based on the deep sigh he gave. Following that, he turned towards Sonic.

"I think the others could use our assistance outside with the remaining Badniks," he said, and then turned to Sorun. "Could you deal with the Doctor before he escapes?"

"Yeah," Sorun said. "Of course."

Sonic, still acting as his usual self, interlocked his hands behind his quills while looking at Shadow. "The 'Ultimate Lifeform' can't handle a bunch of bots with everyone else helping? Eh, I guess there were a lot of 'em. Wouldn't want anyone to get hurt." He glanced back at Sorun. "Hey, go try and capture him if you want, but if it's lookin' too dicey just fall back." He gave Sorun a pointed look. " Capture . Got it?"

"'Course."

Sonic maintained that look he was giving Sorun for a few moments. Long enough that the Earthling began to assume he didn't believe him when he said that. But then he'd simply began grinning a bit and turned around.

"Alright, I'm out. See you in a bit, Sorun!"

He zoomed off in a blue blur right after, back out the way he and Sorun had come in originally. Both Sorun and Shadow stared after him, and once he'd disappeared from their sight they turned towards each other. That angry, disturbed look remained on the half-hedgehog's face, while Sorun's devolved into a sad frown.

"It really looking bad out there?" Sorun asked.

Shadow shook his head. "No. There's still many out there, but everybody's dealing with them handily. But it should be enough of a distraction for the blue hedgehog that you can proceed uninhibited to Robotnik."

"..." Sorun looked off to the side. At an open corridor that likely lead further down into the ship. Towards where Eggman was. "Thanks, Shadow." He looked back at the Mobian. "Are you coming with?"

"I'll... stay with Sonic and the others," he said. "To try and stall them. Give you time to do what's needed." He made a deep breath. "How are you feeling?"

"... Tired," he admitted to him. "Not by much. It's getting worse the longer I go on. And when I finally go to sleep, I... I don't think I'll wake up." Sorun exhaled through his nose and turned away. "I... I, I never managed to think up any last words. Don't got any final messages or anything like that for anyone. So this is goodbye."

"Sorun." He only made it a few steps before Shadow called out his name, making him stop. "I... I'm sorry this happened to you."

"What are you sorry for? You're the only one that didn't agree to use that portal to drag someone into this world." He began walking forwards again. "At least tell the others I don't blame them. Especially Tails. This might mess him up a bit. And tell Nicole..." He stopped to consider his words, but then shook his head and kept moving on. "N-never mind, don't tell her anything. It's not important."

He felt a hand roughly grab his shoulder and whirl him around before he could get any further. He was met with Shadow's crimson eyes staring directly into his blue orbs. Pained and conflicted, looking like he wanted to shout at Sorun. All he could manage was to deeply sigh and let go of Sorun as he stared at the hedgehog with a lifeless, sad look.

"You shouldn't have to be going through this," Shadow mumbled out. "There's truly nothing I can do to help?"

Sorun's eyes glanced away from Shadow. He made a small sigh, and then placed his right palm on Shadow's shoulder. "It was real knowin' you, Shadow." The hand limply slid off his shoulder, followed by Sorun turning around. "I don't have time to mope about myself anymore. I have a job to do."

He started walking forwards again. Shadow's arm twitched when it threatened to reach out to him one more time, but with a subdued breath he had it stay at his side. He whirled around right after, and the two took off in opposite directions.

"Useless things everywhere."

Slash!

"Where is he?"

Slash!

"Where where where...?"

Sorun hadn't pictured the end of his life being a mad dash through the metal innards of a flying ship as he desperately searched for a mad scientist to kill him with a magic katana from a video game, but here he was, doing just such a thing. He hadn't imagined it'd be while he was so young, either, but he made do.

He hadn't been embellishing that much when he told Shadow he'd been feeling a bit tired. That's really all it had been: a bit of exhaustion. The deeper he went, though, and the longer he spent looking and cutting through any robots in his way, the more that sensation grew.

There wasn't any pain. Just growing exhaustion. Weariness. Weakness. He could even feel his heartbeat begin to slow. Not at an alarming pace. It was more gradual, slowing at such a minute pace he hadn't noticed it until the change was significant, and even then Sorun was too preoccupied cutting through all these Badniks as he searched for Robotnik.

Nothing mattered to him but finding and killing that man before he died. It was his sole focus.

His sword cut through yet another robot. More, dozens and dozens more, stood in his way in the wide, metal corridor Sorun had found himself in. He breathed in and out heavily, dark oil dripping off the edge of his katana as he stared at the crowd of robots with hateful eyes.

"I know Robotnik programmed you all with limited intelligence and fear." Sorun began to quickly walk forwards while brandishing his sword. "So unless you want to die, I suggest YOU GET THE HELL OUT OF MY WAY!"

Some actually had moved aside to allow Sorun to pass. Around half of them. They'd begun shaking, some dropped their weapons, and they moved aside to allow Sorun to run through. Others didn't, and tried to run him through with their own weapons. They were all cut down in what may as well have been an instant.

He didn't stop to look at the Badniks as their pieces hit the floor. He only continued moving forwards.

"Well, maybe we can make it a regular thing. Yeah, after the big mission tomorrow we'll all come here to celebrate. We could even make it a regular thing after missions. It'd be really nice, huh?"

Sonic's words kept getting stuck in Sorun's head as he continued cutting through robots.

What would Sorun have given just to have a quiet day enjoying time at a diner with everybody just like old times? Like at that party they'd all had? Times where he could shut out the world's problems and just enjoy life, if just for a few moments. Mobians were the kind of people that acted like that's what they always wanted to do. Sorun could respect it, strive to live like that, in fact. Maybe that's why he liked them so much.

Mobians were simple. Easy to understand, generally enjoyed living life for the sake of life. Had a tendency for wanting to preserve nature and life. Sally had once told Sorun Mobians avoided going into an industrial revolution just so they didn't pollute the environment. Didn't stop them from developing highly advanced technology, but Chaos energy in the form of the Power Rings and such made this kind of thing a possibility. For all the trouble it caused Sorun personally, it was actually the cleanest source of energy imaginable. That and all the weird sorts of technology and apparent magic this world had was probably the only reason Mobians made it so far without poisoning the planet on their end.

It was something that resonated with Sorun. The desire to preserve life. Most Mobians he met possessed this quality to some extent. Annoying at times, such as when Sonic stopped Sorun from killing Eggman, but... he still thought it was nice. That they thought all life was a precious thing that needed to be protected so everybody could live in peace. It was a philosophy of theirs developed to a point it wasn't some naïve, innocent idea but a true code they lived by. The Freedom Fighters being formed and the lengths they'd gone to protect as many people as possible and overthrow Eggman to save the world said enough about their tenacity in defending this point. They simply did it because they wanted everybody to be free to live happily, and even if they had to go so far as to fight for it, they'd fight for it. Not naïve. Just determined, hopeful.

Sorun liked that about them, could even understand the logic. He'd be a fool going this far to save them if he didn't.

But there was just something to their pure nature that was so alluring to him. He just couldn't tell why. Traits they all wore on their sleeves that made them so easy to read and be around. Antoine and his loyal and cowardly nature, the latter of which Sorun had seen him drop when it was most important. Sally and her love of all the people that lived in the Republic of Acorn. Sonic and that childish, competitive attitude of his that fitted over his desire to help others purely because he was that good a person. Most Mobians were good like that. They had their ugly sides, too, but who didn't? Sorun'd be more worried if there weren't flaws. At least with them they were easy to see. Another nice trait he liked about them.

Part of why he just couldn't find it in himself to damn them to a doomed future was just because he liked these people too much. They were just too... good. In every sense of the word. And he liked them. Liked being around them. Liked not having to think so hard just to interact with them, that he could just relax around them and focus more on enjoying life. He simply enjoyed living with Mobians.

He would have liked little more than to just hang out at a diner with all his friends and not have to worry about him dying just so he could save them.

"Getting closer..."

He was down there, cutting through swarms of Badniks just to get to Robotnik. And he'd get there, too, which was the problem. Why he was needed here, Rubrum supposed.

He couldn't let Sorun kill Eggman. As much as he'd love to see Sorun cut him down with his sword, or even do it himself, he just couldn't. Wasn't in His backwards-ass plan Rubrum couldn't comprehend. It was maddening to know the why of why he had to stop Sorun and not know the why of why it had to be like this specifically. But what did he know? He was just the idiot following what the list told him.

It'd be leagues easier if he didn't have to do it without Sorun seeing him, though.

"Ugh, what a pain..." With a sigh, Rubrum looked down from his position, at the large bridge Sorun had just run through cleaving down robots left and right. He rose his right hand up from his side, arcs of red energy and red, ethereal cubes flowing around the appendage. "I guess I'll have to twist reality a bit to make this work."

"Hey. Nicole. I want to ask you something."

The edges of his vision were blacking out. His heartrate was at a rate he didn't want to think about. Exhaustion was making him breath heavily. His whole body was feeling more and more heavy by the minute.

"Hm? Of course, Sorun. What is it?"

He remembered this conversation. They'd had it at the hospital, when she'd found the time to play some games with him after he'd taken the game system from the HQ. It'd been a question he wanted to ask her for no other reason than it had been at the back of his mind, bugging him. And deep down he'd already known the answer. But he couldn't help from asking anyways.

"How... how upset would you be if I died? Just, you know, hypothetically speaking."

She'd paused the game and then slowly set the controller down, and then turned to him while giving him a quizzical look. "Why would you ask such a question?"

"... Morbid curiosity?"

Her ears had flattened a bit, and she'd given him a look that almost seemed disappointed in some way. "I'm not sure what would cause you to think up such a thing." Her ears had straightened out as she looked down in thought. "I would understandably be quite distraught, as I'm sure would be the reaction of everybody that knows you, Sorun. Is that not the appropriate reaction to somebody close to you dying?"

"Is that what we are, Nicole? Close?"

"We are friends, are we not?"

Sorun had been forced to look away from her. "The best," he'd said to her. "You were the only one I felt comfortable with befriending before anybody else. I never did tell you thanks for putting up with me for so long."

"I've never felt burdened by being with you, Sorun." He looked back to her in surprise when he heard that. He'd felt complete shock when he saw the lynx smiling at him. "I thoroughly enjoy spending time with you. You're... quite special to me. Which is why I would be so distraught should you meet a premature end to your life." Without missing a beat, she'd picked the controller back up to return to the game. "But you're well on the way to recovery. There's no need to worry about you dying."

"Yeah," Sorun confirmed as he grasped his own controller. "Of course."

A Judgement Cut sliced a Egg Hammer that had been standing in Sorun's way to pieces. "Why does it feel like I'm just as worried over hurting you as I am dying, Nicole?" Sorun wondered to himself as he continued running forwards. "Why, in these final moments, did it have to be you in my thoughts? Why does just thinking about your name keep pushing me forwards? It's not like I'm doing this just for you. It's for everyone. So why?"

He'd turned a corner so fast he was forced to drag his hand along the ground just to turn sharply enough without losing much momentum. He'd pushed his fingers into the metal ground hard enough to leave small trenches.

"It's always been you that I think about the most. I don't know why. Because you were the only one that brought some sense of normalcy in this fucked up situation of mine? Because we got along and bonded so quickly? Because you were there for me?" Sorun thought. "Did I really, truly like you that much? I'm glad I never told you so I didn't make it any worse for you, but... I don't know. I don't know what I'm even supposed to do with those kinds of thoughts."

More robots in his way. More cutting. More exhaustion and greater weakness in his body.

"What would you say to me if you knew what I was doing to myself, Nicole? Would you call me a fool? Try to stop me, talk me out of it maybe? What could you do?" Black oil stained the walls as Sorun cleaved through yet another group of Badniks. "Nicole. Nicole, Nicole, Nicole... I just don't know how to deal with any of this."

He'd had to take a small break somewhere down the line. Inside some large hallway with exposed, open holes in the walls that revealed more of the hollow interior of the ship beyond it. There'd been a small stack of metal crates nearby Sorun that he'd chosen to sat down in. He'd heaved out a large breath once he settled down on the crate, sheathed katana loosely held in his left hand as he held his forehead with his right.

Just a few minutes. He just needed some time to rest before he kept going forwards.

"How big is this fucking place anyways?" Sorun quietly gasped out as he shook his head. "Goddammit, you couldn't have made it easy for me in this last stretch?"

"When's it ever been easy, bro?"

It was a voice that sounded close and distant at the same time. Like it wasn't all the way there. It was familiar, too, though at this point even if he wasn't exhausted Sorun didn't think he would have been surprised to hear it. So what he'd done was simply let his hand fall away from his head as he looked to his left.

There wasn't any reaction at all when he saw a blonde-haired human sitting next to him, smiling wide enough to show teeth as he looked at him.

"What is this, some near-death hallucination shit I'm pulling on myself now?" Sorun muttered to him.

The blonde human shrugged. "What kind of friend would I be if I wasn't there for you right before you died?" he asked. "That said, I don't have a clue what's happening, either. Hallucination's only thing that makes sense to me, so, eh, let's go with it."

"Fuck it, why not?" Sorun made a half-wave and turned his head towards the ground. "Hey, Dave." He was too tired to think about it. And it this point he'd take some familiar company, even if it was in his head. He didn't care anymore. He wanted to talk to somebody, even if they were an illusion.

"Yo," David greeted back. "Sorun, man, nice to see you." He glanced up at the ceiling. "Yeah, nice to see you in this... weird, dank-ass metal hallway. Where the hell's here, anyways?"

"You won't believe it. I got sucked into a world full of furry people and super powers and all other sorts of crazy shit," Sorun said. "All because I made the mistake of wanting to buy some orange juice on a school night. Like one of those freakin' isekai shows. 'Cept I didn't get a Truck-kun. I got a desperate fox kid that pulled me through a magic portal 'cause I was supposed to be the last, grand hope for the planet." A sardonic, mocking laugh left Sorun. "Some savior I am. All I am is somebody who got crushed under all the pressure and has to hallucinate his best friend just to cope with it all now. It's driving me insane, Dave. It all is."

"Heavy."

"Mm," Sorun hummed out in agreement. "I even got some powers of my own now," he continued, lifting up the katana for Dave to see.

He heard a disbelieving scoff from the hallucination. "You ganked Vergil's shit?" Dave said in disbelief. "I knew you really liked him, dude, but come on. You didn't have to go cosplay the guy."

"It's unoriginal as hell, sure, but I'm not gonna fault it considering everything the powers let me do," Sorun said. "Be even cooler if they weren't killing me, but what are you gonna do?"

There was a momentary pause. "Kind a deal breaker, yeah," Dave admitted, voice a bit quieter. "Damn, man... didn't realize that's how you were going out. That super sucks." A quiet moment passed. "So what are you gonna do?"

"Some magic echidna people said some maniacal scientist guy's gonna wreck the world unless I kill him before I die," Sorun explained. "So I'm on my way to go do that, since, well... the people here are alright, you know? Figured if I ever did anything decent with my life it might as well be this. I mean, psh, I'm not good for much all else."

"Aw, come on, man, don't put yourself down like that," Dave admonished in a teasing tone. "... Hell's an echidna?"

"It's like an anteater or something, I don't really know to be honest," Sorun admitted. He made a sigh and lifted his head up, and then leaned it back far enough that his head thunked against the metal wall behind him. He was still able to make out Dave's visage from the corner of his vision. "I think I grew a huge crush on this one girl while I was here."

He saw Dave perk right up when he heard that. Could almost feel his large smile turn coy. "Ahhh, that's what's this is about," he said. "Surprised you even think you have a shot for how short you are."

"Fuck off, my height's average here," Sorun bit out. "You'd like her. She plays better than you."

"There it is, of course that's what it took for somebody to finally get your damn attention..." Dave sighed out. "Fuckin' known each other since we were kids and you never batted an eye at a single girl, but the second you find one that can keep up with your game skills suddenly you're all-"

"Man, would you give it a rest!?" Sorun shouted out as he turned his head towards David. "It's more than that, you know? She's, like, nice and considerate and all that stuff..."

"Mm-hm, sure. Didn't you say this was a world full of fur-"

"She's an AI."

"Christ, a virtual girl. It's worse than I thought," David muttered out while palming his face. "How far you've fallen, Sorun. You went the path of Master Chief and fell in love with the computer lady while cutting out the middleman of the weird Freudian mom thing."

Yamato sailed through the air and passed through David's body.

"You know, for a hallucination that's supposed to be comforting me in my final moments, you're doing a shit job," Sorun deadpanned. He sighed, and then turned his head back forwards. "I'm so fuckin' scared, man," he said in a small voice. "It shoulda been you that got sent here. You would have been able to solve this whole mess with half the powers I got. You were better than me at practically everything except games."

"Well, yeah, I had the common fucking sense needed to duck when the bowling ball came for my face. Unlike you."

"I froze up, fuck you, it's a perfectly normal reaction!" Sorun yelled out as he turned back to David. They stared at each other for a few moments, both staring into each others eyes. It was broken off when Dave started to breathily chuckle under his breath, while Sorun made a more broken chuckle.

"So what now?" Dave asked as his own laughter subsided.

Sorun slowly shook his head. "Gotta go die now, I guess," he answered. "I thought I'd be ready for it, but I'm really fucking not. But it's either I just sit here and die or I go out saving the world, so... yeah." He re-summoned Yamato and used it as a crutch to lift himself up off the crate he was sitting on. "It's a raw-ass hand I've been dealt, Dave. Don't know how to deal, don't know how to process, I'm just-just trucking forwards and hoping for the best at this point."

"Not much else to do in that regard, I guess." Dave admitted. There was some movement Sorun saw, causing him to look up. He was greeted to the sight of David giving him a thumbs-up along with his teeth-baring smile. "But hey, goin' out to save the girl? Sounds like something a true man would do to me."

"It's about more than the girl, you damn dumbass." Despite his bitter tone, a small smile still formed on Sorun's face. "It's all over for me after this, Dave. So I guess it's bye forever."

"Seems so," said Dave with a sigh, sounding a bit more somber. "We had a hell of a time, bro. Good luck savin' the world."

"Yeah." Sorun blinked his eyes. When he opened his eyes back up, he was completely alone. The spot in front of him was vacant. "I'll do my best."

"FOUND YOU, MOTHERFUCKER!"

Of course he'd been all the way at the end of the ship where the engines were. Of course Eggman had been as far away in this thing as he could have possibly been. And of course it'd taken Sorun so long to get here that he was barely maintaining consciousness.

Oh, but he'd found his second wind when he'd entered that large room that was more like a cavern. It housed the back end of the building-sized engines that propelled the ship, and the backside of the ship had exposed segments that let Sorun look outside. None of this even registered with him, though, because near the center of the room, floating above halfway to the ceiling was him. Eggman. Sitting in a floating saucer.

Sorun had practically forgotten all about his exhaustion when he saw him. He could have sworn some of the blackness in his perception even faded a bit. In that moment, everything disappeared. The fear and the dread of dying. The sorrow of leaving everybody behind. His anger and rage at the unfairness of it all, the feeling of weakness weighing down his limbs. All of it, in that single instant, was wiped out and replaced by sheer determination when he saw Eggman floating in the center of the room.

Eggman, unfortunately, had also seen Sorun. There'd been a small shuttle parked near the back of the room that he seemed to have been making his way towards before he'd turned around to Sorun. His face had alit with panic and he'd pointed out to Sorun while shouting something. Sorun hadn't even been able to hear it as his Bringer Claws exploded out from his back and took off so fast that he was practically a speeding bullet rocketing towards Eggman.

Some of the winged Badniks had immediately flown in from all directions in an attempt to intercept Sorun and stall him as Eggman made his escape. Cuts from the Yamato and Summoned Swords destroyed and grounded them before they could even touch him. When Eggman saw his robots were doing nothing to slow Sorun down, he'd turned his saucer around and attempted to fly away towards the shuttle.

Sorun had Tricked right onto the lip of the saucer before he even took off.

Breathing heavily, Sorun looked down at Eggman. The panic that he'd had on his face earlier was rapidly transmogrifying into fear. He'd even scrambled back as far away as possible away from Sorun. He'd begun saying some words as sweat heavily beaded down his face, words that were completely lost on Sorun as he couldn't even hear much of anything anymore past a dull ring in his ears.

Whatever words Eggman had been saying cut right off when Sorun rose the sword up.

"Bye, Ivo."

He swung the sword down.

Everything turned red.

It'd been for a split second. In that second, quite simply, Sorun's sight had turned completely red. He wasn't so sure why, and for whatever reason he felt a shift in his body. Like his entire being had been tugged a certain direction even though he hadn't felt himself physically move. He felt his sword stab down into something, so he'd assumed the red had just been Eggman's blood splashing into his face.

But then the red faded. It wasn't blood. Sorun didn't know what it was other than it had only appeared for that single second. And when his vision returned, he looked down and saw what he was stabbing into.

It was just the edge of the saucer. He wasn't standing right in front of the Doctor. He was... standing to the side of him, for some reason. He'd somehow completely missed him and cleaved into the saucer instead of Eggman. For some reason he wasn't standing in the same position he'd been in when he'd stabbed down at Eggman.

Sorun blinked in confusion, and looked to the side at Eggman. If the look on his face said anything, he was just as clueless and bewildered as Sorun was at the moment. He tried to pay it no mind and ripped the sword out of the saucer in an attempt to try and slash at Eggman.

Thump.

A strangled gasp left Sorun. A great pain instantly appeared in his chest when he felt one final beat of his heart, followed by a lack of the sensation. His heart wasn't beating any further. It'd stopped completely.

He'd stumbled back from the sensation. Yamato began to rapidly dissolve from Sorun's grasp, and the pain in his chest became so great that he wasn't even able to keep a hold of the sword. When he dropped it, it'd vanished completely before it even hit the saucer beneath his feet. Summoned Swords attempted to materialize themselves next to Sorun, but they'd appeared faded and cracked, and then shattered before he could even fire them off.

"Ngh..." Sorun had uncontrollably stumbled to the edge of the saucer. He maintained his glare towards Eggman, who just stared on in great confusion. The teen's body began to wobble when he began to lose all feeling, and by that point gravity had taken over and he began to tilt over. All Sorun could do was continue looking at Eggman. "D... damn it all..."

And then, he'd fallen over.

"Cutting it kinda close here, aren't I?"

On the ceiling in the room containing the engines, hiding amidst some metal rafters adorning the ceiling, was Rubrum. He watched as Sorun had entered the room, spotting Eggman almost in an instance. He'd shouted towards him, and had alerted Eggman to his presence. Eggman, in response, had sicced what little remaining Badnik forces on Sorun as he attempted to escape.

It was a fruitless attempt from what Rubrum saw. Even in his weakening state Sorun had been too much for those robots. He'd cut down multiple bots in milliseconds. He'd done it without ever taking his eyes off of Eggman his focus on the man had been so great. A kind of manic fervor tempered with so much concentration that Sorun's expression hardly looked human. It was more demented.

But he'd done it. Cut down all the robots in his way and teleported right to Eggman. And had Rubrum done nothing, he would have done it. Used the last few remaining embers fueling his life to cut Eggman's head right off of his shoulders. Sorun'd been that close.

And then, when Rubrum flexed his hand, Sorun's body had briefly glowed red. His position switched, as if he'd been forcibly teleported. Not very far. Just a couple of feet, as well as his orientation having been disrupted by just a slight amount. Enough that'd he'd missed Eggman and swung into the saucer instead.

As far as Sorun was concerned, he'd just think he missed. As simple as that.

The precious moments Sorun had needed to figure out his strike had missed and the moments needed to pull the sword out and ready himself to try and swing at Eggman again proved to be too much. In that moment, he'd ran out of time. His sword faded, and his body began to shut down. A precious few seconds was all he'd had, and would have been all he'd needed if Rubrum hadn't interfered.

Well, interfered he had. And now Rubrum had to watch as Sorun fell off the saucer.

"Sorry, Sorun," Rubrum thought as he watched Sorun's still body fall towards the ground. "Not yet. Not just yet..."

He saw the teen's body collapse on the ground. Eggman had stopped his saucer just so he could peer over the edge, and Rubrum saw he had a dumbfounded look on his face as he looked down at Sorun.

"Well, there it is." And then Rubrum went from looking from the rafters above to crouching on the lip of the saucer, right next to Eggman. The Doctor had spluttered out in surprise at his sudden appearance and had fallen on his back. Rubrum paid him no mind, and continued to look down at Sorun.

"R-Rubrum?" Eggman had chosen that moment to speak. The red-clothed man's hood tilted just the smallest amount as he looked back at the round Doctor. At his haggard appearance and his blue spectacles that were slightly fogged from all the perspiration still leaking from his face. "Where on Mobius did you come from?"

"I was around." Rubrum looked back down at Sorun. "Congratulations. You survived. Sorun died."

Rubrum had attempted to sound cynical when he said that, but at the moment he wasn't able to muster the feeling. So his words had come out blank and hollow as he looked down at Sorun's body. He couldn't help but to silently sigh at the sight.

"What?" The sweating on Eggman's face began to subside. His confusion, on the other hand, only grew. And he'd sounded as lost as he looked. "What... what did you do?"

"I just swapped his position a bit so he'd miss you. Otherwise I didn't do anything," Rubrum blankly replied. "I lied when I told you the Chaos Emeralds weren't having a detrimental effect on his body. His body wasn't built to sustain that amount of Chaos energy. That last Emerald I left for him sealed his fate."

He turned away from Sorun's body. He didn't want to see the sight of Sorun's body anymore. Eggman wasn't a much better sight, but Rubrum preferred that over seeing Sorun in that state, so he'd turned around and moved up a bit so he was crouching on the saucer's interior lip, his shadowed face staring straight at Eggman.

"You... lied...?" Eggman repeated. His earlier anxiety began to disappear as he slowly righted himself upwards.

Rubrum shrugged. "I told you I do that a lot."

"You mean to say at any moment I could have just given Sorun the Emeralds and he would have croaked on his own?" It took an inordinate amount of willpower for Rubrum not to hang his head when he heard that. The second Eggman had said that any and all traces of his earlier anxiety and panic ceased to exist. He looked completely normal. A bit satisfied, even. And then he began to look a bit questioning as he looked towards Rubrum. "I don't understand. If you were just going to kill him with the last Emerald, then why lie to me about it? You could have given me a head-up, you know. Or at least have done it quicker so I could finally put him out of my mind."

"For the same reason I do anything. For insane, arbitrary reasons even I don't understand, Eggman," Rubrum answered, bringing no end to the confusion wrinkling Eggman's face. "It's all on His instruction, nothing more, nothing less. Why He structured this all in such a way is something I gave up on figuring out. Not like I can ask Him. Hell, I've never even met Him." He folded his hands over his knees. Rubrum's form slumped forwards, and a long, drawn-out breath left him. "It's always gotta lead back to Him. Because it's all in accordance with His will."

His right fist curled and banged down on the saucer hard enough to dent it. Eggman hadn't flinched from the reaction, though he did keep a wary eye on Rubrum as he continued to just sit there in front of him, unnaturally still and eerily silent.

"... So, it's back the drawing board for you, then?" Rubrum had suddenly asked. His earlier, sullen tone had disappeared, being replaced by a more neutral voice. Eggman had started a bit at the sudden shift in his demeanor, going as far as to cautiously move back a bit to his own end of the saucer.

"I believe that is my business," Eggman answered him. "You've hardly convinced me that we're allies met to be sharing plans back and forth." He leaned back a bit, propping his shoulder up on the saucer. A small confident smirk played across his lips. "How about you?"

Beneath his hood, Rubrum frowned at that smirk on Eggman's face. He was either happy over the fact that Sorun was dead or he was picking up how upset Rubrum felt at the moment and was taking joy from it. He hated both options in equal measure. "I still have things on my list to cross off," he answered. "This is the last time we're gonna see each other for a while." He paused, and took a quick glance around. "Snively not around?"

"No, he's back in New Megaopolis. Or what's left of it, at least," Eggman answered with a shake of his head and a slight frown. "Why? Don't tell me you wanted to pummel him again."

"I just wanted one more punch for the road. Not really gonna have another chance to... eh, never mind. I guess it doesn't really matter." With another sigh, Rubrum stood up to his feet. "We'll meet again right before you hit the big button."

When Eggman blinked his eyes, Rubrum had been gone by the time he opened them back up. All he offered in response was a simple "hmph", after which he grabbed the controls of the saucer and began steering it towards the nearby shuttle.

What had it all been for in the end?

He'd blacked out when he fell off the saucer and hit the ground. When Sorun opened his eyes, it was when he was flat on his back, looking up. He was greeted to the sight of Eggman's shuttle taking off right then and there, with the man himself likely inside of it, probably laughing at Sorun, who could do nothing but watch as the shuttle flew through the open portion of the ship and disappeared out of sight.

So that was that.

He failed.

"Well. This sucks."

Sorun still couldn't feel his heartbeat. His body's regeneration was probably the only thing keeping him alive at this point, but even that was failing. He could feel it. Could feel himself slowly slipping away, his body finally giving out for good. These were his last moments, and he got to spend them as a failure.

"I really am a royal screwup, aren't I?" With his last remaining strength, Sorun rolled onto his stomach, and then began crawling forwards. "All you had to do was land one shot... and you couldn't even do that..."

How much depended on his landing that hit? The lives and futures of his friends? The Republic of Acorn? All of Mobius? Everybody? All he had to do was connect with him. To make one single, clean strike against Eggman's neck to finally end it all. That's all he needed to do.

What did he do instead?

He missed. Sorun simply missed.

"I don't even know what happened. Vision went all screwy, I... I must've gotten disoriented..." With continuing grunts of effort he continued crawling forwards, towards a raised section of the wall that was slanted by a great amount. "How could I have messed up so badly...?"

The pain was fading away. It was just pure exhaustion now. He couldn't even feel anything anymore. Merely thinking was taking a toll on him. But he pressed forwards, through it all. At the very least he wanted to see something other than cold metal as he died.

"It was all for nothing. Everything I did, all the effort I put into getting these Emeralds, taking this big, final shot... I couldn't do it. I can't... why can't I ever do anything right...?"

This wasn't a feeling Sorun was well familiar with. The sensation of failure couldn't accurately be described by the word "failure" alone. It was such an intense, ineffable feeling assaulting him that, if he wasn't dying and so exhausted at the moment, he probably would have broken down right there. The despair alone might have been enough to kill him.

But he pressed on. Because there was nothing else for him to do but prop his dying body up so he could see the sky one last time.

"Some prophets those Neo-Walkers turned out to be," Sorun had internally scoffed. "What was it all for? Why was I brought here just for me to die for nothing? Were they wrong? Was I just that terrible at accomplishing one simple task? Why? What was the point? Why did I have to die for nothing? Why...?"

With great effort, he'd managed to stand up, only to then crash on the raised, slanted section of wall in a leaning position. Panting heavily, Sorun looked out towards the back of the ship, towards the sky. The sun was just beginning to dip down towards the horizon.

"Maybe I was never meant to kill him?" Sorun thought. "I mean, it... it wasn't for nothing, right? I did things. Significant things. Saved everyone when Knothole was bombed, helped with Enerjak, did all those missions and helped everybody out for all that time... it all has to mean something, right?" Maybe it was just him being hopeful. Trying to cheer himself up or convince himself that he'd done enough. He didn't know if he believed it. "I mean... New Megaopolis is practically gone. They all fought him for over a decade working with way less. Eggman's resources are dwindled, and they have the nanite city. They'll... they'll be fine, won't they...?"

Maybe he was right. Maybe he wasn't. Sorun didn't know. There was nothing he could do about it anymore. He tried his best. It wasn't good enough, but... he'd tried. It was such a small comfort that it didn't even register with Sorun, but as opposed to nothing, it was something.

"I'm sorry, everyone, I... I tried. I really did. I just wasn't good enough."

Sorun's vision continued to rapidly turn black. Even so, he kept his eyes turned up on the sky.

"It's... really beautiful, this world. I never stopped to appreciate it before. I hope they'll be able to save it. Not mess it all up like I did. I... please let everything I did be enough... I don't want them to die..."

"..."

"..."

"..."

"... I really would have liked... to have had one last game with you... Nicole..."

With a final, rattling breath, Sorun's body went still.

"Hey! Sorun! Where'd you go!?"

It was minutes later that two new forms entered the large, cavernous engine room through a door at the far end of the room. One was a blue hedgehog, who was casually walking across the room with his hands cupped around his mouth as he looked around. Behind him was a black-colored hedgehog with red stripes whose expression was severely more downcast than the face the Mobian in front of him wore, which was more or less in a lighthearted grin.

"Man, where'd he go? All those cut-up Badniks lead to here," Sonic said as his hands lowered to his side. "Geez, we passed past so many of them it felt like there were more in here than there were out there. You really oversold how bad things were going on outside, Shads."

"I was just being cautious." Shadow's voice had come out quieter and more somber than normal, though it was a change too subtle for Sonic to pick up on. "Perhaps he-"

"Ah, no, there he is."

Shadow's red eyes picked up when he heard Sonic speak out. They instantly locked onto the form of a white-haired human body in a slightly tattered white coat leaning up against a slanted section of the wall. Completely still and not moving. He'd known just why that was the second Shadow had caught sight of the still body. His breathing had become disrupted and he'd felt a shock from the sight alone as his body stiffened up.

Sonic, however, hadn't picked up on why Sorun wasn't moving, and began to make his way over to him. The movement was enough to shake Shadow out of his stupor, and upon seeing the direction Sonic was heading in, he tried stopping him.

"Sonic," he attempted while weakly reaching out to him, "wait-"

"Sorun, buddy! There you are," Sonic called out, his voice jubilant. He stepped right behind Sorun, who was still facing out towards the open end of the ship at the sky that was nearly in sunset, and reached out to shake his shoulder. "What're you doing? Everybody's wondering where you-"

The shaking from Sonic's hand caused Sorun's body to slide off of the slanted section of the wall. It'd lifelessly collapsed on its back right in front of Sonic, who'd reached his hand back and stepped back in surprise at the motion.

"Er, uh... y-you're kinda tired from the new power, huh, Sorun?" Sonic said in a light chuckle. The chuckling began to die off when he looked towards Sorun's face. "Sorun?"

The pale Earthling's face was completely still. Eyes half-opened, unfocused and unmoving like the rest of him. There wasn't even any sign of Sorun breathing.

"S-Sorun?" Seeing immediately that something was wrong, Sonic got down on his knees and began to shake Sorun's shoulder again. "Co-come on, Sorun, what's the matter?" His shaking began to become a bit more frantic. The nervous smile Sonic had adopted was slowly shifting into an intensely worried expression the longer this went on. "Sorun, seriously, this isn't funny!"

"Sonic..."

A gloved hand gently settled on Sonic's shoulder. He froze at the contact, and then looked up to see Shadow looking at him. He didn't have his usual scowl on. He looked sad, which began to make Sonic's heart sink at the implication.

"He's... he's gone," Shadow said in a voice that was barely above a whisper.

"Gone? What-what do you mean gone?" Sonic looked down at Sorun's body. "He's just- he always gets tired when he gets a new power, doesn't he? He's just sleeping, right?" He looked back up at Shadow. Despite his disbelieving words Sonic's eyes were already beginning to grow damp. "He can't be gone. He isn't- Sorun isn't-"

"Guys? What's going on?"

The question that had cut Sonic off caused both hedgehogs to look towards where'd they just come from. They saw everybody crowding near the doorway, looking towards them all with unsure, questioning looks. Right in front of them was Sally, who'd been the one to voice the question. She'd motion to speak further, but then stopped completely when she looked down at the body lying right in front of Sonic.

"I... I'm unsure how I'm... He..." Shadow, who had tried to explain but wound up tripping over his words in his own grief, made a deep sigh and shook his head in defeat. "I don't know how else to say it. He's gone."

Quiet acceptance grew on Sonic's face at the same time tears began to freely flow from his face and hit the metal floor under him. Sally began to freely cry as well while also taking some steps back and holding her hands to her mouth as she stared at Sorun's body in grief. Others in the group behind her had started to look towards Sorun's corpse and began to come to the same conclusion. Some began to openly cry while others tried and failed to bite back their tears as they looked away.

"He said they were killing him," Shadow mumbled out, drawing Sonic's attention once more. "The Chaos Emeralds. He said they were causing his body to fail."

"That can't be true," Sonic whispered out in disbelief, shaking his head. "He-he would have told us. He would have told us if they were doing something like that!" he shouted, voice growing hysteric. "That doesn't even- how could they have been hurting him!?"

"I'll tell you what he told me," Shadow said, though his words did little to calm Sonic. "What he told me was that..."

Chapter 53

Recursion Error

Episode 53- Gamers never die

"Well, congratulations, you fucking dimwit. You got us killed."

Black. Black, endless void everywhere around. An entire universe full of nothing. Nothing but a single, lone teen in a tattered white coat sitting down on a nonexistent ground with his knees pulled up to his chest. Behind him was another, identical-looking teen down to the face and clothes that was angrily pacing back and forth behind the one sitting down.

"You know, you've done some stupid shit in our life, but this? Oh boy, I don't even- this is the peak. There's nothing above this. I can't even comprehend how you bungled it this badly and I was there every step of the way." Sorun loudly exhaled and threw his arms in front of him. "Just... fuck , man, how!?"

"What was I supposed to do?" the Sorun sitting down on the endless black void asked.

"Oh, oh I don't know, not gotten us killed!?" Sorun screamed out. "'Ah, no, hey, Sorun, buddy, pal. I know we just took you away from your home and loved ones and everything, but hey, listen, things here on Mobius are real bad, so do you mind lending us a hand?' 'Oh, Sorun, by the way, these powers are real neat and all but oh also they're gonna kill you down the line so if you could just get over that for us it'd be greeeat , okay?' No-none of this sounds bad to you?" Sorun stopped pacing and looked down on Sorun. "Christ on a crutch, man, why did you go along with it?"

Sorun shuffled in place. "I didn't want my friends to die."

"Your friends. Right," Sorun scoffed. "Let's-let's do a headcount. Tails? Dragged us through that portal and effectively ended our life right then and there. Sonic, that smug prick, always acting like he was better than us, not a single fucking humble bone in his body. Knuckles- fuck him, fuck him and his entire goddamned species, they can fucking burn for all the trouble they caused us. Elias?" Sorun let out a mocking laugh. "Fucking soy boy supreme, doesn't know what the hell he's doing and came to us of all people for advice, fucking amazed you didn't blow that whole history lesson you gave him. Took, what, a single day of rebellion for him to fold and change the whole government? An evening? Sally straight up lead us by the nose the entire time with that promise she made us just so she could have some sword-slinging weirdo in her motley crew of-"

"They were nice to us," Sorun argued. "They never treated us like-"

" Of course they were nice, it's practically all they know!" Sorun yelled out. "They're so nice they don't even realize how fucked in the head they all are! Or how bad they screwed us over at the very least," he bitterly added. "Shadow- look, I'll admit, he was cool, I know you liked them all but personally he was the only one I could stand to be around."

Sorun sighed and hugged his knees closer to his chest. "They didn't know. They were desperate," he weakly argued. "They never took advantage of us like that. They said we were one of them."

"Oh, grow up, Sorun," Sorun spat out. "They felt sorry for us and made us one of them because they hoped it'd be good enough to make up for everything they did to us. They did it to make themselves feel better."

The Sorun kneeling on the ground began to grow from looking despondent to as angry as the one pacing behind him. "That is simply not true," he denied. "Nicole-"

"And there it is, ladies and GENTLEMEN, the crux of it all!" Sorun shouted up to the nonexistent ceiling. "It wasn't enough to give it all up for a bunch of aliens that stole our life from us. Oh, no, you took it to the next level." He walked over the sitting Sorun and crouched down right next to him. "You went and simped over the holo-lynx," he lowly stated. "She just had to have all the right qualities, huh? Just had to be attractive to us in every single aspect we could possibly imagine. Fact she looked the way she did went right over our head."

Sorun's eyes fell to the endless black ground as Sorun made another scoff and shot up to his feet.

"But to throw away our life for her ?" Sorun continued. "Seriously? For a girl you didn't even have the guts to admit you liked?"

"It wasn't just for her."

"..." Sorun looked off to the side. "Who was it in our final thoughts?" he wondered aloud. "Was it Antoine? 'Oh, Antoine, I'm so sorry we'll never have another sword match where you'll have to hold back against me and still win because even a wimpy fucking fink like you is stronger than me.' How 'bout Amy? 'Ah, Amy, you self-absorbed cunt, thank you so dearly for pulling your head out of the clouds to give me the time of day. You're such a nice person. A veritable pillar of magnanimity!' Nope. No, no, no. It was her. Nicole." Sorun grunted out angrily and began pacing again. "You know what it's like being you? 'Oh, I'm so depressed over dying,' 'this isn't fair, why me,' 'I'm so scared over everything,' 'I just want to play with Nicole for a bit to forget it all,' every single second of every single day we spent on Mobius. The anxiety, the self-doubt, the insecurity, day in, day out. MY LIFE IS FUCKING SUFFERING."

He ran out of steam. With a final breath, Sorun collapsed down onto his backside, breathing in and out heavily in great heaves. The Sorun sitting down didn't so much as look over at him, instead choosing to keeping looking down for a while. When Sorun's breathing returned to normal, Sorun finally spoke out.

"Are you done?" Sorun asked.

"I guess," Sorun breathed out. "I hate this place. There's nothing to do here but realize how miserable my life is. The life we no longer have. The life you threw away like yesterday's garbage. That life." His head rolled to the side to look at Sorun's back. "Why'd you do it?" he questioned. "Why did you throw away our life for them?"

"From the moment we stepped into that grocery store the deck was stacked against us," Sorun coolly answered. "We had no possible way of knowing we'd get pulled through an interdimensional portal to a new world. But that's what happened, so we made the best of what we could with the situation we were in. The Chaos Emeralds changed things."

"Boy, did it," Sorun agreed. "You killed us for a stupid cause."

"It's not as if the options were that glamorous," Sorun argued. "We were cornered the moment we laid our hands on that first Chaos Emerald. The blue one. And just like the grocery store, we had no possible way of knowing it'd be irremovable or that it would give us those poisonous powers. The Mobians were surprised by the development, so it's not as if we could have speculated that outcome. Even people in tune with the Chaos Force were surprised by what we could do. There was absolutely no way of us knowing." He dipped his head lower to the nonexistent floor. "There was simply no way for us to realistically avoid sealing off the way home forever."

"You didn't have to go after the rest of them."

"Those Mobians didn't deserve the fate Robotnik would have given them. It's likely we would have shared the same fate had he won. You know it. I know it. Giving our life up to try and save them was our best option." He made a sigh. "That's the logical explanation, at least. Truly, I... just didn't want to see them suffer. They're dear to me, each and every one. She's the dearest of them all to me." He glanced back at Sorun. "You'd let such a truly beautiful world full of wonderful people die just so we could live a few years longer? For what?"

"It would have been on our terms. And they didn't deserve our help," Sorun answered. "And what good we managed to do." He thrust his arms up. "There he was, all lined up. The biggest and fattest target in history, all dressed in red for us. The phrase 'side of a barn' had never been more applicable, because he practically was the side of a barn! At point-blank range at that! We could have spit on him if you wanted we were so close! And all you had to do was get one eensy-weensy little hit in on the guy. Geez, you didn't even have to aim for his head. Any slash in his general direction would have gone through his body and done fatal damage. That was it. That was all you had to do. We could have done it in our sleep it was so easy. And what did you do?" The arms fell back down. "You dropped the ball. You missed. And because of that, Robotnik's still alive, so all we did was for what? Huh?"

Sorun didn't answer Sorun. Instead, he stood up from his sitting position and began to walk away.

"I don't have to hear this from you," he said. "I'm leaving."

Sorun waved after him, still lying on his back. "Oh yeah, sure, good luck navigating a literal abyss , you moron!"

He hated this place.

Ever since he died he'd been here. He didn't know for how long. He tried counting once but kept losing track of the number, if he was counting in seconds or minutes. All he knew was that it was nothing but an endless, black void and he hated it.

How long had he been here? Minutes? Hours? Days? He didn't know. He didn't even know how long he'd been walking. Could have been seconds, could have been years. He didn't know. All he knew was that he despised every aspect about this place.

The loneliness.

The isolation.

He didn't want to be dead anymore.

He wanted to see his friends again.

How long had he been here?

"Fun fact, this place isn't infinite. It runs in a loop." Sorun only continued to stare ahead as Sorun began walking besides him. "Well, either that or you got turned around and began walking in circles since, you know... there's not really any landmarks."

"Where even is here?" Sorun asked. "The afterlife?"

A shrug. "What'd you expect? A desaturated beach?" Sorun asked with a scoff. "How can you adore people that ruined our lives?"

"Will you drop it already?"

"And do what instead? Stare at the vast nothing?" Sorun sarcastically remarked. "It really just took them being nice to win you over? For real?"

"What else was needed?" Sorun asked Sorun. "They realized the grave mistake they made and tried to make up for it. Beyond that, they treated us as an equal when we obviously weren't one. They valued our life just as much as their neighbors and brothers despite the fact we were complete strangers, a different species even. Altruism for the sake of altruism. A genuine love of life." He grew quiet as he looked down. "How could I not grow enamored with them after the way they treated us? With her?"

"Yeah, how could we not love people that kidnapped us and forced us into a guerilla war against our will. Whoo-hoo."

It began to show that Sorun's patience was wearing thin when he stopped and turned towards Sorun with his calm expression slowly turning angered again. "They had. No way. Of knowing."

"And they had no right to ask us to do shit after what they did. Sonic didn't have any right to make that stupid bet with the foot race and trick us," Sorun snapped back with an equally angry expression. "We're dead because of them."

"We're dead because we chose to die."

"Chose? Chose!?" Sorun spread his arms wide and gestured to the emptiness all around him. "We chose this!?" he yelled out. "Ah, yeah, such a super choice! We get damned to an eternity of this insanity while everyone else gets to go on their own merry way-"

Slck!

It'd been an automatic movement on Sorun's part. He'd grown so sick of it. Of this place, of hearing Sorun's mocking of Sorun's choices for every second Sorun was here. Couldn't take it anymore, didn't want to take it, he just wanted it to end .

He didn't even know when Yamato flashed into his hands or when he moved forwards to stab Sorun in the midsection. All he knew was that, at some point, he'd done just that. And now Sorun was standing here in front of Sorun, stabbing Sorun through the chest with the katana held in his hands.

Sorun looked down at the blade piercing his chest, more or less nonplussed at the act. "This all you know how to do?" Sorun asked as he looked back up at Sorun. "Kill yourself? I'm not surprised. It's the one thing you haven't fucked up."

Sorun pulled the sword out. There was nobody in front of him anymore. Just empty space. He was there alone. Just him. Sorun. Nobody else.

He suddenly felt something on his right arm. A strange sensation, like something slowly curling around the limb. With his breathing beginning to become more erratic, he looked down at his hand. He immediately saw what he was feeling.

It was the Yamato. There were... vines, bluish-black vines like tentacles spreading out from beneath the white wrapping of the blue hilt and wrapping all around his right arm. There was an eye, too. An eye with a blue iris and slit pupil, right there in the center of the blade, the metal cracking around it. Just a normal eye rapidly looking everywhere, with a small stream of blood dripping out of it like a bloodied tear. The eye finally stopped when it snapped to a position so that it was looking right into Sorun's eye, and he could have sword he heard the high-pitched screaming of his own voice.

With a panicked scream, Sorun threw the sword away. It clattered against the ground that wasn't there, and with heavy breathing, Sorun continued to look at it even as it skidded away. There were no tentacles. No blood, no eye, nothing. It was just a normal katana.

Panting with heavy breath, Sorun collapsed onto his hands and knees. He looked down, but all he saw was blackness. There was nothing but an endless void when he looked up and around. No matter where he looked, there was absolutely nothing in any direction. Nothing but an infinite emptiness.

"I hate it here," Sorun tonelessly droned out. Yamato flashed back into his hands. He held it up and stabbed it down into whatever invisible ground he was leaning on.

Reality itself began to crack all around Sorun. White, glowing cracks that spiderwebbed around from where the sword was stabbing into. Sorun continued to blankly stare at the spot, pouring more power into the blade as he pushed it in further. Blue energy was roaring down the length of the blade as the white cracks intensified.

"I don't want to be here anymore." Segments of reality began to fall around Sorun, like black shards of glass, revealing bright, white light behind it all. "Take me out of here. I want to go back to them."

The entire world around Sorun shattered completely.

Sorun's eyes snapped open.

"... What just happened?" That was the first and foremost thought that came to his head. What came after was the memory of dying, and all the mental baggage that carried. Everything past that just gave him a headache to think about. The details were there, but fuzzy, disjointed. Hard to remember. So he ceased those thoughts and looked up. "Uh..."

He didn't know why, but for some reason he was on his back, with his head resting in something oddly soft. He'd wondered what that was until he'd looked up and seen the sky. The sky that wasn't blue, but a giant, glowing canvas of various shades of white and purple. No sun, no moon, not even any stars. Just a lot of white and purple. He also noted there were some green leaves in his peripheral, and when he looked down he saw he was surrounded by trees.

"Well this is just all kinds of weird," he muttered to himself. He finally took note of the soft thing his head was laying on, and felt around with his hand to try and feel it. Oddly enough, his hand rubbed against something damp, and when he held it above his face, much to his confusion, it was wet. "... Why am I wet?"

Sorun looked further up. He was greeted to a pair of solid green eyes looking down at him that were attached to a head completely made of water.

"Whoa-whoa-whoa-whoa!" Startled by the sight, Sorun rolled right off whatever wet thing he'd been lying on. He felt soft grass brush against his exposed hands and face as he rolled away, ending when he rolled into a low crouch to look at the thing he'd saw look at him.

He had absolutely no idea what he was looking at. It was some bipedal... thing. A thing made completely from water. In fact, the only things he saw in it that wasn't water were the two solid, oblong objects acting as its eyes and a brain floating in what Sorun assumed to be its head.

For some reason its shape reminded him of an alien of some kind. The two-toed, three-fingered, three tentacled-headed... thing in front of him just didn't resemble anything else for comparison. For the life of him he couldn't figure out why it was completely made of water.

"Um... what's up...?" Sorun awkwardly greeted. The watery thing in front of him, sitting down with its legs crossed, merely had made a gurgling sound while tilting its head at him. "... Yeah, alright." Sorun looked away from it. "Where am I?"

Looking around didn't give him much in the way of answers. It looked like a circular clearing inside of a grove of trees. There was a pond in the middle filled with clear water, a few large rocks surrounding its edge, and... Chao, for whatever reason. Seven in total from what he counted, all just meandering about and minding their own business. A few had cast curious looks over in Sorun's direction, but that had been about it.

"It's a... Chao Garden?" Sorun mumbled to himself. "What the...?"

Something Sorun had never done in his life was skip stones across the water, like they did in the movies. Not surprisingly he was pretty terrible at it when he tried. Like the world hadn't brought him down enough.

"I mean, I try to look at the positives in life," Sorun said as he threw another small stone at the pond, only for it to sink right to the bottom along with his mood. Maybe the shape of the stones was the problem. He was pretty sure only flat ones sufficed, but there were only round ones here. "You know, like when all the downs in life gets me, well, down, I try to remember all the ups." He looked to the side. "Know what I mean?"

The blue water monster thing was sitting right besides Sorun in front of the pond. Some of the Chao he saw were sleeping on it or playing by hanging off its limbs, not that it seemed to mind. Sorun was fairly sure it was keeping up with the conversation, but, well... it was a water monster. So he wasn't really sure.

The fact it gurgled at him in response to his previous question didn't help him much in discerning a clear answer. Its appearance still made Sorun ambivalent towards whether it was dangerous or not, but at east it seemed friendly. So he decided to voice some of his thoughts at it at some point.

"So, uh... you got a name?" Sorun asked.

It gurgled at him again.

"... Nice to meet you. I'm Sorun."

The water monster tilted its head, and the green objects Sorun assumed were its eyes thinned a great amount for a brief moment. And then it went back to normal.

"Was that, like, a smile? I don't even know." With a sigh, Sorun turned back to the pond. "What am I even doing?" he wondered as he tossed another stone in the water. "I screwed up, got killed without taking Eggman with me. Now I'm here, wherever here is, and he's out there doing his usual thing."

It still sat with him poorly, utter failure. It was a level of disappointment he'd never had the misfortune to feel before, and as such it was a completely foreign experience. And past all that was the anxiety. How were the others back in New Mobotropolis doing? Were they okay? How were they handling his death? Had he absolutely messed up by not killing Eggman, thereby dooming the world, or had his actions been significant enough to avoid that fate?

With questions like these sitting in him, it was hard to not worry. But he didn't really know how to proceed from here, or even what his current state of being was. Was he a ghost? A spirit? Was this some kind of great beyond? It couldn't have been Mobius from how the sky looked. So where was he?

"Hm?" He felt something that drew his eyes downwards. To his delight, he'd finally managed to find a relatively flat stone. He held it up, and after squinting his eye to aim at the pond, he let the stone loose.

It sunk just as quickly as the rest of the stones.

"I give up," Sorun groaned out as he rose up into a standing position. He brushed his hands over the sides of his tattered white coat, and then turned around.

He'd cried out in surprise and fallen back-first into the pond when he turned to see a pair of bright blue eyes fill his vision.

A splash was heard as Sorun's backside fell into the shallow end of the pond. At the very least the water was lukewarm, but it did little to assuage the annoyance Sorun felt when he heard a gurgle from the water monster that sounded suspiciously like a deep-sounding chortle. Sitting down in the pond with the water up to his waist, Sorun gave the water thing a glare before looking to the left at whoever- oh god it was an echidna.

"No, not another one, please..." Sorun moaned out in a defeated tone. His body had gone completely limp and he'd almost fallen completely into the pool before he'd extended a hand to catch himself.

"Um... sir...?" A soft, feminine voice drew Sorun's attention forwards, at the echidna standing at the edge of the pond in front of Sorun. "Are you okay?"

She certainly looked like a strange echidna, at least compared to the ones Sorun had seen. Her dress was strange. Old and tribal-like, almost. She was a light orange, too, as opposed to the normal red he saw in echidna. Her head flesh-extensions things were adorned with all sorts of makeshift accessories, and her bright eyes looked down at Sorun with a worried expression across her face. Her whole body was hunched forwards in a way that suggested concern over him.

He would have considered the gesture sweet if it was anybody else, but seeing as she was an echidna, he couldn't help but be a bit wary.

"Considering I'm pretty sure I'm dead, not really," Sorun had sighed out as he stood up. On second glance, he wasn't so sure if he needed to be worried about her. Echidna or not, she did seem genuinely worried over him. So he'd give her a chance. "Thanks for the concern," he added as he stepped out of the pond and sat back down next to the water monster.

The orange echidna gave him a short nod, and then got down on her knees at Sorun's right side, her eyes still trained on his face. Sorun was about to ask why she was staring at him before he felt a strange, crawling sensation. He looked to his left, and then saw something that had made Sorun do a double-take. The three watery tentacles on the monster's head were extending over to Sorun and running themselves over the wet areas on Sorun's body. He watched, and even felt, as the moisture was absorbed from the wet spots, and then put together that the thing was helping to dry him off.

"Oh." Sorun blinked as the tentacles receded back behind the creature's head, and then gave it an appreciative nod. "Thanks... Ccccarrllll...?"

"Chaos."

"Hm?" Sorun made a small hum as he turned back to the echidna. "What about it?"

She gently shook his head. "No, I mean him." Her eyes briefly flicked to the water thing, and then looked back at Sorun. "His name is Chaos."

"Ahh." Weirdly coincidental name given everything, but whatever, he supposed. He almost went as far as to comment on it before he noticed the orange echidna girl was still staring at him. "Hi...?"

It was hard to place the look on her face. She seemed incredibly inquisitive but confused at the same time. Maybe even a bit fearful from how soft and gentle her face looked. It was enough that Sorun felt oddly calm just looking at her as she looked him up and down, her confusion only increasing the more she looked at him. Finally, she looked right back into his eyes and asked a single question. "What are you?"

"Confused."

She'd blinked at the answer. "N-no, I mean what are you?" she repeated. "You... remind me of the residents of that city. Station Square, I believe it was called?" She reached forwards and gently took some of Sorun's hair into her hands to examine it. The unexpected contact had made Sorun flinch a little. "But you look different, and this color is... strange, for one who seems so young."

"... Wait, why is it still white?" Sorun suddenly thought as he looked at his own hair. Indeed, it was still a pure white color. "I would have thought it'd revert back to black. What's goin' on?"

The white hair was a sign he still had his powers, if not just Devil's Body. But... that'd couldn't be, could it? He was dead, wasn't he? Was he? He didn't know, not in this state he was in. He didn't know if he was some ghost, or if he'd been transported somewhere, or some third thing he was unaware of. He didn't know anything about what was going on.

He figured he may as well ask.

"I'll tell you if you answer me first," Sorun offered. He paused when he noticed the echidna girl was still examining his hair, and with a small sigh he reached forwards and gently grabbed her wrists. "Hey, come on."

"Oh! My apologies." The girl grew a sheepish look as she pulled her hands back and looked to Sorun's eyes. "I just have never encountered one of your kind that is so strange. Even your height being similar to that of a Mobian's is unusual."

"Of all the things you had to point out, it had to be that...?" Sorun muttered out as he looked to the side, feeling his shattered pride take yet another hit. "Listen," he said as he looked back to the echidna, "I'm, like... super lost. In all aspects of everything. I'll tell you all about me, but first I gotta know what's going on."

She gave him a nod. "Of course. You must be dreadfully confused about your current circumstances. I would be happy to explain everything to you."

"Great, cool." With a sigh, Sorun tiredly rubbed a hand across his face as he looked around. "For starters, uh... where is here, exactly?" he asked. "It looks like a Chao Garden, but, like... spiritual? I don't know how to describe it."

A small, soft giggle left the girl. "You're much closer to the truth than you think." One of the Chao had wandered near the echidna girl. She'd picked it up with a smile and then placed it in her lap, and then began to slowly stroke its head as she continued to address Sorun. "This place is a sanctuary whose sole purpose is to contain the god of destruction, Chaos, as well as the seven Servers. You have met them already."

"..." With a face as calm as stone, Sorun turned back to his left, towards Chaos. The supposed god of destruction gave him a small wave. "'Sup, man," he quietly said before turning back to the echidna. "The Servers?" He glanced down at one of the Chao that was in her lap. "The... seven Chao here?"

She gave him a nod. "Yes, that's correct. For reasons that are not entirely clear to me, these seven Chao are strongly linked to the Chaos Force, so much so that their capacity for power is greater than that of the fabled Chaos Emeralds."

Again donning his stony, neutral expression, Sorun continued to stare down at the Chao, and then glanced around at all the other Chao scattered around. As far as he could tell they all just looked like everyday, ordinary Chao, like the ones he'd seen on Mobius. Nothing special at all was jumping out at him, asides from the fact they were all in this weird place.

"I know Chao are kinda close with the Chaos Force, so... I guess that's believable," he muttered out as he turned back to the orange Mobian. "Wouldn't be the weirdest thing ever."

Her blue eyes brightened up a bit, as if in interest. "Oh! You know some about Chao, then?"

Sorun shrugged. "A little. I took one as a pet, tried to do some research on them so I knew how to take care of him." He blinked in realization. "Oh, man, I hope Cream's feeding Virgil." He'd almost forgotten he'd left him with her. He severely doubted she'd neglect him, though. He already known she was responsible when he met the rabbit girl.

But him suddenly remembering Virgil right then and there made Sorun sag a bit when he realized that his former pet Chao was just one more person he'd never get to see again. His first pet ever. It brought him some comfort knowing he'd left him with somebody actually capable of looking out for him, probably more capable than he himself had been, but he couldn't help but wonder how he'd take his death. Probably as bad as everybody else.

"Virgil?" the echidna girl echoed, followed by her making a small laugh. "That's a rather funny name to give a Chao."

"Yeah, well, he was a rather funny Chao," Sorun said. "He evolved into a... pretty startling form for me." He turned his head to the side. "I don't really know how to describe it. He... evolved to look like something only I should know about. I know for a fact he could only turn into what he did because of me, but I still can't really grasp why he ended up looking like that."

"Chao are very mysterious creatures." Another one of the Server Chao flew up onto the echidna's shoulder. She began to lightly scratch under its chin, giving the small creature a loving smile, while the Chao itself nuzzled against one of her dreadlocks. "To form a bond with somebody is to imply that somebody is a person that Chao truly loves and cherishes. The forms they take can often be influenced somewhat by those they form bonds with, as well as serve to strengthen their bond to the Chaos Force. It can be seen as a source of strength for the Chao in that regard."

"Loves and cherishes? You haven't met Virgil," Sorun said with a small scoff and shake of his head. The Mobian girl gave him a curious look as a result, though this was ignored by Sorun as he glanced around the Chao Garden. "You said this place is a sanctuary?"

"Yes. Specifically, this is a separate zone entirely than the one inhabited by Mobius. It resides within the Ancient Onyx. A... special artifact," she added when she saw confusion cross Sorun's features. "I remember it resembling a Chaos Emerald."

Slowly, Sorun nodded in half-understanding. "Dimension in a rock, sure," he muttered under his breath. "Why is this place here? Why are the Chao and Chaos here?"

A sad look crossed over the girl's features. She reached up to pick the Chao off her shoulder and set it down on the ground, and then turned back to Sorun before answering. "In the past, many had tried to take advantage of the Servers in order to abuse their power," she explained to him. Her voice had grown somewhat gloomy halfway through the explanation. "Chaos is a being charged with protecting the seven Servers, though the power he wields can prove to be... catastrophic. It was just recently a valiant group of Mobians had assisted me in securing Chaos and the Servers away from the world when the Servers were threatened and Chaos had run amok."

"It wasn't with the help of somebody named Sonic, was it?" At the girl's eyes widened and an instant nod, Sorun made a hum. "Yeah, I know him. I think he made an offhand comment about this once, but I don't really remember that well." He pointed at her. "And who are you?"

"My name is Tikal." She introduced herself by slightly bowing her head in Sorun's direction. "I am simply an echidna who chose to look after Chaos and the Servers." She looked past Sorun's shoulder, over at Chaos who had been silently observing the pair throughout the entire conversation. "Chaos is truly a peaceful creature, but he can be overprotective of the Servers and loses control far too easily. I reside here with him and the Servers to keep them company and ensure Chaos remains at peace."

"Really, now?" Sorun glanced to the side at the rest of the Chao Garden. "Don't it get lonely here? Or at least boring?" he asked as he turned back to Tikal. "I mean, are you even alive?"

She shook her head. "Strictly speaking, no. My physical form was sacrificed hundreds of years ago so I could remain with them. But I don't mind," she said, making Sorun's face bloom in surprise. "I'm content with spending time here with them. I've always loved Chao, you see," she added with a small smile as she looked off to the side at some of the Chao. "Life here is peaceful and quiet. That's all any of us that reside here truly desire."

"If you're happy with it, I suppose," Sorun mumbled with a shrug. It was beyond his comprehension how somebody could spend centuries in a place like this and be happily content with it, but everybody had their own tastes, he guessed. There was some allure to it, he would admit. Living in utter peace, even if it was a quiet place like this, and with the company of a weird water monster and some Chao. He didn't completely get it, but he could somewhat see what she was getting at.

Wasn't anything he could ever commit to, but more power to her.

Still, it answered some of his questions, like where he was and who they all were, but not how he got here in the first place. Or even what his current status could be labeled as. He figured he should ask that next, and maybe introduce himself in the process.

"Well, thanks for telling me all that," Sorun thanked, causing Tikal to give him a smile and a nod. "My name is Sorun. I... guess I died."

Tikal's smile lowered drastically at that. "Yes, I was afraid this was so," she admitted. "You did not have a physical form when I found you. You were a spirit, much like I am."

"And where did you find me?" Sorun pressed.

"Simply put, you were just... floating." Tikal's face furrowed a bit in concentration as she attempted to explain. "I'm unsure how to be completely clear about this. You... did not travel to the great beyond, to the Chaos Force that links every and all living beings in the cosmos. When one linked with the Chaos Force dies, that is the destination their soul is bound for. I myself am an exception due to my relationship with the Servers, but this is a uniform rule that every being should follow." She gave Sorun a curious look. "But yet you... you did not go to the Chaos Force. I found your soul wandering, seemingly lost. You radiated so much energy that it would have been hard to miss you, really, despite the vast distances between us. So I'd... sung a prayer, to try and draw you towards me. Your soul followed my song and you ended up here."

"I don't remember any of this," Sorun muttered out with a shake of his head. "I remember dying, then..."

Blackness. Infinite, vast void. Nothingness, endless expanse, isolation, loneliness, insanity-

Sorun roughly shook his head, startling both Tikal and Chaos. "I... remember dying," Sorun finished with a small, shuddering breath. "And then I woke up here."

"Are you alright?" Tikal seemed to take note of the way Sorun's breathing had increased by a bit, and the way his eyes had grown a bit vacant. She'd reached across between them to grasp at one of Sorun's hands with both of hers, which snapped Sorun out of his funk and caused him to look the echidna in the eyes. "You seem unwell. Is there something I can do to help?"

"N-no, I'm fine. Thank you." Somewhat awkwardly, Sorun untangled his hand from Tikal's and, somewhat abashed, turned away. "I'm fine," he whispered out under his breath.

The look on Tikal's face suggested she didn't believe him all completely. Nevertheless, she still pulled back away from him. "If you're sure. Please tell me if anything comes to mind for me to help."

"Mm." It was kind of her to offer, and Sorun deeply appreciated it, even if he wouldn't say so. Tikal was already quickly approaching his list of echidna he actually liked, which, even with her, was a small list compared to all the ones he detested. She must have been one of the good ones. She had to at least have the patience of a saint if she chose to reside in this place of all places forever, peaceful as it was.

"But still," Tikal continued, breaking Sorun's thoughts, "I can't figure out why it was your soul was lost like that."

"I don't know. Me not having a natural link to the Chaos Force might have something to do with it," Sorun suggested.

"Huh?" Tikal blinked once, then twice, and then gave Sorun an odd look. "No, that's... quite impossible, Sorun," she denied with a shake of her head. "Even though most beings have such a weak link they gain no abilities from it, every single lifeform in the cosmos is intrinsically linked to the Chaos Force. Nothing alive can exist without a link."

"I mean, that's not necessarily true. I know an AI that's quite alive, and I doubt she was made with a link to the Chaos Force, even if she's able to draw and use Chaos energy. Kinda... like me, huh." Sorun blinked his eyes in mild realization. "Anyway," he continued, shaking his head for getting off-topic, "it's completely possible. I'm not even from this zone- er, Mobius' zone. I'm from a different one entirely where nothing has a link to the Chaos Force since none of that stuff exists there." He made a sigh and looked off to the side. "We just evolved differently, I guess. Different environmental factors creating a species independent of Chaos energy due to a lack of it in our universe or something along those lines, I don't know, I'm not a biologist, but it's the best explanation I can think of. Maybe my home universe was a freak accident when it was created. All I know is that it's unique in that it's not touched by Chaos energy."

"But... you yourself possess Chaos energy," Tikal argued as she looked towards Sorun's chest. "To be quite honest with you, the amount I feel radiating from you is... it's quite staggering, Sorun. Forgive me if this sounds impudent, but I can hardly imagine how somebody who feels as powerful as you could die so young."

"It's not my Chaos energy," Sorun corrected her. "It's from Chaos Emeralds I absorbed. Don't have my own link, so my body made an artificial one by absorbing more and more energy. Each Emerald I absorbed strengthened that artificial link and gave me more powers, but... well, like I said. My species didn't evolve to handle this stuff, Tikal, so it got to a point where I just burned out and died." Tikal's eyes had softened in sorrow while Sorun rose a hand to his face. "I'm not sure why I still seem to have those powers, though," he confessed. "I'm a spirit now, aren't I? This isn't the physical body that absorbed all the Emeralds. So why do I still appear to have the powers...?"

Was it a fluke of some kind? Had the power of the Emeralds transferred with him in this spirit form? Was he still linked to his physical body that still contained the seven Emeralds? What was even the state of his corporeal body? How long had he been away from it?

Too many questions, and he didn't have a single answer to any of them.

"I still find it difficult to believe," Tikal said with a small shake of her head. "To think a whole species could survive without a link to the Chaos Force... how could life not supported by the Chaos Force ever exist?"

"Couldn't tell ya. At this point I'm pretty sure I'm just running on pure spite and vitriol," Sorun said. "Humans are cool like that."

Tikal made a small frown, evidently not approving of Sorun's words. "Don't say such harsh things about yourself. You seem like a truly wonderful person, Sorun."

"Yeah, you haven't known me for long," he breathed out as he looked away from her. He made one final glance around the Chao Garden, sighed, and then turned back to the echidna. "Alright, here's what I'll do. We got a lot of time and nothing better to do with it, so... I'll just go ahead and tell you how I wound up here."

So he ended up telling Tikal and Chaos everything.

No detail had been spared. Every event that had transpired from the moment he was pulled to Mobius to his death, his feelings, his thoughts on it all, everything down to every minutia of detail to the best of his describing ability. It felt like he'd been there for hours explaining it all to them. For all he knew it probably was hours. Might have been a whole day, even.

It felt strange, reliving it all again, going through all those memories. The good times, the bad times, the happiness, the sadness. All of it. All the nostalgia that had hit him, him feeling good when they'd reached points in the story he'd been happy, or him being angry and sad... well, during a majority of the story. From him and the Freedom Fighters to Aurora and Athair and the Emeralds to Eggman and all those fights to everything in between. The bonds he made with everybody, his regrets, lingering desires. He couldn't help but feel a sense of longing throughout the entire thing on top of it all. Almost like he actually missed those times and wanted to return to them.

Well, of course he wanted to return to being alive, but going back to all that? The fighting and the stress that came with him risking his life all time? He'd hated all that, but everybody around him, his friends... he didn't know. Somehow they all made it worth it, if just to be near them all. To be near people he could just relax and be at ease around, be himself without having to worry or think too hard all the time, to just... go with the flow and live. People he'd laughed with, fought with, bled with, liked... really liked in one case.

He realized pretty early on in the story that he wanted to return to them. If only returning to life were so easy...

"And then I screwed it all up and missed," Sorun finished off as he stared towards the pond in the middle of the Chao Garden, knees pulled up to his chest. "He got away, and I was left there to die. Alone. Just me propping my own dying body up on a wall so I could see the sky and sun one last time. I don't know why I did that, I... I guess I just wanted to look at something pretty before I died instead of a metal floor. And the only thing I can remember that kept looping over and over in my head is just... failure, y'know?" He sighed, shook his head, and ran his hand through his white hair. "Had one goal, gave everything up for that goal, but in the end I couldn't accomplish it. I mean, I knew it was a long shot going in, because come on, some random guy like me taking out somebody like Eggman probably wasn't gonna happen even with all my powers, but I still hoped , Tikal." He threw his hand up and let it fall to his side. "But I guess hope and powers wasn't enough to cut it, 'cause I messed up, and now I'm dead and left wondering if everything I did was enough to save the future or if I failed so bad everybody's gonna suffer because of it." He looked to the side at Tikal. "What am I supposed to do with that? Tikal?"

When he looked over at the orange echidna sitting next to him, Sorun was greeted to a sight that completely shocked him. She was crying. Not loudly; she was just sitting there, shoulders shaking as she quietly sobbed. Tears kept flowing out of her eyes only to stain the orange fur beneath them.

"H-hey, Tikal, come on..." This was too awkward to watch. He grew uncomfortable enough at seeing someone sad, but seeing somebody cry their eyes out in front of him was proving to be too much. He was already struggling with dealing with his own emotions. He couldn't handle feeling bad for her on top of feeling bad for himself. "Tikal, please don't cry."

"I-I'm sorry, Sorun, I'm just... I'm so..." She sniffed, wiped away some of her tears only for more to flow out, and then she looked up at him with glossy eyes. "I just don't know what to say. To have been taken from your home against your will just to fight in a war-"

"I mean you're making it sound worse than it... well I guess that's kinda what happened, yeah, but-"

"And the nerve of those two echidna!" She exclaimed loudly, making Sorun jump slightly. He thought that she tried to look angry, but she seemed so mild-mannered that, if anything, Tikal just looked even more sad. "To have done such a vile thing and use you like... like an item! For you to have lost your life in that way... you never had a say..." She had to tilt her head down when the tears became too much. "I'm so sorry, Sorun... I'm so, so sorry this happened to you..."

"Why is she taking this worse than I am?" It was a strange sensation, seeing somebody bawling their eyes out over sympathy for him of all people. There'd been some tears on his part on his journey, sure, not many, a few at most, practically a negligible amount, but they'd been made in silence alone where nobody could see him and only half the time he'd been cutting himself with a magic sword because of it. And then here Tikal was, crying her entire heart out. On his behalf. "For crying out loud, I'm the one that died..."

It was so bizarre that all Sorun could do was stare in silence. So strange and peculiar. He felt annoyed at her saying sorry over and over. He wanted to correct her and say none of this was her fault, maybe try and comfort her in some way, but the sight before him was so strange he couldn't even think to move.

"U-uh... Tikal, really, it's fine-"

She'd suddenly moved towards him in a burst of speed that... okay, admittedly he could have dodged with ease, but he was so bewildered by what was happening the thought to move hadn't even crossed his mind. But then the orange echidna had wrapped her arms around him in a hug. His thoughts couldn't even form coherent words as he looked down and saw Tikal crying into his chest. She'd probably been in that state for a good thirty seconds before he managed to get words out.

"Oi, oi, oi, c-c'mon, Tikal, this is a bit unnecessary...!" He saw some shadows on the ground shift as something behind him moved, as well as the sound of water quietly sloshing. He looked behind him and saw that Chaos was leaning in closer and closer to Sorun's back with his arms outstretched. He knew immediately what he was going for. "No, wait, man, come on you're wet-"

It was too late. Chaos hadn't listened to Sorun at all. He'd latched onto his back and wrapped his liquid arms around Sorun, trapping him in the middle of two beings hugging him. He could have escaped, he realized, but not without hurting either of them. So with a large sigh he resigned to his fate and just sat there with an uncomfortable look on his face.

"... It's all wet." The moisture from Chaos was beginning to seep into his clothes. Spirit clothes? He didn't even know anymore. The Server Chao that usually meandered about saw what was happening and joined in for the hug, the little creatures either latching onto Tikal, Chaos, or Sorun himself.

They wouldn't stop, either. Tikal kept holding onto him and crying on him. Chaos and the Chao kept hugging him. Sorun just continued to sit there wishing he was anywhere but there at the moment.

The hug actually did feel quite nice. There was something about it... he wasn't quite sure. The feeling of safety and warmness of it, despite all the dampness. Knowing these beings were sympathetic of him to the point of tears. Seeing them like this, knowing he himself could get overwhelmed by his own emotions and to have nothing bad happen as a result, it... made it so tempting to cry right there along with Tikal. To finally let it all out.

He didn't, because he absolutely refused to cry in front of her. But he came a bit too close to crying for comfort. To the point that most of his time was spent sitting there keeping up that awkward face while fighting back the urge to cry, which in itself made time pass even slower for Sorun as he waited for this strange torment to end.

Finally, Tikal's crying seemed to calm down. Full-on crying had devolved to small hiccups and sniffles, and thankfully the tears had ended. He was still wet everywhere from Tikal's tears to Chaos' moistness, but at least he wasn't getting any wetter on his front side. So when Tikal finally seemed to calm down, Sorun placed a hand on her shoulder.

"Are you okay?" he softly asked her. "You... you can let go now if you want." He managed to make it sound like he didn't want her to let go, but on the inside half of him was begging for her to release him while the other half was hoping she'd keep clinging on for a little bit longer. That part of him didn't want the comfort her hug brought to go away yet.

Conflicting internal emotions aside, she had released him and moved back a bit. The Chao had jumped down from all of them and began to surround the group of three in a circle. Chaos, too, let go of Sorun, and much to the Earthling's thanks the moisture that had leaked from him to Sorun had left along with Chaos. The water monster went to sit down next to Tikal, who herself was drying off the remainder of her tears.

"I-I'm... I'm sorry for that, Sorun," Tikal apologized as she looked back up at him. Her eyes were still wet and a bit red in the corners. "I just feel so terrible for you... nothing like that should ever happen to any person. Is there anything we can do to help you?"

"Can you bring me back to life?" When both she and Chaos had stilled, Sorun made an incredibly small, wry grin. "Just joking," he said. "... Seriously though, can you?"

He couldn't say he was too surprised to see Tikal shake her head, but it didn't make him any less disappointed. "I'm afraid not. I've some moderate abilities, but nothing that could do something like that."

"Eh, don't worry about it, then. You've done plenty," Sorun assured her.

Tikal didn't seem very satisfied by that answer, but she seemed to understand regardless. So, still giving Sorun a sad look, she asked, "What are you going to do now?" She looked down at the grass, and then began to absentmindedly tap at one of her knees. "You could... stay with us here, if you so desired, Sorun. I would never cast a poor soul like you out, and, well... you seem a pleasant fellow." She glanced up at Chaos. "I know that Chaos has already taken a liking to you."

Another gurgle left the water monster as he looked at Sorun. He'd tilted his head and narrowed his solid, green eyes again for a second before righting himself. Another smile, Sorun supposed.

"That's generous of you, Tikal, but... there's something I want to do." With a small sigh, Sorun held his left hand out. "If my hair is still white, if I do in fact still have my powers, then... I should still have this, shouldn't I...?"

He'd barely even had to think of it before it happened. In a small shower of blue particles Yamato appeared in his hand. Same black scabbard with a dark blue ribbon tied around it. Same blue, scaly handle with white wrapping. Same strange dark blue and gold guard.

The Yamato. As far as he was concerned, aside from when it competed with a large amount of Chaos energy that cancelled its abilities out, its power to separate anything truly was absolute.

Anything from physical items to space and time to concepts. The one power out of all the others that had so much potential. Potential that was only possible because his heart specifically shaped a Chaos Emerald, an item with an unlimited capacity for power, into this blade.

Did that still hold true even while he was dead...?

When he looked back up, he saw both Tikal and Chaos were looking down at the blade. Tikal had a cautious look as she warily eyed the blade, and Chaos... Chaos was actually bristling at the sight of it. Sorun could tell from the way his posture was just slightly hunched, like he was getting ready to attack the sword itself.

"Is... that the sword you mentioned, Sorun...?" Tikal nervously asked. "The one from the... what was the term... that game?"

"Y-yeah, the Yamato." Sorun nodded at the pair and lowered the sword onto the ground. "Them too, huh? Why does the sword always freak people out?" Sorun wondered. "It's demonic in nature, but it's also just a facsimile. A perfect replica made from a Chaos Emerald. Not the real sword from the games. But it's so close that I have to wonder if it even matters... or just how much of that demonic nature got translated when my heart made this."

It's not as if the sword had ever done anything diabolic in the games' stories. It'd been used to sow incredible amounts of chaos, perhaps, but only when it had been wielded by those with that intent. At the end of the day, it was just that. A tool. A weapon. A horrifyingly powerful one, maybe, but still a weapon.

Tentacles escaping from beneath the white wrapping, eye in the blade, blood and screaming-

It was just a sword.

"I never did figure out that 'true potential' bit," Sorun mused. "But maybe I'm wrong about that. It was more like... Nero fused it with his arm and used it as a focus for his powers, and Urizen seemed to be able to fuse it with himself and use it as a focus for his powers, so maybe that's it. It's a focus for amplifying demonic power as well as everything else it can do. But I don't have any demonic power. I'm human. But... it doesn't use demonic power. It uses Chaos energy, even if it emulates demonic energy.

"So why was Enerjak so scared when he saw this?"

"..."

"I'm overthinking this," Sorun decided. "It's just a sword. A sword with powers. That's all it is."

"Guys, it's fine. You don't have to freak out over this," Sorun called out in an attempt to put Tikal and Chaos at ease. "It's only a sword. I need to use it for something."

His words did manage to calm them both down. Chaos seemed to be more at ease from his body language, and Tikal had taken a calming breath before nodding at Sorun. "What are you going to do?" the echidna asked him.

Sorun stood up to his feet. "In the lore of the games, this thing could cut portals between dimensions," he explained to her. "I know I can use it to make portals and teleport around, but I gotta wonder..."

"You intend to try and use your sword to make a portal from here to Mobius?" Tikal guessed. When Sorun nodded in confirmation, she made a small hum. "Are you sure that is safe?"

Sorun shrugged.

"That gesture doesn't fill me with confidence, Sorun."

"Yeah, but what's the worst that can happen? I die?" With a scoff, Sorun grasped the handle of the katana with both hands. "Just focus in on your desire to go to a specific location. That's how I've always been getting around," he thought. "Shouldn't be too hard. It's not like this is a separate universe entirely; it's more like a pocket dimension inside of the dimension Mobius is in. At least that's how Tikal made it sound if this whole place really does exist inside of a physical object somewhere on Mobius. Just need to cut a way out to New Mobotropolis..."

Would it work? He didn't know. Did he have a plan on what he was going to do if it did work? None whatsoever. But he figured doing something was better than nothing, and while Tikal may have had the mental fortitude needed to spend an eternity here, he didn't.

And besides. He wanted to see the others again. He wanted to see Nicole.

To his surprise making the portal had come easy. He'd simply done the same thing he'd always done when he made a portal somewhere. The cuts quickly and cleanly made, and seconds later a portal was floating there right in front of Sorun.

"... Wow, that was shockingly easy," he mumbled to himself. He looked back at Tikal and Chaos, looked at the portal, and then looked back at the pair. "So, uh... I'm just gonna go ahead and head out," he told them. "Might, uh, might come back later. Might not. Guess we'll see."

"What is it you hope to find on Mobius?" Tikal asked him.

Sorun sighed. "Honestly? I just want to check on my friends and make sure they're okay," he said. "That said I don't even know what's gonna happen to me when I walk through that. But I need to go."

"I understand." Tikal offered him a small smile. "Should you desire to return, we will always be here. I wish you safe travels, Sorun, and hope for the best."

Her, Chaos, and the Chao surrounding them all gave Sorun a wave. He was a bit taken back by the gesture, but soon after he gave them all a small smile and a two-fingered salute.

"It's been an experience, guys. You're all real great. Seeya around." And with that, he turned back towards the portal. "Got no clue what's waiting for me on the other side of this, but I can't just stay here. Too many questions, too many worries. I gotta know for certain or I'll never sleep again. If I even need sleep in this state..."

And so, without any further hesitation, he stepped on through the portal.

"AAAHH- oh, hey, that wasn't so bad at all."

Walking through the Yamato-made portal was... the exact same as always, as it turned out. Little more than a brisk walk through a hole cut through space. As he shut the portal with the katana before dispelling it, Sorun couldn't help but marvel at how easy the experience as a whole had been. Or where he'd ended up.

New Mobotropolis, in the middle of one of the sidewalks. It looked the exact same as he remembered it. Same off-white houses and buildings, same trees and grass everywhere. Daytime, mid-afternoon it looked like if not late morning. Sky was clear and sunny, and Mobians were walking about freely chatting with each other.

"Alright, everything seems good so far," Sorun mumbled, a bit surprised at how peaceful everything looked. "Kinda weird nobody's paying any interest to me, though."

After looking around for a brief bit, Sorun came upon the sight of a Mobian sitting on a nearby bench. Old-looking fellow, an owl if Sorun had to guess. He was reading a newspaper, but otherwise didn't so much as look up when Sorun stepped in front of him.

"Hello, mister? Can we please talk for a second?" Sorun politely asked. The Mobian ignored him completely and turned a page in his newspaper. "Sir?" He began to frown a bit at being ignored. "Hey, man, come on, I'm trying to talk to you."

Still nothing. Making a dissatisfied hum, Sorun leaned closer to him.

"Dude. Homie. Come on." Even when he began snapping his fingers in the owl's face he didn't look up at him. Didn't even so much as blink in response. This caused Sorun to make a frustrated growl and swipe at him. "For fuck's sake, would you just-!?"

His hand passed right through the owl's face. It been startling enough that Sorun had jumped back in surprise, while the Mobian didn't even seem to notice the hand that had phased harmlessly through his face. After getting over his initial surprise, Sorun carefully stepped back in front of the owl and, slowly, reached his hand back out to poke him in the face.

Nothing. He felt nothing. His hand completely passed through the owl's face, like his own hand was some sort of projection. Sorun tried everything from swiping his hand through his face to poking his eyes, but no matter what he couldn't garner a reaction from the owl, who only continued to read his newspaper. Huffing out a breath, Sorun stepped back from the owl and continued glancing around. Everyone continued to ignore him just like the owl Mobian.

"Right. Still dead," Sorun muttered. "Man, it's the end of 'Dragon's Dogma' all over again. Nobody can see me, but I can still see and hear everything." He rose his hand up to look at it. "I guess spirits like me can't interact with... what would it even be, the physical realm or whatever? World of the living? Ah, I don't know."

Disappointing, but at least he could still walk around and witness things. Wasn't a total loss if that was the case. The fact he couldn't even interact with objects put a hamper on his mood, but there was nothing he could do to help it. Honestly, he was thankful enough he was even able to do this much. He'd all but figured he'd be gone for good after dying.

"Well, I guess I'll have to hold off on haunting Antoine," Sorun sighed as he lowered his hand back to his side. "What to do, what to do... oh, yeah, I guess I should go see how my body's doing. Wonder what they did with my corpse?"

Chapter 54

Recursion Error

Episode 54- The post-life experience

"Well, ain't this just depressing to see."

Any good civilization needed a way of disposing corpses, since just leaving bodies in the streets wasn't very conducive towards promoting public hygiene. Or basic respect and decency. To that end, at the very least you needed a morgue to store the things. As far as Sorun knew there wasn't a morgue in New Mobotropolis, but there was a hospital. And more often than not they had a morgue built-in to store corpses for disposal.

Enter him phasing through and walking through walls to live out his fantasy of being a ghost as he searched around the hospital before he found the morgue in the basement. Little room, had some tables, some shelves and cabinets full of various tools Sorun didn't recognize. The backmost wall in the room had a small row of corpse cabinets, the ones with the small metal beds that slid out of the wall locked behind small, metal square doors. Most of them were closed. Except one, that had its bed extended outwards. It had a body lying on it.

Sorun's body.

He didn't really know what Mobians did with their dead. If there was a custom or something like that they followed, if they preferred burying or cremation. He didn't even think anybody in Knothole or New Mobotropolis had ever died during the duration he'd stayed in all these places since things were usually relatively alright. It somewhat surprised Sorun that they were storing his body in the morgue, but maybe they just didn't know what to do with his body. It wasn't like he ever told them what his own personal culture decided to do with people's bodies, which was either toss them in a box and throw them in a hole in the ground or just burn them to ash. But they didn't know that. So maybe they just didn't want to be disrespectful to him by disposing of the body improperly until they figured out what to do.

"This is weird." He didn't know what to feel, seeing his own body just there. All things considered it looked shockingly intact. He didn't see any signs of decay whatsoever. If it weren't for the fact it wasn't breathing and he knew for a fact the body, his body, was dead, he'd assume it was just sleeping. "It can't have been that long ago, right? Not if the body's looking like this. Unless... the hair's still white..."

Just like his spiritual form. The hair on the corpse's head was still white. Confirmed his theory that the Chaos Emeralds and their power were still in his corpse, so maybe the reason as a spirit he still possessed those powers was that he was still connected to his body somehow. Maybe. He didn't quite know, but the fact the body's hair was white was telling enough.

"Is the regeneration still keeping the body intact even though it's dead?" Sorun wondered to himself as he examined the body. "How the hell does that make sense? Or has it just really not been that long?"

It was just so unnerving, seeing his own face lying there and dead to the world. At least somebody had done him the favor of closing his eyes.

"... Maybe I can pull a Disney miracle and just, like, crawl back inside." He had heavy doubt it would work, but it wasn't like it would hurt to try. It'd be amazing if it actually did work.

Sorun had tried a variety of positions. Matching his spiritual hand up with his body's hand, his head, he'd even tried laying down in it entirely hoping he'd just merge back into the body or something. But nothing worked. All Sorun accomplished in doing was harmlessly phasing through his body over and over with no results.

"Yeah, this isn't working," Sorun muttered to himself. He'd taken a few steps away from his body, looking down at it as he thoughtfully stroked at his chin. He clicked his tongue while also humming in thought, and then materialized the Yamato. "Separation of concepts, huh...?" Sorun asked himself as he held the blade up. "Death's a concept, right? I dunno... kind of a stretch..."

Then again, splitting off one's own psyche to create two separate beings from the context of "separating man and devil" was a pretty vague concept, and that had been the entire plot of the fifth DMC game. And his own Yamato didn't necessarily follow all the same rules. Just the ability to separate anything.

The concept of death, though? It seemed out there, even for the Yamato.

"I mean... I guess I don't have anything to lose by trying..." Hesitantly, Sorun flipped the sword over in a reverse grip. "I got the regeneration, so it should all be fine. Plus ghosts can't die, right?" He held the sword out, with its tip pointed right at his chest. "'Least I hope they can't."

And so, he stuck the sword into himself far enough that the tip of the blade pierced through his back.

He staggered back a few steps, choking out a bit in pain from the katana he'd plunged into his own chest. Blue energy ran down the entire length of the silver blade, and at the same time, Sorun's spirit form began to flicker rapidly. He'd gasped out in surprise at the sight, and in less than a second later, both he and the sword disappeared entirely.

For around a minute at first, nothing happened. The entire room was silent, and the dead body on the table remained motionless. Another minute passed, and still nothing happened. The same was true for the third. At the forth, the corpse's eyes widened, and Sorun took in a deep, wheezing breath as he sat up on the table.

And then with a choked gasp he fell back down on the table. His eyes closed, and his breathing halted. Some seconds later his spirit instantly popped back into existence, lying down flat on his back on the floor with his face blank and staring up at the ceiling. Some seconds passed, after which he sighed and began to stand up.

"Worth a shot," he mumbled out as he stood up to his full height. With disappointment on his face, he turned back to his corpse. "Surprised it even worked for as long as it did," he said to himself, "but I guess dead is dead. Body can't accommodate a soul if it ain't alive; not even Yamato can change that, even if it can circumvent the rules a bit." He made a small sigh as he tilted his head. "Then again, it probably only even worked for a second because my powers are keeping my body intact. The regeneration is running on automatic, healing my body from decomposition and the damage the Emeralds' power is doing to it, fueled by the infinite energy of the Emeralds... but the body's stamina is limited, it can't keep up with all the overuse, so it can't live." Groaning, he rose a hand and rubbed at his forehead. "Shit's confusing," he concluded.

Too active to cease functioning, but too dead to support life or a soul inhabiting it. As best as Sorun could guess the seven Chaos Emeralds inside the body was the only reason the body was in this state. Still powering the body with abilities even though it was dead.

"Weird it's not crumbling to pieces like Vergil was. Maybe it's because the Emeralds are a separate source of power instead of it being my own, like it was with Vergil..." Sorun mused. "Amount of energy was never the problem. Just my stamina and the damage. It was probably a good thing I got Devil's Body last after all, since the constant regeneration might have killed me out of exhaustion way sooner than I planned for... Well, no point dwelling on it, I suppose." he turned away from the body. "Intact and empowered or not, it's still dead, and I'm still a ghost." With a deep sigh, he pocketed his hands and began to walk away from his own corpse.

"Wonder how well the others are holding up?"

He decided he might as well get the worst one out of the way first.

Nicole didn't really have a "home" in the city, per se. Or more accurately, the city itself was her home since she primarily existed in its systems as a digital entity. But Sorun knew she liked to exist in her physical form as long as she wanted to, and a lot of the time she spent time in the server rooms inside the science center. Her own special spot. Her haunt.

... Maye not the best word to use given the circumstances.

"I do not picture this going well at all," Sorun thought to himself as he looked at the front of the science center building. "Why am I... why am I even thinking? Not like anybody can hear me," he muttered out as he began walking towards the building. "What am I even hoping to find here? Not like she'll be able to see me, hear me, even know I'm there. I'm just a ghost looking out at everybody. What's the point?"

None, really, and yet he felt himself compelled to keep moving forwards regardless for no other reason than he wanted to see her. At the same time he felt nervous and anxious at the idea of seeing her again, at seeing what possible state she might be in. It made him hesitate when he finally reached the outer wall of the science center. The trepidation of it all, of seeing Nicole again.

But his desire to see her managed to outmatch the fear of it, so he'd managed to step past the wall into the main lobby of the science center. He walked past it all immediately, going to the halls and stairways, looking for one room in particular. He'd only ever been in this building once, during the Enerjak incident, but it was enough to know the general layout. So he didn't need to spend much time finding what he was looking for.

The server room didn't look like much. It was little more than a cold room crammed with servers. At least, he assumed it was kept cold. He couldn't feel the ambient temperature while walking around as a spirit. But he didn't have to search around very far to find who he was looking for.

She was sitting on the ground with her back pressed against a large server box, with her knees pressed so far into her chest that her face was obscured behind her legs. Her arms were folded up over her knees, unmoving and more or less just hanging off of them limply. Sorun saw that the black and brown lynx had a small, black object held in her right hand. A game controller. And he recognized it as the one he always used when playing with her.

"Oh, Nicole... what a mess I've made of it all." Sorun hopped up on top of one of the nearby server boxes as he looked down at her with a sad expression. "It's all my fault, I guess. If I would have just maintained that conviction I had to stay distant with you all, you wouldn't have nearly been as broken up about me dying. But I had to go and cave in to my desires, to reach out to you and others just so I wouldn't feel so terrible all the time... look where it got us." He shook his head and turned away from her. "You worked so hard to finally have a life of your own, and all I wanted to do was make sure you and everybody else got to keep your lives. No, more than that I... just wanted to live. But I couldn't see a path forwards that let me do that. And I don't even know if I even managed to accomplish saving you all.

"I... didn't mean to be this terrible of a person, Nicole... You shouldn't be wasting your life being so upset over a pathetic nobody like me..."

The door to the server room opened. Sorun looked over in its direction, while Nicole hadn't even stirred from her spot. He watched the familiar form of Sally walk into the room, and then softly close the door behind her. She'd taken a second to just stand there, like she was trying to compose herself, before she began walking away from the door. Sorun's head slowly followed the chipmunk as she walked further into the server room, before she finally stopped right in front of Nicole.

She didn't look all that well herself. An intensely gloomy expression was on Sally's face as she looked down at Nicole. Sorun had a hard time seeing if it was out of worry for her friend or if she was still mourning the death of another friend. He somewhat hoped for the former, but he had no way of knowing how long he'd actually been dead for. He was still going off the assumption it couldn't have been long since his body was still in a morgue, but there was no way of knowing until he heard someone say a number.

"Nicole." Sally's voice had come out as soft and sad at the same time. When the AI didn't even so much as move at Sally's voice, Sally let out a short breath. "Nicole, talk to me," she said, voice growing a bit more assertive. "Nobody's seen you for three days. Is this where you've been the whole time?"

"Three days, huh?" Sorun clicked in tongue. "Not as long as I would have thought."

After she finished speaking, Sally silently watched and waited for Nicole to move, or make a sound, or do anything. But she just continued to motionlessly sit there, with one of her hands still clutching the controller. Sally had softly sighed at the sight. "Nicole, please say something," she pleaded with her. "I'm not leaving until you do."

"... He's gone..."

The words came out quiet and broken, to a point that Sorun had flinched in anguish when he heard just how woeful Nicole sounded. Sally had displayed a similar reaction when she heard her, but it was when Nicole had picked her head up off of her legs so she could look at Sally that Sorun was forced to turn away from the sight.

She'd been crying. Her holographic form was apparently sophisticated enough she could shed actual tears down her face.

There'd been so much sorrow in her green eyes Sorun felt like he'd been slapped by one of his own Bringer Claws just from the sight. He could barely stand to be in the room when she was like this, could barely stand to exist at the moment knowing he was the reason she was like this. Him and his screw-ups and failures. It was all his fault somebody he held so dear was hurting like this.

"I know, Nicole." Sally looked off to the side as she rubbed at one of her arms. "It's... it's been hard on all of us. And I know you two were close." She glanced towards Nicole's hand. "What's that?"

Sorun palmed his face. "Goddammit, Sally, why'd you go and ask about the controller?"

"It was his," Nicole brokenly replied. She held the controller closer to her, cradling it with both hands as she looked down at it. "He refused to use the other one. He said the left stick on this controller often became stuck. It was handicap he used as an extra challenge to make games more fun for him." The barest hint of a smile crossed Nicole's features. "I was never able to consistently defeat him even when he was using this. He adapted to me no matter what methods I used. He... I... I very much enjoyed every second of time we spent with each other..."

The faint glimmer of happiness that had been on Nicole's face was wiped out in an instant. She looked sad enough to start breaking out into tears again, but instead she just continued to stare down at the controller.

"This is all I have left of him," she'd whispered out. "This and my memories."

Ah, right. He never really did have much in the way of possessions, did he? Especially after Knothole was lost. Really all he had was his clothes, and fortunately they'd all had the decency to leave those on him.

With slumped shoulders, Sally walked over to Nicole's position. She slowly slid down into a sitting position next to her, close enough that their shoulders were touching. "You two were really close, huh?" Sally asked her.

"From the moment we met he treated me as a real, living person. Not an AI. I had fun being with him, he... helped show me new aspects of life. Sometimes it felt like he had more respect for me than himself." She glanced off to the side. "I never got to properly thank him. For trusting me so much, for spending so much time with me, for everything he did for me, and for all the words he said to me. I... I'd wanted to ask him..." Her voice trailed off, after which her knees pressed in a bit closer. "It doesn't matter anymore. He's gone. Sorun's gone."

"I know. He was my friend, too," Sally said in a sad voice. "He was a bit strange, but... he was a good person, to join us even though we were the ones responsible for bringing him here. I just... can't stop thinking about what Shadow said, about what the Emeralds were doing to him," she muttered. "The fact he was with us through everything while going through all that, I... I just can't imagine."

"It's awful," Nicole mumbled. "He knew he was dying the entire time. He couldn't even tell us. He continued to kill himself more and more every time he touched an Emerald for our sake, and we never noticed a thing." Her face became more pained at the thought. "I can't understand how I never suspected anything, how I never saw how much pain he must have been in. He trusted me, Sally, confided so much to me that he never told any of you. I thought I was doing so much to help him in return by just being there for him, but... but I was never able to help him..." A few more tears slipped out from Nicole's eyes. "It hurts so much knowing how scared he must have been and knowing I did nothing to help him in all that time, Sally."

"Don't say that, Nicole. I know he enjoyed being with you just as much as you did," Sally said in her best attempt to sooth her friend. "If anything, it's my fault. He just... always looked so unwell, you know? There were so many times I thought he looked sicker and sicker with every passing day, but he'd always play it off or just say he was tired from missions. I always took his words at face value because I never imagined he'd be lying about something like him dying." Her own eyes began to become glossy at the mere thought. "I was the one that told him about that last Emerald. I practically told him that day was his last day to be alive, and I was so happy about it. And all he did was... w-was try and get me to not feel guilty because of that promise we made that I broke. Even when he was dying he kept trying to help us." She shook her head. "He seemed so off when I told him and I couldn't figure out why until it was too late. If I'd just known , I... I would have tried to do something to help him. He didn't deserve this."

The odd thing was that Sorun was upset they weren't talking about all his bad qualities. How he'd lied, how he'd conspired to try and kill Eggman behind their backs. If only they'd criticize him, not make him sound like this tragic hero figure they were mourning over than it could have been something that comforted Sorun and not make him feel nearly as bad as how he felt right now watching this. But unfortunately none of these qualities seemed to even come to their minds. He may as well have been a martyr the way they were talking.

Sorun would have preferred being remembered as nothing but a liar nobody liked if this was how his death was hitting people. He regretted so much not sticking to that uncaring persona of his, of acting to be so unlikeable.

"Look at us. He gave up his life for us, and all we can do is cry over him," Sally said with a sad half-smile. "Can you imagine what he'd say if he saw us right now?"

"I can't even imagine it," Sorun mumbled out as he watched the pair.

Nicole shook her head. "What would you suggest?"

"I'm not so sure myself. I'm not saying not to mourn Sorun, but, well... we have to move on eventually," Sally told her. "Besides, I don't think Sorun would like it if we spent too much time over him. He was a selfless person like that."

All Sorun could do was tiredly sigh and rub at his eyes.

"I don't want to just get over him, Sally." Nicole looked back down at the controller she clutched. "I... I miss him too much..."

Sally cast a sad glance towards her friend. She made a small sigh, reached out to gently squeeze at her shoulder in comfort, and then began to stand up. "I know, Nicole. I... know somewhat about what you're going through." She looked off to the side and began rubbing at her arm again. "I'm not gonna lie to you and say it gets easier, but... I-I'm here, you know, if you need to talk about it. You're not alone."

Nicole didn't say anything. She just continued to look down at the controller with a lost, forlorn expression, with her ears flattened against her head. It only served to make Sally a bit more downcast, after which she began to turn around.

"Just... you know where to find me if you need me," she said as she began moving away. "I'll come back and check on you later, alright?"

"... He wanted one last game with me." Nicole's words caused Sally to stop and turn back towards the lynx. Her focus was still on the controller. "Sorun. He knew he would die the next day, and he wanted to spend the last of his time with me. And I said no." Tears began falling from her face. "I shouldn't have said no. I didn't know. I'd made so many plans for after that mission, I had so much I wanted to say to him, I... I-I thought we had so much more time..."

Sally's arms sagged to her side as she looked towards her friend. "Oh, Nicole..."

"I can't watch this anymore." Sorun hopped off of the server box, walked right through Sally, and made his way towards the nearest wall. "Christ, I... I screwed it all up so badly..."

All he'd wanted to do was save them. He didn't know it would turn out this badly. He didn't know he would have failed. He didn't want any of this...

He decided to drop in on Virgil afterwards to see how his Chao was doing. It'd taken some searching around since he didn't know which house Cream and Vanilla lived in, and there were so many homes in the residential district that Sorun felt it would have taken too much time to individually search every home. He'd almost given up entirely until he'd actually found Cream. She'd been walking alongside with Amy, and they'd both had armloads of bags filled with fruits, bread, and other foodstuffs. Sorun assumed Amy had been helping Cream with groceries, and chose to follow them in the hopes it'd lead to the rabbit's home. To his luck that's exactly where they'd gone to.

Wasn't much to say about the place; it wasn't all too dissimilar to the rest of the surrounding houses. Only thing Sorun could see of note was the garden full of vegetables out in front, and even more along the sides of the house. All comprised of what looked like clay pots filled with what he assumed to be actual soil as opposed to the artificial soil the city sat on top of. Under any other circumstances he would have been amused to see the garden pots were mainly filled with carrots, though there were other vegetables growing out from them that he could see.

Another thing he could see was his Chao sitting behind one of the windows to the house. Even from out here he could see the silver crest that was on top of his head, the cylindrical horns. He saw that Virgil wasn't really looking out towards anything in particular. Just aimlessly staring, really, with a sad frown on his face. Sorun would be the first to admit Virgil wasn't exactly a happy-looking Chao regularly, but even this seemed pretty glum for him.

"Thank you so much for helping me, Mrs. Amy!" Hearing Cream's voice caused Sorun to turn his face towards the pair. The smaller rabbit girl was looking up at the pink hedgehog with a beaming smile on her face. "Mother has been terribly busy around the house, you see, and I was worried I wouldn't be able to carry all this back by myself."

Amy mirrored Cream's own smile. "It's not a problem, Cream, don't mention it. I'm happy to help."

At first, Cream's smile had brightened up all that much more at hearing Amy's words. But then she'd turned towards her house, and she must have seen Virgil sitting at the window and staring out. It was the only explanation Sorun could think of for why her smile would lower down a bit right there. "Um, Mrs. Amy?" She looked back up at Amy. "When is Mr. Sorun coming to check in on Virgil? It's been an awful long time since I've seen him, and I think poor Virgil is starting to worry about him..."

The smile Amy wore visibly wavered, to a point Sorun flinched just by seeing it. She did her best to keep the smile up, but he'd have to be blind not to see the pain that was in her eyes. Cream, for being either too young or too innocent or both, fortunately had not seen the change in her. "O-oh, uh, Sorun, he's... I don't think he's gonna come around for a... you know, a long while," Amy tried telling her. "He's... busy with... actually, why don't I help you get all this food inside?"

"She doesn't know? I woulda thought my death would have been kind of a big thing after everything I did," Sorun mumbled to himself in confusion. He looked back towards his sad Chao sitting at the window, and then towards a now-confused Cream looking up at Amy. "Oh, did they just not tell Cream?" Sorun realized. "Yeah, guess I can't blame them. Nobody wants to be that guy that has to tell the kid somebody died. She's like, what, six? Somewhere around there?"

He didn't know the exact number, but he knew it was younger than Tails. Sure, he may have been introduced to the concept first-hand at a way younger age than even that, but those were special circumstances and humans held different values than Mobians. Even then back on Earth he didn't know anybody that'd want to willingly explain something like somebody dying to someone as young as Cream was, so he could see why Mobians would try and steer way clear of the subject. It was practically a natural reaction. Hell, he'd probably be on the same side of the fence as them in that regard.

Whether he actually agreed with it or not was something he couldn't make up his mind about, but again, he couldn't blame 'em.

"Huh?" Cream had blinked up at Amy amidst her confusion. "But doesn't Mr. Sorun want to know how Virgil is doing?"

"I... I'll go ahead and tell him!" The fake smile that was on Amy's face almost brought pain to Sorun as he watched the display. "How's that... nice ... Chao been doing living with you and your mom?"

"Oh, he's been absolutely wonderful!" Cream exclaimed as the pair began walking back towards the house. The answer had been one that caused visible surprise to show on both Sorun and Amy. "He's very strong for a Chao! Sometimes he helps my mother tending to the vegetables in the garden." The front door to the house was opened. "Mother cannot stop talking about how much she appreciates..."

The rest of the conversation was lost on Sorun as the two Mobians entered the house, with the door closing behind them. He could have chosen to follow in after them, but he felt he'd heard enough. Between that and the sad-looking Chao sitting at the window, he'd heard more than enough.

"Well... at least he seems to be doing fine. Glad he actually listened to me about not terrorizing the family looking after him," Sorun said to himself. "Amy's taking it all well, too, so there's that. Either that or she's putting up a brave face for Cream. Ugh, I don't know." After running a hand over his face, Sorun turned away from the house and began walking away. "I'm regretting this more and more by the second..."

By now Sorun wasn't even sure where he was supposed to go. In fact, he didn't even know if he should even keep going on at this point knowing he was going to find more of the same: his friends being sad and Sorun being disgusted at himself for letting things devolve into such a state. He didn't know what the point was of doing this.

He was really more of in a daze than anything else by now. A sad, depressed daze.

So to that end, Sorun's feet carried him to the airfield where the aircraft was kept for some reason. If he had to guess, it was because he wanted to see Tails, and if he was anywhere, it was usually near his plane. He was a bit worried about him, about if he blamed himself for what happened with Sorun since he'd been the one to decode those coordinates on the wood tablet and had been the one to drag Sorun to this world kicking and screaming. Now he was dead as a result, and Tails, well... Sorun wouldn't know until he saw him.

When he walked into the air hangar, he immediately was drawn towards the blue biplane sitting in the center of the hangar. Near the top he saw Tails' yellow-orange body, with his front half completely buried in the plane's internals through an open hatch. Burying himself in his work, then, somewhat literally. Could be a good sign or a bad sign, but he was always somewhat of a workaholic when it came to his own projects. Could be he was trying to cope by working his thoughts away, or maybe he was completely over it and this was just business as normal for him. No way to know for sure, and it wasn't as if he could just go up to him and ask.

"Strange fate, is it not, Tails?" Sorun asked as he stepped in front of the plane. "I'm not gonna lie. I hated you at first. I tried not to, I tried seeing things from your perspective, tried putting myself in your shoes, but... it was hard." He took in a deep breath. "I... fantasized about clawing your face clean off. On the one-month anniversary of me being here. Almost did, managed to stop myself just in time since... since you were just a kid trying to save the world and all his friends. Kinda like me, I guess. How could I hate that? I guess because I was too selfish to see past myself." Sorun paused. "I managed to find forgiveness for you eventually, and I'll admit it may have taken way longer than any decent person should have taken. But I did, somewhere down the line. Now I just hate myself more than anything because of everything I've put everyone through. I'm left wondering why the hell I was even born if this was what I was gonna wind up doing. Be some failure that did more harm than good to everyone." He turned around and leaned on one of the plane's wheels. "Things would be different if I hadn't died. Failing to kill Eggman is one thing, that's a mistake that can be fixed, but having that be my last act, leaving things like this... I just feel like I've permanently ruined something.

"But, you'll survive. You're eleven and you managed to outlast me. Not really saying much seeing how big a loser I am, but you get the idea. I just kind of hope you'll eventually forget about me, because this guilt shit is soul-crushing."

The only thing that answered Sorun was the cranking sound of a wrench tightening screws and bolts inside of the plane. He couldn't help but sigh as a result.

He'd almost walked away right there when Sorun saw a blue object zoom into his vision. He blinked in surprise, and when he opened his eyes he saw Sonic standing across from him. Looking up at the plane where Tails was while tapping his foot on the ground in an impatient manner.

"Yo, Tails!" Sonic called up. "You busy?"

"A little bit, yeah," the fox called back down, still in the plane.

Sonic sighed and shook his head. "Busy with anything important ?"

"Plane is important."

"Tails, come on." The hedgehog quickly ran his hand through his quills. "Your parents are starting to get worried. They've barely seen you for the past few days. Geez, I'm starting to get worried. Can we just talk?"

Another sigh, this time from Tails. It came out from inside the plane as the young Mobian finally poked his head up out of the plane's innards. He looked down at Sonic, and with another sigh, he spun his two tails up and hovered up off the plane, only to slowly lower himself back onto the ground. The tails ceased rotating after his feet touched the ground, followed by Tails looking up at Sonic's face.

"What do you want?" he asked. Sorun, still leaning on the plane's wheel off to the side, couldn't help but notice how tired Tails looked. The way his eyes were slightly sunken in and darkened around the rims.

"You've been getting enough sleep, right, Tails?" Sonic asked, a hint of worry to his voice.

"Mm-hm." With a small, noncommittal hum, Tailed turned around to the plane. "I just... you know, can't stop thinking about..." Tails' voice trailed off, and without another word he began to walk towards the back of the plane.

Sonic made a sigh as he watched Tails go off. "Sorun?" he finished for him.

"Yeah." Tails stopped at the tail of the plane, and then looked up as his own two-tailed logo stamped on the side. "It's not my fault he's gone, is it, Sonic?"

"Huh?" Sonic blinked, and then opened his eyes widely. "N-no, no way! Not at all!" Shaking his head and hands in a "no" gesture, Sonic began to approach Tails' back. "Sorun, he... he... it ain't your fault, bud."

"But I'm the one that brought him here, aren't I?" Tails mumbled out while looking up at the logo. "I'm the one who built that machine with Chuck and Rotor's help. I'm the one that figured out the numbers and opened the portal. And... and I'm the one that pulled him through that portal when he didn't want to come here." He reached up and began to run his hand along the logo. "Now he's gone and it just feels like it's my fault somehow. I mean, he was here because of me, right?"

"Tails..." Sonic stopped right behind the fox and put a hand on his shoulder. "He's not gone 'cause of you."

"... He was always off around Chaos Emeralds, you know?" Tails' voice had gone a little bit higher and at the same time quieter. "L-like when Knuckles brought us to that mountain, a-and he didn't want to touch it. The entire time back he wouldn't stop glaring at it. He and Shadow kept shouting at each other, and that's when he ran away." He made a small hiccup. "He said he didn't want to die, and I- and I told him he wouldn't..."

Sorun saw Sonic flinch back from what Tails told him as his expression grew more sad. He nearly felt the same himself seeing what was happening to Tails. This is what he'd been afraid of happening.

"Yeah. I remember when he got that second Emerald," Sonic said, making Tails freeze. "Knuckles, he... tossed it into Sorun's hands, and Sorun, he... yeah, he kept bashing Knuckles into the wall with his new arms afterwards." He'd attempted to make a small smile at the memory, though it just came out as a grimace. "I laid into him over it afterwards, told him he couldn't just attack people like that, but... I mean, I don't know if I can even blame the guy anymore if they really were taking time off his life like that. Which I guess is why he was kept from ever talking about it..." His hand slipped off of Tails' shoulder.

"I just feel bad," Sonic continued in a noticeably sadder voice, making Tails turn towards him. "It-it just doesn't sit right with me, knowing he was probably asking for help that entire time and none of us ever picked up on it. There were times he was acting weird and I just couldn't figure out why, and I- I should have known something was off with him, but I didn't." His shoulder slumped downwards. "If anything it's my fault he got dragged into our problems," he said. "I'm the one that talked him into being a Freedom Fighter when he really didn't want to be one. I get where you were coming from, Tails, since... I mean it was really bad back then, wasn't it?" he asked, looking to Tails for help, who gave him a slow, sad nod in response. "A-and he did a really good job, too. Saved Antoine that one time, fought with us on all those missions, helped us with his portals, sheesh, he saved us all after Knothole... you know. He... he came back, knowing if he kept using those Emeralds they'd kill him down the line." He looked off to the side, making a sad, broken chuckle. "I just... really respect him for that, you know? But at the same time I wish he hadn't gone through with it. He shouldn't have had to die. I shoulda seen all the signs and kept him from touching any more of those Emeralds. Should have known him saying he was 'tired' all the time was more than just excuses..." Sonic made small, despondent grin. "He really pulled one over all us, huh?"

Tails didn't respond to the question, and neither did Sorun, even if it'd just end up with him talking with himself. They all just continued to stare towards one another with gloomy looks, and with Tails' eyes being just the slightest amount damp.

"I miss him," Tails finally confessed. "He was nice to be around."

"I know, bud. I do too. He kept my room tidy more than I did. Mom always liked that about him." The small joke caused the both of them to chuckle a bit, and even Sorun had cracked somewhat of a small grin in response. It faded away quickly back to the sad expressions. "It feels like Tommy all over again, and everyone else we've lost over time," Sonic said. "And it's... it's just not getting any easier for me. It's hurting more every time."

Tails made a sigh and looked at the ground. "I know what you mean," he agreed, a few tears falling from his eyes and hitting the floor. "Maybe he'll come back?"

Sonic grimaced a bit at that. "T-Tails, come on, you know better than that." Sonic looked off to the side. "Yeah, his... his body's not degrading for some reason, and it's throwing all the doctors for a loop and a half, but... he's dead, Tails." He reached up and began rubbing the side of his head. "We're still trying to figure out what we're even gonna do with his body. He never told any of us what his people do with their dead."

"But Shadow said Sorun talked with Aurora and Athair," Tails argued. "I know Knuckles said he wasn't having any luck with contacting them, but couldn't they help? They brought Knuckles back to life when he died, didn't they?"

Sorun's head snapped to Tails. "What?"

"Yeah, but that was a really specific thing," said Sonic. "And you can't tell me you actually want to ask them for help?" He crossed his arms and made a soured face. "Rubs me the wrong way, what they did to Sorun... it wasn't right..."

"I... I know. I still can't believe Athair would do something like that," Tails agreed as his ears lowered down a bit. They went right back up as he looked back at Sonic. "But Knuckles didn't even have a body to go back to and they helped him come back! Sorun's is still here, so couldn't they bring him back like they did him?"

"Fucking what?"

"Well... maybe, I don't know. I honestly don't have a clue how a lot of this Chaos stuff works," Sonic admitted with a shrug. "And like you said, Knuckles couldn't even contact them anyways even though he's been mediating or whatever he does on that island, so it's not like we can ask..."

The rest of Sonic's words were lost as Sorun stomped away from the plane and out from the hangar. He made it as far as the middle of the airfield's runway before he was forced to stop completely. He took an extremely long inhale, held it for what felt like a full minute, and then slowly exhaled it in what was probably the most impressive form of self-control he'd ever displayed.

It did absolutely nothing to calm him down.

"Oh, so that's just a thing they can do, huh...?" Sorun's hands clenched at his sides, and they began shaking. "Bring back the dead? That's a thing you can do, huh, Aurora? Didn't think it'd be something important to mention at some point, HUH?"

Bolts of blue electricity began arcing over Sorun's entire form. His anger began to grow at an exponential rate as more and more electricity began to savagely arc around him.

"All this time, you could have done that...? I could have avoided hurting everybody like this if you'd just brought me back...!?"

He was livid. Furious. Enraged. Words alone didn't cover the sheer amount of anger that had began to well up in Sorun as he realized the implications of the conversation between Sonic and Tails he overheard.

Knuckles died once. And the Neo-Walkers brought him back to life. Meanwhile he was dead in part because of them and they'd yet to even lift a finger to help him.

"You damn echidna..." Yamato instantly appeared in Sorun's left hand. "I made her cry... over nothing? I'm dead over nothing!?"

He savagely tore the Yamato out from its sheath so quickly bolts of blue lightning shot out from the sheath. The blade cut right through the air with an angered shout, leaving a thick, blue gash hanging in the space right in front of him. In that small section of space, reality itself cracked apart like glass as a portal was forced open ahead of Sorun.

With a grunt, Sorun slammed the sword back into its scabbard. He took a breath that yet again failed to calm him, and then brushed some of his long, white hair out from his face. The bolts of electricity arcing around him ceased once he got his breathing under control, and he opened his eyes up at the portal in front of him.

"Alright. Alright alright alright... let's not get ahead of ourselves here. If it's too good to be true..." His hands began shaking against, and his left knuckles whitened from his tight hold on Yamato. "No, fuck that, they knew . They knew this entire time, and they let it all happen anyway." He began stomping towards the portal. "Fine, we'll just see what they have to say for themselves. One last thing to do first..."

The second he'd crossed the portal to the other side he'd unsheathed Yamato, swiped it behind him to close it, and then slipped the sword back into its scabbard all in the same motion, his intense anger sharpening his focus and concentration. The sanctuary inside what Tikal had called the Ancient Onyx greeted him once he arrived. Both Tikal and Chaos were right there, sitting next to the pond right in front of him. Both had looked towards him with startled eyes when Sorun had appeared. Or at least as startled as Chaos could look in his case.

The sight of them and the Chao sitting around was probably the only thing that gave Sorun some semblance of mental control at the moment. He was still angry beyond words, but he was thinking straighter now, with more coherent thoughts. Thoughts that began to form questions.

Why? Why hadn't the Neo-Walkers told him they had an ability to bring the dead back to life? Why'd they keep it from him? Was there some piece of context he was missing? Was it not that simple? Did they just not like him? Was it because they didn't think he deserved it since he failed to kill Eggman? Why? Why was he abandoned, especially after everything he'd done? Had they simply forgotten ?

Why, why, why...?

"Sorun?" Tikal, seeing the incredibly distressed look on Sorun's face, had immediately risen up to her feet and approached his side. Chaos was not far behind her. "Y-you look awful! What happened?" she asked in clear worry.

"Tikal, I... they..." A loud clack! was heard as Sorun gnashed his teeth together, and he shook his head. "I can't do it. I can't stand to see everybody like this. Nicole, she... I'm not doing this. I'm done being dead."

Blue lightning began to arc around Yamato's scabbard and the sword held within. Tikal had cast wary eyes down at it, and slowly she began to look back up at Sorun. "S-Sorun, I... I do not understand..."

"I don't understand either, Tikal. I really don't." Sorun used his thumb to lift the Yamato out from its scabbard by a few inches. "But I'll get my answers yet," he said. He turned to look at her, expression relaxing just the slightest amount. "I just wanted to come and say thanks for helping me out, and to say goodbye."

His hand wrapped around the sword's handle, and slowly he began to pull it out from the sparking scabbard.

"You see, I've decided it's time I visited a couple of echidna I know."

Chapter 55

Recursion Error

Episode 55- +1 life

The only other time Sorun remembered having ever been so intensely focused was actually in recent memory. During that last stretch when he'd gone to go kill Eggman. Nothing, absolutely nothing else, registered in his very being than the goal he'd been staring at. Not the sights of the world around him, not the sounds or smells, nothing. Even his own thoughts had been solely aimed at that one objective: cut his head off.

And now, for a second time, Sorun once again had that focus. It was almost like his body had been on autopilot when he tore the portal open with his sword. He didn't recognize the world that seemed to be made of golden clouds that he stepped into. All he could think about were the two echidna that lived here. The ones that had dragged his consciousness here when he got that first Emerald.

The ones that apparently had the ability to revive the dead.

"Aurora. Athair. What the hell are you two playing at with me...?"

So now all of a sudden people could be brought back to life. It'd been that way Tails had said it, just the way he described Knuckles being revived one time being so... nonchalant. Like it was a common occurrence on Mobius. For all he knew it was, because everything fucking weird happened on that planet. And he knew Knuckles knew them, he told Sorun so himself. Would have also been nice if he'd mentioned they'd revived him at one point, but it was a moot point now.

"Sorun, please, reconsider!"

A pair of arms grasped Sorun's right and halted him. He stopped, and then turned around. He saw Tikal clinging onto his arm, having run through the portal he came from and neglected to close. She had a pleading look in her eyes.

"I just want to talk to them." Sorun pulled his arm from her. "Go home, Tikal. This has nothing to do with you."

"Then why do you feel like this?" She stepped to his side, still looking into his eyes. "I... feel so much anger, so much rage... it reminds me of how Chaos felt, when the Servers were threatened, but... this feels so much worse..."

"I just found out the same people that forced me to go through all these hoops that lead to my death might have the power to bring me back, and they said nothing about it. How am I supposed to be feeling?"

Tikal flinched back at Sorun's cold words. "I... just do not want you to do something you would regret..." she mumbled out.

By just the barest amount, Sorun's expression softened. Tikal was a caring person to be going this far for somebody she barely knew for a day, he'd give her that much. Her just appearing like that managed to calm him down just that much. "Like I said. I just want to talk," he repeated, hoping to put her somewhat at ease. "But... fine. Come along if you want. Portal's right there when you wanna go back."

He walked away before she could get a response in, though he saw her still following him from his peripheral. He didn't much care. She could do what she wanted. He just wanted to find those Neo-Walkers.

It'd taken some time walking through all the golden clouds, enough time he felt like they'd been going in circles and were lost, but eventually he spotted a large clearing of the clouds, an open spot in this place that mimicked a golden sky. He faintly saw a pair standing off down there in that direction. And as such, he'd Tricked right in front of them.

Sorun had appeared right in front of them, hands in his pockets and a face that would have appeared completely calm if the fury in his eyes didn't give his true emotions away. Right in front of him were the exact two he was expecting to find. The same two echidna from all the way back then. An old male echidna. A younger-looking female echidna. Athair and Aurora. Aurora and Athair. Neo-Walkers.

"Yo. It's been a while," Sorun greeted in a quiet, blank voice. "You sure look surprised to see me."

Surprised they did indeed look, with their eyes so wide it was comical. Aurora even had her mouth gaping open in surprise she seemed so shocked to see Sorun standing there. Like they couldn't believe what they were looking at. It was enough that Aurora had slightly stuttered out a bit before she began speaking.

"This shouldn't be possible," Aurora had whispered out while looking at Sorun.

Sorun made a "tsk" noise. "Those ain't the words I wanna hear."

Athair spoke up next. "How... how did you manage to breach our Virtual Zone?"

"How do you think?" Sorun glanced back and forth between the two of them once. "For beings toting themselves as all-seeing gods... you're not so good at the 'seeing' part, are you?" One of his eyelids began twitching. "I've been having a lot of bad luck with echidna calling themselves gods. You two, Enerjak-" Aurora flinched at the mention of Enerjak's name, "-, it's just all so absurd. And not one of you ever made the impression of being gods to me. Just posers with powers."

Tikal chose that moment to run up to the three, and then stopped at Sorun's side, panting softly while holding her knees. The two Neo-

Walkers shifted their gazes to her while Sorun glanced to the side at her.

"Tikal-"

"You two!" The sudden shout that interrupted Sorun caused him to flinch back from Tikal, mostly from not having expected her to raise her voices like that. The other two echidna, meanwhile, grew a bit nervous as she began to stomp towards them. "What do you two have to say for yourselves!?"

Athair blinked in surprise at the younger echidna, and then squinted and leaned his head in closer to get a better look at her. His eyes then widened in realization when he seemed to recognize her. "You... you're the caretaker of the seven Servers and their protector," Athair said, causing some surprise to show on Aurora's face. "What... why are you here?" He glanced at the side at Sorun. "You're with him?"

"I saved him when I sensed his soul lost between realms," Tikal informed them. She tried to sound calm, but there was a hint of anger to her tone that made all three around her back up a bit. "He told me everything you've done to him."

At that, both the red echidna glanced at each other. Sorun felt his anger spike when they had the audacity to actually look ashamed of themselves, after which they turned back to Tikal.

"Caretaker, please try and understand our position," Aurora attempted. "We foresaw the entire world of Mobius at stake. There was no other... he was unwilling-"

"And that gave you a right to take matters into your own hands!?" she shouted at her. "He told me you'd placed a curse on him that prevented him from speaking of his ailments! You... you used him! A living creature with their own will and desires!"

"And what good it managed to do," Sorun drawled out, still standing behind Tikal with his hands tucked in his pockets. "I played your song and dance, got killed off by the Emeralds, and Eggman's still running around free and alive. Hope you're happy with yourselves."

"Yes, we... we know this," Athair informed them, looking down to avoid eye contact with the pair. "We were not able to view those events as they transpired, so we'd assumed the worst in that you failed."

Sorun scoffed and rolled his eyes. "Nice to know you care. And that you really are terrible at watching things from your high perch."

"We were blocked," Aurora cut in, sternly looking at Sorun. "There are many thing that are... blocked, from us surrounding you."

"Blocked?" Sorun repeated, with an air of disbelief to his voice. "By what?"

Both Athair and Aurora glanced at each other. For some reason, for just a second, they'd looked fearful. And then it was wiped away when they looked back at Sorun. "We can't tell you," Athair said in a grim tone.

"Can't tell me- you know what, fine, I don't care." Shaking his head Sorun began to walk towards Aurora. "You used me. Put that curse on me, had your pal Merlin keep tabs on me to make sure I kept dancin' to your tune. I don't even know how many times you made my heart stop with that curse." He stopped right in front of Aurora, barely any more than a nose's length away from her. "You forced me to kill myself for some cause I never signed up for."

Unlike Athair, who stood off to the side in mixtures of nervousness and shame, Aurora stared into Sorun's eyes with a steely, adamant gaze that directly competed with his furious eyes. "I forced you to do nothing," she stated, and the sheer defiance in her voice only made Sorun that much angrier. "At worst, I encouraged you. You had the ability to remove the curse yourself with that sword, and yet you refused. You chose to chase the rest of the Emeralds. You chose to uphold the mission of saving the world. You dying was your choice . The curse was simply meant to ensure you could never inform the others and jeopardize your path for when you changed your mind."

"Oh, and you were so sure I'd go along with it, huh?"

"Did you not?" Aurora challenged.

She had him there. All the curse did was keep his mouth shut about the fatal side effects of the Emeralds. At the end of the day, he'd been the one to absorb the Emeralds just to amass power for no other reason than he wanted enough power to kill Eggman. They hadn't been the ones that brought him here, nor did they even force that first Emerald on him.

But there was still the principle of the matter there for Sorun. Regardless of intentions, regardless of how it swung in the end, they still did all that with the intent to use him, to have him go on a suicide mission. They still treated him like a sacrificial pawn even if he eventually agreed to it without even regarding his feelings towards the matter. That , he couldn't forgive. The principle of it. The total disregard for his life in their eyes.

"You used the excuse of saving the world to end my life. You're manipulative scum."

"And you are the height of supreme arrogance to think your life is equal to billions," Aurora said back in an icy tone. "A foreigner to this world who had no regard but for a handful who reside on Mobius. I have no regrets."

"Tch." Sorun began backing up away from them. "At least tell me if I did enough to save the future or not," he said as he stopped at Tikal's side, who was still silently fuming at the two.

"..." A deep sigh left Aurora. "We don't know."

"What she means to say," Athair quickly added at seeing Sorun grow visibly upset, "is that our foresight into the future has been significantly disrupted." A small sigh left him as the aged echidna clasped his hands behind his back. "You were never supposed to arrive on Mobius, Sorun," he explained. "The future we saw, the visions given to us by our closeness with the Chaos Force, never foresaw you. Your mere appearance in this world had changed the visions. A path of destruction should you do nothing by Robotnik's hands-"

"- And a future of uncertainty should you act," Aurora finished. "But the longer you carried on, the more you ingratiated yourself with the world and changed natural events, the more blurry our sight of the future became." She paused, her expression changing to looked unsettled. "Simply put... your actions have been so significant that it is impossible to tell what the future holds. You changed too much. And that sword you carry doesn't help." She looked almost disgusted when she said the word 'sword'. "That... thing passively disrupts time and space just by existing. It would be harmless on its own, but it contributed towards the degradation of our ability to see the future. I can't tell you if your actions were able to save the future or not, because we simply cannot tell anymore."

So that was it. He'd made too many waves, did too many things. Their foresight was ruined as a result.

